The Golden Dwarf

A Sensational Romance of To-Day.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "A Keeper of Secrets," "Hate, the Destroyer,"
"A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

SYNOPSIS OF FIRST INSTALMENT OF "GOLDEN DWARF."

"It is the body of Sir Christopher Dering!"

The words are spoken by a pretty girl—fair-haired, blue-eyed. She stands, horrified, by a grass-grown ditch in a country lane, out of which a great mastiff is climbing. The ditch contains the corpse of a stalwart man—a handkerchief bound over his mouth and nostrils.

Close to there is a strange figure, graceful, well-dressed, even handsome, but with the stature of a boy and the face of an adult. He carries a heavy dog-whip, and stares, fixedly, at the dead body just discovered by his mastiff, Cerberus.

The girl is Esther Carew; the dwarf, Otto Hare, the richest landowner in Derbyshire, and the mystery of Wyresdale, a village in that county. For the first time in fifteen years he has set foot in a public thoroughfare, to attract the attention of Esther, whom he has watched from his park.

Sir Christopher Dering was alive at seven o'clock the preceding day. He and his nephew, Felix, had quarrelled over the latter's love for Esther. Sir Christopher wanted Felix to make a good marriage—the birth of his little cousin Brian has put him out of the succession to the baronetcy. Felix is faithful to the penniless Esther Carew.

Much turns on the whereabouts of Felix on the night before. It appears that he was in Duchester, some miles off, whither he went on business, and spent a night at the theatre. Could he have killed the squire?

Otto Hare would like to suggest that he did—Esther's mercenary mother accepts his hints. She wants the Golden Dwarf for a son-in-law.

Felix is secretly loved by Judith Garland, a striking brunette, Lady Dering's companion. She has a wastrel brother, Neal, who is unaccountably in Wyresdale, and who is demanding money. This, by an affectation of sisterly solicitude, Judith obtains, as a cheque, from Felix Dering. The cheque is payable to bearer.

Otto Hare has an ally, a strange German physician, Joseph Kraft, who lives with him at Wyresdale Park, the Golden Dwarf's residence. He is an object of much curiosity to Archibald Geddes, a clever assistant at the Wyresdale Pharmacy, which is kept by a drunken old chemist, Caleb Forester.

Caleb has a charming daughter, Connie, whom Geddes is making bashful love to. She is Esther's friend, and quarrels with Geddes for crediting the rumour that Felix killed his uncle.

A one-armed sailor has suddenly appeared in Wyresdale. At the chemist's shop he encounters Kraft, whom he follows, and on the strength of some past episode attempts to blackmail. Kraft repulses him, but is dexterously tracked by the sailor to a curious fort-like structure in Wyresdale Park.

While spying on this the sailor is attacked by a huge dog, which he stabs. He is seen by Kraft and the Golden Dwarf.

Esther tells Felix of her mother's plan to marry her to Otto Hare. They swear constancy in an old and picturesque oath. Felix returns to Dering House, to be asked by the child Brian if it is true Felix has taken his father away.

Judith Garland shows Felix several links of a chain he has been in the habit of wearing. They are bloodstained. She adds that they were found near the cross roads, where Sir Christopher's body was discovered, and that, moreover, Felix was seen near the place at ten o'clock on the night when he was supposed to be in Duchester. She assures him she will keep his secret.

Felix in vain protests his innocence. At this moment an inspector of the local police is announced.

Felix Dering staggers—is he dreaming, the prey of some hideous nightmare?

A caution sounds in his ears; Judith Garland is speaking to him. "Don't look like that," she whispers, "pull yourself together."

CHAPTER IV.

DR. KRAFT TAKES A WALK.

"CURSE it, why am I not like other men? The girl loathes me, Kraft; I can see it in her face."

The Golden Dwarf flung himself pettishly into a leather-covered lounge—spattered from end to end with the grey ash of consumed tobacco. He had just entered the private sitting-room of the singular German physician whom he had permanently installed at Wyresdale Park.

Joseph Kraft looked shrewdly at his diminutive patron. The elephantine figure of the German was extended in a creaking wicker-chair, a cigar in a corner of his big mouth. On his knee was an oblong cage, of wire and wood, empty. Its late tenants, a dozen small and gaily-coloured tropical birds, were fluttering about his massive head and clean-shaven visage.

"That is better," he retorted, in his deep bass, holding out a fat finger for a parroquet to perch on; "than if she should despise you. My birds feared me to begin with; now their affection begins to grow, as flowers in sunshine. Sugar-plums, flattery, and good-temper have made them mine. So you must tame the love-bird Esther."

He laid down his Havana and put a glossy rape-seed between his lips—the parroquet flew on to his chin and picked the dainty out of his mouth. The German smiled and started to hum a tune. Presently he broke into the words,

"It was upon a Monday,
Upon a Monday free,
That Mynheer Jacob van Artevelde
Unto his men said he:"

Otto Hare fidgeted impatiently. "Confound your new pets, Kraft," he interrupted; "they have begun to get on my nerves. If you would christen one of them Felix Dering and wring its neck, it might reconcile me to the rest."

Joseph Kraft smiled genially and clapped his great hands. With a babel of shrill chirpings, the flock of birds wheeled about him for a moment, and then settled in the cage. Their owner secured it, and placed the receptacle on a stand. The German was singing a fresh stanza of the curious Flemish ditty:

"And when he came to Bruges town,
The meisjes sprang from bed,
And found Mynheer van Artevelde
With a cross-bolt through his head."

Dr. Kraft spun round and commenced to rub his plump palms together.

"The Golden Dwarf" is simply enthralling.

"So you are still hungry for the blood of Mr. Felix Dering," he said. "My impulsive friend, have I not shown you a better way? Did you carry out my instructions touching your visit this afternoon to the worthy Mrs. Carew?"

The Golden Dwarf produced a flat gold case and lighted a cigarette.

"To the letter," he answered. "I represented Wyresdale as ringing with the suggestion that Dering was accountable for his uncle's death, Sir Christopher and he having quarrelled the day previous to the discovery of the body. I also permitted my interest in Esther to be seen, and felt Mrs. Carew's pulse as to Dering's connection with her daughter. You were right; the mother will work for me. She threw Dering over without hesitation."

Kraft started to gather up a batch of papers that littered a writing-table hard by. The apartment in which the two men were conversing was large and bright, yet phenomenally untidy, and spattered everywhere with cigar ash. Chemical flasks, jars, and test-tubes stood about, books mingled with manuscripts on shelves and carpet, and a fire-proof safe, open, showed its pale green interior between the windows. Outside were the velvet lawns and thick plantations of Wyresdale Park.

"Am I not always right?" observed the German, responding to the other's final sentence. "My dear Hare, you perceive in me your benevolent fairy godfather. Strongly as I disapprove of your sudden passion for this girl, from the instant I saw she was necessary to your happiness I determined, at all costs, to bring about your marriage with her. Who but I warned you that Dering was your rival, who but I pointed out the possibility of connecting him with his uncle's murder?"

The Golden Dwarf rose and contemplated his mentor cynically; Otto Hare's tiny frame and proud features lent a certain grace to his scornful attitude.

"Fairy godfather or familar demon," he said; "I care not which you are, Kraft, provided you win me Esther Carew for my wife."

"It shall be done," declared Joseph Kraft, shaking his papers into order; "you must have a little patience, that is all. But to business; you have not glanced at my notes for days."

He held out a bundle of sheets, covered closely by lines of cipher, resembling the hieroglyphics of a stenographer, or those of some Oriental script. Otto Hare waved the folios aside.

"I am in no humour for work," he replied; "I shall go and look at the dogs."

Kraft was locking away his papers in the safe.

"A love-sick man desires solitude," he commented briefly; "so be it."

The Golden Dwarf lit another cigarette.

"I wish," he muttered, "we could discover the blackguard who stabbed Cerberus. He had only a single arm, I thought."

Joseph Kraft laughed uneasily.

"A trick of perspective," he said; "I myself saw both his arms. Some poacher probably."

"What was a poacher doing near the——?" asked Otto Hare, significantly, and leaving the query unfinished.

Kraft turned and chirruped to his birds.

"You are not yourself, my dear Hare," he decided; "if I did not know you to be suffering from the tender passion, I should say you were getting—morbid."

The Golden Dwarf shrugged his shoulders and left the room without answering. Joseph Kraft paused reflectively in the middle of the apartment, the late sunshine gleaming on the lenses of his wide spectacles.

"Otto, my friend," he murmured; "you are becoming more difficult to drive on what you call a loose rein. Well, I have a strong wrist and I fancy the tackles will hold. But, you must have no doubt upon this point—the man who dispatched the unpleasant Cerberus had two arms—oh, yes, he had two arms, beyond question. If you believed otherwise, now that you have returned to the external world, Otto, and were to notice in Wyresdale a seafaring person with one arm, you would have a bad attack of that stupid English disease, the 'funk.' And then you might take the bit between your white teeth and all my two years of labour would go for nothing. Perhaps, Otto, it is fortunate you are in love—it will occupy your mind."

He donned his soft straw hat, twisted the key in the door of the chamber, pocketed the complicated steel trifle, and walked downstairs—his private room was on an upper floor of the Golden Dwarf's huge residence.

The house itself was a white stone building, with a classic portico, marble steps, and two tall and shallow wings. It was elevated on a terrace, reached by a sweeping double file of Scotch firs.

Dr. Joseph Kraft did not follow the course of the avenue, but struck off, at his rapid, noiseless gait, toward the southern limit of the park.

Soon he attained the blunt green hill on whose slope was erected the peculiar structure—resembling, but for its tower, a species of fort—that had excited the curiosity of Nicholas Foley, the one-armed sailor.

Entering the low portal in the thick base of the tower, the German vanished.

When he reappeared again, it was to walk with a slower stride and his hands behind his back, as if lost in meditation. Reaching the wicket in the ring-fence of Otto Hare's domains, he passed through it, and continued his saunter in the direction of the cross-roads.

As he strolled down the narrowest of the ways, he came in front of a dilapidated cottage with a thatched roof. It boasted a strip of garden, and in this, at a bed near the gate, a man was wielding a short fork. The digger had a cropped bullet-head, a bronzed skin, and a limp sleeve—the sign of a missing arm—pinned to his jacket. He was none other than the sailor, Nicholas Foley.

Straightening himself to breathe, he beheld the flapping frock-coat and straw hat of Dr. Kraft. A grin wrinkled his tanned countenance.

"Mornin', Dutchy," he cried; "how goes it?"

Kraft glanced at him and frowned; the sailor came to the gate and leaned over.

"I've settled down quite close to your swagger lodging, Dutchy," he said; "so's to keep an eye on you. Got these moorings on the cheap; I'm putting in a few sallids."

He motioned the German to draw closer.

"How did the little chap take my dishing his bow-wow yesterday?" queried Nicholas Foley, touching the buck-horn haft of a clasp-knife that projected from a wide, buttoned pocket on the front of his hip; "you twigged me, didn't you? I knew you'd not put the coppers on me yourself, but them little men are rumbustious when they're roused, so I sheered off."

Dr. Kraft gazed undecidedly at the sailor; his pale yellow orbs seemed to fix in a spasm of intense reverie. Nicholas Foley threw the gate ajar.

"Suppose you come in, Dutchy," he offered; "and we can have a talk over old times, the old times I'm so willing to keep quiet about—at a price."

Kraft weighed the proposal. Then, his hands still knitted at his back, he marched up the cramped path and into the cottage. The sailor followed him; on the threshold he halted and unbuttoned his pocket, so that the buck-horn haft of his clasp-knife was within easy reach of his brown fingers. This done, he entered. The latch snapped behind him.

CHAPTER V.

IN WHICH AN ARREST IS MADE.

"INSPECTOR BRASHER to see you, sir."

The message was brought to Felix Dering as he stood in the entrance hall of Dering House with Judith Garland by him. Her whispered counsel: "Pull yourself together!" still rang ominously upon his ear. Like a man half awake he stepped forward, Judith following him.

The inspector saluted with every appearance of respect. He was a young and semi-military type, smarter than the average county police-officer.

"Sorry to trouble you at such a moment, Mr. Dering," he said; "but the fact is, I've a warrant for the arrest of the man we suspect of the late Sir Christopher's murder. And thinking it would be preferable to nab him quietly, I asked for a short interview with you."

"Who—who is the person you wish to apprehend?" stammered Felix, trying in vain to control his voice—the shock so recently dealt him by Judith Garland's bewildering allegation had left him tremulous and unnerved.

Inspector Brasher dropped his own crisp accents to a confidential murmur.

"It's—it's a groom on the establishment here," he answered; "Edward Spencer, commonly known as Ted. The late Sir Christopher, we believe, gave him a month's notice only a week ago, Mr. Dering—Spencer is stated to have been lurking in the neighbourhood of the cross-roads the evening prior to the discovery of the body."

Felix Dering felt that a great weight had been lifted from his shoulders. He heaved a sigh of relief. Judith Garland, who had heard all, knitted her dark brows and showed her even teeth in a flash of annoyance. Then she smiled—a slow, terrible smile. Some sudden and reassuring thought might have passed through her mind, so satisfied became the expression on her handsome features.

"Now, if I may trouble you to send for Spencer," proceeded the inspector; "as though to make some arrangement or issue some order, I can secure him without a fuss in domestic quarters. Perhaps, however, the lady had better retire." And he glanced critically at Judith.

"I will advise it," said Felix, and he went to the side of the woman who, but a few moments earlier, had been showing him that strange piece of evidence which was to connect him with the murder of his uncle.

"The officer thinks that it will be as well," he observed coldly, for he guessed that she had been listening, "if you are not present when Spencer is arrested."

She looked at him, amused, and raising a firm small hand, opened it slightly. In her palm there lay the blood-stained links, whose terrible import she had been so brutally explaining to him upon the arrival of the inspector.

"For your sake," she said, under her breath, "I am glad the police have picked up this absurd scent. It makes you safe—safe from all but me. And I am your friend, am I not, on conditions."

She moved to the window-seat, from which position of vantage the child Brian was studying the stalwart frame and trim uniform of Inspector Brasher. Picking up the little baronet, she carried him off, a gliding, elastic figure in her black dinner-dress. Felix Dering rang for a servant (the inspector's tall form had stepped hastily into a recess below the stairs), and bade him light the great chandelier that hung from the roof. This preliminary over, he summoned the groom who was the object of Inspector Brasher's diplomacy.

While he waited for the appearance of the youth, once, in spite of the three months' notice mentioned by the inspector, Sir Christopher's favourite attendant Felix Dering was wrestling with a score of perplexing problems.

How had that broken portion of his watch-chain come into the possession of Judith Garland? He had caught his guard by chance upon the stile at the cross-roads, when vaulting the ragged bar, and had torn, at the same time, the flesh of his palm. Touching the severed chain with blood-besmeared fingers, he must have left on it a terribly suggestive stain, before several of the dangling links, strained at some unperceived point, had fallen to the earth.

Improbable though the explanation seemed, it was true. But why did Judith say he had been seen in the vicinity of the cross-roads that night—the night he was supposed to be in Duchester? A grey pallor fell on the countenance of Felix Dering, and he shuddered.

He was roused from his meditation by a brisk step, and a sharp "Yes, sir": he looked up. A bright young fellow stood before him, fair, and hazel-eyed, with a ruddy complexion, and clad in a neat, plain suit of tweeds. It was Ted Spencer, a cheerful Irishman, who had been on the best of terms with everyone at Dering House, including, as a rule, the irascible Sir Christopher.

Felix Dering shrank back, sickened by the part the inspector had caused him to play. The groom stood at ease, a trifle puzzled. A tap on his shoulder made him start, there was a double click! and the Irishman's wrists were in steel fetters.

"Edward Spencer," intimated Inspector Brasher, the author of this disconcerting achievement, "I arrest you on a warrant. You are charged with the murder of Sir Christopher Dering. It is my duty to warn you that anything you say may be taken down and used in evidence against you."

The groom flung out his gyved arms towards Felix.

"I am innocent, sir," he cried, "I swear it. I was at the spot that night—I am walking out with Barbara, Mrs. Carew's maid, the Rosery is close to the cross-roads. And I did see something I would have told, sir, if I hadn't been a bit of a coward after all the talk about the murder, and that was a man, the very spit of Sir Christopher, sitting on a horse as though he were ill, and another man leading it by the bridle. I might have followed, sir, but Barbara had promised to meet me, and I didn't like to risk missing her."

The words sounded sincere enough, and they filled Felix Dering with a paralysing amazement. What enigma lay behind the murder of his uncle? Could he, indeed, have been killed by this pleasant Irish lad, with the frank, hazel eyes, and the brown cheeks, and if not, by whose hand had he been done to death in the mysterious hours that lay between his departure from Wyresdale Park and the discovery of his lifeless body in the ditch near the gate of Mrs. Carew's villa? Was there in the groom's tale of a horse, a swaying rider, and an unknown guide at the bridle, more than the glib equivocation of an accused criminal?

"Don't look at me like that, Mr. Felix," pleaded Ted Spencer; "I can't bear it; I wouldn't have harmed a hair of the squire's head for worlds. I—I——"

He faltered and hid his face.

"It'll kill my Barbara when she hears I'm taken," he moaned.

Felix Dering flung off his absorption.

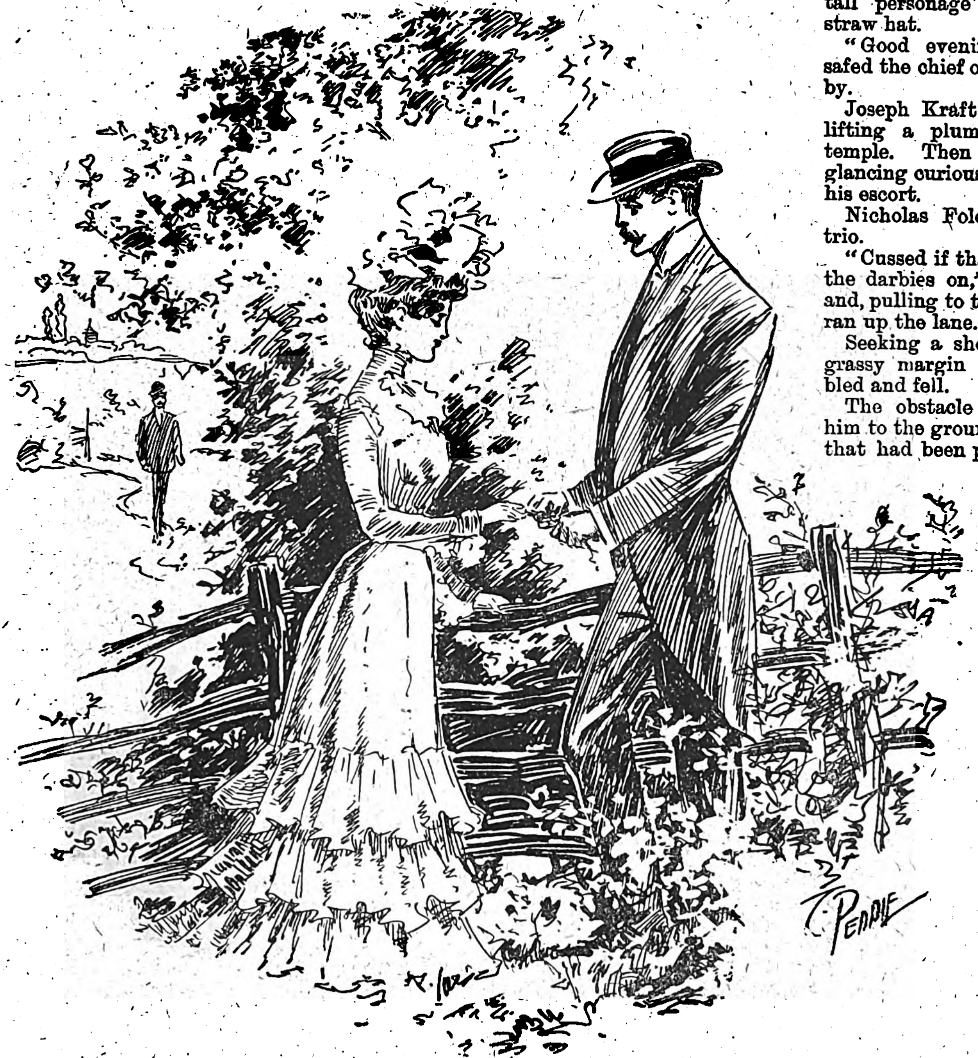
"I do not think you guilty, Spencer," he said, "and you shall have every chance to clear yourself, for Barbara's sake."

"Thank you, sir," muttered the Irishman; "thank you kindly; can't I be rid of these, sir?" he showed the polished fetters on his wrists; "I'll go peaceful with the officer."

Felix glanced at the inspector, but that authority made a curt sign in the negative.

"Hurry up, Spencer," he added; "I've a constable outside and we'll just walk you down to the station without any show—it's dusk already. Keep a good heart; you're not guilty till you've been tried and sentenced. And, for the credit of Wyresdale, I'm sure I hope you'll prove yourself innocent."

With this concession the severe Brasher and his aide led away their prisoner, after borrowing a cap for him from the rack in the hall. They left Felix Dering a prey to the most utter bewilderment.



"I, Felix Dering, promise."
"I, Esther Carew, promise."

Down the shadowy avenue the two police-officers and the groom proceeded at a melancholy pace. The evening was closing in, the western sky aflame with the hues of the rainbow, and the cool air of the gloaming perfumed by the thousand gentle odours of July.

Near the lodge-gates the Irishman halted and spoke.

"Put my handkerchief so it'll cover these irons," he said; "I can hold an end in my fingers, natural-like."

The inspector sniffed, but acted upon the petition, nevertheless. Ted Spencer murmured a grateful acknowledgement and resumed his despondent advance.

Reaching the lane beyond, the three stalked towards the cross-roads Their route lay beside the fence of Nicholas Foley's cottage.

The sailor, at his wicket, was just bidding farewell to a tall personage in a frock-coat and straw hat.

"Good evening, Doctor," vouchsafed the chief of the officers, striding by.

Joseph Kraft started, and bowed, lifting a plump forefinger to his temple. Then he, also, passed on, glancing curiously at the groom and his escort.

Nicholas Foley stared after the trio.

"Cussed if that son of a gun hadn't the darbies on," he said to himself, and, pulling to the door of his cottage, ran up the lane.

Seeking a short cut athwart the grassy margin of the lane, he stumbled and fell.

The obstacle which had brought him to the ground was a human leg that had been pushed through a gap in the fence. The rest of the body appeared, hastily crawling backwards from a neighbouring meadow on to the wayside.

Nicholas Foley had bounded to his feet in an instant. As he perceived the unwitting cause of his accident, he cried out bluntly:

"Hullo, messmate, do you steer starn foremost for choice?"

The fellow addressed sat up.

It was Neal Garland, and the sailor saw his evil countenance. Nicholas Foley gasped.

"Keelhaul me for a landlubber!" he exclaimed; "if it isn't the swab that struck the match at the stile. Here, my hearty, what was it you picked up yonder and gave to the taut little craft you had with you?"

CHAPTER VI.

THE STATION STRONG-ROOM.

"No, I'm not given to taking prejudices, Miss Connie, but I must say I can't endure that man Brasher. He's as opinionated as he's presumptuous and as presumptuous as he's opinionated."

Constance Forester laughed. She was strolling by the side of Archibald Geddes—the clever young Scotch chemist who was her father's assistant—through a field of ripening corn. The chime of the bells from the spire of the parish church and the height of the sun in a cloudless sky marked the advance of the peaceful Sabbath towards its noon.

"The dead set he's made at poor Spencer," went on Geddes, in his dry, resentful tone; "is simply ridiculous. If the lad's had one month's notice from Sir Christopher he's had a score. He used to come to the shop for Lady Dering's medicines and tell me jokingly, 'I'm on a month's notice again, Mr. Geddes,' or 'I'm stopping to show how I behave myself.' The squire had his peculiarities like the rest of us, and it's absurd to imagine that Spencer would lie in wait for Sir Christopher and knock him over the head on account of a dismissal he'd no call to take seriously. Don't you think so yourself, Miss Connie?"

Connie plucked a blade of corn and trifled with the yellowing seeds. "Inspector Brasher is supposed to be very clever," she answered mischievously.

"Ay," said the Scotchman, "and it's fools that do the supposing. What's his theory of the matter? That Spencer, out of revenge, surprised the squire riding home, hit him on the back of the skull with a club, dragged him to the ground, and finished him off by suffocating him with a handkerchief and rifling his pockets to make the thing look like highway robbery. As I've explained to you, Miss Connie, it's perfectly obvious that the squire was struck when he was lying down. The fracture proves it."

"Why don't you offer to give evidence, then?" queried Connie, regarding him with a certain admiration, and shaking out the filmy skirts of her best frock.

Archibald Geddes shrugged his shoulders. "And ruin our prescription business," he said. "Didn't old Doctor Vavasour perform the post-mortem, and doesn't he agree entirely with the Inspector. They wouldn't hear me if I asked to go into the box. I'm not a surgical expert, I'm a chemist. And then, Miss Connie, I've another reason for holding my tongue—and that's your father."

Constance Forester started—her brown eyes widened and her cheeks blanched.

"What can you mean, Mr. Geddes?" she faltered.

The Scotchman lowered his voice and bent towards the pretty person near him.

"I'm afraid Mr. Forester knows more about this affair of Sir Christopher's death than he chooses to allow," responded Archibald Geddes significantly. "Haven't you noticed how he avoids the subject, how he insisted—until Ted Spencer was dragged into the case—that the motive was robbery and nothing else. He must have come past the Cross that night, for he was drinking at the Wheatsheaf, and I have managed to find out quietly that he left at ten. He did not arrive home, as you know, till after twelve."

Connie shivered. "You—you don't suspect him, really, Mr. Geddes," she stammered.

"No," admitted the chemist, "but there is an offence termed being an accessory after the fact, and it may receive a rather severe punishment. I don't say that Mr. Forester has rendered himself liable to the law in any degree. The whole thing is a riddle. But in view of your father's singular embarrassment when Sir Christopher's death is referred to, and his inexplicable delay in arriving at the High Street when he set out from the Wheatsheaf an hour earlier than usual, I have not wished to draw attention to us at all in connection with the mystery. I only mention it to you lest you might speak casually of Mr. Forester's movements that evening."

Constance put a hand upon the Scotchman's arm. "Thank you, Mr. Geddes," she murmured, "you are very kind—very, very kind. I don't know what would become of me if you weren't here to protect father against himself and to take care of the shop."

"I've done nothing to deserve your thanks, Miss Connie," dissented Archibald Geddes, "it's pure selfishness, and the pleasure of having you smile at me occasionally as you go by the counter. I was afraid I'd angered you the other day by speaking of the rumour in Wyresdale about Mr. Dering and the squire's murder."

"Forgive me for being so impolite," whispered Connie penitently, "but I could not bear to hear you talk of that horrible slander. You see, Esther—I should say Miss Carew—and Mr. Dering are practically engaged. But the police evidently don't attach any importance to the horrid idea, and we'll pretend we never heard of it, won't we? I tried to believe Mr. Brasher was right over Ted Spencer because it cleared Mr. Dering."

Archibald Geddes coughed nervously.

"I've a confession to make, Miss Connie," he said, "I've been running down Brasher for a bumptious ass, and so I dare be sworn he is. But the conviction is not a disinterested one on my part. You'll remember he's been paying you a good many compliments lately—buying useless soaps and scents from us and hanging round to pass the time of day with you. I'm jealous of him, Miss Connie, and that's why I've been defaming his character and speaking evil of dignities."

Constance flushed charmingly and dropped, in her agitation, the stalk of corn she had been depriving of its burden.

"You are very foolish, Mr. Geddes," she murmured.

"Maybe," replied the chemist, "but such folly is an infallible sign of a certain ailment that I'm suffering from. Mr. Brasher is a taller man than I am, and a bigger man, and he has a fine black beard and a fist that would fell a heifer. And I'm given to understand that these are things the ladies admire."

"I don't admire them, Mr. Geddes," said Connie, "and I'm positive the inspector doesn't know half so much as you do."

"You're right," conceded the Scotchman gravely, "Brasher is nothing but a constable in a hurry. I may be slow, Miss Connie, but I am sure. For three months now, I wondered if I was in love; at last I've made up my mind. I am."

He drew a step closer to the listener, and, twitching his wrist free of his starched cuff sought deliberately to embrace her. Connie slipped from him; a brace of figures were approaching them. Archibald Geddes recognised the slight form of Esther Carew. By her was Felix Dering.

"Good morning, Geddes," observed the latter, raising his hat to Connie.

The chemist returned the greeting imperturbably, and added a bow for Felix's companion. This recognition completed, the two pairs of lovers took to different paths, with an unsuccessful attempt at a calm demeanour. A lightning glance had been exchanged by Connie and Esther, a look of bantering feminine sympathy. Then a hedge intervened and separated the couples.

"You and little Miss Forester are still as firm friends as ever?" queried Felix, stooping once more to the pink ear and fair curls of Esther Carew.

"Yes," said Esther; "Connie is a brave girl—Mrs. Forester is dead, and her father drinks, yet she never despairs. I fancy she is beginning to care for Mr. Geddes, though she will not own it."

"Lucky Geddes!" answered Felix. "Nothing stands between him and happiness, while it seems as if the fates themselves were plotting to keep us asunder. Here am I detained indefinitely at Wyresdale by the murder of my uncle, which has not only threatened to cast upon me the shadow of a crime Heaven knows I did not commit, but has led you to become acquainted with Otto Hare, and so has excited a pitiless ambition in your mother's breast. Would I had left Wyresdale three months ago!"

Esther clung to him as they wandered through the wide expanse of standing grain. A quarter rang musically from the distant church—a lark's shrill song descended to them out of the blue.

"There is a detail of my perplexity, Esther," pursued Felix Dering, "that I have not so far confided to you. It may save us both greater pain if I anticipate the disclosure from some other lips. Yesterday, at the opening of the inquest, I answered the formal questions that were put to me. I could not feel it wise to volunteer a dangerous admission. Esther, I was not in Duchester the whole of that fatal night. After dining I visited the theatre, it is true; but the play was the Shaughraun, and the sorrows of Eily sent my thoughts flying to you. As if I were a romantic boy, I left my stall, and struck athwart the fields from Duchester, to catch a glimpse of your window. I may have been in the neighbourhood when my uncle was attacked."

Esther Carew had grown very pale; a sudden chill swept over her as she realised that circumstances had woven yet another sombre strand about their destinies.

"I am glad you told me," she murmured, "but sorry it was for me you did what might cause people to suspect you." She choked down a sob. "I would give my life for you, dear," she faltered, "and I am the very one who contrives to do you most harm. You quarrelled with Sir Christopher over me, and if you had not come back that evening, you would be able to vindicate yourself against the spiteful stories which Mr. Hare repeated to mamma."

"Mr. Hare," exclaimed Felix, "yes; I had forgotten. He would be willing enough to employ the slander against his rival. Esther, has your mother no heart? She encouraged our affection from the beginning; she knows that we have ended by being all in all to one another, and yet she schemes to give you to this—this Golden Dwarf, because his riches balance, and more than balance, his affliction."

Esther drooped, in her muslin gown, like some frail plant.

"Mamma is very cruel," she sighed pathetically; "but I will be faithful to you, Felix. They shall not compel me to marry Mr. Hare."

A luxuriant thorn-bush screened the couple at the moment; Felix seized the opportunity to clasp his betrothed to his breast.

"We are told," he said, "that all evils are powerless to withstand love, if it be love. We must prove the proverb to the hilt; while we live we will be loyal.' See!"

He broke a twig from the thorn-bush and gave her an extremity to hold.

Grasping the nearer tip he snapped the thin branch in twain.

"It is an old charm," he commented; "these are the words of the vow: 'Till this severed wood unite and bear leaf and flower, we promise fidelity, each to each.' Let us take it. I, Felix Dering, promise."

"I, Esther Carew, promise," gasped Esther, and burst into a fit of scalding tears.

Felix had much ado to comfort her, nor could he easily be brought to comprehend the unnerving effect of the picturesque oath upon the sensitive girl whose innocent soul had long since given itself to him.

While they talked, in the fond simplicity of their grief, a voice summoned Felix Dering. The tones were those of Archibald Geddes.

"Excuse me, Mr. Dering," he said, appearing round the thorn-bush—he had abandoned Connie and pursued them along the winding footpath to their retreat—"but a curious event has happened, and Inspector Brasher, at the police-station in the High Street, is half crazy. If you don't mind stepping down, as a gentleman of position in the neighbourhood——"

He paused, keenly regarding the countenance of Felix Dering.

"Certainly," responded Felix; "forgive me, Miss Carew, if I leave you without ceremony."

Esther replied by a veiled and tender look, and the two men set off together.

"What is the nature of the accident?" inquired Felix, as they strode along.

"I didn't say it was an accident," declared Archibald Geddes, drily; "and I want just to let the situation burst on you, sir."

Felix Dering wondered, but allowed himself to be hastened forward.

At the entrance of the Wyresdale police-station there was an excited crowd.

Felix pushed through it, escorted by his guide, and gained the principal apartment.

The door of the lock-up was ajar, Geddes marched in, nodding to a stolid constable, who gravely saluted Felix Dering.

The chemist pointed to a window, devised at an unusual elevation in the wall of the strong-room. But a solitary shaft of iron remained to testify that the aperture had been barred; a dozen bricks had vanished from the lintel.

"Brasher fastened Ted Spencer in here on Saturday," said Archibald Geddes, studying the expression on Felix Dering's startled face; "this morning he was gone and the window as it is now. Someone got the bars loose from outside—who, is what the Inspector would like to know."

"YOU say he is a director in a newspaper publishing company?" "Yes, he directs the wrappers for the out-of-town subscribers."

NORA: "One week from to-night I will give you my answer." Eugene: "Goodness! What am I to do in the meantime?" Nora: "You might make yourself agreeable to my parents."

"YOUR husband is not looking well to-night, Mrs. Rhymer. Has he been overworking himself?" "It isn't that so much; it is his originality. Why, that man is struck by so many original ideas that his mind must be one mass of bruises."

"I HAVE a handsome home," he suggested. "With all the modern conveniences?" she asked. "No-o," he answered slowly; "not all. One is lacking." "What is it?" she inquired. "A wife," he replied. Then she managed to convey the assurance to him that one was to be had for the asking.

CUSTOMER: "Why haven't you called upon me for that little bill I owe you?" Grocer: "Oh, I make it a rule never to ask a gentleman for money." Customer: "Indeed! But suppose a man is indebted to you and doesn't pay?" Grocer: "Well, after a certain length of time I conclude that he is not a gentleman; then I ask him."

An important announcement will be made in this column next week.

FOUR LIVES IN ONE.

A Tale of Transanimation.

THERE was something about the wholesome sleepiness of Freiberg, in Saxony, that fitted well with the lazy nature of Ronald Wyde. So, having run down there to spend a day or two among the students and the mines, and taking a liking to the quaint, unmodernised town, he boldly changed his plans of autumn travel, gave up a cherished scheme of Russian vagabondage, had his baggage sent from Dresden, and made ready to settle down and drowse away three or four months in idleness and not over-arduous study. And this move of his led to the happening of a very strange and seemingly unreal event in his life.

Ronald Wyde was then about twenty-five or six years old, rather above the medium height, with thick blue-black hair that he had an artist-trick of allowing to ripple down to his neck, dark hazel eyes that were almost too deeply recessed in their bony orbits, and a troublesome growth of beard that, close-shaven as he always was, showed in strong blue outline through the thin and rather sallow skin.

His address was singularly pleasing, and his wide experience of life, taught him by years of varied travel, made him a good deal of a cosmopolitan in his views and ways, which caused him to be looked upon as a not over-safe companion for young men of his own age or under.

Having made up his mind to winter in Freiberg, his first step was to quit the little hotel, with its mouldy stone-vaulted entrance and its columned dining-room, under whose full-centred arches close, beery, and smoky fumes lingered persistently, and seek quieter student-lodgings in the heart of the town.

His choice was mainly influenced by a thin-railed balcony, twined through and through by the shoots of a vigorous Virginia creeper that flamed and flickered in the breezy October sunsets in strong relief against the curtains that drifted whitely out and in through the open window.

So, with the steady-going and hale old Frau Spritzkrapfen he took up his quarters, fully persuading himself that he did so for the sake of the stray home-breaths that seemed to stir the scarlet vine-leaves more gently for him, and ignoring pretty Lottchen's great, earnest Saxon eyes as best he could.

A sunny morning followed his removal to Frau Spritzkrapfen's tidy home.

There had been a slight rain in the early night, and the footways were yet bright and moist in patches, that the slanting morning rays were slowly coaxing away.

Ronald Wyde, having set his favourite books handily on the dimity-draped table, which comprised for him the process of getting to rights, and having given more than one glance of amused wonderment at the naïve blue-and-white scriptural tiles that cased his cumbrous four-storey, earthenware stove, and smiled lazily at poor Adam's obvious and sudden indigestion, even while the uneaten half-apple remained in his guilty hand, he stepped out on his balcony, leaned his elbows among the crimson leaves, and took in the healthful morning air in great draughts. It was a Sunday; the bells of the gray minster hard by were iterating their clanging calls to the simple townsfolk to come and be droned to in sleepy German gutturals from the carved pillar-hung pulpit inside. Looking down he saw thick-ankled women cluttering past in loose wooden-soled shoes, and dumpy girls with tow braids primly dangling to their hips, convoying sturdy Dutch-built luggers of younger brothers up the easy slope that led to the church and the bells. Presently Frau Spritzkrapfen and dainty Lottchen, rosy with soap and health, slipped through the doorway beneath him out into the little church-bound throng, and, as they disappeared, left the house and street somehow unaccountably alone. Feeling this, Ronald Wyde determined on a stroll.

Something in the Sabbath stillness around him led Ronald away from the swift clang and throbbing hum of the bells and in the direction of the old cemetery. Passing through the clumsy tower-gate that lifts its grimy bulk sullenly, like a huge head-stone over the grave of a dead time of feudalism, he reached the burial-ground and entered the quiet enclosure.

The usual touching reverence of the Germans for their dead was strikingly manifest around him. The humbler mounds, walled up with rough stones a foot or two above the pathway level, carried on their crests little gardens of gay and inexpensive plants; while on the tall wooden crosses at their head hung yellow wreaths, half hiding the hopeful legend, "Wiedersehen."

The more pretentious slabs bore vases filled with fresh flowers; while in the grate-barred vaults, that skirted the ground like the arches of a cloister, lay rusty heaps of long-since mouldered bloom, topped by newer wreaths tossed lovingly in to wilt and turn to dust in their turn, like those cast in before them in memory of that other dust asleep below.

Turning aside from the central walk that halved the cemetery, Ronald strolled along, his hands in his pockets, his eyes listlessly fixed on the orange-coloured fumes and rolling smoke that welled out of tall chimneys in the hollow beyond, an idle student tune humming on his lips, and his thoughts nowhere and everywhere at once. Happening to look away from the dun smoke-trail for an instant, he found something of greater interest close at hand. An old man stooped stiffly over a simple mound, busied among the flowers that hid it, and by his side crouched a young girl, perhaps fourteen years old, who peered up at Ronald with questioning velvet brown eyes. The old man heard the intruder's steps crunching in the damp gravel, and slowly looked up too.

"Good-morning, mein Herr," said Ronald, pleasantly.

The old man remained for an instant blinking nervously and shading his eyes from the full sunlight that fell on his face. A quiet face it was and very old, seamed and creased by mazy wrinkles that played at aimless cross purposes with each other, beginning and ending nowhere. His thick beard and thin, curved nose looked just a little Jewish, and seemed at variance with his pale blue eyes that were still bright in spite of age. And yet, bearded as he was, there was a lurking expression about his features that bordered upon effeminacy, and made the treble of his voice sound even more thin and womanish as he answered Wyde's greeting.

"Good-morning, too, mein Herr. A stranger to our town, I see."

"Yes; but soon not to be called one, I hope. I am here for the winter."

"A cold season—a cold season; our northern winters are very chilling to an old man's blood." And slouching together into a tired stoop, he resumed his simple task of knotting a few flowers into a clumsy nosegay. Ronald stood and watched him with a vague interest. Presently, the flowers being clumped to his liking, the old man pried himself upright by getting a good purchase with his left hand in the small of his back, and so deliberately that Ronald almost fancied he heard him creak. The girl rose too, and drew her thin shawl over her shoulders.

"You Germans love longer than we," said Ronald, glancing at the flowers that trembled in the old man's bony fingers, and then downward to the quiet grave; "a lifetime of easy-going love and a year or two of easier forgetting are enough for us."

"Should I forget my own flesh and blood?" asked the old man simply.

Ronald paused a moment, and, pointing downward, said:

"Your daughter, then, I fancy?"

"Yes."

"Long dead?"

"Very long; more than fifty years."

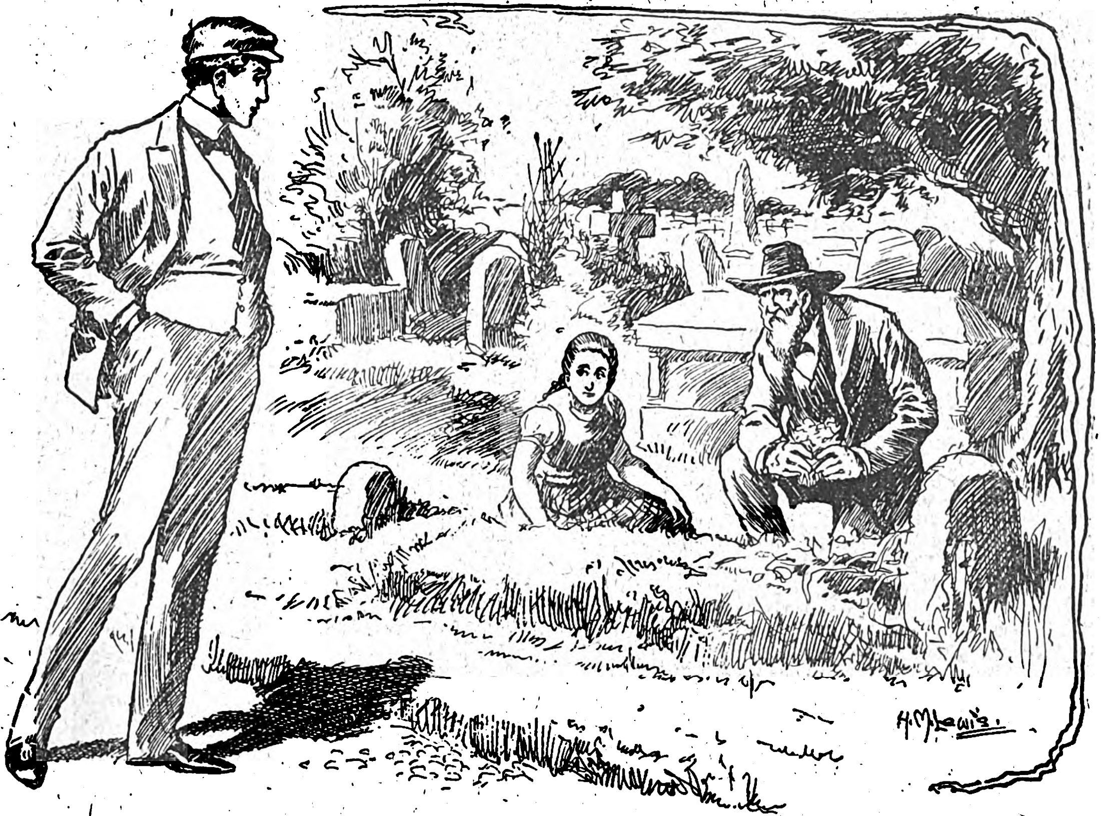
Ronald stared, but said nothing audibly. Inwardly he whispered something about being devilish glad to make the wandering Jew's acquaintance, rattled the loose gröschen in his pocket, and turned to follow the tottering old man and firm footed child down the walk.

After a dozen paces they halted before a more ambitious tombstone, on which Ronald could make out the well-remembered name of Plattner.

The child took the flowers and laid them reverently on the stone.

"It seems to me almost like arriving at the end of a pilgrimage," said Ronald, "when I stand by the grave of a man of science. Perhaps you knew him, mein Herr."

"He was my pupil."



The old man heard the intruder's steps crunching on the damp gravel, and slowly looked up too.

Take in "Short Stories" and it won't return the compliment.

"Whew!" thought Ronald; "that makes my friend here a centenarian at least."

"My pupil and my friend," the feeble voice went on; "and more than that, my daughter's first lover, and only one."

"Ach so!" said Ronald.

"And now on her death-day, I take these poor flowers from her to him, as I have done all these years."

Something in the pathetic earnestness of his companion touched Ronald Wyde, and he forthwith took his hands out of his pockets, and didn't try to whistle—which was a great deal for him to do.

"I know Plattner well by his works," he said; "I once studied mineralogy for nearly a month."

"You love science, then?"

"Yes; like everything else, for diversion."

"It was different with him," quavered the old man, pointing unsteadily to the head-stone. "Science grew to be his one passion, and many discoveries rewarded him for his devotion. He was groping on the track of a far greater achievement when he died."

"May I ask what it was?" said Ronald, now fairly interested.

"The creation and isolation of the principle of Life!"

This was too much for Ronald Wyde; down dived his restless hands into his trousers' pockets again, and the gröschen rattled as merrily as before.

"I have made quite a study of biology, and all that sort of thing," said he; "and, although a good deal of a sceptic, and inclined to follow Huxley, I can't bring myself to conceive of life without organism. Such theorizing is, to my mind, on a par with the illogical search for the philosopher's stone and a perpetual motor."

The old man's eyes sparkled as he turned full upon Roland.

"You dismiss the subject very airily, my young friend," he cried; "but let me tell you that I—I, whom you see here—have grappled with such problems through a weary century, and have conquered one of them."

"And that one is ——"

"The one that conquered Plattner!"

"Do I understand you to claim that you have discovered the life-principle?"

"Yes."

"Will you permit an utter stranger to inquire what is its nature?"

"Certainly. It is two-fold. The ultimate principle of life is carbon; the cause of its combination with water, or rather, with the two gaseous elements of water, and the development of organized existence therefrom, is electricity."

Ronald Wyde shrugged his broad shoulders a little, and absently replied:

"All I can say, mein Herr, is, that you've got the bulge on me."

"I beg your pardon——"

"Excuse me; I unconsciously translated an Americanism. I mean that I don't quite understand you."

"Which means that you do not believe me. It is but natural at your age, when one doubts as if by instinct. Would you be convinced?"

"Nothing would please me better."

With the same painful effort as before, the old man straightened himself, and made a piercing, clairvoyant examination into and through Ronald Wyde's eyes, as if reading the brain beyond them.

"I think I can trust you," he mumbled at last "Come with me."

Leaning on the young girl's arm, the old philosopher faltered through the cemetery and into the town, followed by Wyde, his hands again pocketed for safety. Groups of released church goers, sermon-fed, met them, and once in a while some stout burgher would nod patronisingly to Ronald's guides, and get in response a shaky, sidelong roll of the old man's head, as if it were mounted on a weak spiral spring. Farther on they intersected a knot of students, who eyed them askance and exchanged remarks in an undertone.

Keeping on deeper into the foul heart of the town, they passed through swarms of idle children playing sportlessly, as poverty is apt to play, in the dark shadows of the narrow street. They seemed incited to mirth and ribaldry by the sight of Ronald's new friend, and one even ventured to hurl a clod at him; but this striking Ronald instead, and he facing promptly to the hostile quarter whence it came, caused a sudden slinking of the crowd into unknown holes, like a horde of rats, and the street was for a time empty save for the little party that threaded it. Ronald began to think that the old man's sanity was gravely called in doubt by the townsfolk, and would really have backed out of his adventure but for the curiosity that had now got the upper hand of him.

Presently the old man sidled into a dingy doorway, like a tired beast run to earth, and Ronald followed him, not without a wish that the architect had provided for a more efficient lighting of the sombre passage-way in which he found himself. A sharp turn to the right, after a dozen groping paces, a narrow stairway, a bump or two against unexpected saliences of rough-mortared wall, two steps upward, and one very surprising step downward through a cavernous doorway that took away Ronald's breath for a moment, and sent it back again with a hot, creeping wave of sudden perspiration all over him, as is the way with missteps, and two more sharp turns, brought the three into a black, no-thoroughfare of a hall, whose farther end was closed by a locked door. The girl here rubbed a brimstone abomination of a match into a malodorous green glow, and by its help the old man got a tortuous key into the snakey opening in the great lock, creakily shot back its bolt, swung open the door, and motioned Ronald to enter.

He found himself in a long rather narrow room, with a high ceiling, duskily lighted by three wide windows that were thickly webbed and dusted, like ancestral bottles of fine crusty port. A veritable den it was, filled with what seemed to be the wrecks of philosophical apparatus dating back two or three generations—ill-fated ventures on the treacherous main of science. Here a fat-bellied alembic lolled lazily over in a gleamy sand bath, like a beach-lost galleon at ebb-tide; and there a heap of broken porcelain-tubing and shreds of crucibles lay, like bleaching ship ribs on a sullen shore. Beyond, by the middle window, stood a furnace, fireless, and clogged with grey ashes. Two or three solid, old-time tables, buil when joiners were more lavish of oaken timber than nowadays, stood hopelessly littered with retorts, filtering funnels, lamps, ring-stands, and squat beakers of delicate glass, caked with long-dried sediment, all alike dust-smirched. Ronald involuntarily sought for some huge Chaldaic tome, conveniently open at a favourite spell, or a handy crocodile or two dangling from the square beams overhead, but saw nothing more formidable than a stray volume of "Kant's Critique of Pure Reason." Taking this up, and glancing at its fly-leaf, he saw a name written in spidery German script, almost illegible from its shakiness—"Max Lebensfunke."

"Your name?" he asked.

"Yes, mein Herr," answered the old man, taking the volume and caressing it like a live thing in his fumbling hands. "This book was given to me by the great Kant himself," he added.

Reverently replacing it, he advanced a few steps toward the middle of the room. Ronald followed, and, turning from the windows, looked further around him. In striking contrast to the undisturbed disorder, so redolent of middle-age alchemy, was the big table that flanked the laboratory through its whole length. It began with a powerful galvanic battery, succeeded by a wiry labyrinth of coils and helices, with little keys in front of them like a telegraph-office retired from business; these gave place to many-necked jars wired together by twos and threes, like oath-bound patriots plotting treason; beyond them stood a great glass globe, connected with a sizable air-pump, and filled with a complexity of shiny wires and glassware; next loomed up a huge induction-magnet, carefully insulated on solid glass supports; and at the further extremity of the table lay a corpse.

Ronald Wyde, in spite of his many-sided experience of dissection-rooms, and morgues, and other ghastlinesses to which he had long since accustomed himself from principle, drew back at the sight—perhaps because he had come to this strange place to clutch the world-old mystery of the life-essence, and found himself, instead, confronted on its threshold by the equal mystery of death.

Herr Lebensfunke smiled feebly at this movement.

"A subject received this morning from Berlin," he said, in answer to Wyde's look of inquiry; "a sad piece of extravagance, mein Herr—a luxury to which I can rarely afford to treat myself."

Ronald Wyde bent over the body and looked into its face—a rough, red face, that had seemingly seen forty years of low-lived dissipation. The blotched skin and bleary eyes told of debauchery and drunkenness, and a slight alcoholic-fœtidness was perceptible, as from the breath of one who sleeps away the effects of a carouse.

"I hope you don't think of restoring this soaked specimen to life?" said Ronald.

"That is still beyond me," answered the old man, mournfully; "as yet I have not created life of a higher grade than of the lowest zoöphytes."

"Do you claim to have done as much as that?"

"It is not an idle claim," said Herr Lebensfunke, solemnly; "look at this, if you doubt."

"This" was the great crystal globe that rose from the middle of the long table, and dominated its lesser accessories, as some great dome swells above the clustered houses of a town. Tubes passing through its walls met in a smaller central globe half filled with a colourless liquid. Beneath this, and half encircling it, was an intricate maze of bright wire; and two other wires dipped into it, touching the surface of the liquid with their platinum tips. Within the liquid pulsed a shapeless mass of almost transparent spongy tissue.

"You see an aggregation of cells possessed of life—of a low order, it is true, but none the less life," said the philosopher proudly. "These were created from water chemically pure, with the exception of a trace of ammonia, and impregnated with liquid carbon, by the combined action of heat and induced electricity, in vacuo. Look!"

He pressed one of the keys before him. Presently the wire began to glow with a faint light which increased in intensity till the coal flamed into pure whiteness. Removing his finger the current ceased to flow, and the wire grew rapidly cool.

"I passed the whole strength of sixty cups through it to show you its action. Ordinarily, with one or two carbon shells, and refining the current by triple deduction, the temperature is barely blood-warm."

"Pardon an interruption," said Ronald. "You spoke of liquid carbon; does it exist?"

"Yes; here is some in this vial. See it—how pure, how transparent! How it loves and hoards the light!"

The old man held the vial up as he spoke, and turned it round and round.

"See how it flashes! No wonder, for it is the diamond, liquid and uncrystallized. Think how these fools of men have called diamonds precious above all gems through these many weary years, and showered them on their kings or tossed them to their mistresses' feet, never dreaming that the silly stone they lauded was inert, crystallized life!"

"Can't you crystallize diamonds yourself?" asked Wyde, "and make Freiberg a Golconda and yourself a Crœsus?"

"It could be done after the lapse of thousands of years," replied Herr Lebensfunke. "Place undiluted liquid carbon in that inner globe; keep the coil at a white heat, and if Adam had started the process, his heir-at-law would have a Koh-i-noor to-day, and a nice lawsuit for its possession."

Ronald Wyde bent toward the globe once more, and examined the throbbing mass closely, whistling softly meanwhile.

"If you can create this cellular life, why not develop it still higher into an organism?"

"Because I can only create life—not soul. Years ago I was a free-thinker; now my discoveries have made me a deist—for I found that my cells, living as they were, and possessing undoubted parietal circulation, were not germs; and though they might cluster into a bulk like this, as bubbles do to form froth, to evolve an animal or plant from them was far beyond me—that needs what we call soul. But, in searching blindly for this higher power, I grasped a greater discovery than any I had hoped for—the power to isolate life from its bodily organism."

"You have to keep the bottle carefully corked, I should imagine," laughed Ronald.

"Not quite," said Herr Lubensfunke, joining in the laugh; "life is not glue. My grand discovery is the life-magnet."

"Which has the post of honour on your table here, has it not?" inquired Ronald, drawing his hand from his pocket and pointing to the insulated coil.

The old man glanced keenly at his hand as he did so; at which Ronald seemed confused, and pocketed it again abruptly.

"Yes, that is the life-magnet. You see this bent glass tube surrounded by the helix? That tube contains liquid carbon. I pass through the helix a current of induced electricity, generated by the action of these sixty Bunsen cups upon a succession of coils and carbon cores, and the magnet becomes charged with soulless life. I reverse the stream—what was positive now is negative, and the same magnet will absorb life from a living being to an extent only to be measured by thousands of millions."

"Then what effect is produced on the body you pump the life from?"

"Death."

"And what becomes of the soul?"

"I don't quite know. I fancy, however, that the magnet absorbs that too."

"Can it give it back?"

"Certainly; otherwise my life-magnet would belie its name, and be simply an ingenious and expensive instrument of death. By reversing the condition, I can restore both soul and life to the body from which I drew them, or to another body, even after the lapse of several days."

"Have you ever done so?"

"I have."

Ronald looked reflectively downward to his boot-toe, but seemed to find nothing there—except boot-toe.

"I say, my friend," he spoke at last, "haven't you got a pin you can stick in me? I'd like to know if I'm dreaming."

"I can convince you better than by pins," replied Herr Lebensfunke. "Let me see that hand you hide so carefully."

Ronald Wyde slowly drew it from his pocket, as reluctantly as though it were a grudged charity dole, and extended it to the old man. Its little finger was gone.

"A defect that I am foolishly sensitive about," said he. "A childish freak—playing with edged tools, you know. A boy-playmate chopped it off by accident; I cut his head open with his own hatchet, and made an idiot of him for life—that's all."

"I could do this," said Herr Lebensfunke, pausing on each word as if it were somewhat heavy, and had to be lifted out of his cramped chest by force; "I could draw your entity into that magnet, leaving you side by side with this corpse. I could dissect a finger from that same corpse, attach it to your own dead hand by a little of that palpitating life mass you have seen, pass an electric stream through it, and a junction would be effected in three or four days. I could then restore you to existence whole, and not maimed as now."

"I don't like the idea of dying, even for a day," answered Wyde. "Couldn't you contrive to lend me a body while you are mending my own?"

"You can take that one, if you like."

Ronald Wyde looked round once more at the sodden features of the corpse, and smiled lugubriously.

"A mighty shabby old customer," he said, "and I doubt if I could feel at home in his skin; but I'm willing to risk it for the sake of the novelty of the thing."

The old philosopher's thin face lit up with pleasure.

"You consent, then?" he chuckled in his womanish treble.

"Of course I do. Begin at once, and have done with it."

"Not now, mein Herr; some modifications must be made in the connections—mere matters of detail. Come again to-night."

"At what hour?"

"At ten. Mein Vögelein, show the Herr the way out."

The girl, who had been moving restlessly about the room all this time, with her wild brown eyes fixed now on Ronald, now on the old man, and oftener, in a shy, inquisitive stare, on the corpse, lit a dusty chemical lamp, and led the way down the awkward passage and stairs.

Ronald tried to start a conversation with her as he followed.

"You are too young, my birdling, to be accustomed to such sights as this up-stairs."

"Birdling is not too young, she's almost fourteen," said the girl, proudly. "And she likes it, too; it makes her think of mother. Mother went to sleep on that table, mein Herr."

"Poor thing! she's half-witted," thought Wyde, as he passed into the street. "By-by, birdie."

Home he walked, briskly, to be met under his flaming balcony by Lottchen's kindly afternoon greeting. How had mein Herr passed his sabbath? she asked.

"Quietly enough, Lottchen. I met a an old philosopher on the God's-Acre, and went home with him to his shop. Have you ever heard of Herr Doctor Lebensfunke?"

"Yes, mein Herr. Wrong here, they say," and she tapped her wide, round German forehead, and lifted her eyes expressively heavenward.

"Sold himself to the devil, eh?" asked Wyde.

Lottchen was not quite sure on that point. Some said one thing and some another. There was undoubtedly a devil, else how could good Doctor Luther have thrown his inkstand at him? But he had never been seen in Doctor Lebensfunke's neighbourhood; and, on the whole, Lottchen was inclined to attribute the Herr Doctor's trouble to an indefinable something whose nature was broadly hinted at by more tapping of the forehead.

Ronald Wyde mounted the stairs, locked himself in his room, and wished himself out of the scrape he was getting into. But, being in for it now, he lit a cigar, and tried to fancy the processes he would have to go through, and how he, a natty and respectable young fellow, would look and feel in a drunkard's skin. His conjectures being too foggily outlined to please him, he put them aside, and waited impatiently enough for ten o'clock. A moonlight walk through the low streets, transfigured by the silver gleam into fairy vistas—all but the odour—brought him to Herr Lebensfunke's house. Simple birdling, on the lookout for him, piloted him through the unsafe channel and brought him to anchor in the dimly lit room.

"All is ready," said the philosopher, as he trembled forward and shook Ronald's hand. "See here." Zigzags of silk-bound wire squirmed hither and thither from the life magnet. Two of them ended in carbon points. "And here, too, my young friend, is your new finger."

It lay detached in the central globe, and on its severed end atoms of protoplasm were already clustered. "Literally a second-hand article," thought Ronald; but, not venturing to translate the idiom, he only bowed and said: "Ach so!" which means anything and everything in German.

It was not without a very natural sinking of the heart that Ronald Wyde divested himself of his clothing, and took his position, by the old man's direction, on the stout table, side by side with the dead. A flat brass plate pressed between his shoulders, and one of the carbon points, clamped in a little insulated stand, rested on his bosom and quivered with the quickened motion of the heart beneath it. The other point touched the dead man's breast.

The old man and the corpse of his former self lay together under the light of a lamp.

"Are you ready?"

"Yes."

The old man pressed a key, and as he did so a sharp sting, hardly worse than a leech's bite, pricked Roland Wyde's breast. A sense of languor crept slowly upon him, his feet tingled, his breath came slowly, and waves of light and shade pulsed in indistinct alternation before his sight; but through them the old man's eyes peered into his, like a dream. Presently Ronald would have started if he could, for two old philosophers were craning over him instead of one. But as he looked more steadily, one face softly dimmed into nothing, and the other grew brighter and stronger in its lines, while the room flushed with an unaccountable light. The little key clicked once more; a vague sensation that the current had somehow ceased to flow, roused him, and he raised himself on his elbow and looked in blank bewilderment at his own dead self lying by his side in the daylight, while the sunrise tried to peer through the webbed panes.

"Is it over," he asked, with a puzzled glance around him; and added, "Which am I?"

"Either, or both," answered Herr Lebensfunke. "Your identity will be something of a problem to you for a day or two."

Aided by the old man, Ronald awkwardly got into the sleazey clothes that went with the exchange—growing less and less at home each minute. He felt weak and sore; his head ached, and the wound left by the fresh amputation of his little finger, throbbed angrily.

"I suppose I may as well go now," he said. "When can I get my old self there back again?"

"On Thursday night, if all works well," said the old man. "Till then, good-day."

Ronald Wyde's first impulse, as he shambled into the open air, was to go home; but he thought of the confusion his sadly mixed identity would cause in Frau Spritzkrapfen's quiet household, and came to a dead-stop to consider the matter. Then he decided to quit the town for the interminable four days—to go to Dresden, or anywhere. His next step was to slouch into the nearest beer-cellar and call for beer, pen, and paper.

While waiting for these, he surveyed his own reflection in the dingy glass that hung above the table he sat by—a glass that gave his face a wavy look, as if seen through heated air. He felt an amused pride in his altered appearance, much as a masquerader might be pleased with a clever disguise, and caught himself wondering whether he were likely to be recognised in it. Apparently satisfied of his safety from detection, he turned to the table and wrote a beer-scented note to Frau Spritzkrapfen, explaining his sudden absence by some discreet fiction. He got along well enough until he reached the end, when, instead of his own flowing sign-manual, he tipsily scrawled the unfamiliar name of Hans Kraut. Tearing the sheet angrily across, he wrote another, and signed his name with an effort. He was about to seek a messenger to carry his note, when it occurred to him to leave it himself, which he did; and had thereby the keen satisfaction of hearing pretty Lottchen confess, with a blush on her fair German cheek, that they would all miss Herr Wyde very much, because they all loved him. Turning away with a sigh that was very like a hiccough, he trudged to the railway station and took a ticket to Dresden, going third-class as best befitting his clothes and appearance.

He felt ashamed enough of himself as the train rumbled over the rolling land between Freiberg and the capital, and gave him time to think connectedly over what had happened, and what he now was. His fellow-passengers cast him sidelong looks, and gave him a wide berth. Even the quaint, flat-arched windows of one pane each, that winked out of the red-tiled roofs like sleepy eyes, seemed to leer drunkenly at him as they scudded by.

Ronald Wyde's account of those days in Dresden was vague and misty. He crept along the bustling streets of that sombre, grey city, that seemed to look more natural by cloud-light than in the full sunshine, feeling continually within him a struggle between two incompatible natures now so strangely blended. Each day he kept up the contest manfully, passing by the countless beer-cellars and drinking-booths with an assumption of firmness and resolution that oozed slowly away toward nightfall, when the animal body of the late Hans Kraut would contrive to get the better of the animating principle of Ronald Wyde; the refined nature would yield to the toper's brute-craving, with an awful sense of its deep degradation in so succumbing, and, before midnight, Hans was gloriously drunk, to Ronald's intense grief.

Time passed somehow. He had memories of sunny lounges on the Bruhl'sche Terrace, looking on the turbid flow of the eddied Elbe, and watching the little steamboats that buzzed up and down the city's flanks, settling now and then, like gad-flies, to drain it of a few drops of its human life. Well-known friends, whose hands he had grasped not a week before, passed him unheedingly; all save one, who eyed him for a moment, said "Poor devil!" in an undertone, and dropped a silber-gro' into his maimed hand.

He felt glad of even this lame sympathy in his lowness; but most of all he prized the moistened glance of pity that flashed upon him from the great dark eyes of a lovely girl who had passed him now and then as he slouched along. Once, a being as degraded and scurvy as his own outward self, turned to him, called him "Dutzbruder," asked him how he left them all in Berlin, stared at Ronald's blank look of non-recognition, and passed on with a muttered curse on his own stupidity in mistaking a stranger, in broad daylight, for his crony, Kraut.

Another memory was of the strange lassitude that seemed to almost paralyze him after even moderate exertion, and caused him to drop exhausted on a bench on the terrace when he had shuffled over less than half its length. More than once the suspicion crept upon him that only a portion of his vitality now remained to him, and that its greater part lay mysteriously coiled in Herr Lebensfunke's life-magnet. And this, in turn, broadened into a doubting distrust of the Herr himself—a dread lest the old man might in some way appropriate his stock of life to his own use, and so renew his fast-expiring lease for a score or two of years to come. At last this dread grew so painfully definite, that he hurried back to Freiberg a day before his appointed time, and once more found his two-fold self wandering through its devious streets.

It was long after dark, and a thin rain slanted on the slippery stones, as he again made his way through the deserted and sleepy paths of the town to the old philosopher's house. He was wet, chilled, weary, and sick enough at heart as he leaned against the old stone doorway and waited for an answer to his knock. The plash of the heavier rain-drops from the tiled leaves was the only sound he heard for many minutes, until, at last, pattering feet neared him on the inside, and a child's voice asked him who was there. To his friendly response the door was opened half wide, and Vögelein's blank, pretty face peeped in.

Was Herr Lebensfunke at home? No; he had said that he wasn't at home; but then, she thought he was in the long room where mamma went to sleep. Could he be seen? No, she thought not; he was very tired, and, in her own—Vögelein's—opinion, he was going to sleep, too, just as mamma did. And the wizened little face, with its eldritch eyes and tangled hair, was withdrawn, and the door began to close. Ronald forced himself inside, and grasped the child's arm.

"Vögelein, don't you know me?"

The girl, in nowise startled, gravely set her flickering candle on the doorstep, looked up at him wonderingly, as if he were an exhibition, and said she thought not, unless he had been asleep on the table.

"Good heavens!" cried Ronald, "can this child talk of nothing else but people asleep on a table?"

But, as he spoke, a thought whirred through his brain. He drew the poor half-witted thing close to him and asked:

"Can Vögelein tell me something about mamma, and how she went to sleep?"

The child rambled on, pleased to find a listener to her foolish prattle. All he could connect into a narrative was, that the girl's mother, some seven or eight years before, had been drained of her life by the awful magnet, and that, as the child said, "the Herr Doctor ever since had talked just like mamma."

His dread was well founded, then. The old man's one dream and end was to prolong his wretched life; could he doubt that he would not now make use of the means he had so unwisely thrown in his way? He turned about, half maddened.

"Girl!" he cried, "I must see the old man! Where is here?"

He couldn't see him, she whined. He was asleep up there on the table. At one o'clock he had said he would wake up.

He pushed past her, mounted to the long room, pressed open the unfastened door, and entered.

The old man and the corpse of his former self lay together under the light of a lamp that swung from the beam overhead.

An isolated carbon point was directed to each white, still breast. From the old man's hand a cord ran to a key beyond, arranged to make or break connection at a touch. By it stood a clock, with a simple mechanism attached that bore upon a second key like the first, evidently planned to press upon it when the hands should mark a given hour. The child had said that he would wake at one, and it was now past midnight.

Ronald Wyde comprehended it all now. The wily old man's feeble life had been withdrawn into the great magnet, and mixed therein with what remained of his own. In less than an hour the key would fall, and the double stream would flow into and animate his young body, which would then wake to renewed life; while the cast-off shell beside it, worn to utter uselessness by a toilsome century, would be left to molder as a mothed garment.

Surely no time was to be lost; his life depended upon instant action. And yet, comprehending this, he went to work slowly, and as a somnambulist might, acting almost by instinct, and well knowing that a blunder now meant irrevocable death.

Carefully disengaging the cord from the old man's yet warm grasp, and setting the carbon point aside, he lifted the shrivelled corpse and bore it away, to cast it on the white rubbish-heap in one corner. Returning to his work, he stripped himself, and lay down in the old man's place. As he did so the distant minster bells rang the three-quarters.

Was there yet time?

He braced his shoulders firmly against the brass plate under him, and moved the carbon point steadily back to its place, with its tip resting on his breast—the silk wrapped wire that dangled between it and the magnet quivering as he did so, as with conscious life. Drawing a long breath, he tightened the cord, and heard a faint click as the key snapped down.

The same sharp sting as before instantly pricked his breast, tingling thrills pulsed over him, beats of light and shadow swept before his eyes, and he lost all consciousness. For how long he knew not At last he felt, rather than saw, the lamp-rays flickering above him, and opened his eyes as though waking from a tired sleep. Sitting up, he gave a fearful look around him, as if dreading what he might see. The drunkard's body lay stretched and motionless beside him, and the clock marked three. He was saved!

Slipping down from his perilous bed, he resumed the old familiar garments that belonged to him as Ronald Wyde, shuddering with emotion as he did so. Only pausing to give one look at the heap in the shadowy corner, and at the other sleeper under the now dying lamp, he quitted the room, and locked its heavy door upon the two silent guardians of its life-secrets. When he reached the street, he found the rain had ceased to trop, and that the cold stars blinked over the slumberous down. Before noon he had taken leave of Frau Spritzkrapfen, turned buxom Lottchen scarlet all over by a hearty, sudden, farewell kiss, and was far on his way from Freiberg, with its re-vined balcony and its dark laboratory, never again to visit it or them. And as the busy engine toiled and shrieked, and with each beat of its mighty steam-heart carried him further away, his thoughts flew back and clustered around the witless, brown-eyed birdling. Poor child, he never learned her fate.

I heard this strange story from its hero one sunny summer morning, as we swept over the meadowy reaches of the Erie Zailway or hung along the cliff side by the wooded windings of the Susquehanna. When he had ended it, he smiled languidly, and, showing me his still mutilated hand, said that the old doctor's job had been a sad bungle, after all. In fact, the only physical proof that remained to verify his story was a curved blue spot where the ingoing current of the magnet had carried particles from the carbon point and lodged them beneath the skin. Psychologically, he was sadly mixed up, he said; for since that time he had felt that four lives were joined in him—his own, the remnant of Herr Lebensfunke's miserable hoard merged in that of poor birdling's mother, and, last of all Hans Kraut's.

He left the cars soon afterwards at Binghampton, watchfully followed by a stout, shabby man with a three days' beard stubbling his chin, who had occupied the seat in front of us, and had turned now and then to listen for a moment to Ronald's rapid narration.

A week later I heard that he was dead—having committed suicide in a fit of delirium soon after his admission to the Binghampton Inebriate Asylum. The attendant who made him ready for burial noticed a singular blue mark on his left breast that looked, he said a little like a horseshoe magnet.

A Nine Days' Wonder.

THE whole street—the whole neighbourhood was in a ferment. For that matter, all London, from East to West, quivered with excitement and curious imaginings, for the Press had circulated far and wide the fact that Andrew Atterbury, of No. 2 Delaval Street, W., had suddenly and mysteriously disappeared.

Everyone was ready, of course, with the usual theory as to why and where the missing man had gone; but also, as usual, the suggestions were worse than valueless. As for the police, they were completely at fault and—awaiting information.

The strangest part, however, of the whole affair was that the only individual who might be said to have any, the greatest in fact, personal interest in Mr. Atterbury's movements manifested a singular and irritating mysterious unconcern.

At eleven o'clock on the morning of the day when the newspapers were devoting columns of "copy" to the "Sensational Case of Mr. Andrew Atterbury," the wife of that well-known financier and accredited agent in London for the South American Republic of "Buenos Vistas," emerged, groomed to perfection, from her front door and stood a moment calmly and deliberately buttoning her gloves, the while she talked to and teased her fat, wheezy, black pug.

The whisperings, the astonished hand-liftings, and the general surmisings, charitable and otherwise (principally otherwise) that followed the lady in her passage along the sunny side of the street testified undoubtedly to the extraordinary feeling of respectable surprise evoked by an attitude the ordinary mind could not grasp, much less understand.

Andrew Atterbury was an exceptionally clever man. City men swore by him, and followed his lead in things financial with the blind faith of sheep in the bell-wether. Not a movement in monetary matters, either in London or the world over, took place without his knowledge or intervention; not a "golden pie" was mixed without his finger, or hand even, being deep in it.

He was the "King of the Money Market," and although not a member of the Stock Exchange, knew more of its inner working, and controlled its more important interests to a greater extent than the most magnificent broker of them all.

The Republic he commercially—and rumour said politically—represented was certainly fortunate in its agent, for when its sister States failed, as they often did, to touch the pocket side of the well-to-do outside world, Buenos Vistas could always rely upon its loans being successfully taken up and placed without vexatious or unnecessary trouble or delay.

The financier's nationality was a mystery. Some said he was a Jew, and assuredly there was warrant for the opinion. He had all the Israelitish faculty for acquiring wealth, his personality also being markedly Hebraic. But where he was born no man knew.

Speaking English fluently and with a perfect accent, possessing a peculiarly English name, it was difficult to deny him a Briton's birthright. Yet German, High Dutch, Russian even, were as familiar to him as his presumably mother tongue.

A reticent man, more than ordinarily so, it was hopeless to seek to "draw" him on these and other private matters, and so men were content to worship Mammon in his company and under his priestship, and to let the mere detail of his genius quietly rest until that inevitable social millennium when revelation should satisfactorily account for every, as yet, unaccountable thing.

It was an open secret that the affairs of Buenos Vistas occupied the first place with Andrew Atterbury, and the largest share by far of his time and attention. The papers would every now and again publish a paragraph stating that "the agent for the Republic of Buenos Vistas left London last night by the late mail en route for San Madura. Mr. Atterbury's mission is, we understand, not altogether unconnected with a certain new loan, rendered necessary, it is believed, by the present critical state of public affairs in the Republic."

Statements such as these were common, everyday incidents, so much so that people thought but little of them; but when without a word of warning, without any journalistic notice or send-off, Andrew Atterbury, between the hours of six p.m. on the 10th and nine a.m. on the 11th of August, disappeared completely, no man knowing the manner of his going, tongues were set a-wagging and the floodgates of public wonderment flung wide to their fullest.

He had been last seen when descending from his brougham at his own door at six o'clock on the evening of the 10th, but from the moment that the house door closed behind him no more was known of him. A very pretty mystery, deepened, as has been said, by his wife's apparently inexplicable indifference.

Bankruptcy, ruin, and the whole pack of commercial ban-dogs were trotted out, patted on the back, and otherwise made much of. It is such a satisfaction to hound the canine at the heels of a successful quarry. Much may be pardoned in our fellow man, but success—never.

Yet was this altogether a false scent, for Atterbury's solicitors—without, of course, revealing details—publicly announced in a letter to The Times that the financial position of their client was, if anything, still more impregnable and satisfactory than it had ever been, and that those who sought to insinuate ugly and scandalous suggestions did so without a shadow of foundation upon which to base their calumnious impertinencies.

Now there was in Atterbury's employ a person, one Barnaby Quicket, who probably could, if he would, have done much to satisfy public curiosity. But there existed a reason and a difficulty, the explaining away of the one and the surmounting of the other being alike almost out of the question.

Andrew Atterbury, big man financially though he was, had no office or other recognised place for the transaction of his business. He kept no books, in the ordinary sense of the word, nor had he in his service an army of clerks and underlings such as his brother magnates habitually indulged in.

One solitary henchman had he, the aforesaid Barnaby Quicket, and although there was a limit to his confidence in the man, yet the latter, being a trifle unscrupulous, did not hesitate to acquire information with regard to his master's more exclusive business arrangements by means undoubtedly underhanded, not to say criminal. The man had become an adept in the nefarious art of opening letters and deftly reclosing them, in keyhole spying, and in many other little ways and habits that come so easily to the crookedly-inclined.

Quicket's non-location in any one particular place rendered any questioning of him well nigh an impossibility. It had been always difficult to catch him; he was a sort of City "will-o'-the-wisp," evasive, disappointing; but now that his chief had melted into the shadow he was literally not to be found at all.

A certain stockbroker's clerk, to whom he was known by sight, declared distinctly that he had seen him, dressed for travelling, on the platform at Euston, evidently about to leave by the night mail. This in itself looked suspicious, but before the clue could be followed up and run to earth the opportunity had passed, and Barnaby Quicket, too, had dropped into the abyss of the unseen.

At last everybody decided to give up the riddle in despair, in the course of a fortnight the affair being practically forgotten save for an occasional reference to it in the daily papers.

To this day people talk of the ball given by Mrs. Atterbury in Delaval Street, just three months after the disappearance of her husband. There were no refusals. People were only too eager to attend in the hope of seeing or hearing something sensational. All such cravings were, however, unsatisfied.

The hostess was graciousness itself, beautifully dressed, but—absolutely silent upon the one all-important topic. There was no appearance of self-consciousness in Mrs. Atterbury's manner, no sign of any attempt to disguise real feelings. Perfectly natural, she moved among her guests with a dignity that to most of them seemed new and unaccustomed.

I have it on the authority of a well-known Society leader that Mrs. Atterbury trod her drawing-room floor that night with the step of a queen, that robes, crown, and all the other paraphernalia of royalty were alone needed to make a picture unequalled in the gallery of sovereigns. I learned also from my same informant a fact which, if it were true—and I have no reason for believing it to be otherwise—furnished the one link lacking to complete the chain of, as yet, circumstantial evidence.

Lady Hatfield averred that while resting in Mrs. Atterbury's boudoir, no one else being in the apartment, she heard voices, one of them that of her hostess, in conversation behind the closed door communicating with the adjoining sitting-room. She declares that she heard Mrs. Atterbury say:

"Well, Quicket, this is my last word to His Excellency, namely, that I will be with him upon the 6th of January. And, now, you must not delay longer or you will miss the mail."

Lady Hatfield says that after an interval of scarcely two minutes she saw a man, attired in a long ulster and wearing a travelling cap, pass the door of the boudoir and disappear quickly down the staircase.

The next day a large board announcing that No. 2 was to let appeared on the front of the house, other indications making it clear, a fact verified later in the day, that Mrs. Atterbury had departed for parts unknown.

"Revolution in Buenos Vistas. Complete Anarchy in San Madura, the Capital. Assassination of General Santhos, the President of the Republic, and Assumption by Señor Artuero of the Presidential Authority."

The above was the leaded headline announcement in all the evening papers of the 17th of January. Strange things began to be whispered at street corners in the City anent the matter. The name of the sometime financier, Atterbury, was banded about, and became somehow mixed up with those who had brought about the state of things existing in Buenos Vistas.

Then a letter appeared in The Times from an English resident in San Madura, making definite assertion that from his own personal knowledge of the missing Andrew Atterbury, he was able to declare that Señor Artuero, the revolutionary trader, the organiser of the pronunciamento, and the late London agent of the Republic were one and the same person.

This was in itself startling, but when a cable communicating the proclamation of that person as President was published in every newspaper throughout the three kingdoms the surprise was intensified a hundredfold.

His Excellency Señor Andrea Artuero, President of the Republic of Buenos Vistas, and his beautiful consort never returned to England; for when, less than six months after his accession, Señor Artuero, otherwise Atterbury, was shot during one of the perennial popular outbreaks in the capital, his wife, the sole inheritor of his vast wealth, departed for Paris, in which city she is likely to end her days in that fashion most pleasing to herself, and as Nature evidently intended her.

The Story of a Cigarette Case.

LIFE in what is called Society (remarked the ex-valet) is not all beer and skittles, nor even champagne and billiards, as I found out when I was "own man" to young Lord Ernest Delhoste, the second son of the Earl of Sinbars. He was a nice young chap, and very popular with his intimates. Life offers many temptations to young men when they are handsome, popular, and sufficiently well-off; and I am afraid my master rather went the pace till that happened which often happens—he met and fell in love with a sweet young girl of his own rank in life. There was her photograph in a big silver frame on Lord Ernest's mantelpiece, and I often used to have a good look at it, for a sweeter, purer, truer face I have never seen.

You know the kind of face which gives you at once the impression of a loyal and straightforward nature. Miss Mollie Trevarthen's was one of that kind. She belonged to a Cornish family, as the name will tell you—one of the very oldest in the kingdom, so I have heard, and so old and proud that three successive heads had refused titles at the hands of the sovereign of their day.

My master was not the same man after his engagement to his sweetheart got its due six lines in "London Day by Day" in the Daily Telegraph. The dubious companions who ate his lunches, drank his wine, smoked his cigars, "borrowed" his money, and swindled him at cards and billiards, were disgusted at the change. They would indignantly demand of me the reason of Lord Ernest's cutting himself off from his old haunts and habits in this sudden fashion; but, of course, being up in my business, I joined the "Know Nothing Club" directly. People in my position do not believe in the policy of the open mouth, and I do not blame them.

I am not saying that my master became an entire hermit after his acceptance by Miss Trevarthen. Among other things he still gave little card-parties in his rooms, though the company was a little more select than it had been, and only men in his own rank of life were admitted. One of the guests was invariably a Mr. Frank Hill. I believe he had been in the army, but had resigned on succeeding to some estates and a large fortune.

He was a bachelor, and currently reported to be sweet on Miss Trevarthen, though it did not appear to make any difference in his attitude towards my master, who on his part, never dreamed that any such attachment existed. Mr. Hill was a short, stocky man, very broad across the shoulders, with a very firm jaw, which his habit of shaving clean emphasised.

I should think he would have been a very useful man in a fight. Some people thought him good-looking, but in my opinion his eyes spoilt him, being hard and cruel in the extreme. However, his pleasant, but reserved, manner offended nobody, and "Old Frank Hill" was generally popular, though he did not draw to himself that admiring affection which seemed the birthright of Lord Ernest.

Never shall I forget a certain April night about six weeks after the engagement was announced. My master was having a little game of poker in his rooms. Though he hardly touched a card himself at that time, his guests were all devotees of the fascinating pastime, and they were soon hard at it in the midst of that absorbed silence which all good card-players love.

Suddenly one of the players, a callow youth named Deecie (who was subsequently slain at Spion Kop, poor lad!) picked up a massive silver cigarette-case which lay at Hill's elbow.

"F. H. from M. T.," he read out; and being a child utterly without discretion, he simpered: "Who may 'M. T.' be, if it isn't a rude question?"

"It is a rude question," snapped Hill, curtly.

Poor Deecie went scarlet, and dropped the cigarette case as if it were hot. But Hill wasn't looking at him; he stared straight at Lord Ernest with such mingled hate and triumph in his cold eyes, that as I caught it over my master's shoulder, I nearly let go the glass I was handing him.

For a moment Lord Ernest looked back at him, white to the lips, then in an ordinary tone, he said:

"I see your ten, and ten better."

So the game went on.

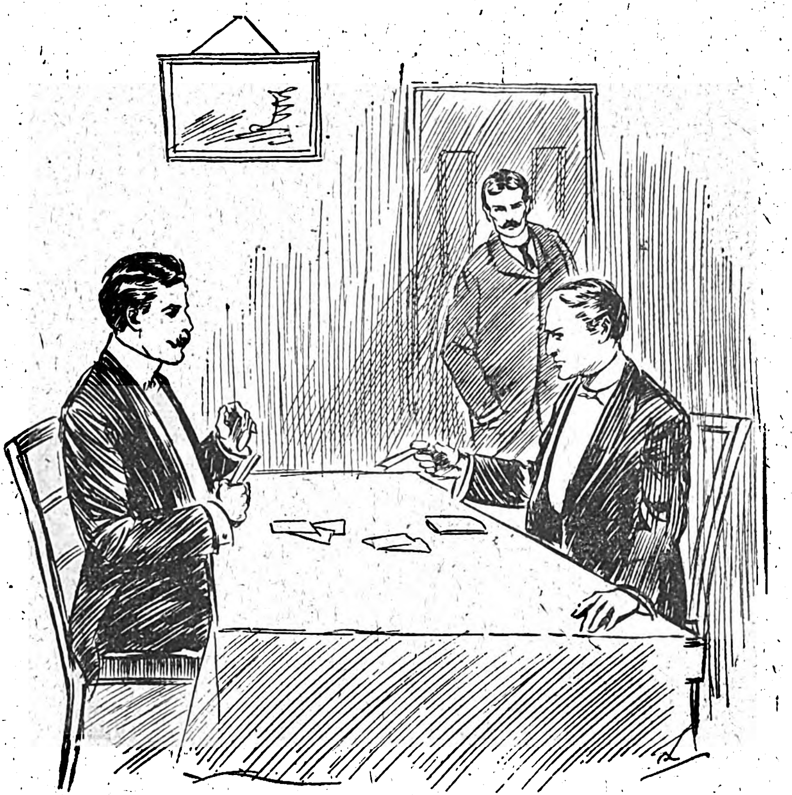
Mr. Hill was the last to leave the chambers when the party broke up. The wan dawn was breaking in through the window, and the sparrows were chattering. Most of the gentlemen looked heavy-eyed and haggard.

"I want a word with you, Hill," said Lord Ernest, when the two were alone.

"Yes?" said Mr. Hill in a non-committal manner.

"You made an insinuation at the table about—about the initials on your cigarette-case," said my master in a low, hoarse voice.

"I? An insinuation? I said nothing, my dear chap," cried Mr. Hill, raising his thick eyebrows in wonderment.



There were the two men quietly playing cards with as much composure as if the violent scene had never taken place.

"You looked an insinuation."

"Rot! I can't stand here at this hour in the morning arguing about looks. I want to get to bed."

He moved towards the door.

"One moment," said Lord Ernest in the same low tone, "I don't want to pry into your affairs."

"That's lucky," put in Mr. Hill with a black sneer.

"But I must know that it is not from Miss Trevarthen," said Lord Ernest, bringing out the last words with an expression of such utter misery that one's heart bled for him.

"Upon my word!" cried Mr. Hill scornfully. "Is that the kind of insinuation you make against the lady you are engaged to? You, to talk about insinuations!" He gave a low, contemptuous laugh.

My lord saw the trap into which his subtle enemy had lured him. He was livid with shame, anger, and disgust with himself. So engrossed were the two disputants in their conversation that neither of them had noticed me, as I busied myself with some totally unnecessary task at a side-table, but just then my lord happened to see me, and I was promptly ordered off to bed. I did not go to bed. I thought perhaps my lord might want me again before he retired, so I sat up in my own room. I could hear nothing from the room I had left but an agitated voice which I recognised as Lord Ernest's, and occasionally the cold, sneering tones of the other. All of a sudden, a loud cry in my master's voice was succeeded by a deadly stillness.

The silence continued for so long that I entered the room in case I might be wanted; but I nearly cried out with astonishment at what I saw. There were the two men quietly playing cards, with as much composure as if the violent scene of ten minutes before had never taken place. Soon, however, I noticed that with all my master's apparent composure, one large bead of moisture had appeared on his forehead, and his face was pallid and drawn. Hill was coolly smoking, and his case lay beside him on the table. He dealt another hand. My master began to bet confidently, after he had drawn a couple of cards, for the game was poker. I may say that both players drew two cards. The betting went on in silence for some time, till only a few chips remained to my master.

"Another ten," said Hill, quietly, putting up the stakes.

"I see you," said my lord in a harsh whisper, and he pushed over the last pile of ivory discs that remained beneath his hand.

He had to pass his tongue over his dry lips before he could manage to mutter: "What have you got?"

"Four tens," cried Mr. Hill, flinging down his cards faces upwards. "Is that good enough?"

My master nodded.

"Quite good enough," he said in the same harsh whisper, and he idly fingered the cards that had fallen from his hand.

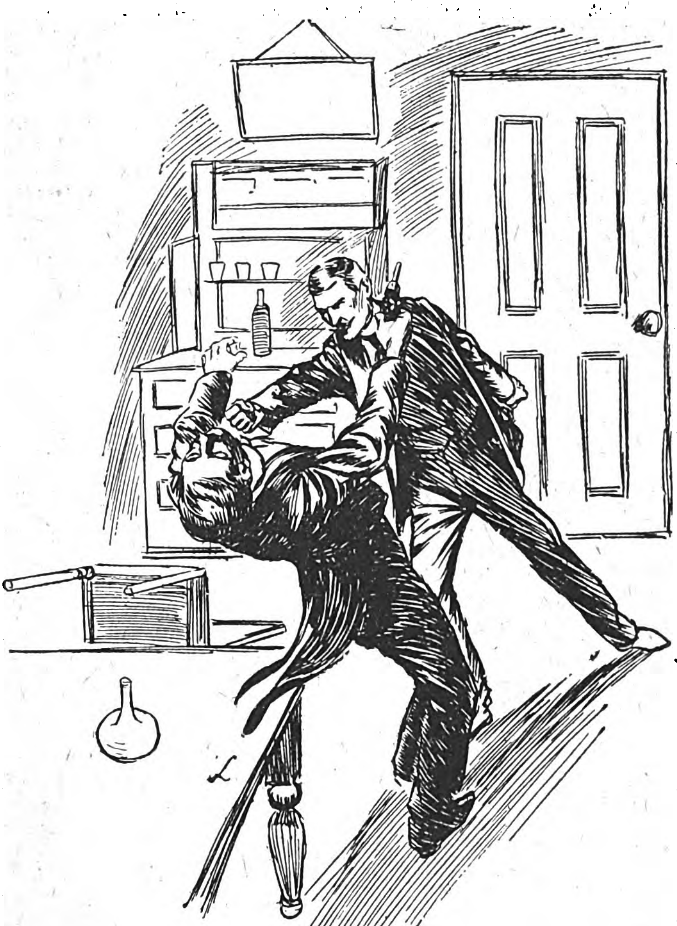
Mr. Hill rose.

I handed him his hat and coat.

"Good-night, Delhoste," he said, but my master was staring in front of him with such blank horror on his face as froze the blood in my veins.

* * * * *

I never want to pass such another month as the one following that night. I really thought my lord's mind had become affected. He was alternately wildly, recklessly merry, or in the depths of gloom. He spent money like water, and gambled furiously every night. Mr. Hill was never seen again at our place; nor, indeed, any of the people who had been present on the night of the quarrel. At the boisterous supper-parties which my lord gave, I shuddered to hear his wild laughter ringing high above the rest. It seemed to me as if the eternally-lost laughed.



I flung myself upon my lord, caught his wrist, and the pistol in his hand exploded.

Exactly a month from the date of his last game with Mr. Hill, my master handed me a note in the afternoon.

"There is a book—the title of it is inside—which I want you to get for me this afternoon," he said with the feverish, nervous manner that had become natural with him. "You must go to every bookseller's shop in London if necessary, but don't come back without it. It is most important that I have it to-day."

His room was in great disorder, and there was a heap of burnt paper in the grate. Two or three letters lay on his writing-table, and I noticed the top one was addressed to Miss Trevarthen.

"What are you waiting for?" cried Lord Ernest, irritably. "Why don't you go? A little fresh air will do you good, for I don't think you've been fifty yards from the door for the last month."

It was quite true that I had seldom been away from our place, for I felt that things were not going at all well, and I wished to be on hand in the case of an emergency.

Well, that afternoon I visited, as it seemed to me, dozens of booksellers' shops, but at each received the same reply. None of them had the book my master desired so particularly; and the assistant at the last place I visited bluntly said that he did not believe that there was such a book in existence.

Then, as it were, I saw clearly. Like a thunderbolt the revelation came upon me. My master had desired to get me out of the way for a time. But why? His extraordinary behaviour of late—the strange poker game I had witnessed—I began to piece things together rapidly. Then, chilling my blood, came the recollection of a wicked wager I had read about some years before, and had forgotten—that fearful institution known as the "American duel."

The duellists play cards, and the loser swears to kill himself at the end of a certain time. Could it be that my master was the victim of one of these fiendish contests? I leapt into a cab, and shouted to the man to hurry to Victoria Street on a matter of life and death.

As I expected, my master's door was locked when I reached home, but—thank Heaven!—I could hear his feverish tread still going to and fro. I put my shoulder against the door—I was young and strong then—it went in with a crash. I flung myself upon my lord, caught his wrist, the pistol in his hand exploded with a stunning report, but the bullet sped harmlessly upward. He fought as furiously for death as most for life — cursed and struck me, but I held on, and gradually he ceased to struggle, and only panted and glared wildly at me as I pinned him against the wall.

"My lord," I gasped at him, "listen, there is no need. I know everything. I tell you Mr. Hill cheated that night at poker."

"What do you mean?" he cried, wildly.

"I tell you he did," I said. "I saw him pass the cards over his cigarette-case as he dealt and he saw their reflection in the polished silver!"

* * * * *

This is how I saved my master from an ignominious end. He is now the adoring husband of the sweet girl whose photograph used to stand on his mantelpiece, for needless to say the initials on Mr. Hill's cigarette-case were not those of Mollie Trevarthen, but of a very different "M. T."

Tell us of a better paper than "Short Stories" and we'll take it in.

Eli Blake, Democrat.

"WELL, they're my sentiments, anyway; an' I'd stick to 'em, if I died for it."

"What! you'll make master an' man change places?"

"I didn't mean that; all I say is, as the 'man' 'as 'is rights as well as the 'master,' an' that one on 'em is the right to his own private opinion. Now, my opinion is, that, except in business hours, an' on business matters, master and man should each mind their own, an' leave one another's alone. I don't want to say any more about it, for it's just nine o'clock, an' there's Mr. Ned a-comin'."

The old timekeeper at Carberry and Mills, chain-cable and anchor makers, Isle of Dogs, stood waiting by the half-open gate, barely acknowledging the cheery morning greeting of Ned Carberry as he strode past toward his office.

Eli Blake was a character—a man of pronounced views—as his concluding remarks in the above fragment of conversation with the foreman of the yard clearly indicates.

He was, too, a prudent man, believing that absolute discretion should obtain, as between man and woman; above all, between master and servant.

He was a widower, with one child, a daughter, and Elsie Blake knew quite enough of her father's "mental twist" (as his cronies termed the somewhat forcible expression of his opinions, socialistic and political) to abstain from injudicious indulgence in too much self-assertion.

She was both a good girl and a pretty; about eighteen, and, for one in her station, well-informed and refined above the average.

Old Eli had been for many years in the employ of Carberry and Mills; for so many, in fact, that he was looked upon, alike by master and by men, as an institution, a fixture.

All knew his little peculiarities, but, in consideration of his many other and more important sterling qualities—virtues, indeed—liked and respected him none the less because of them.

Ned Carberry would as soon have thought of abdicating his own throne as of doing without Eli Blake. While certainly not entirely sympathising with the old man's more extreme democratic views, he did more than tolerate them, in that he held himself to be a man of the people, and believed in the right application of the great law of brotherhood, as between man and man.

This, of course, was going a little ahead of Eli, who, probably, from long habit, had come to recognize the class dividing-line as being not only a necessity, but, in a limited sense, an advantage.

One thing troubled—greatly troubled—him; Elsie would not, or could not, show any inclination for neighbourliness with those of her own class.

This struck at the very root of his principles, for he thought he saw in it the outcome of a spirit of dangerous social ambition, fatal to the due cultivation of that which he conceived to be the proper pride of her caste.

About five years before, in his wife's lifetime, Elsie, then a mere child, had on a certain occasion, narrowly escaped death.

It was in this way:

She was in the habit of daily carrying her father's dinner to him at the yard. One day the horse attached to an empty waggon, just being driven through the gates, shied, bolted, and fell with a crash, as the cart, colliding with one of the gate-posts, overturned, and was smashed to splinters.

Elsie was immediately in the path of the animal, and but for the presence of mind of young Ned Carberry—then a stalwart youngster of sixteen, who chanced to be making his way towards the entrance—would inevitably have been either crushed by the wreckage, or knocked down by the infuriated horse.

She was too frightened, poor child, to move out of the way, and it was only when Ned rushed forward, and, taking her up bodily, threw her with all his strength on to one side, that she fully realised her peril.

The act of her preserver had bruised and pained her, but the physical consequences of Ned's timely exertion of boyish muscle soon passed; from that time forward Ned Carberry was her girlish hero, the one being in the whole world whom she accorded a large place in her warm little heart.

Soon after this incident, Eli and his wife decided, on account of her poor health, to send Elsie to some farmer relatives in the Midlands.

The originally proposed visit of a month lengthened out, however, from various causes, into one of years, terminating only with Mrs. Blake's death.

His wife gone, his hearth lonely, Eli craved for his child's companionship, and so it was that a week or two before the beginning of this little chronicle, Elsie returned to her old home in Nelson Street, Isle of Dogs.

It so happened that during the years of Elsie Blake's absence, Ned Carberry had gone abroad to see the world, returning on the death of his father to take his position as sole partner in Carberry and Mills.

There had been no Mills for many a long day; so many, and so long, that the dead and gone junior partner had come to be regarded as a mere myth or a musty tradition.

Her new duties as her father's housekeeper fully occupying her time and attention, Elsie now no longer brought him his midday meal, the ten-year-old son of the foreman of the yard, and a great favourite with old Eli, deputising for her.

Elsie, it may be said, had now developed into a perfectly lovely woman, with about her not one reminiscent mark of her sun-bonnet and pinafore days.

There was not much difference to be noted in Ned himself. True, he was bigger, stronger, and, if anything, kinder and more gentle even than he had been as a boy. But he was the same Ned—the same loveable nature to all who had ever known him.

It may be accepted as a fact that the incident of nearly five years before had long since died out of his recollection. Men are not like women; they see and hear so much, their interests and occupations are so varied, that unless it concerns them very closely they easily forget events, which a woman, naturally and by habit more introspective, and with greater opportunities for quiet musing, cherishes in the hiding-places of her memory, bringing them forth every now and again, for contemplation, and mental refreshment.

Ned Carberry knew that Eli Blake had a daughter, but as to what manner of girl she was, pretty or plain, good or bad, he had not the faintest idea.

With Elsie it was far different. She, it may safely be said, had never forgotten the big Eton-jacketted boy who, at the risk of his own life, had saved hers. From the day that she had erected the idol in her little "holy of holies," she had continued faithfully to worship at the shrine until now she was beginning to find, to her own shame and confusion of mind, that the image she had set up was the one thing on earth she most desired.

It was all very reprehensible, no doubt; and quite opposed to the principles set forth in the dominant clause of her father's creed.

She knew this, and dreaded sometimes lest he should discover her secret.

Perhaps he might never even have known of its existence, had it not been for two things, impossible of control—fate, so called, and the tongue of a mischievous woman.

I venture to qualify the word "fate," it being in my humble opinion, at the best, a doubtful quantity, and not by any means to be relied upon, for I, at least, hold it to be half-brother to "chance," a notoriously untrustworthy principle. This admitted, I prefer to assign the credit of that which followed to "the Providence that shapes our ends," regardless of anything we may humanly do to carve out our own destinies.

Providence, then, decreed that Ned Carberry should, on a certain sunny morning in August—for the sun shines sometimes in the Isle of Dogs—and while on his way to the works, see Elsie Blake at the parlour window tending her plants, and looking sweet enough to charm the heart out of the veriest churl, vowed to celibacy and sulky solitude.

At first he could not identify her; did not, indeed, know her from—Eve! Then, with a hesitating slowness born of indecision, he raised his hat, halting almost imperceptibly as he did so.

It was a tribute to a beautiful presence—nothing more—for it was not until he reached the end of the street that it flashed upon him who it really was.

"Elsie Blake, by all that's wonderful! Why, she would be rare among the rarest. I'm glad, even in ignorance, that I saluted her. It's a privilege to recognise beauty such as hers."

This was dangerous musing. That his thoughts, far from troubling him, afforded him the keenest satisfaction, was not wonderful, though it intensified the peril; and when he passed the timekeeper's lodge and smilingly gave a more than usually hearty "Good morning!" to old Eli, there could have been but one opinion as to the state and bent of his mind.

Elsie was certainly not so ignorant as to who he was, as he himself had been at sight of her. Woman seldom is; she reads where man spells—very often.

Yet was it all very unfortunate; for Elsie, socially barred, and conventionally shut out from all the ordinary sources of giving and receiving, could, after this gentle fillip to her imagination, but indulge in vague dreams, which might or might not remain with her, when she should, as assuredly she would, awake to life's sober realities.

The morning's rencontre in Nelson Street had not passed unnoticed, Eli Blake having been informed of it on his way home the same evening by a certain inquisitive busy-body.

"Well, what about it?" growled old Eli. "I've only got your word for it" (he hated this particular specimen of the tattling sisterhood). "For aught I know you may be mistaken. I can hardly believe Elsie would encourage any, even the slightest attention from Mr. Ned; she knows my sentiments too well."

"Oh! of course you can believe it or not, Mr. Blake, just as you like." This with a sniff and a toss of the not too tidy head. "It's no concern of mine, and——"

"Then don't bother your head about it," snapped Eli, interrupting her, at the same time pushing past the woman, and hurrying on his way.

"Old cat!" he said to himself, when free of his persecutor. "An' yet," for it rankled, spite of himself and his faith in his daughter, "it's possible—it's just possible. Well, if it should be true, I'll nip it in the bud, that's all. Mr. Ned wouldn't wrong me or mine, I'm sure of that, sure as death! but I want no fine gentleman son-in-law, not me! An' so I'd tell 'im 'imself if it came to the push."

That evening, over his tea, he expressed himself pretty plainly upon the matter, much to Elsie's confusion and distress.

"I wouldn't mess about at that parlor winder of a mornin', Elsie," he said, "if I was you; leastways, not till Mr. Ned's gone by. He may think he's pleasin' you by a kind word, or a nod, but it don't please me; an' so I tell you. There's nobody the world over like Mr. Ned, but—well, don't do it, my girl! don't do it!"

Elsie made no reply; the fact is that she was afraid to speak, lest her manner should betray her; so Eli concluded that she had understood him, and would respect his wishes.

Days went by, and though Ned Carberry saw Elsie no more at her window, he met her frequently in the neighbourhood, when, as he often now did, he strolled out from his duties for a "breath of fresh air," as he tried to deceive himself into believing.

The Isle of Dogs is far from being an ideal place for a ramble, even in fine weather, but Ned Carberry did not appear to find it at all depressing.

Oh! how delicious it all was—to Elsie, poor Elsie; as for Ned, he too thought it delightful, but experienced qualms of conscience with regard to the wisdom of it all.

Even then all might have been well; and two lives, though they might not each have the "moon," still might have secured something, in its way equally good, something, perhaps, in the end, more satisfying, and intrinsically of greater value.

This is as the world would think. I have my own opinion.

But the busy-body was not content with that which she had already achieved, viz., the implanting in old Eli's mind a disturbing element, that without doubt, would rankle and grow, to the ultimate upsetting of everybody concerned.

She must needs send round the marvellous tale, with embellishments and exaggerations; the gossips of the neighbourhood soon taking up the story, and making the most of it.

It was not surprising that that which the wives discussed, should soon became the common property of the husbands, and that a whisper, more or less emphatic, should in time reach the ears of old Eli.

The day that he heard it was one when Ned and Elsie had agreed to meet at noon.

There were some waste fields, and by some deserted chemical works. Huge boards, proclaiming that the land was to be let for building purposes, disfigured even the already uninviting prospect. It was of all dreary spots the most dreary. As a trysting-place for lovers I can imagine none less suitable.

But as everybody knows it is difficult to find rural or romantic spots in the Isle of Dogs; a place therefore, such as I have described would probably be, for that locality, rather above the average than otherwise.

It would be about half-past twelve, when Ned and Elsie, standing, absorbed in talk, in the shadow of the wall that girt the uninhabited factory, heard heavy footsteps aproaching on the cinder-path leaning to where they were.

Elsie saw him first and instinctively drew away from Ned's side.

"Oh, don't trouble yourself," said Eli, quietly but with a dangerous light in his honest old eyes. "Don't trouble yourself to move, I shan't disturb you for long. I've got something to say, and when I've said it I'll go my way, an'"—he looked keenly at her—"you can go yourn."

"Blake! you're under a misapprehension," cried Ned Carberry; "you're not treating your daughter fairly!"

"Ain't I? Then I'm sorry, mortal sorry. But I'm thinkin' that it's you as is mistaken, sir. However what I've got to say to you, Mr. Ned, I'll say when I've done with her."

Elsie moved nearer to Ned now, perhaps because she felt that soon he would be her only protector.

"Elsie Blake," continued the old man, each word coming sharp as a razor from his lips, "a week or so ago I told you plainly what I wished; and I had every reason to believe that you would obey me. I find now that I wer' over-trustin'. If you think that a marriage with my master will please me, or that you will reap good from it, I tell you that you will do neither. From this moment I've done with you! I never wish to see your face more! I'll provide for you away from my roof 'till you go to your husband, but in no other way. That's my last word to you."

"Mr. Blake!" broke out Ned Carberry, "you are unnatural."

"Am I? That's as it may be," answered Eli, still quietly. "I thought, sir, as you was a gentleman, an' as I've knowed you ever since you was a lad, as you was honest. It's not my fault as you're neither one or the other."

"Blake, you forget yourself!"

"No, Mr. Ned! it's you as 'as forgot yourself, an' take this from me: oil and water'll never mix. You know my meanin'. I leaves your service from to-night. Good-day to you, sir."

He turned and walked slowly back along the cinder-path, without so much as a head-turn, and went into his own house—alone.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward Carberry are to-day a fairly happy couple, but I fancy that the lady must often call to mind those last words of old Eli (she has never set eyes on him since that day), for at times her husband sees the tears in her eyes.

He never asks the reason, for he knows.

GALBRAITH OF St. ANSELM'S.
A story of Oxford and Undergraduates; of villainy and manhood; of shadows and sunshine. A story wherein is set forth the strange career of Galbraith of St. Anselm's—how shadowy mystery dogged his footsteps; how he suffered for the sins of another; how he was hounded out of college and university; how a faithful few stood by him; how, sometimes swept under, sorely battered and bruised, he never ceased to fight the fierce tide of adversity, and reached the shore at last! ADRIAN'S ADOPTION.

"HERE, Mac! what do you make of this?" and Captain Philip Darling handed the morning's Times across the breakfast-table, with a laugh, to his companion.

"Make of what?" echoed the major; Major Patrick MacIlray, V.C., a grizzled old Indian veteran, and a frequent visitor in the early hours at the captain's quarters.

"Ah! I see," he continued, nicely adjusting his "pince-nez," and reading aloud the paragraph indicated by the other, which ran as follows:

> ADOPTION—Will any wealthy and benevolently-inclined bachelor or spinster adopt young couple, who have been many years engaged, but are unable to marry owing to lack of means. Address:—H. H., Box 1002, International Agency, Fleet Street. E. C.

"Well?" said the captain.

"H'm; can't say exactly, wants thinking over," said the major.

"Do you know what my opinion is about it?"

"No; what is it?"

"Rot!"

"Don't agree with you. May be genuine. Facts sometimes stranger than fic——"

"Not always. In such cases as this, for instance, it suspiciously inclines to the mendacious."

"I repeat, I don't agree with you, Phil, at any rate I intend investigating the thing."

"Nonsense! You're not serious! As sure as your name's Mac you'll be done if you have anything to do with it. You're too soft-hearted to undertake the rôle of investigator."

"Scoffer! avaunt! Frankly Phil, I've made up my mind to write to the male half of this advertising couple; and, according as I find, so will I act."

The major rose from the table with as much military precision and smartness as his years and the "gameness" of his right leg would admit of; then, asking his host for writing materials, he scribbled for a minute or two, and read aloud the following:

> IF "A. A." (the gentleman, not the lady) will call to-morrow afternoon, three o'clock, at subscribed address, he may hear of something to his advantage.
> MAJOR PATRICK,
> 64 Oxford Terrace,
> Oct. 5, 1900. Belgravia, SW.

"You mean business, then," said the other, scarcely able to restrain an amused smile.

"Of course! Why, sir, there's no knowing what prize I may get out of it; a—affection, and—and——"

"Disinterested affection; also, of course. Mac! Mac! you'll make a mess of it. Look here, old chap! I'm open to make a bet with you—a level 'tenner'—that within a fortnight—ten days—within a week from the sending of this letter you'll wish you hadn't."

"Done, you unbeliever, done! I'll leave you now; post this, and return on this day week to claim stakes. Ta-ta."

"Half a moment, Mac! Why Oxford Terrace, Belgravia, you don't live there?"

"No, but my man, that married last year, does. Benjamin and his wife are only too ready to oblige me; and it's very handy to have such a convenient field for operation."

"Yes, in the event of failure, and the necessity for backing out."

First posting his answer to the advertisement, the major made his way to Oxford Terrace, arranged matters then with Mrs. Benjamin, and strolled away to his club to await results.

He had desired that any letter for him, should be at once forwarded to the "Junior Military," by special messenger.

At eight p.m. a note was left at the club by Benjamin himself. It ran:

> DEAR SIR.
> In reply to yours of this morning I beg to say that I shall have much pleasure in keeping the appointment made by you:
> Yours Faithfully
> ADRIAN ADKINSON.

"He's lost no time, at any rate," said the Major to himself, "it now only remains to be seen what manner of man he is, and whether, as Phil seems to think he has any little game. The wish may be father to the thought but I don't believe he has."

When the next day at 3. p.m. punctually, the knocker was vigorously applied at Number 64, Major Mac, from an advantageous position behind the parlour window curtain had a good preliminary glimpse of his visitor.

He was young; he was well-dressed, and not by any means bad-looking. More than this the gallant "investigator" was unable to gather.

By the time the major had resumed his seat in an armchair by the fire, Mrs. Benjamin had announced Mr. Adrian Adkinson, and the owner of the name standing a moment in the doorway of the room, hat in hand, advanced towards the correspondent, who rose to meet him; bowed, and indicated a chair.

After an interchange of conventional courtesies, and a little diplomatic skirmishing on the Major's part to decide, if possible, motives and character indices, the following facts, or, waiting proof, what passed for such, were arrived at.

In the first place Ilma Dunthorpe, and Adrian Adkinson were not of the same "caste" socially—the latter admitted this in a way, but only as the result of a chance question of the major's. Evidently he would much rather have concealed the detail, being as he was, a young man of the vain, super-sensitive sort, much given to indulgence in wounded feelings, and the like.

It appeared that the lady, the daughter of parents moving in good society, was of artistic bent. A working student on certain days at South Kensington and elsewhere, she had met Adrian on various occasions. The son of people who had sacrificed much for his education and general advancement in life, young Adkinson had paid assiduous court to the girl, mainly as he was particularly anxious to impress upon his listener, because of her winsome personality. She, on her part was no less attracted by him, or, so, at least, he said.

With the usual drift of events in such cases, an engagement, secret for some time, followed. Then came trouble. A girl of fine principle, loyal-hearted, and straightforward to a degree, she confided in her mother, the issue being, a parental ultimatum, and a separation of interests.

Ilma possessed in her own right a small income of fifty pounds a year, and as she was of age, the disposal of it was in her own hands. A clever "black and white" artist, she calculated that her earnings in this connection, added to her own private resources, would enable her to circumvent the irrepressible wolf.

"But what first suggested to you the idea of advertising," asked the major.

"Oh! I don't quite know. I'm not very clever at money-getting, and didn't exactly relish the notion of living on my wife's means. Then I thought that there must be wealthy people in the world without kith or kin to absorb their good things, and so, I—we, I mean, decided to appeal to such in the forlorn hope that some one, man or woman, would see things in our light, and help us to help ourselves."

"Ah! now, suppose that I, willing and able to make your dream a substantial reality, adopt you; you, mind, open an account for you with a bank, and pave the way for your making a braver show on your side, would that suit your book, eh?"

"Well, Major Patrick, we—I thought that perhaps you would——"

"Do just as I have said. If, after certain inquiries made by me, I find everything satisfactory, you will be in the position of my adopted son, and able to meet your intended wife upon equal terms, or even more so. I don't understand women, and don't want to, which sufficiently explains my reason for dealing solely with you in the matter. It remains only for you to give me your address; the address of Miss Dunthorpe; and the name and whereabouts of someone to whom you have during your life been known."

Adrian Adkinson was only too ready to comply with these not unreasonable demands of the major, and left the house with the understanding that he was to call again at the same hour on the third day after.

He was more than satisfied with the result of the afternoon's work, but it was not until he was almost within hail of his own door, that there occurred to him something, which, had the major but even faintly suspected it, would have spoiled his success and prospects beyond redemption.

This was nothing less than repudiation of his obligations with regard to Ilma Dunthorpe. An idea, dim at first, began to take shape with him, that given a fair pecuniary status, a match, better and in every way more advantageous, was both possible and desirable. That such a course had in it the elements of mean, shifty trickery, and exposed him to an accusation of unmanliness and self-seeking, troubled him but little, not so much as crossed his mind even.

Poor Ilma was not a beauty, certainly; but there were compensations, that went a long way toward making that fact not worth mentioning.

intelligence above the average, enshrined in a form slight, indeed, but graceful, and instinct with a vigour healthy, because altogether wholesome, go to make a woman worthy the name, then Ilma Dunthorpe was a notable example of that which is "above rubies."

Adrian Adkinson had lied when he told the major that his fiancé was cognisant of the advertisement. As a matter of fact she was entirely ignorant of it, and would probably have remained so had not fate decreed otherwise, in a way absolutely unexpected.

Meanwhile, the inquiries concerning the young man (conducted through the medium of the ever convenient Benjamin) resulted so far satisfactorily, that the major considered himself justified in fulfilling his part of the contract.

Probably, it may almost be said certainly, the old veteran was influenced quite as much by a desire to crow over his friend Philip, as by mere philanthropic motives. Either way Adrian Adkinson profited. The adopted son and presumable heir of a wealthy old bachelor, his position was to be envied.

The germ of crooked inclination, however, manifested itself as a suspicious suggestion, almost before the ink was dry upon the dead copy, and substantial cheque, which changed hands upon the day of the completion of the business.

A casual question put by the major to his brand-new legal connection set the ball a-rolling.

"I suppose you will at once acquaint Miss—a—Dunthorpe as to how matters stand with you?" he said.

"Ilma? Oh! she can wait! I've so many things to do, more important, that trifling affairs of that nature must give way."

"Oh! I beg pardon! I merely thought that the main object of our little arrangement was the doing away with the necessity for this same waiting."

"So it is, sir," answered Adrian, not exactly in a confused way, but in something very much like it, "but I think you'll agree with me, that since owing to your goodness, the cause for anxiety is virtually removed, there need be no immediate hurry."

"Well, no; perhaps not; although Miss Dunthorpe must still be, to some extent, affected by the anxiety you refer to, inasmuch as she is utterly ignorant of the fact that indulgence in it is now unnecessary. But, as I said, I don't understand women, and their ways, and so I'll leave you to manage your own personal concerns in that direction in your own way."

Adrian Adkinson was not clever enough to detect the wrapped-up satire, but departed in the happy frame of mind of one able now to make his little "paradise of self" quite comfortable, and impervious to the attacks of vulgar worry and inconvenient disturbance.

Had he seen, however, the Major's expression of disgustful dissatisfaction as the latter watched him cross the road, and disappear up the street, he would, without doubt, have felt uneasy; not because he need fear the withdrawal of his patron's bounty (that after the legal formalities was impossible) but because of the contempt and worse, which highminded men always have for double-dealing, and which most men instinctively wince under and dread.

Late that evening Captain Philip Darling received a visit from his old friend.

The captain was inclined to make chaffing inquiry of the major as to the progress of the advertisement matter, but the latter was not to be drawn.

"Phil, I want you to do me a favour."

"You know it's granted before asking. What is it Mac? Not money, I know; you've plenty of that; and even if you hadn't, it would be no use to come to me, would it? The exquisite sensation of 'wealth' is an experience in futuro as far as I'm concerned. Now, what is it?"

"Only that you will make a call for me."

"Where, when? Say the word, and it's done."

"I want you, if you've no other engagement, to call in a casual way to-morrow afternoon at 197 Warwick Street, S.W., and discover for me if Mr. Adrian Adkinson is at home or out. I'm curious to know. For certain reasons I can't go myself; neither can I send Benjamin, as the inquirer must be a gentleman."

"Oh, of course I'll do it for you. In fact, I've a little private business of my own in that neighbourhood. But, 'Adrian Adkinson,' who on earth is he?"

"Oh, someone in whom I am interested."

"All right, old chap! beg pardon! wouldn't probe secrets for the world."

"Thanks, Phil. I may depend upon you then."

"Certainly."

"Good-night," said the major.

On the following afternoon about four o'clock, Captain Philip Darling, stepping out of a hansom, knocked at 197 Warwick Street, S.W.

Truth to say, he was somewhat at a loss how exactly to do his private inquiry business.

As so very often happens, however, the difficulty was solved for him, in unexpected fashion.

About to put a leading question to the woman (evidently the landlady) who answered his summons, he he was interrupted by the advent of a young lady, hatted and jacketed, who, hurriedly descending the stairs and advancing along the hall-way towards the street door, stopped shortly at the mention of Adrian Adkinson's name. She had a crushed note in her hand, and Captain Philip could plainly see that she was excited, angry even.

"Excuse me," she said to him, "are you seeking Mr. Adkinson?"

"I certainly did wish to see him, had he been at home," replied Philip, impressed by the girl's appearance and manner.

"Are you a friend of his?" she queried, still in the same agitated way.

"Well, no, not exactly," he said, "I am acting for a friend of my own."

"Have you any objection to telling me your friend's name? I have a reason—a very strong reason for asking. My own name is Dunthorpe, Ilma Dunthorpe, and I am, or was engaged to Mr. Adkinson."

"Oh, indeed!" said Philip, in a courteously interested way—(they had left the house, and were walking along one side of Eccleston Square, into which they had turned out of Warwick Street.)—"There is no reason," he added, "why I should not tell you my friend's name. It is Major Patrick——"

"Mac Ilray. I thought so."

"Then you know him?"

"No, I have never seen him, Mr.—a——"

"Philip Darling," said he, producing his card case.

"Captain Darling," she said, just glancing at the pasteboard. "If you are a friend of Major Mac Ilray's you will tell me where I can find him, or, better still, take me to him at once. He only can make quite clear to me that which I have but now learnt in a very unsatisfactory way."

"I shall be pleased to take you to the major," said Philip, glancing down sideways at his companion, and beginning to think what a nice girl she was, and what an ass a man must be to say or do anything which should risk the losing such a treasure.

The day was fine and Philip, availing himself of the fact to the full, strolled with Ilma to the major's chambers in the "Albany."

He certainly lost no time in improving the acquaintance, and before the Park was reached they were chatting in the spirit of right good-fellowship.

She explained her presence in Warwick Street by saying that not having heard for some time from Adkinson, she had called at his lodgings to gain information about him.

The landlady had handed her a note from Adrian, ultimately permitting her to write a few lines in his sitting-room.

It was while she was thus engaged that a certain paper lying open on the table opened her eyes to her lover's dissimulation. Hence her agitation.

The same paper also made her acquainted with Major MacIlray's name, and share in the business.

Then light broke for Captain Philip. Unknown to his old friend he had stumbled across the latter's studiously preserved secret. He laughed joyously to himself; promising himself a rare treat when he should reveal his knowledge.

There is not much more to say.

Ilma Dunthorpe, in her interview with the Major, got to the bottom of Adrian's treachery, as towards herself; first in concealing the fact of the advertisement from her, and making her unconscious partner in his scheme for raising the wind, and then, when success was achieved, casting her aside, as something undesirable in his prosperity.

Fortunately, Major MacIlray's fortune could stand the comparatively small strain upon it of the money he had so impulsively settled upon Adrian. A growl or two, and he passed it to the "loss" account with as good a grace as might be.

But still more fortunately, he saw that Phillip and Ilma made common cause.

No word of love, so far as he at least knew, had as yet passed between them, but these were sure indications that the word would be spoken, and soon.

With regard to that "tenner," there was a decided unanimity of opinion; both agreeing that in the broadest sense, there had been no failure, although upon the face of it the word was to a certain extent plainly written.

The bet, therefore, was by mutual consent cancelled, both parties to it being more than satisfied.

The Major found a good wife for his favourite; and Philip rejoiced in the possession of the love of as true and sweet a nature as ever gladdened man's heart and life.

Adrian Adkinson has recently been heard of. Upon the list of passengers on the Teutonic, for New York, he and his wife prominently figure.

It is supposed that he was actually married at the time Ilma discovered his deceit, deceit which has so happily resulted for herself.

HOW "SPIKE" BEALE LOST HIS NERVE.

"SPOT the big cove in the corner—'im wi' the beard!"

It was Joe Egan, an old convict with whom I had become acquainted, who whispered these words in my ear as I sat alongside him in the parlour of the "Brown Bear."

The tavern in question is grimy and exceedingly ancient, and is situated in one of Hoxton's worst streets—a street through which no respectable person willingly passes after nightfall.

A favourite resort of criminals who infest the neighbourhood is "The Bear," and oft-times has its secret loft afforded refuge to desperate cracksmen being hunted by the men of Scotland Yard. How old Ben Draffin, the landlord, secured his licence in the first instance, and how he manages to get that license regularly renewed, is not easy to understand, seeing that the police are well aware of the character of Ben's principal customers.

I had visited the place twice before under the guidance (and protection) of Joe Egan. On the night of this, my third visit, a kind of benefit was going to be held in aid of a pickpocket's young widow, and as the hour at which the proceedings were to commence was close at hand, the low-ceilinged parlour was unwontedly crowded.

It was curious company to be in—this gathering of evil-visaged criminals. Burglars, swell-mobsmen, pickpockets, representatives of almost every branch of crime, in fact, stood or sat about in little groups, drinking, and laughing together. Roughly dressed for the occasion though I was, each new arrival regarded me suspiciously, until a signal from my companion reassured them that I was "all right."

Absorbed in watching the faces of those around me I was suddenly aroused by the remark from Joe Egan which I have set forth above. Looking in the direction indicated, I at once espied the individual referred to—a man of herculean build and bloated face, the lower part of which was adorned with a bushy red beard.

"Ain't exac'ly o' the burglar cut, is he?" my acquaintance quietly observed. "That's 'is lay, though—or was 'is lay is, p'r'aps, nearer the mark. For 'e aint any good at anythin' but warehouse-breakin' jobs nowadays. He used to be a tip-topper, too, fer all 'is awk'ard make. Wouldn't touch nothin' but the best jobs, Spike Beale wouldn't—until he lost 'is nerve."

I took another look at the big, bearded man in the corner. Though bull-necked and of unpleasing-enough countenance, he was totally unlike the typical Bill Sikes. His huge, clumsy-looking figure, too, was not exactly adapted to a "profession" which, above all things, requires agility. I noticed another failing. His hand, as he raised a glass of spirits to his twitching mouth, trembled violently—a sure sign of "nerves."

"No, it 'aint the rum," muttered Egan, reading my thoughts. "Until the night o' that job t'other side of the Thames, Spike Beale could drink a pint neat, an' 'is nerves be as steady as steel arter it."

Then, speaking in low tones, and breaking off now and again to join in the choruses, or applaud the performers, my companion related how "Spike" Beale lost his nerve. He told the story in his own way. For the better understanding of my readers I here re-tell it in mine.

* * * * *

The neighbouring clocks had just struck one a.m. and the dense November fog which had been hanging over South London for nearly twelve hours obscured everything like a pall. Under the wall of a large detached house, standing some way back from a lonely suburban road, two men crouched. They seemed not to mind the weather at all. Indeed, to judge by their conversation, the state of the atmosphere appeared to afford them the liveliest satisfaction.

"Couldn't 'a bin better, Spike!" said one of the pair. "The cop. won't be by again fer another hour, an' you might light the 'ouse up an' then 'im not see a glimmer from the road 'ere."

"Yes, it's turned out well. But keep a sharp look, all the same. Now give me a lift."

The speaker, a bearded, immensely powerful-looking man, clutched the top of the surrounding wall, and, with the assistance of his comrade, pulled himself up. Then, with the parting injunction, "Keep yer eyes open," he dropped into the garden of the lonely house.

Cautiously picking his way along, he advanced for about twenty yards, then halted for a moment as the house itself loomed into view. All was dark within, the occupants being apparently fast asleep in their beds. From the pocket of his capacious coat "Spike" Beale—for that notorious burglar it was—now produced a small lantern, ready lighted. Then he tip-toed to the rear of the house, finally halting before a window.

Five minutes later, he was standing inside the kitchen, his keen eyes taking in every article exposed to view. Apparently coming to the conclusion that there was nothing there worth stealing, Beale crept softly along a passage until, reaching the dining-room door, he turned the handle and entered.

Here he found a small quantity of silver-plate, which he promptly wrapped up in a cloth and placed in the passage. Then he returned and commenced to force open sundry drawers and cabinets. Their contents evidently disappointed him, for, muttering an oath, he crept out of the room and entered another on the opposite side of the passage. This apartment contained nothing of a portable, and at the same time valuable, nature, save a marble clock and a few richly-chased ornaments. These he placed in the passage with the plate, and muttering, "Jewellery and money in the bedrooms, I expect," immediately ascended a broad flight of stairs.

Reaching the landing, he hesitated for a second, listening intently. Not a sound did he hear.

A door on his left stood ajar. Pushing it open he found himself in a small but well-furnished bedroom. It was unoccupied, and was evidently kept ready for the use of any visitor who might have occasion to stay at the house for a night. A rapid search satisfied Beale that it was no use wasting time in the room; so, with the swiftness of the experienced housebreaker, he now glided along a passage which ran at right angles from the landing.

Again he halted at a door, and this time placed his ear to the keyhole. There was no sound of any occupant.

"Rummy!" mused the burglar. "The servant's out fer the night, but the family' at home, Poulter said, and from his plan o' the 'ouse this ought to be the boss's room. Can't 'ear no breathin,' though!"

Once more he stooped and listened; then covering the glass of his lantern, tried the door. To his surprise it was not locked.

Beale pushed the door open an inch or two, and listened a third time. As before, all was silent as the grave; so deciding that Poulter—the confederate who had arranged the "job" and prepared a rough plan of the house—had either been misinformed as to the location of the principal bedroom, or that the family were away for the night, the buglar boldly entered.

Uncovering his lantern, the first things he espied were several articles of jewellery lying upon a dressing-table near the window. His eyes glistened greedily. Then the thought flashed on him that in a room where watches and rings lay about there must be occupants, and, shading his lantern with his hand, he turned to take a general survey of the room.

He glanced at the bed, and the sight which met his gaze almost caused him to shriek aloud with terror. His eyes bulged from their sockets, his tongue and lips grew suddenly parched, while his whole attitude was that of a man stricken with palsy.

For, side by side in the bed, lay a woman and a little child—dead—with their throats cut!

Beale stood horror-stricken for several minutes. Try as he might he could neither move nor take his eyes from the awful sight.

Then suddenly the spell was broken by the sound of a footstep behind him, and, turning, he saw standing in the doorway a man as tall and powerfully-built as himself, holding in his hand a razor, the blade of which was dyed a deep crimson.

But it was the man's eyes which struck terror to the burglar's heart. They were bloodshot, and in the dim light emitted by Beale's lantern glowed like live coals.

For a moment the two stood gazing at each other, then the man uttered a horrible laugh, and, with razor uplifted, sprang furiously at the burglar. Dodging just in time, Beale avoided a vicious slash, and, dropping his lantern, closed with his antagonist.

In the black darkness there then commenced a battle of giants.

Both men were, as has been said, of great proportions, and both were of about the same age. It was a silent struggle, save for the horrible panting of the two antagonists as each vainly tried to overpower the other. To and fro in that chamber of death they struggled, until at length Beale felt muscular fingers gripping his throat, and, half choking, he was borne backwards and pinned against the wall.

The burglar was now powerless to struggle, and feeling the clutch on his windpipe tighten, he had given himself up as doomed, when suddenly the other relinquished his hold, and, chuckling strangely, began to fumble about the floor for his dropped razor.

Like lightning, Beale slipped past him, and, half mad with terror, hurried downstairs and out of the house. The fog was still dense, and he did not hesitate to reach the road by way of the front gate. Near at hand he found his accomplice waiting in some alarm, and to him Beale briefly recounted what had happened.

On the following day the evening papers were filled with accounts of "A Horrible Tragedy in South London," in which were set out the fact that a well-to-do gentleman had, in a sudden fit of madness, murdered his young wife and child, and afterwards committed suicide.

They dwelt at length on one mysterious point, viz., that although the victims were found lying in positions which testified to their having been murdered in their sleep, the room showed unmistakable signs of a violent struggle having taken place. To account for the fact that the murderer's clothes were disarranged and torn, it could only be surmised that he had roamed about the house in a wild frenzy before cutting his own throat.

Another curious thing about the terrible affair was the discovery that burglars must have visited the house, seeing that the kitchen window was found to have been forced, while a bundle of plate lay in the passage as though it had been dropped there by housebreakers.

* * * * *

"Since that night," concluded Joe Egan, "Spike Beale's nerve 'aint bin worth a brass farden. Whether it was the sight o' the murdered wife an' babby, or the narrer escape 'e 'ad o' bein' choked by the madman that give 'im sich a fright as 'e can't git over, I dunno. But that it was one o' the two there 'aint a doubt. 'E trembles an' sweats whenever 'e sees a copper in the street, an' can't be got to jine anybody in a private 'ouse plant.

"Altogether 'e's got a bad look-out afore 'm. Ware'ouse breakin' don't show much profit—the fences git all that. Besides, I'm thinkin' that if 'e goes on swillin' the rum like 'e's bin doin' fer the last few months, even ware'ouse jobs'll soon be too much fer Spike."

Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a Stereoscope to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, July 8th. Postcards only, please. The first prize of One Guinea has been awarded this week to Miss A. Clark, 35 Palace Grove, Bromley, Kent, whose contribution is denoted by a star thus.*

"Anything fresh this morning?" asked the gossip. "Only that paint you are leaning against," replied the bored man, with a yawn.

"Don't you hate to hear unpleasant things people say about you?" "No, I feel in luck that I don't have to know the unpleasant things they think about me."

Brown: "Do you suppose I'll ever make a good golf-player?" Todd (pityingly): "Never, old man. You think too much of your family, and your business."

"They say a carrier pigeon will go farther than any other bird," said the boarder, between bites. "Well, I'll have to try one," said the landlady. "I notice a fowl doesn't go far!"

"What two things," exclaimed the orator, "are helping mankind to get up in the world?" "The alarum-clock and the step-ladder," answered somebody in the rear of the hall.

Tailor: "We came, your lordship, to ask you to pay your bill. We cannot wait any longer because we have not been able to pay our own bills for cloth for three months." His lordship: "Well, I declare—you fellows incur debts and then you come to me for money to pay them. What impudence!"

Returned Trooper: "Clara, you were engaged to me, and yet I hear that while I was at the front you went out often with that old admirer of yours." Clara: "Oh, George, he was so thoughtful, and I was so anxious that he took me every night to the—er—War office—to see—er—if you were killed!"

"Oh, we had the loveliest arrangement at our bazaar last week! Every woman contributed to the missionary cause one pound, which she earned herself by hard work." "How did you get yours?" "From my husband." "I shouldn't call that earning it yourself by hard work." "You don't know my husband."

*A negro boy was a great favourite with his master, but whenever he committed a fault, his master gave him a note to carry to the overseer, directing that he should be whipped. The boy soon noticed that whenever he took the piece of paper he got punished. He spoke to his master about it. His master said: "Oh, the paper tells the overseer that you are idle and neglect your work." "Why, massa," said the boy, "I never see you work." "Not with my hands, certainly," said his master, "but I work with my head, which is much more difficult." The next time he was sent with a note to the overseer he threw it away. His master asked what the overseer said. "Nothing at all," said the boy, "I did not go to him; I worked with my head this time."

Men of the Time—Watchmakers.

Many people settle their debts like clockwork—tick, tick, tick.

The ability of the gas company to make both ends meet depends on the meter.

"This is two bad!" exclaimed the tram conductor when he received his second bad shilling.

"I see your husband is trying to read without glasses." "Yes, he will persist in making a spectacle of himself."

"Our yacht was beaten by a despicable trick." "Why, how?" "Woman in balloon sleeves stood on the deck of the other boat."

Possibly what makes it more annoying and painful is, whatever he does for man, the mosquito presents his bill before beginning work.

Cyclist: "Is this a safe hill, my man? Do cyclists meet accidents here?" Rustic: "Oh, no, sur; it's quite safe—they all walk down it."

"'Ere, capting, won't yer give us a copper? I'm that 'ungry——" "Why don't you work?" "Well, cos that 'u'd only make me more 'ungry."

Dick Singleton: "Does your wife object to your going to the club of an evening?" Benny Dictus: "No, but she objects to my coming home from it in the morning."

Miss Anteek: "He is the most insulting man I ever met." The Brother: "Did he ask you how old you were?" Miss Anteek: "No; he asked me how old I said I was."

"What makes you look so worn and dreary,
As if you were quite tired of life?"
"Alas!" he sighed, in accents dreary,
"I've just been shopping with my wife."

Jones has come into Brown's and is looking about the walls. Suddenly he pauses before a sketch. "I say, Harry," he says, "where did you get that?" "Why, I got it out of my head." "Well, it's lucky for your head that you got it out."

Flossie is six years old. "Mamma," she called one day, "if I get married will I have to have a husband like papa?" "Yes," replied the mother with an amused smile. "And if I don't get married will I have to be an old maid like Aunt Kate?" "Yes." "Mamma"—after a pause—"its a tough world for us women, isn't it?"

A professor in a medical college called the attention of his class to a man who had applied for medical advice. "Now, gentlemen," said the professor, "will you be kind enough to look at this patient closely, and see if you can tell what is the matter with him? Look at his eyes, the shape of his head, the expression of his features. You detect nothing. I do not wonder at it, for, gentlemen, let me assure you that it requires many years of actual experience to detect at a glance the malady of the patient. I am no more acquainted with this man than you are, yet as soon as I looked at him, I saw that he was a deaf mute." The students indulged in exclamations of admiration. As soon as these had subsided, the supposed deaf mute opened his mouth and spoke: "I say, gov'nor, I hope you will excuse me, but it's my brother who is deaf and dumb. He is outside waiting to know if he shall come in. Shall I fetch him?"

HAIR RENEWER

Called by him "TATCHO"

(Romany: "Genuine," "Good," "True.")

And why, pray, is the successful poet, playwright, and journalist an eminent authority on hair restorer? Eager for an explanation a Daily Mail representative sought out Mr. Sims. . . .

Now Mr. G. R. Sims, as many people know, is one of the busiest men in the kingdom, but hastily affixing his signature to a letter, he looked up and extended a characteristically cordial welcome. Then he said, "I will explain. I found that I was rapidly going bald. Not seriously, you understand, but the thinning out was sufficiently marked to set me thinking out a remedy. I went to two specialists, both of whom cheerfully assured me that I should be absolutely bald in two years.

Then I discovered the preparation which is now placed upon the market. I found that I had hit upon a remedy capable of working wonders. Look at my hair now, isn't that convincing evidence of the value of my preparation?

"Ladies confirm my good opinion of it as a dressing for daily use. Mrs. Brown-Potter, whose beautiful hair is the admiration of the entire lady world, writes that she uses nothing but 'Tatcho.' There is nothing to prevent every woman from making her hair silken in texture and bountiful in volume, for she can obtain a bottle of 'Tatcho' now in every town or even village."

In order that the public may be able to test the superlative value of Mr. George R. Sims discovery, the Company is issuing large 4/6 size test bottles post free for 1/10, under plain cover, one of which may be had on application. THE EDITOR'S PAGE.

A CHORUS of hearty approval has followed the reading of the opening chapters of "The Golden Dwarf." From various parts of the kingdom complimentary letters have come, showing the most cordial appreciation of Mr. Norman Silver's great story.

Now, on this matter of appreciation, I want to have a little candid talk with you. As you can readily understand, the weekly supply of thirty-two pages of high-class fiction entails a heavy expense on the editorial exchequer. I am not going to grumble at that. My policy has ever been, give the readers the best, cost what it may.

In these fiercely competitive days quality must inevitably tell, and when you compare Short Stories with the trash that many papers contain you will readily agree that we have quality as well as quantity.

I want you to help us to recoup ourselves for the very heavy outlay which this production entails. Now, don't pull out your cheque books. I am not starting a subscription list —all you have to spare in that way you can send to the FRESH AIR FUND.

What I want you to do is to each get me a new reader. You can do this easily. All you need do is to hand to a friend the number containing the opening chapters of the new serial, with a hint to him to read it. The story itself will do the rest. If you don't care to hand anybody your copy, post it, or leave it in a train or omnibus. But do do something.

DON'T read the foregoing and then forget all about it. Just give a thought to your poor editor, whose whole life is spent in trying to please you, and really make an attempt to get him a new reader.

"WEIGHTY."—A French doctor has pointed out that several fallacies are common with regard to the weight of the human body. The man who congratulates himself on his gain of several pounds in weight over a given period may have no cause for rejoicing, for he may be under a delusion. Very few people, says this French investigator, have any correct idea of their own weight. As a rule, the correctness of his scale may be taken into account, the time which has elapsed since eating, etc.

As a matter of fact, the weight of the body is continuously changing, owing to innumerable influences. On a warm day, after breakfast, a man will lose more than a third of a pound per hour. Seventy per cent. of the body consists of water, and thus its weight must vary with the transpiration of moisture.

Therefore, the inferences drawn from the loss or gain of a pound or two may be mistrusted. Fluctuations of a few ounces per day are a sign that the body is in a healthy state.

THE following is declared to be the work of a pupil in an English elementary school:

"Seamen are what we call sailors, and captains, and training-ship boys. The sailors you see in the streets are nice little fat men, with red and brown faces. They ware boys' coats and hats, and their trousers are too tite for them up above and too wide for them down below. It makes them feel very riled. Sailors don't ware colars, becose their necks are so thick; and they always have their boots blacked for fear the captain might see them round a corner. They don't carry their best close in boxes, but they ty them up in big red and blue handkerchiefs, just like Christmas puddens.

"Sailors are very fond of their mothers and sisters, and you neerly always see them taking them out to walk. The reason why sailors like to get drunk is becose it makes them roll about like as if they were on the ocheant."

"RING-MASTER."—It is said that the origin of the modern circus dates back to about 1770. At that time a discharged English soldier, named Philip Astley, improvised a ring at Lambeth, London, and gave them exhibitions of horsemanship. His success was very great, and soon afterwards he built a rude circus near Westminster Bridge. There was no roof over the original structure, except that part occupied by the spectators; the ring was in the open air. His wife took part in the performance, being the first woman to enter the arena. This venture was so successful that Astley was able, in 1780, to put up a large and handsome amphitheatre. It was burned down three times, each time being immediately rebuilt.

"MABEL" sends me a question which on arriving at this office was eagerly discussed by all the younger members of the staff.

"Why is kissing so pleasant?" she asks.

Well, my chief assistant editor, who is of a scientific turn of mind and a great osculatory expert says that it "is because the teeth and lips are full of nerves, and when the lips of persons meet an electric current is generated."

The Joke Editor confirms this view and remarks:

"Yes, and it is so cheap. You don't have to have a dynamo machine nor a battery in the house, nor a call box, nor a button to touch to ring up the central office, and there is no patent on it, and the poorest person in the world can enjoy the electric current as well as the millionaire, and it never gets out of order. If Edison had invented kissing it would cost £20 a year, like the telephone, and then extra kissing would be charged up extra, and if you didn't pay for it they would take out your kissaphone and disconnect you from the central office."

As for my own opinion, being a poor, lone bachelor, I can venture none.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Mrs. DARNLEV SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 21lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me.

"Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mr. WALKER, 236 London Road, Hazelgrove, Stockport, says: "I have used one box and am 14lb. lighter. Send another soon as possible."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. E. ALEXANDER, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They have reduced me quite 2 stone, and I am now quite cured."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Mrs. TAYLOR-ROBINSON, of Tweed Green House, Whalley Range, Manchester, says: "I feel so much lighter and better since taking your Tablets, and am so much thinner that I hardly recognise myself."

Miss A. DAWSON, 62 Orchard Street, Weston-super-Mare, says: "Glad to say the Tablets have sufficiently reduced me. I shall always recommend them."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

Mrs. DREW, of 1 Bellevue Gardens, The Nursery, Devizes, writes: "I took Tablets some years ago; they soon reduced me and I have not got stout since. Send me a box for my mother."

THE GOLDEN DWARF.

The Golden Dwarf

A Sensational Romance of To-Day.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "A Keeper of Secrets," "Hate, the Destroyer," "A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

SYNOPSIS OF FIRST INSTALMENT OF "GOLDEN DWARF."

The words are spoken by a pretty girl—fair-haired, blue-eyed. She stands, horrified, by a grass-grown ditch in a country lane, out of which a great mastiff is climbing. The ditch contains the corpse of a stalwart man—a handkerchief bound over his mouth and nostrils.

Close to there is a strange figure, graceful, well-dressed, even handsome, but with the stature of a boy and the face of an adult. He carries a heavy dog-whip, and stares, fixedly, at the dead body just discovered by his mastiff, Cerberus.

The girl is Esther Carew; the dwarf, Otto Hare, the richest landowner in Derbyshire, and the mystery of Wyresdale, a village in that county. For the first time in fifteen years he has set foot in a public thoroughfare, to attract the attention of Esther, whom he has watched from his park.

Sir Christopher Dering was alive at seven o'clock the preceding day. He and his nephew, Felix, had quarrelled over the latter's love for Esther. Sir Christopher wanted Felix to make a good marriage—the birth of his little cousin Brian has put him out of the succession to the baronetcy. Felix is faithful to the penniless Esther Carew.

Much turns on the whereabouts of Felix on the night before. It appears that he was in Duchester, some miles off, whither he went on business, and spent a night at the theatre. Could he have killed the squire?

Otto Hare would like to suggest that he did—Esther's mercenary mother accepts his hints. She wants the Golden Dwarf for a son-in-law.

Felix is secretly loved by Judith Garland, a striking brunette, Lady Dering's companion. She has a wastrel brother, Neal, who is unaccountably in Wyresdale, and who is demanding money. This, by an affectation of sisterly solicitude, Judith obtains, as a cheque, from Felix Dering. The cheque is payable to bearer.

Otto Hare has an ally, a strange German physician, Joseph Kraft, who lives with him at Wyresdale Park, the Golden Dwarf's residence. He is an object of much curiosity to Archibald Geddes, a clever assistant at the Wyresdale Pharmacy, which is kept by a drunken old chemist, Caleb Forester.

Caleb has a charming daughter, Connie, whom Geddes is making bashful love to. She is Esther's friend, and quarrels with Geddes for crediting the rumour that Felix killed his uncle.

A one-armed sailor has suddenly appeared in Wyresdale. At the chemist's shop he encounters Kraft, whom he follows, and on the strength of some past episode attempts to blackmail. Kraft repulses him, but is dexterously tracked by the sailor to a curious fort-like structure in Wyresdale Park.

While spying on this the sailor is attacked by a huge dog, which he stabs. He is seen by Kraft and the Golden Dwarf.

Esther tells Felix of her mother's plan to marry her to Otto Hare. They swear constancy in an old and picturesque oath. Felix returns to Dering House, to be asked by the child Brian if it is true Felix has taken his father away.

Judith Garland shows Felix several links of a chain he has been in the habit of wearing. They are bloodstained. She adds that they were found near the cross roads, where Sir Christopher's body was discovered, and that, moreover, Felix was seen near the place at ten o'clock on the night when he was supposed to be in Duchester. She assures him she will keep his secret.

Felix in vain protests his innocence. At this moment an inspector of the local police is announced.

Felix Dering staggers—is he dreaming, the prey of some hideous nightmare?

A caution sounds in his ears; Judith Garland is speaking to him. "Don't look like that," she whispers, "pull yourself together."

Notwithstanding their alarm, the police-officer—one Inspector Brasher—has merely called to arrest, on suspicion of being concerned in Sir Christopher's death, a certain Edward Spencer, a young Irish groom whom the baronet, shortly before his death, had given notice to leave. Protesting his innocence, Spencer is taken away. While on the route to the little country police-station, he was seen by Foley, with whom Dr. Kraft has been holding a mysterious consultation. Almost immediately afterwards, Foley, by chance, makes the acquaintance of Neal Garland. "Here, my hearty," asks the sailor in his maritime lingo, "what was it you picked up yonder and gave to the taut little craft you had with you?" He is referring to the meeting of Judith and Neal at the stile.

The scene changes. During a walk in the meadows on a pleasant Sabbath morning, Felix tells Esther that he was indeed in Wyresdale that fatal evening, and explains his return. A new sensation interrupts their conversation, Felix is called to the small local police-station. It has a single cell, and in this Ted Spencer had been confined over an adjourned inquest. This cell is now empty, Spencer has vanished. The barred window has been broken through—from the outside!

CHAPTER VII.

"You'll Have to Go Shares."

"I DON'T know you from Adam, my man, and as I'm in a hurry I'll thank you to stand aside and let me pass."

Nicholas Foley placed his one athletic palm on the chest of the fellow who, after crawling backwards through the gnarled stems of the hawthorn hedge, had just risen to an upright position.

"Easy, messmate," he retorted; "you mightn't have the pleasure of my acquaintance and yet be no stranger to me. Let me prove it to you. You never saw me before in your life, but when you showed a glim at the stile last night, I was within hail; ay, and closer."

Neal Garland's dark features assumed a menacing expression and the stiff black hairs upon his upper lip bristled, as if they had been the feelers of some angry beast. He brushed the withered grass-blades from his garments and tried to sneer. The sailor went on, still remaining between his prisoner and the road.

"Consekently," he said, "I see you overhaul a bit of paper, give you by a smart little piece you called Judith, and which you allowed was a pay-note, signed by Felix Dering, and worth twenty quid to bearer."

The listener clenched a couple of soiled fists.

"Out of my path, you meddling fool," he stormed, and made a dive to escape his tormentor.

Nicholas Foley headed off the manœuvre and resumed his statement.

"Chucking down the match you'd struck," proceeded the sailor; "you was going to weigh anchor, but Judy hadn't finished with you. Says she, 'Neal Garland, spin me the yarn of Sir Christopher Dering's death,' or words to sich an effect."

Neal gathered himself together at this startling intimation, and without warning, sprang on Nicholas Foley. His lean fingers shot out towards the loose pocket, on the front of the sailor's hip, where was deposited a certain buckhorn hafted clasp-knife. The dagger-like handle had been noted by Neal Garland's comprehensive glance.

Nicholas bent and ducked through his antagonist's legs; their owner was hurled to the ground minus his projected booty. Snatching out the weapon thus retained, the sailor opened it, and mounted guard over his captive.

"Afore you could tip her an answer," pursued Foley, "the grass, which is more hay than grass in these hedgerows, blazed up—fired by your smouldering match—and you had to stamp it out. Your foot grinded on summat, you collared the thing and lighted another fusee to take stock of it. 'That's what he was searching for!' cried you, and Judy says 'Who?' and you told her 'A tall young chap, with a brown face and riding-boots and pretty moustaches.'"

Neal laid idly upon the parched turf, a sardonic smile stealing over his sallow countenance.

"Then the fusee popped out," continued Nicholas, "and I seen no more, and only heard a word off and on. Once it was, from you, 'Past the Cross—the same, I'll swear—the night of the murder,' and once, from her, 'Leave all to me; Felix Dering shall pay both of us our price.'"

The ferocious mirth betrayed by Neal Garland's twitching mouth increased; his amusement became unmistakable.

"Now," added the sailor, "I'm in want of a few yellowboys myself, and if so be as silence is golden, Nick Foley's is worth as much as anyone else's. Do I stand in, messmate, or do I go to the perlice?"

Neal sat up, motioning away the keen blade which still menaced him.

"You're a wonder, my friend," he said; "under the circumstances I have no alternative but to explain. The trifle I annexed at the stile was a section of a watch-chain, the links of which were smeared with blood. That section my sister Judith recognised as similar in pattern to a guard usually worn by Felix Dering. The importance of those blood-stained links consists in the fact that Sir Christopher Dering's dead body was found a few yards from the spot. I suppose you'll have to go shares in whatever hold we may obtain over Master Felix. But for the life of me I can't tell you what your share is worth. Felix Dering has no money to speak of, though my sister Judith has a plan which may remedy that drawback. You must wait for your investment to mature, Mr. Foley."

Nicholas closed his knife, and slid it into the pocket on the front of his hip.

"Maybe," answered the sailor, "and maybe not. I can't decide till I've took soundings on my own account. Do you keep these waters, my hearty, or have you put in to refit?"

"Oh, I'm off south in a day or two," said Neal, rising. "I merely came to Derbyshire to visit my sister."

The grim and enigmatic laughter had passed from his face, which showed traces of a vicious ill-temper at this new complication in his affairs.

Nicholas Foley stepped clear of the unkempt figure; he was aware that, with his single arm, it was necessary to be on his guard against a possible further assault.

"So Judy hangs out in Wyresdale," reflected Nicholas. "I guess I'll need to enjoy the pleasure of her acquaintance. What is she—a barmaid?"

Neal winced. His own shabby costume had warranted the inference that Judith Garland's station could not but be humble.

"She is companion to Lady Dering," he said sharply.

The sailor slapped his thigh.

"Shiver my timbers!" he ejaculated, "that is good! So Judy stays at Dering House, and makes her market out of Mr. Felix. The clever little hussy! Jehoshophat! I remember Mr. Felix when he was a lad and supposed to be the heir—before the first Lady D. died. She had no babbies, and Mr. Felix was the Squire's eldest nephew. And now he's reckoned to be his uncle's murderer! Dear! dear! It's a wicked world!"

Nicholas wrinkled his mahogany cheeks into something that purported to be a shocked expression, yet which only succeeded in being a malicious and hypocritical one.

"Where were you bound as I fell over you?" he demanded a characteristic shrewdness displacing his pretence of melancholy.

"I was retiring for the night," confessed Neal Garland, and pointed towards the end of the cramped thoroughfare; "my couch of ferns in Wyresdale Park is peaceful and salubrious, which excellences cannot be claimed for my Pimlico pallet. Mr. Foley, you have won this evening's rubber. Whether it will repay you for your trouble is a problem the future alone can solve; meantime, I am your obedient servant."

And casting at the sailor a glance in which vindictiveness and mockery were blended, he ran up the road and disappeared round a slight curve.

Nicholas Foley burst into a peal of odd merriment. As he retraced the route to his cottage he gazed thoughtfully into the roseate West, and the cool breezes of the early evening fanned his withered cheek.

"Same old sun," he muttered to himself, "same old earth, same old human nature! Nicholas, you're in for a bit of luck."

As he uttered the words he paused at the rustic gate of his small garden.

Upon the threshold of the dilapidated house beyond, was a stooping, undersized figure, with silvery locks beneath a square crowned black hat.

"By the great horn spoon," exclaimed Nicholas; "if it isn't Caleb Forester!"

He hurried up the rubble walk and clapped the chemist on the shoulder.

"What cheer, matey," he cried; "to think of you boarding me permiscuous like this! I asked them at the shop to report my call 'tother morning, but I reckoned on having to fire a shot across your bows myself. Come into the shanty and we'll have a glass of grog."

He turned the latch of the cottage door, kicked at it, and it swung wide.

Caleb Forester advanced, peering nervously about him. There were a few embers in the high grate, a table in the middle of the principal room bore a loaf of bread, a slab of cheese, a pitcher, a mug, and a whiskey-bottle, half full. On a delf platter was the bare spine of a herring.

The sailor placed a wooden chair for his guest, sought out an extra mug, tipped into the two a liberal quantity of the yellow spirit, qualified his own by a dash from the pitcher, and thrust the second vessel to Caleb. The chemist diluted its contents and gulped them greedily.

Nicholas watched him.

"Dry as ever, Caleb?" he said.

The visitor nodded and his host tapped the bottle.

"Plenty more!" he announced.

But the chemist drained his mug and turned it upside down.

"My brain's not as thick as yours," he snarled, depositing his hat on the table; "you've a skull of brass and a stomach of leather, and always had, be hanged to you!"

Nicholas replenished his drinking-vessel, he had emptied it at a draught.

"Why are you here?" he pursued, filling a briar pipe with a magnificent Virginian leaf tobacco which had palpably not been bought in Wyresdale; "you was never proud enough of our relationship to act on it uninvited."

Caleb coughed and cracked his pallid fingers—his frail, restless limbs afforded a peculiar contrast to the burly, indolent frame of the sailor.

"I was told about your visiting at the shop," he faltered; "but I was quite prepared for that—knowing that you were in the village. I—I saw you at the cross-roads, drunk, last Wednesday night"

Nicholas sprang to his feet, his brows knit, his skin purple, his discoloured teeth protruding.

"The night of the murder!" he hissed; "Caleb, you lubber, do you want me gaoled, your own brother-in-law?"

The chemist shrank from the fierce lineaments which glared at him.

"It—it didn't occur to me to suspect you!" he stammered, "but if I had done, I should have dismissed the idea on finding you had lost an arm—it was too dark to notice the fact on Wednesday. But Sir Christopher was not stunned and suffocated, my dear Nicholas, by a man with one arm—the fact is surely obvious."

At this consoling admission the sailor, with an effort, regained his equanimity.

"Least said, soonest mended," he growled, "where no offence was meant, none should be taken. But you haven't told me yet why you looked me up."

Caleb Forester leaned over the table.

"Did—did you see anything particular at the cross-roads that night?" he murmured.

Nicholas affected to ponder.

"N—no," said the sailor, "I was too drunk to see, Caleb, even you, so I cou'dn't swear to your being there, if I was put in the box, saving to you telling me yourself."

The chemist started and abandoned his seat.

"You're joking, Nicholas," he answered, "but I don't care for such fun, it's too ghastly. However, if you didn't see anyone, you didn't. I'll say good-evening to you now, Nicholas, I promised to be back at the shop in half-an-hour."

Nicholas Foley caught his brother-in-law by a button-hole

"What did you think I might have seen?" he inquired.

"Oh, something connected with the murder, of course," said Caleb nervously, "I've a notion to be a sort of amateur detective, Nicholas. I wondered if you could help me to a clue. You've disappointed me, really. Good evening."

He donned his square-crowned hat and evaded the sailor's attempts to detain him. Hastening through the low exit, he waved a rather hysterical farewell and departed.

The sailor compounded, with inexpressionable unction, a brimming mug of whisky-and-water and consumed it in silence. Then he smote his thigh, as if profoundly surprised and amused, and fixing his own slouched felt on his cropped head, marched off. He did not trouble to secure the latch, but left the door ajar.

The sunset sky was fading into a deep indigo as he went up the grassy lane towards the Cross. He passed the gravelled island in whose midst was reared that ancient land-mark, and strode on until he reached a drooping bough which over-hung the brick wall of Wyresdale Park, the house of the rich, if diminutive, person known, for miles about, as the Golden Dwarf.

Scanning the deserted prospect for possible spectators, Nicholas satisfied himself of his comparative privacy. This precaution finished, he grasped the branch with his knotted palm, and, exerting a tremendous strength, lifted himself elbow-high. The feat, though inelegant, enabled him to fling a leg over the rocking support. As agile as a monkey, he ran along the bough and dropped into the park.

Not far away, was the singular edifice on which he had been spying when the Golden Dwarf's favourite mastiff came by so unexpected a death at Nicholas Foley's hands. The shadows were veiling its stout walls and curious, round-topped tower. Screened by the uncertain light, the sailor darted to the base of the latter, and peered about its massive entrance.

Suddenly a voice arrested him, a sonorous, meditative voice, that carolled a rumbling song and drew nearer and nearer through the scented August night. Nicholas could distinguish the words—they were rolled out in a good English, a guttural German ring to them.

"It was upon a Monday,
Upon a Monday free,
That Mynheer Jacob van Artevelde,
Unto his men said he:"

"Dutchy!" muttered the sailor, and dodged into a sheltered corner some distance from the door. He was right; Dr. Joseph Kraft, in evening dress, a cigar in his fingers and the first rays of the moon glimmering on the lenses of his spectacles, stepped over the dewy turf and halted at the mysterious entrance. Unlocking it with a bright steel key, he vanished into the tower.

Nicholas shook his fist at the nail-studded portal. "Curse you!" he grumbled; "if only I could get inside I might learn some more of Dutchy's secrets. It's a soft job for a quiet man, taking money to hold your tongue. Wonder what this affair of Mr. Dering's 'll pan out like." A chuckle broke from his tanned throat. "Murder's a business that weighs heavy on the mind," he growled, "and the ill-convenience must be charged for."

An echoing bay interrupted him—it was replied to by another and another. The great dogs that evening let loose in Wyresdale Park had scented a stranger.

Nicholas Foley blasphemed. But he doubled back, nevertheless, from the ominous sounds, and was soon scaling the brick wall that shut in the Golden Dwarf's abode.

CHAPTER VIII.

"SHE DOES NOT SUSPECT ME—YET!"

"BUT why should he want to escape if he were not guilty?"

The question was propounded by Felix Dering. He stood within the strong-room at the Wyresdale police-station, and contemplated thoughtfully the small, high window through which—helped by some unknown friend—Ted Spencer, the young Irish groom accused of Sir Christopher's murder, had made his exit.

Archibald Geddes traced an invisible ring on the concrete floor with a neatly-polished shoe.

"Perhaps the one that helped him to get off could throw light on the point," retorted the Scotchman. "Spencer said at the commencement of the inquest yesterday that he saw a fellow leading a horse with a rider on it that looked very like as if he might be Sir Christopher, ill or wounded. Don't you think, Mr. Dering, if Spencer spoke the truth, it would be good policy for him to be spirited out of the way, lest he should identify, by any chance, the person he saw?"

Felix considered the suggestion. "It's a very reasonable view," he admitted, "and allows us to believe Spencer innocent—I cannot bring myself to look upon him as the criminal. Yet, in the event which you describe, it is unfortunate for him that he consented to fly when the road was freed. It will damage him at the adjourned inquest; the verdict will infallibly be murder, and against him."

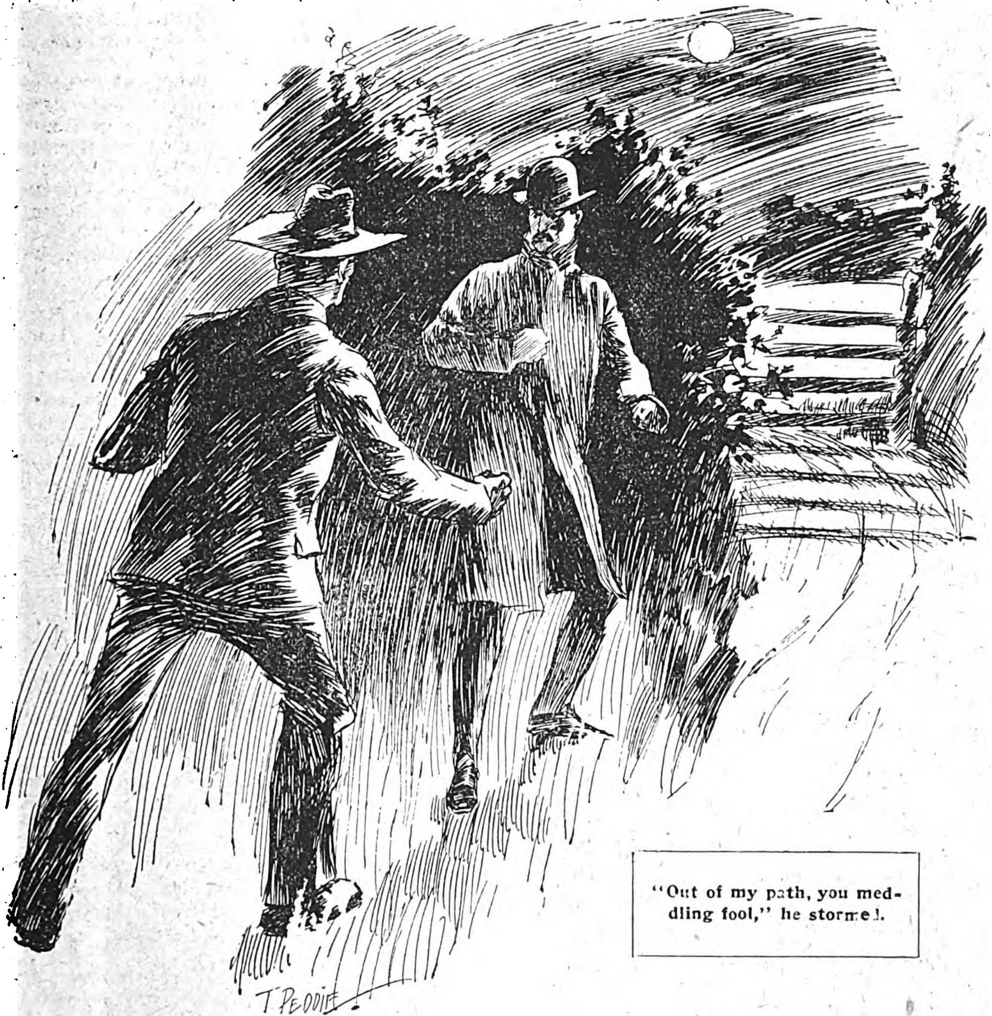
"What if that were foreseen, too," queried Geddes, "by the poor lad's pretended rescuer?"

Felix shook his head. "Now you are growing fanciful," he demurred; "let us have a glimpse at the outside of the window. The bars appear to have been removed in a most scientific fashion."

The chemist's assistant studied his companion as they passed into the general office of the little police dep't, and threaded its short entries to the rear. Unconscious of the close and singular analysis with which Archibald Geddes was favouring him, Felix penetrated a clump of bushes that backed upon the window of the strong-room.

Here, at the foot of the wall, were laid a heap of rusty iron bars. They had been displaced by some skilful operator from the casement above, their limed extremities showing where they had been set in the brickwork. A bend in each testified to the strength of the hand that had drawn them out of their sockets. The glass and its wooden frame had been levered away and deposited among the shrubs.

"This is no amateur performance, Geddes," exclaimed Felix Dering; "although these rods were only intended to confine an occasional drunkard or a petty thief, yet they are moderately stout. It is improbable that Spencer, unaided, could have wrenched them clear and dropped that frame down. But it might have fallen on the soil with a minimum of noise; what makes you so confident of his having had an ally?"



"Out of my path, you meddling fool," he stormed.

"The bars were on the outside of the window, Brasher says," replied the Scotchman, "and mark this, sir"—he indicated a couple of deep impressions in the earth under the ruined casement—"they're the traces of a ladder—the fellow was bold enough to bring or borrow it."

"Upon my word, Geddes," cried Felix, "you have a quick observation!"

"Brasher is the author of the discovery and the inference," answered Archibald Geddes; "he is fit to shoot himself now that the mischief is done. Spencer should have been sent to Duchester gaol over the week-end. But the Inspector kept him in Wyresdale for the sake of reflecting importance upon the local authorities. Brasher's weakness is vanity, otherwise he is quite a smart constable, as county police go—he even noticed that Spencer's rescuer must have had his boots muffled, to avoid leaving footprints in the recently levelled soil."

"Heavens!" cried Felix Dering; "it has been quite an organised affair, then."

"So much the worse for Brasher," said the chemist's assistant, with a patronising air; "he and I are on friendly terms enough, which accounts for my unofficial presence. But the more fuss there is made about the escape the hotter the Inspector will catch it. He will devote the rest of his career to tracking down the offender. I know Brasher."

The Scotchman spoke this prophecy in a manner that conveyed a species of warning. Felix Dering, however, was so engrossed by his own bewildered meditations that he failed to demand a reason for the other's significant intonation.

"I am sorry for the Inspector," he declared absently, "but as I am not a Justice of the Peace, I have no right to interfere. The law must avenge my uncle's death according to its lights; I cannot feel that a shadow of real proof has been adduced against Spencer. If he is guiltless, as I feel he is, I am glad he has escaped."

With which candid admission, Felix, not dreaming that he had lent grave support, in the Scotchman's mind, to a terrible theory—of Archibald Geddes's own evolving—bade him good-day. Re-entering the police-station, he acknowledged the salute of the constable at the desk, and walked out. The atmosphere of the miniature gaol was repellent to him.

As he went towards the gates of Dering House through the placid summer noon, his brain was occupied with the inexplicable details of the mystery that had fallen upon Wyresdale.

How, and by whom, had Sir Christopher been slain in those unrecorded hours which had elapsed between the moment when he loosed rein to canter home for his belated dinner, and that when his lifeless corpse was found in the ditch near the Rosery? Who had whisked Ted Spencer out of his prison, what malicious agency had brought into the possession of Judith Garland the bloodstained links that had convinced her of Felix Dering's guilt? Felix's brain reeled before a thousand improbable conjectures.

At the top of the avenue he gained a wide terrace that skirted the old and ivied mansion. Upon its gravelled expanse the child Brian was strolling gravely in his picturesque garments of velvet, black now instead of their wonted purple. By him, under a black lace sunshade, moved a despondent figure—the figure of Lady Dering.

Felix advanced and lifted his hat; she turned and glanced at him sadly.

Stella Dering was a pretty woman, with a weak mouth and large, pathetic violet pupils. Her faults were written upon her characterless features, but she was a good woman, and, in spite of her fretful disposition, had a kind heart.

Her young kinsman was a favourite of hers, his chivalric nature had made him invariably considerate of her overstrung nerves. Also, he loved Brian, her one child, and Brian worshipped his gallant cousin; he ran to clasp Felix's strong palm and be swung up to his shoulder.

"Cousin Felix," he cried, pushing back his sailor hat of white straw; "won't you tell me where father is? You said you hadn't taken him from me, you know, and he hasn't come back, all the same."

Felix averted his head; a lump had risen in his throat—Lady Dering covered her face with her handkerchief.

"Hush, Brian, dear," begged Felix, brokenly, "you distress mother—we will talk about father some other time you and I."

"Yes," conceded Brian, "but I do want a drive to-morrow and I must ask him quick, or he will go without me, as he always does. If you had taken him away, Cousin Felix, you would have had to take me, too."

Felix groaned; the child was wringing both their hearts.

"Oh, no," he answered, huskily; "you would have stayed with mother, wouldn't you?"

The little baronet dissented.

"Mother gets tired of me," was his shrewd objection; father only said, "Come and have a romp, you rascal!"

Lady Dering sat down upon a garden-chair and wept aloud.

Brian slipped out of his cousin's arm and climbed up by her.

"Don't cry, mother," he whispered "I'd rather be with you, often—I would, indeed."

His mother clasped him to her widowed bosom and sobbed. Suddenly she released him and bade him fetch some cake for the pea-fowl; his absence would give her an opportunity to regain her self-control. Felix leaned over the chair as Brian trotted off.

"You heard what the child told me," he murmured; "that I had said I had not taken his father from him. The slander had reached his innocent ears—the Wyresdale gossips would rejoice if they could learn the fact. My misunderstanding with Sir Christopher that afternoon will cost me a heavy price."

Stella Dering gazed at the man who—though about her own age—was nominally her nephew. "You don't mean," she stammered; "you are suspected of—oh, my poor boy, how absurd! Why, you were in Duchester when—it—it must have been done."

Felix shivered. "Would you credit the slander if I had not been?" he queried, hoarsely.

The dead man's wife looked into the generous countenance of her questioner. Her child had dispoiled him of a home and a fortune, yet she felt that he had never regretted his loss, that he loved Brian as if the boy were his own.

"What a foolish idea!" she said; "of course not! Here is Brian with the cake; do not let us speak of Kit's death before him—I cannot bear it."

She took the dainty from the childish fingers and broke it into crumbs for the splendid birds.

Felix slipped away. In the portico of Dering House he glanced back at the figure of the bereaved woman, playing sorrowfully with her young son.

"Thank heaven she does not suspect me—yet!" he muttered.

CHAPTER IX.

A NEW TWIST IN THE SKEIN.

"You must not think, Miss Carew, because I am as I am, that I differ seriously from other men."

It was Otto Hare who spoke; he was lounging among the cushions of a big and padded "chesterfield" in the window-bay which over-looked the Rosery gaden. His dark eyes were fixed on the slender figure of the girl who sat opposite him plying her embroidery needle with a nervous deliberation; he had relinquished his tea-cup, it rested on the low Moorish stool between them. The urn and cake-baskets were deserted—Mrs. Carew had contrived to be called away, leaving the Golden Dwarf and her daughter together.

"For instance," he pursued, a trifle disdainfully; "I can ride, shoot, swim, fence, and talk in four languages; there you have the equipment of the well-bred Briton. I am proud, revengeful, constant, passionate—which is as much as to say, I have red blood in my veins. Yet for fifteen years, Miss Carew, I had not gazed upon the face of a young and lovely woman. Then I beheld yours."

Esther's fair curls were bent over her work; she did not interrupt the Golden Dwarf's monologue. Once, however, she touched a little locket which hung at her throat—it held a portrait of Felix Dering.

"In that moment," said Otto Hare; "I realised how powerless was ambition—and I have had ambitions, Miss Carew—beside the unconscious charm wielded by your gentle sex. You are the flowers in earth's garden, do not blame us for desiring to pluck you."

He studied her attentively; Esther Carew's blue eyes, rippling blonde locks, and the milk and roses of her cheeks were, indeed, a text for poetical similes. The Golden Dwarf slipped his hand into his vest-pocket, produced a shallow case and pressed a spring. The lid of the receptacle shot up, to reveal a circlet of priceless old filagree, crusted with gems—rubies, emeralds and diamonds. As an ornament it was costly, as an article of it vertu was inestimable.

"Beautiful things should have beautiful owners," murmured Otto Hare, lifting the bracelet from its bed of silk. "Miss Carew, will you gratify me by accepting this? It is Oriental and of a somewhat rare finish."

Esther drew her breath, the proffered gift was beautiful, and she thought rather of its beauty than of its worth. But the expression on the Golden Dwarf's saturnine features recalled her to herself.

"It is indeed marvellous," she faltered, her gaze reverting to the barbaric splendour of yellow and red and green and translucent crystal, "but I could not take it; thank you very much, Mr. Hare, but really I could not."

The Golden Dwarf put the bracelet under his foot and crushed the jewel to a shapeless mass.

"Since you will not wear it," he said, slipping the ruined ornament calmly into his pocket with the case, "no woman ever shall."

Esther was terrified by the fierce determination evinced in this remarkable act. Before she could utter the words of regret that had lingered on her lips, the door opened and Mrs. Carew entered smilingly.

"So sorry to have been detained," she began: "Esther, dear, did you ask Mr. Hare to have some more tea?"

"Short Stories" is just the paper for seaside reading

Astute by nature and training, the widow could not fail to perceive that her daughter and the Golden Dwarf were upon strained terms. She was too diplomatic to take notice of it, but a vague anxiety filled her scheming heart. Surely Otto Hare had not been fool enough to propose upon so short an acquaintance, ere his wealth and position had had time to dazzle Esther's blue orbs, before her mother had been able to soften and bend her youthful will!

The Golden Dwarf rose.

"I have been too agreeably entertained by Miss Carew's conversation," he said sardonically, "to spare a thought for mundane realities. It is a pleasure I hope to renew."

He turned towards Esther with a certain dry significance.

"Ah," he said; "I was going to tear myself away before discharging my mission. Mrs. Carew, I am inclined to signalise my return to the world by throwing my gates open to my neighbours. I have no lady to receive my guests, may I venture to solicit your good offices?"

Mrs. Carew gasped delightedly. To play the part of hostess to the bachelor owner of Wyresdale Park—to penetrate its mysteries, and, for a few hours, to control its enormous social resources, it would confer upon her a position in Wyresdale second hardly to that of Lady Dering.

"I shall be charmed, Mr. Hare," she told him; "now that terrible inquest is over and the police have allowed the supposed criminal to escape, we will all be glad to forget the dismal affair for a while. And, in any case, it is most charitable of you to waken Wyresdale from its native dulness. Everybody will be delighted at the mere prospect of penetrating some of your reputed secrets."

Otto Hare made a contemptuous gesture. "Secrets which exist only in the imagination of Wyresdale!" he answered. "A thousand thanks, Mrs. Carew, for your promise to further my project; Miss Carew, permit me to confess that I shall estimate the success of my little fête by the amount of pleasure you derive from it."

He shook hands with her—his powerful though diminutive fingers causing her a curious thrill of revulsion—bade farewell to Mrs. Carew, and took his departure. On the threshold he passed a graceful, sombrely-dressed woman, whose dark, intelligent countenance moved him to a second scrutiny.

It had in it a force and selfishness akin to that betrayed by his own. As he walked out to his phaeton, he heard her name given to the maid—it was "Miss Garland."

Mrs. Carew greeted the newcomer with a degree of patronage—for was not Judith a paid companion, and had not she herself (though once but little better than a social outsider in Wyresdale) become now the chosen friend of the millionaire Golden Dwarf? Much had happened in Wyresdale since last Miss Garland had condescended to call at the Rosery.

"And how is Lady Dering?" asked Mrs. Carew, as she filled a cup of tea for her guest; "still quite prostrate, I suppose. But little Sir Brian will be a comfort to her, no doubt—she will bear up for his sake."

Judith Garland's lip curled.

"The child means a great deal to her, Mrs. Carew," she said, cynically; "if it were not for Brian, Lady Dering would soon be a mere dowager, and Mr. Dering would step into a very decent property."

Mrs. Carew glanced at Esther—Judith saw it and barbed an arrow for the girl's bosom.

"I believe," she said, and trifled with her spoon, "Mr Dering was about to leave for America when Sir Christopher's death detained him. If he had only sailed a fortnight ago he might never have learned how few true friends he had in Wyresdale. Of course, we did not credit the slanderous insinuation that he could have told the real story of the squire's murder. But some people did, and practically cut him."

A hot tear trickled down Esther Carew's cheek and splashed upon her embroidery. Judith gloated over her suffering.

"I imagine it was Mr. Hare who drove off just as I called," she called; "you are fortunate in striking up an acquaintance with him—he is enormously rich and quite nice, they say, in spite of his being a dwarf and a recluse."

Mrs. Carew fathomed the depths of Judith's malice, though she did not entirely comprehend its cause.

"Mr. Hare will be a recluse no longer," she said; "he is planning a garden-party in Wyresdale Park; being a bachelor, he wishes me to receive for him."

Judith started—the object of her visit was gained and another item of Wyresdale gossip vindicated.

"I congratulate you," she replied, putting down her cup; "it is an ill wind—you remember the proverb? Sir Christopher's death, I fancy, was the means of introducing Mr. Hare to you. We are all speculating on the cause of his sudden resolution not to shut himself up any more. Rumour has it that a pretty face—but there, I mustn't be indiscreet. Good-day, dear Mrs. Carew; bye-bye, Esther, get me an invitation to Mr. Hare's party, won't you?"

Esther could not have answered to save her life; every syllable of Judith Garland's had stabbed her deeply. She realised that her mother's heartless attitude towards Felix was as clear to Judith Garland as were Mrs. Carew's mercenary schemes respecting the Golden Dwarf. As her skilful tormentor departed she burst into a passion of grief, whose abandonment and intensity disconcerted her mother.

As for Judith, she communed with herself on the road to Dering House.

"I was right," she muttered; "they have thrown him over and are angling for that strange creature, Otto Hare. If I do not act quickly Felix will fling himself out of England in despair. I cannot lose him so. Guilty or not guilty of his uncle's death, he is the only man I ever cared for, and I will win him. There is but one way to keep him in Wyresdale—that way shall be taken."

This resolution, whatever its purport, made the rest of the afternoon and evening seem to Judith Garland like a week of ordinary days. Nor, when she went to her bedroom, did she prepare for sleep. Donning a thick cloak, she wrapped a shawl about her head and waited till all was silent in the old mansion.

Then, noiselessly, she stole from corridor to corridor of Dering House, reaching at length the nursery of its child-master, the little Sir Brian. Lifting the slumbering boy out of his cot, she folded him in her cloak and carried him down the wide stairs and through the dusky hall. At the side-door she drew a couple of bolts and bore him forth into the night air. The moon was up, but veiled by flying clouds.

BY ☘ LIP ☘ MOVEMENT.

IN the dimness and silence of the great West-End square the strip of red carpet that cut across the pavement and trailed up the broad stone steps to the portico of the house caught my eye in passing. Having nothing particular on hand at the moment I paused to see what was going on.

It was early yet for Society dinner-parties and crushes, the season being quite in its infancy. These people, whoever they were, were evidently determined to take time by the forelock and set the ball rolling at the first possible moment.

The guests were evidently slow in arriving, for though I waited several minutes I was rewarded by seeing nothing more imposing than a telegraph boy, who handed in his message and clattered off down the steps again.

Just as I was about to pass on, however, the lights of a hansom swung round the corner, and the vehicle came jingling leisurely towards the house. I looked for a man in evening dress, but to my surprise it was a young and exceedingly pretty girl, a white-furred opera cloak thrown loosely around her delicate shoulders and carrying a guitar-case in her hand, who alighted on the pavement within a yard or two of me.

As she crossed towards the steps her purse, which she had taken out to pay the cabman, fell with a soft flop on to the strip of carpet. I shot forward at once, picked it up, and restored it to her with a bow.

She took it from me with a most winsome smile and a soft murmur of thanks, while her limpid brown eyes, which shone in that dim light like two lovely stars, rested upon me for one fleeting second. Then she passed on up the steps, and the door closed upon this beautiful vision.

Though I had not been greatly interested in the proceedings so far, somehow it was very different now. In truth, that smile and the look which accompanied it had made more than a passing impression upon me. I wanted to see this charming creature again, felt as if I must see her, even though I had to loiter about until the small hours of the morning. As I looked up at the closed door I was conscious of a very envious feeling towards those who had the undisputed right of entry, and strongly inclined to rail against my own hard luck at being left out in the cold,

While I lingered on, unwilling to tear myself away, the door yawned open again. I glanced up to find a tall man in evening dress standing on the steps, his imposing figure silhouetted against the flood of light that came from the hall behind him.

He was, in many respects, a man worth looking at. Strikingly handsome, with a commanding presence and dark, flashing eyes, he caught and rivetted your attention on the instant.

At the present moment, however, he appeared strangely perturbed and upset. As he stood there, folding and unfolding a slip of pink paper—a telegram evidently—in a nervously abstracted manner, I could see that he was planted fairly and squarely on the horns of a dilemma, and was feverishly casting about in his mind for some way of escape.

His gaze swept round until it encountered my figure in the background. Instantly his dark eyes fastened upon me—clutched at me, as it were, with a kind of eager avidity. He was a man in a strait—a grievous strait, perhaps—and like all such was ready to grab at any straw within reach.

He tried to drag his gaze away, but it came back again instantly in my direction, and his keen eye played over me like the point of a rapier.

I made no move of any sort. I just stood still and watched that silent struggle, knowing full well that something would come of it. And something did come of it very soon.

My friend on the steps looked at me again, paused, hesitated a moment, and then came pit-patting down to the spot where I was standing.

"Excuse me," he said, speaking very hurriedly, and yet in the courteous tones of one about to ask a favour, "but do you happen to have any pressing engagement this evening?"

"Neither pressing nor otherwise," I answered airily.

"Ah!" he said with a pleased sparkle in his eyes, for the spirit in which I took his advances evidently went far to relieve him of his embarrassment. "Then you have it in your power to render me a service which will lay me under the deepest obligation, and which, I venture to think, will prove an agreeable method of passing a spare hour or two as far as you yourself are concerned."

"Indeed! Might I inquire the nature of this service you speak of?"

"Simply this: I am giving a little entertainment to some friends of mine"—here he waved his white hand towards the house—"tableaux vivants, and things of that kind, you know; just an informal and quite impromptu affair. Unfortunately, one of my guests, who was to have taken a leading part, wires me to say that he has been prevented from coming at the last moment through sudden indisposition. By an extraordinary coincidence, you bear a somewhat close resemblance to him, and——"

"You wish me to take his place?" I said, seeing that he paused; and I rather fancy there was a certain telltale eagerness in my tones, for the thought of seeing that beautiful girl again caused quite a little flutter within me.

"If you would be so kind," he murmured insinuatingly.

If I would be so kind! Why, I was ready to jump at the proposal. Here was the very chance for which I had longed thrown right in my way, the closed door opened to me. I could think of nothing else at the moment.

I was on the point of closing with his suggestion, for I was eager enough to avail of this unexpected opportunity, when a sudden thought occurred to me, and I glanced down doubtfully at my plain suit of tweed.

He read the looks at once.

"There are several costumes inside which are at your disposal," he said. "The little representations I propose to give will be principally tropical scenes, illustrative of life in Mexico and thereabouts. My guests are mostly from that part of the world, you see. By the way," he added, breaking off suddenly and looking straight at me, "you do not understand Spanish, do you?"

"Not a word," I assured him with perfect truthfulness.

"Ah!"

It was difficult to put a precise meaning upon that "Ah!" for the tone in which it was uttered was a singular one. Nor did my companion give me much time to puzzle over the point. Wheeling round he led the way up the steps, and conducted me through the brilliantly-lighted hall to a snug little retreat at the back, half study, half dressing-room.

He certainly had provided a varied assortment of costumes to choose from, though the picturesque tunic, flaring red sash, and broad sombrero of the Mexican was the one most in evidence.

Passing over these, however, he singled out for me a rich Spanish uniform, a marvel of gold lace, which might have done duty for an ambassador at the very least. I fancy my eyes sparkled a little at sight of it, for there was one among the company upon whom I was anxious to make an impression, and was not a little pleased at the thought of appearing before her in such fine feathers.

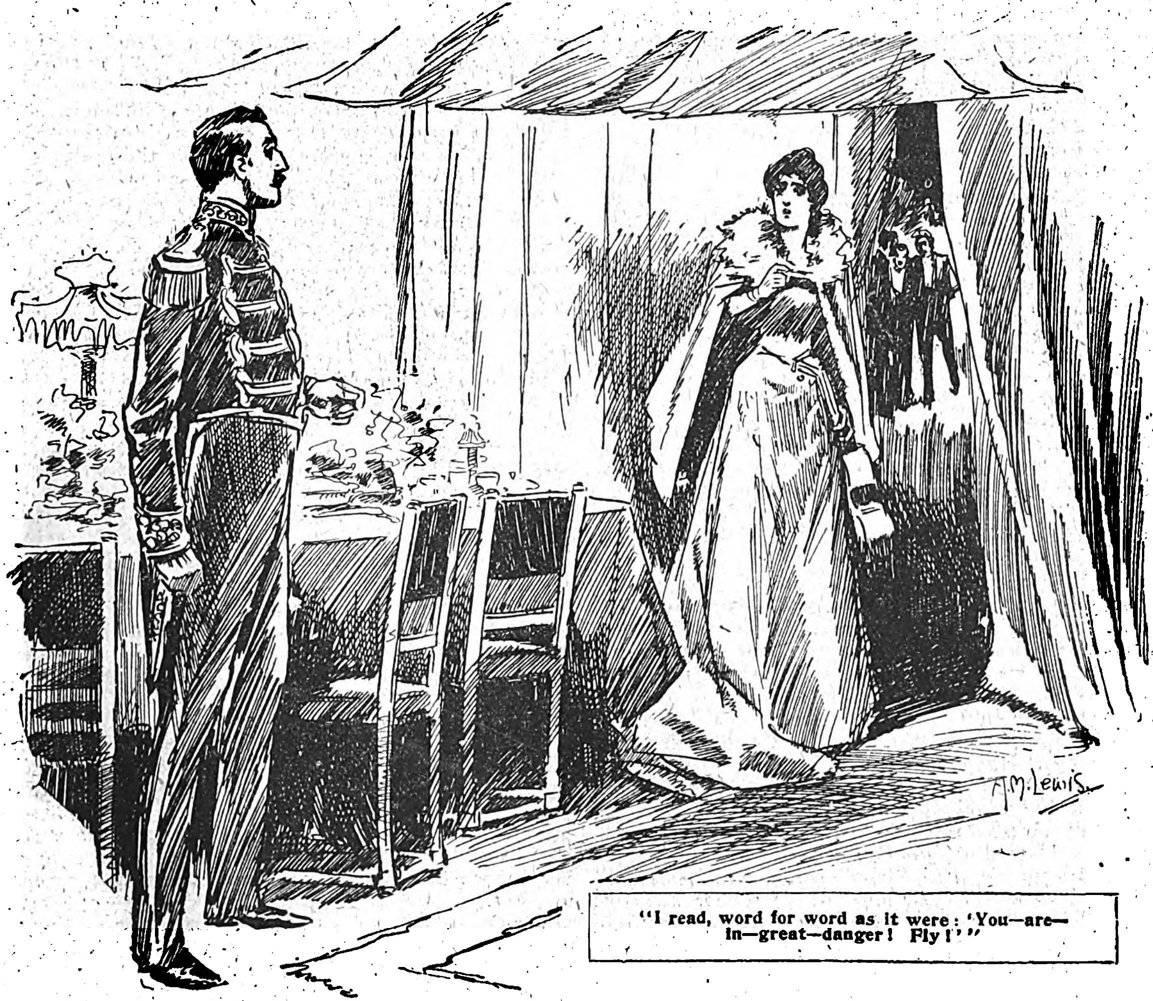
The host left me while I effected my change of raiment, and when I emerged from the room, in all the splendour of my borrowed plumes, I found him waiting for me outside.

Already there was a marvellous change in him. He was like a different man. The worried look had completely vanished, and he was evidently in the best of spirits again.

Nor, now that he had secured his man, if I may so express it, did he appear in any particular hurry to return to his guests. Taking me by the arm in quite a friendly way he drew me into the dining-room, which was unoccupied at the moment, and took a decanter from the sideboard.

While we chatted over a glass of wine, he informed me that his name was Orlebar, and that he had seen a good deal of the rough side of life abroad, especially in Mexico.

All this time I kept wondering where were the guests, for I could hear no sounds of festivity in any of the adjoining rooms. Unless, in the absence of their host,



"I read, word for word as it were: 'You—are—in—great—danger! Fly!'"

Persuade your best friend to read "The Golden Dwarf."

they were simply twirling their thumbs for want of something better to do, I couldn't make it out.

At last my companion led me from the room with the air of a man who had a little surprise in store, which he wished to spring upon me suddenly. Instead of moving towards the reception-rooms, however, he drew me along a handsome corridor which gave access to a spacious conservatory at the back. Looking on ahead I could see that the place was a blaze of electric lights.

Passing through the rows of magnificent palms and rare exotic plants we reached a door opening on to the garden. Just as my foot was upon the threshold I stopped short with a regular gasp of surprise, for a most wonderful, a truly fairy-like scene, burst upon my astonished vision.

The garden was evidently a large one, the space nearest the house being occupied by a velvety green sward. Beyond, wherever the eye turned, grottoes, pagodas, marvels of every kind were to be seen. You heard the splashing of tiny cascades; the soft hissing of concealed fountains. The skill of the landscape gardener, in fact had converted this ordinary London pleasure ground into some dream of the tropics.

Everywhere there were fairy lamps and Chinese lanterns, their soft, coloured glow, the flickering lights and shades of the whole place, producing a most wonderful effect upon the imagination.

To add to the impression, from some secluded nook to the right came the silvery tinkle of a guitar; and even as I stood there, lost in stricken wonder, a soft, musical voice—a woman's voice—poured forth a flood of melody from that concealment.

Upon the sward in front a number of men in evening dress were grouped; some few pacing slowly to and fro in couples. They were men of swarthy complexions and flashing eyes, all of them; chattering noisily in some foreign tongue, and inhaling cigarettes the whole time.

I was aroused from my wondering abstraction by the sound of the host's voice in my ear.

"Our entertainment is quite an al fresco one, you see," he said with a little gratified laugh, as if my visible astonishment was by no means displeasing to him. "My friends being from the tropics, I thought they would enjoy themselves more out of doors, especially as the evening is so delightfully mild. But come; let us get supper out of the way before we ring up the curtain, as it were."

I felt strongly impelled to make a bee-line for that concealed nook where the singer was posted, but Mr. Orlebar led me straight across the velvety sward, at the further end of which a large marquee had been erected.

As I moved along by his side in my brilliant uniform, the chatter ceased as if by magic. The guests drew apart, and every eye in the place was fixed upon me in a strangely intent and observant manner. I cannot describe the peculiar sensation it gave rise to, the concentrated fire of those gleaming eyes, but it was not exactly a comfortable one.

As we entered the tent and passed round to the other side of the long, well-laden table, the others all trooped in after us. With a wave of his hand in my direction, Orlebar said something in Spanish—by way of introduction, I suppose—and I was treated to a series of stiff, icy bows, which I did my best to return without appearing to notice the singularly frigid reception accorded me. Needless to say, I was quite at a loss to understand the meaning of it.

During the whole course of the meal, which was an elaborate one, I was practically left out in the cold as far as the conversation went. Orlebar's whole attention was taken up in answering the fire of questions poured in upon him from every side. The extraordinary part of it was, that, judging by the repeated glances shot in my direction, these questions seemed somehow to have reference to my presence amongst them.

As the supper drew to a close, a servant entered and whispered something to the host. Orlebar rose from the table at once, murmured a few words of excuse in my ear, reeled off a string of Spanish to the others, and left the tent hurriedly.

The instant his back was turned, a wiry, wrinkled, little fellow, seated on my left, turned to me and scraped out a sentence in broken English.

"Vat's becoom-a boullion, hey?" he said, fixing me with his glittering eye.

Boullion? Boullion? What on earth did he mean? I ran my eye over everything on the table. Finally, I looked back at him, and shook my head.

With a quick, angry gesture he turned to the others, and instantly they fell to jabbering amongst themselves in the most vehement and excited manner. The next minute they rose from the table in a body and left the tent as if to hold a consultation outside. I remained seated there in solitary state, and not a little bewildered by the strange turn events were taking.

So far I had seen nothing of the girl; but now, as I happened to look up, I suddenly caught sight of her outside. She was passing slowly before the opening of the tent, her guitar in her hand. I kept my eyes fixed upon her, for there was something peculiar in her manner, that I could not very well understand.

Presently she paused, edged a little closer to the opening, and threw a quick glance around as if to see that no one was standing near. Then, with a rapid movement, she turned full in my direction, and gave me a look which seemed to strike a chill to my heart. The next second her lips began to move.

Fortunately for me, I had some little knowledge of lip language; that is to say, the formation of words by the movement of the lips, without any sound being emitted. And now, as I watched the girl with eager, breathless intentness, I read word for word as it were:

"You—are—in—danger—great danger. Fly!"

She was gone like a flash, and seemed to pass round towards the back of the tent.

Danger! My heart seemed to stand still as I rose to my feet. Then it suddenly started to beat again like the piston of a steam-engine, for I caught the soft pit-pat of footsteps on the grass outside, and knew that the foreigners were about to return. Three or four of them made their appearance the next moment, and posted themselves near the entrance of the tent as if to frustrate any attempt at escape on my part.

My senses were keenly, almost painfully, on the alert, and just at that moment I caught a stealthy ripping sort of sound behind me. There was a pause, and then the sound was repeated. I knew what it meant. Ah! that brave girl. She had slit the canvas of the tent from top to bottom, so as to make an opening by which I could effect my escape at the proper moment.

Very cautiously I edged my way back; and, without daring to turn round, thrust out my hand behind me, groped for the rent, and found it.

Once or twice I thought of making a dive through the opening, but every time I glanced towards the entrance I caught the gleam of those watchful eyes in the semi-gloom outside, and knew that my slightest movement would only precipitate matters.

At last the rest of the foreigners came back, and the whole crowd trooped into the tent in a body. A striking and ominous change had taken place in their demeanour; their noisy chatter had given way to a sullen silence. I confess that I did not like the look of things at all.

They appeared to take no particular notice of me at first; but I observed with inward misgiving, that they were edging quietly round the table on either side, as if to hem me in.

I waited a moment or two longer, my heart beating as if it would stifle me. And then, as they came nearer, and I noticed that each man's hand was stealing slyly towards his breast, I flashed round in an instant and dived head foremost through the slit behind me.

At my very first movement the whole crowd set up a most appalling yell and rushed towards the spot, each with a glittering stilleto in his hand! But, thank Heaven! I was through the opening before they reached me, though I heard the whizz of those deadly weapons as they descended within a few feet of me!

Bolting around the tent I raced for the open door of the conservatory as I had never raced before. I reached it well ahead of those blood-thirsty wretches, who had scrambled out of the tent anyhow, slammed it in their faces, and turned the key in the lock. And then, as I started forward again, I ran right into the arms of Orlebar himself, who instantly closed with me!

For the first half-second or so I was too taken aback to try and shake him off; but, to my utter astonishment, he hissed sharply in my ear:

"Hit out, man! Struggle—fight! They'd have my life if they thought I allowed you to escape. I had no idea they would turn so confoundedly rusty!"

I did hit out; or rather I planted my knuckles on his chest and sent him crashing back amongst the flower pots. Then, while the others were clamouring at the door like a pack of wolves, I dashed on into the hall, and the next minute was tearing down the square in my magnificent, gold-laced uniform.

At the corner I saw a hansom waiting and instantly made towards it. To my surprise I found that it was already occupied, and by the beautiful girl to whom I owed my life!

"Thank Heaven, you have escaped!" she said, as she recognised me. "I could not go away until I knew you were safely out of their hands."

Hurriedly begging me not to stop, she handed me a card with her address, asked me to call the following afternoon, when she would endeavour to explain matters, and drove off.

Next day, my nerves being still a trifle shaky, I set out to call upon Miss Hendon—that was the young lady's name—and found her occupying a pretty flat in West Kensington, where she lived with her invalid mother.

"Mr. Orlebar," she explained, when we had settled down for a talk, "is a distant connection of ours. We have never seen very much of him, however, for most of his life has been spent in one of the smaller republics of Central America. I happened to meet him a few days ago, when he told me he was giving a little entertainment to some foreign friends, and said he would be most grateful if I would bring my guitar and help to amuse them for an hour or two.

"As it so happens, I have a brother who has lived for many years in Central America, though this fact was unknown to Mr. Orlebar. When he was last at home, being confined to the house a good deal by an accident, he amused himself by teaching me Spanish. On finding myself in the company of Mr. Orlebar's guests, therefore, I was able to follow the drift of their conversation easily enough.

"From what they said, and also from facts related to me by my brother, I learned that they were at one time at the head of affairs in their own country. The government was a very corrupt one, however; so much so, indeed, that it provoked a fierce and bloody revolution.

"The President was a man named De Castro, a close friend of Mr. Orlebar's. This De Castro had married an Englishwoman, but before these troubles broke out he had sent his wife over here to be out of harm's way. She was accompanied by their only son, who was a mere child at the time.

"Seeing that the insurgents were likely to get the upper-hand, De Castro, aided, it is said, by Mr. Orlebar, laid violent hands upon the Treasury, which was supposed to contain a vast sum in bullion, and escaped with it on board a trading steamer."

"Ah!" I exclaimed, for I now knew what my little wrinkled friend had been driving at when he spoke of "boullion."

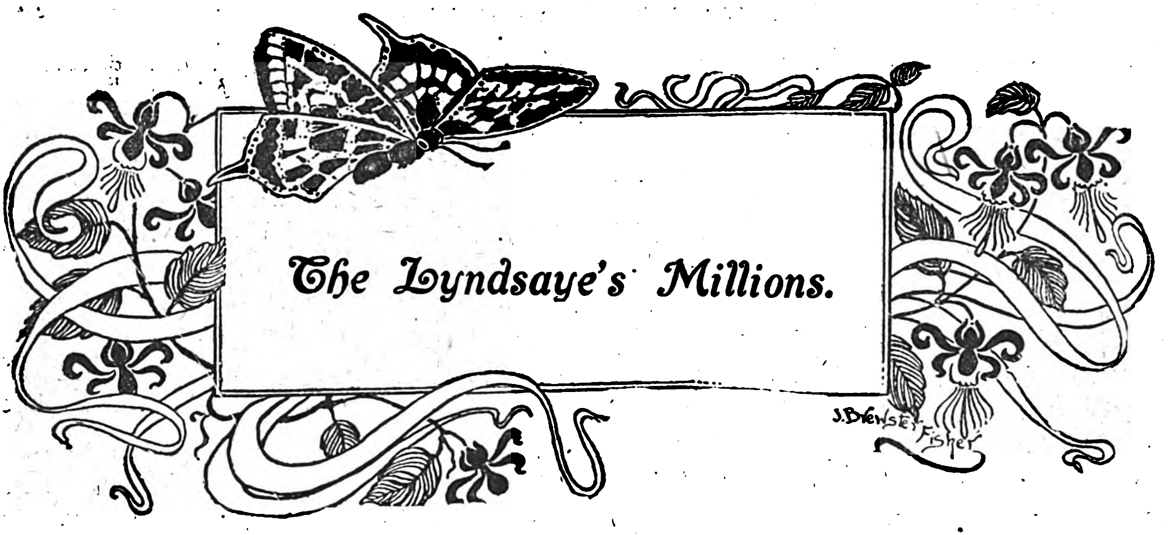
"The other members of the government were not so fortunate. Those who escaped the fury of the mob were thrown into a fortress, where they languished year after year, probably almost forgotten by the victors.

"When they regained their liberty at last they lost no time in making their way to England, with the intention of compelling De Castro to make a division of the plunder amongst them. But de Castro, they found, was long since dead; his son, who was now grown up, having inherited his ill-gotten wealth.

"In their difficulty they sought out Mr. Orlebar, who was supposed to have had a share in the spoil, and no doubt compelled him by threats to invite the son of the ex-President to his house. From what they said, I gathered that they meditated evil of some kind if the young fellow refused to comply with their demands.

"My amazement was unbounded when I saw you enter in his place. I guessed that, for some reason of his own, Mr. Orlebar wished to palm you off upon his guests as the son of their old colleague. At the close of the supper I sent in a servant to inform him that I wished to return home at once. When he joined me outside, however, I begged him to lend me a certain book, which I knew it would take him some little time to find. Then, when the others had left the tent, I attempted to warn you in the only way open to me."

And, to my mind, Orlebar's motive was not far to seek. It was plain that he wished to keep in with both parties—to run with the hare and hunt with the hounds. No doubt, under the pressure brought to bear upon him, he had invited de Castro to his house; but that young gentleman was not to be caught so easily. He must have got wind of the pleasant little reception which awaited him, and wriggled out of it by pleading "sudden indisposition."



The Lyndsaye's Millions.

Travellers' tales, for many and obvious reasons, are not always to be relied upon.

Either they are related to gratify the personal vanity of the traveller himself, becoming then closely allied to the "fearful and wonderful," or they are the handed-down traditionary experiences of men and women of old, the intervening years having added whatever proportion and colour they may originally have lacked.

"Niggers" (that is to say, natives of Africa, the West Indian Islands, and so on) are adepts at this peculiar manipulation of the story-telling art; and as the island of Jamaica, or rather its surrounding waters, is the scene of the incident I am about to relate, one would naturally have to be upon one's guard when lending an ear to the ebon-hued spinner of yarns.

It must too, be borne in mind that the following account is satisfactorily authenticated, not only by the fact of the principal actors having been my own "forbears," but also in that the descriptive statement of the occurrence, bearing date 1760 (the year of King George the Thirds' accession to the throne of these realms,) is in the handwriting of my own great grandmother; and bears upon the face of it the unmistakeable mark of "truth dependable," which I have always understood to have been a notable characteristic of the old lady's.

It was quite by accident that I discovered the document referred to.

One day during the Winter of last year, I was for some reason or other, seized with a fit of "ferreting."

This meant of course, the turning out of long-hoarded, long-forgotten possessions, of every conceivable sort and description.

The largest part of this miscellaneous collection consisted, as in such cases it nearly always does, of old letters and papers.

I fear that Time had sadly discounted the original value of most of them; the fire, therefore, was in frequent requisition.

After an hour or two's hard "rummaging," I at length delved out a letter, dated from St. Anne's, near Port Royal, Jamaica, nearly a hundred and fifty years ago, and written in that fine, spiky, neat hand, so popular with the fair sex at that period.

Further than that I placed the yellow old packet on one side for future and more leisured inspection. I took no more present notice of it, beyond remarking in a casual way that the name "Romeo" occurred more than once in the somewhat lengthy account.

A few days afterwards I happened to be in Southampton on business—no matter of what nature—bent. Taking a quiet stroll one evening "Above Bar," in the direction of the "Forest," I encountered an old, grey-headed negro crooning out, in the roadway, one of the plaintive melodies so dear to the average black man's soul.

I stopped—I don't know why—but I stopped, gave him alms, and made to pass on.

"Ole Romeo t'ank you, sah!—t'ank you berry much, sah!"

"Romeo!" I should have thought but little about it, had it not been for this faded old letter of my great grandmother's, Dame Mahetabel Lyndsaye.

The coincidence was so strange.

"Is Romeo really your given name?" I asked the poor old creature.

"Yes, sah! an' my fader's—he called Romeo, too—an' his fader—but I got no chile—I'se the berry last Romeo—Yes, sah!"

He had got up alongside the kerb, towards which I had beckoned him, and stood shivering in the cold wind, which was blowing in gusts down the road from the Forest.

"Where were you born?"

"I'se Jamaiky nigger, sah!—San Annes—Po't Ro'al. Warm—warm dere! here po' Romeo die, he so cold, sah!" and he shivered until it seemed that he must fall to pieces, so wretchedly attenuated was he.

That decided me. As I said before, I cannot, even now, explain why I did all this. I only know that I could not help doing it.

I took the poor old darkie to where he could be cleansed, clothed, warmed and fed, and brought him back to London with me, another item to be considered; another link in a soon-to-be-found wonderful chain. The day after my return I was dining with a friend at Blackheath. Dinner over, with a consequent adjournment to the host's study for a smoke and a chat, my attention was drawn to a large engraving, evidently very old, over the chimney piece, and which I certainly had never before seen there, or, indeed, anywhere.

A large, open boat, with half-a-dozen people in it, filled nearly the whole of the picture space. In the water, on the side of the boat nearest to the spectator, appeared the enormous head, and more than half the body of an immense alligator. Its jaws were only kept from being completely snapped down upon the left leg of a man, by a vigorous thrusting of the latter's left arm down the creature's throat. The man's right hand clung to the boat's gunwale, and frantic efforts were being made by a big nigger, naked to the waist, to aid the alligator's victim.

Underneath the print was a brief descriptive note in French and English. This set forth that the sufferer was one Henry Lyndsaye, and that it was to his personal slave, Romeo (the nigger of the picture), that he owed his rescue, and subsequent restoration to life and health.

Thus I had, within the period of but a few days, become acquainted, co-incidentally almost, with three distinct things, all pointing to, and proving one particular circumstance.

The circumstance was in itself, perhaps, nothing more than a mere traditionary story of adventure, although the tale was, to my mind at least, removed far out of the ordinary run of such yarns, by reason of my own descendantal connection with Henry Lyndsaye, and his mother, the writer of the letter.

Perhaps, too, I ought at this point to mention a matter, which, in the light of after events, has no slight bearing upon general issues.

My great-grandfather, General Calthorpe Lyndsaye, was, in the year of 1760, Governor of Jamaica.

A rich man by inheritance, he had added to his wealth by judicious sugar-planting, and by sundry other ways and means, better, I take it, left untalked-about here.

It seems that when the General died, which he did in or about 1768 (his wife having pre-deceased him by nearly two years) leaving two sons (the elder of whom, though being suspected of being alive, had mysteriously disappeared six years previously) his large fortune running, it is said, well into six figures, became hopelessly locked up, the will definitely leaving everything without any reservation whatever, to Henry Lyndsaye the eldest son.

It came about, therefore, that the second son, Jasper, failed, right up to his death, to establish his claim to all, or any portion of his father's estate; Chancery, eventually opening wide its mighty man to absorb the tempting morsel.

Attempts were made at different times, and by divers persons to get the impounded money, but without success; and at the present period when I first became cognisant of its somewhat visionary legal existence, the representatives of the family had long ceased to express belief, or to take any interest in the "hid treasure." I may add that I am, to-day, the acknowledged head of the Lyndsayes, and am, therefore, entitled to take first action, should action be at any time necessary.

Up to now I had seen no reason for formulating and presenting any claim to the High Court for the resumption by me of the accumulated millions that it was supposed must now be lying in the name of Calthorpe Lyndsaye, late Major General, and Governor of Jamaica.

Probably, nay certainly, I should still have been of the same opinion, and have gone down to my grave holding it, but for this triple discovery, this letting in of light upon a subject that I had agreed upon with myself to bury out of sight.

My friend Zartway at Blackheath, had, at my especial request, lent me for a few days the engraving that had so much interested me on the day that I had last dined with him. I had it taken to my study, and then, on the 15th day of January, 1899, I began my investigations.

It was the letter of old Dame Mahetabel that first claimed my attention.

It had been written evidently to a female friend in London—someone with whom the writer was well acquainted, and who had intimate knowledge of the family and its affairs.

After a few preliminary conventional courtesies, Mrs. Lyndsaye proceeds to tell how in the early morning of a certain day, Henry Lyndsaye, as was his wont, had gone down to the landing-stage, and leaving his clothes thereon, had swam out to a distance of a hundred yards or so from the shore.

Suddenly he was attacked by a huge alligator (twenty feet in length, according to the old lady, but the measurement is open to question) who succeeded in obtaining a partial grip of his left thigh. This, the monster would doubtless have been able to dissever, but for an heroic effort on the part of young Lyndsaye, who contrived to thrust his left arm down the brute's throat, and keep it there, so preventing complete dismemberment.

Despite his agony and terror, the young fellow managed to raise his voice in a piteous cry for help. This was heard by his own personal slave and henchman, Romeo, a gigantic negro, devotedly attached to his young master, and who had come down to the landing stage to look for him.

Romeo at once gave the alarm, and in a few minutes a boat, manned by the faithful "black" and half a dozen whites, friends and sympathisers, put off, and moved out to the spot where, in the semi-darkness, the deadly struggle still continued.

Romeo masterfully assumed the direction of affairs, no man forbidding him.

There is some mysterious, inexplicable force in the look which a negro, a full-blooded negro, casts upon you at times. In the region where Obi prevails this is even the more especially so.

So now. Romeo bent down from his great height, and peered intently and silently into the alligator's small red eyes, upturned as in devilish triumph to his own; the cruel, half-closed snout forming as ugly a picture as could well be of Nature in her most repulsive mood.

Just whispering in the ear of the now almost exhausted man: "Courage! Mass' Harry! Romeo'll do 'um!" the black reached down his long, muscular and naked arm underneath the creatures hinder-part, and with a rapid and powerful swing upwards, literally turned the alligator over on to its back, making it describe a veritable summersault.

Surprise and rage caused a momentary relaxing of the hideous jaws; and before the brute could resume its hold, willing hands had lifted the now inert body of Henry Lyndsaye into the boat.

The document goes on to describe, in quaint phraseology, which I have ventured to transcribe into modern vernacular, how that three physicians took the case in hand, at an expense in fees alone, so says the record, of over £700.

Merely saying that the patient in due course recovered, the writer winds up her statement with a fervent expression of thanks to "the Giver of all Good, for His great mercy in thus protecting an Estimable Young Man, the joy of his Parents and Friends, from the Powers of Evil, and from a Cruel Death."

So much for the letter of Dame Mehetabel Lyndsaye.

Were there no more to be found in it, it would simply be an ordinary or extraordinary story of perilous adventure, describable in a few brief sentences, and needing but little comment.

But as will presently be seen, the alligator story was a detail merely, a first brick in the building up of a "palace of fortune," which but for it, would probably never have been realised as being even possible.

Romeo, the Romeo of the third generation, was the next, and human document for examination.

The old man was in himself remarkable, inasmuch as he was just upon a hundred years old, and remembered things, in their way every whit as extraordinary as were the reminiscent revelations relating to the Lyndsayes, of his father, the second Romeo, when the century was young.

His first statement was—to me at any rate—startling. I already knew that Henry Lyndsaye had disappeared, but that he had done so immediately after his restoration to health I was altogether ignorant of.

The suggestion of my Romeo's father, that the young heir had been spirited away at the instance, and with the active connivance of Jasper, the second son, placed the latter's conduct in anything but a favourable light. That he hoped thereby to supplant his brother, and so grasp the greater portion of the wealth designed for the eldest born is certain, while it was as certain that he was quite unaware of the existence of the will, which completely disinherited him, and which gave as a reason the evil course of his life from boyhood upward.

Anyway Henry vanished, and from the day that he did so, never was seen again.

Every now and then rumour would assert him to be alive and well—somewhere, but where, rumour said not, with its usual brave vagueness, not condescending to detail. It was idle, general gossip, as worthless as it was unauthorised.

Then the General died, and there being no living representative of Henry Lyndsaye to be found, the property, as has been stated, was thrown into Chancery, there to accumulate if no claim was established to it, for the sole use and benefit of the Government in time of stress or emergency.

Could legal proof of Henry's death have been obtainable, then the next heir would naturally have succeeded; but such was not forthcoming (as I believe, providentially in order that villainy might not reap its unjust reward, and that after many days, right might reign) and so, the law being unsatisfied without it, and there being no prospect of its production in the near future, all interested had to be content as far as in them lay.

My own father, a moody, reserved man, and who never at any time educated me in the family history, kept religiously out of sight (that is, out of my sight) anything and everything that would have fostered in me the spirit of curiosity. It was only, indeed, when old Romeo, by certain things he told me, made me to see my position in almost its right light, that I at last suspected myself to be the real descendant of the Henry Lyndsaye aforesaid.

Romeo, who, when I met him in Southampton, had but just been discharged from the Hants County Hospital as an incurable pulmonary case, said that he recollected once how that his father had told him of a suspicion he had that Master Henry would be found in a certain little town in Holland, where, for some reason best known to himself, he lived secluded and alone, and where he, without doubt, ultimately died. Why he did this, why even he went there at all, is a mystery, of which no man knows the solution, or ever will know in this dispensation. How Romeo number two got the idea of Henry Lyndsaye's Dutch residence into his head it is hard to say. My own theory is that he had had a secret communication from his old master himself, and so had not a suspicion merely, but an absolute knowledge on the point.

Wasting no time I started that night for Amsterdam, and by noon the next day after my arrival was prosecuting inquiries in the office of the genial little notary of a village not a hundred miles from the "Palace in the Wood." It was the last thread I was gathering up, the last link I was forging.

Meinherr Schundel over convinced that I was the man I claimed to be, produced a mass of documentary evidence, left him, with the notarial business, by his late father, and to the latter by the grandfather of the firm's present representative, said papers having been deposited by Henry Lyndsaye some years before his death, the Meinherr Schundel of that day being the exile's legal adviser, and, indeed, only friend. In him he had confided, and when he died left him executor to his testamentary wishes.

Among the papers was one added by Schundel, which had it been produced earlier would materially have affected individual lives and fortunes, the certificate of Henry's death.

As a legal necessity, it was of course, now of no value, as no Court in the world would in 1899 dispute the fact of the death of the man born about 1740.

Once and for ever then, it was established that I, Henry Calthorpe Lyndsaye was the true and only living descendant of the Henry Lyndsaye, who, in the year 1760, experienced so terrible an adventure off St. Annes, Port Royal, Jamaica. "Never despise the day of small things," so says the proverb, it is homely but wise.

For me it has a more than ordinary significance, and when I think as I often do now-a-days, of how the casual unearthing of a long-forgotten letter set the ball a-rolling, which will, so my legal advisers inform me, result in the course of a few months, in my undisputed accession to a princely fortune, I am more than ever disposed to echo the sentiment, and to look upon nothing in this world as being too small for consideration and respect.

BIG JACK'S OUTBREAK.

. . A Convict Story. . .

THERE were those who said that convict 1280 was innocent of the crime which sent him to prison for such a long term of years that there was scarce a hope of his ever being a free man again. They meant that he was technically guilty. He had sought to save a woman from a beating at the hands of her husband, and in the struggles and excitement he had struck a blow which caused the death of the man. It was an accident in a sense, but it was also manslaughter.

"Big Jack," as the convict was sometimes referred to, was like most big men—a child in his gentleness and good nature. He went to prison weeping. He did not complain, but he grieved. He thought of the years and years which must drag away before the prison doors would open to him, and he moved about like a weak old man.

The prison officials felt to pity him, but a convict is a convict and all must be treated alike—all who show obedience to the rules. They sized him up as child-like and good-natured, and yet they said to each other as they talked of him:

"Look out for Big Jack. He will break loose some day and do some desperate thing."

They thought it would come during the first six months of his term. Then during his second. Then they almost became afraid of him. Men who are slow to anger—who go on grieving, brooding, and bearing a mental burden for weeks and months—are devils when the climax comes.

Big Jack had the management of the trip hammer in the machine shop. Had they put him in the shoe shop or tailor shop he would have rebelled at once. His place was beside the biggest piece of machinery in the shops—two pieces of machinery as it were—"Jack and Trip."

Day by day, week by week, and month by month the ponderous hammer rose and fell, and its blows shook the very earth for yards around, making the convict smile and look proud.

The guards had an eye on him, and kept saying to each other:

"It will come. It is only delayed. When he breaks loose he will kill somebody and have to be killed in turn."

Nearly half of the second year had passed and the giant convict had never even sulked, when one day there came into the shop as sightseers a husband, wife, and little girl four or five years old. Children are seldom seen in prisons, and it is a rare thing that they are taken into the shops in the yards.

If anyone in that prison knew that convict 1280 had a daughter—a fair-haired, handsome child, who could only walk alone when the jury pronounced his verdict of "guilty"—he had forgotten the fact. His wife had visited him as often as visitors were allowed, but the child had never been seen within the grim walls.

Knowing that her husband had killed a man by accident, the wife could bear to see him wearing the horrible stripes of a convict, but to let the child look upon him, to gaze in wonder at the iron bars, to ask why all those men were there—a thousand times no! And so this was the first child Big Jack had seen since the heavy door shut him in.

Father, mother, and child came close to him and gazed at the ponderous hammer with wondering eyes. You would have argued that the sight of the child would have softened the convict's heart and brought tears to his eyes, but it did not. It brought a feeling of madness, of desperation, of frenzy.

To save a woman from a brutal beating at the hands of a drunken, worthless thing not fit to be classed with men, he had struck a blow. A jury had called it murder in the second degree, and he was here in prison on a sentence almost never ending. He had been wronged, and the knowledge of it fired his heart and brought the long-expected outbreak.

With a sudden cry that startled everyone in the noisy shop, Big Jack made a spring forward, seized the child in his arms, and there was a shout of defiance on his lips as he held her at arm's length and glared about him. The mother of the child gasped for breath and staggered back to the wall and sunk down. The father stood staring, as if struck dumb, but presently held out his hands in silent supplication.

Big Jack glowered and muttered a reply. He was a convict—a childless father. He was dead to his child; she was dead to him. He could not make another father's heart ache and throb as his did, but he would secure revenge.

After muttering he was silent. No one cried out. Guards and convicts were seemingly stupified. There was the hum of machinery but not of voices. Convicts turned from forge and anvil and bench and lathe and held their breath. The two shop guards leaned forward in their chairs and looked and looked, but they did not move or cry out.

What will he do with the child?

The two men working at the trip hammer with Big Jack had fallen back. He had control of the machinery which worked it. The answer to the question could be read in his eyes. Men had wronged him under cover of the law. He had been deprived of liberty, degraded, and disgraced.

Death were more merciful than such a sentence as his, and in dying he would secure revenge. A piece of metal had been left under the hammer. There was the sound of "crash! crash! crash!" as the mass of iron rose and fell at regular intervals—the sound above the monotonous hum of the machinery.

"He will thrust her under the hammer!"

So thought each guard and each convict. So thought the father, whose feet seemed chained to the floor and whose face was whiter than the dead. One of the guards could have touched a button and signalled the engineer to shut off steam, but he did not move a hand. Either guard had a fair mark to shoot at, but their pistols were not lifted.

Up and down, up and down went the hammer, but suddenly the belt was thrown over on the loose pulley and the mass rested on the anvil. It seemed to those who looked as if they had been looking through a mist, such a mist as rises from the earth of a summer's morning. It seemed to them that this mist thinned out, cleared away before the influence of a rising sun, and by and by they saw the child nestling on Big Jack's hairy breast, one hand smoothing his cheek, and, seeming to come from a long distance off, they heard her childish voice saying:

"No, you wouldn't hurt Nellie—you wouldn't hurt Nellie! What makes you cry? Have you a little girl, too? Won't they let you go home and see your little girl?"

And the convicts advanced step by step, and the guards crept forward, and lo! Big Jack's tears were falling, and he hugged the child more tightly and kissed her hair and rosy cheek. There was silence yet—silence as he walked to and fro and wept and kissed and lifted the child till she could clasp her tiny arms about his neck and rest her cheek against his. Not a whisper among the convicts—not a move from father or mother or the guards.

By and by Big Jack placed the child in her father's arms, wiped the tears from his eyes on his striped jacket, and with a "God bless the little darling!" and a "Thank ye, sir!" he returned to his work, and the hammer was lifted and held in waiting for the hot iron to be placed on the anvil beneath.

The guards motioned for the other convicts to go back to their benches and forges, and a minute later the visitors had gone, and work was in full blast. The long-expected outbreak had come and gone.

A POINT OF HONOUR.

THE military-police patrol was out.

It was on the stroke of "eleven," and Knightsbridge, where the 'buses stop just opposite Lord Strathnairn's equestrian statue, was lively, as it always is at this time of night. The "patrol" consisted of two privates and a sergeant.

According to custom, they visited, one after another, the various public-houses in the neighbourhood in search of "defaulters."

One establishment, especially, appeared to have more than the usual official attraction for them, through its several entrances the "guard" successively passed, making a searching round of each crowded compartment (it was Saturday night), but without meeting with that for which they were evidently and particularly looking.

This operation was repeated two or three times, but with the same result.

"Ain't 'ere," said Private Tom Jones to his mate, as the three came out on to the wet, greasy pavement for the last time. "Where to, Sergeant?"

Sergeant Halliwell did not reply for the moment.

Puzzled, and vexed at his non-success, he was inclined to be a bit irritable.

"Down Sloane Street," he at length growled, and down Sloane Street the trio accordingly moved at a slow walking pace.

The two privates kept up a low-voiced conversation, the sergeant following at their heels in dignified, if somewhat sulky silence.

"Rum 'e wasn't in the 'Clock House,'" said Tom Jones, "they says as she always meets 'im there about this time."

"She! Who?" queried Private Wallis.

"Why, I dunno; some says as it's 'is missus, as 'e spliced 'off the strength'; an' some says as it's 'is sister, but that's gammon; you don't give up yer walk-out every time to yer sister, does yer? 'Tain't likely!"

"No," replied Wallis, "'tain't likely. I'll bet it's 'is missus."

"Well, it may be or it mayn't," said the other, "the p'int is where's 'e now? It's rum as 'e shouldn't be there to-night, jest when 'e's wanted so badly, ain't it?"

"I suppose it's right as 'e oughtn't to 'ave bin out to-night?" asked Wallis.

"'Course not; 'e's under fourteen days 'C.B.' Desertion, that's wot it amounts to," said Tom Jones, a trifle sententiously.

"Well, I 'opes as we don't spot 'im," said Wallis, forgetting caution, and speaking rather more loudly than was prudent.

"Oh! you do, do you?" snapped the sergeant from behind. "If I hear anything like that again, you'll toe the mark in the orderly-room to-morrow morning, Private Wallis, and don't you forget it. Shut up both of you, and keep your lamps trimmed."

The delinquents drew themselves up to "attention," grips their "swaggers" tighter, and at once became "wooden" men in obedience to order.

Private Harold Daubigny was a "gentleman ranker;" one, too, of the most pronounced of the class.

Of course he was a failure (they most of them are, socially, that is), a failure of the sort that seldom or never gets head above water.

The thing that specially led to his applying for "Her Majesty's shilling" was reprehensible, certainly, though not particularly "out and out." It was on this wise.

Harold Daubigny was the heir-presumptive to one of the oldest baronetcies in the kingdom; being next in succession to his elder brother, a sickly man whose days were nearly numbered.

His father had been dead these many years, his mother, the late Sir Gaspard's widow, living mostly with her two sons (her only children) at the country seat of the family in Kent.

Rare visits to London broke the monotony of life at Tower Crecy, the most perfect of all the many beautiful historic houses in the garden county, or, for the matter of that, in Great Britain.

The Tower Crecy estate had come into the family by marriage in Queen Anne's time, the lady whose dower it was having been a noble ward of the Crown, and a "Lady of the Bedchamber" to Marlborough's Royal mistress.

It was her wealth that had turned a poor family into a rich one. The first holder of the title, one of James I.'s batch of baronets, having been near of kin to the traditionary church mouse.

Now, young Harold, the hero of this little true history, had in him but a very small share, if any, of the family "cuteness." He was all for pleasure; the passing hour, and how to lounge it away; the sunny side of life, and how to secure it; for these objects, and these alone, he existed and schemed.

But time-killing is a costly pursuit, that sooner or later lands the individual in either the Bankruptcy Court or in that which is every whit as bad the slough of social ostracism.

The latter is always the most unpleasant, for the reason that "Society" is ruthless, and never forgets.

His money gone—wasted; his reversionary interests mortgaged up to the hilt, and in some instances sold outright, there was but one end possible to it all.

His mother, who worshipped him (it is ever the scapegrace who gets the mother-bestowed "Benjamin's mess"); had pleaded day and night long almost, but without avail.

The bit once between his teeth, he would not be restrained; was soon far beyond the reach of remonstrance and control.

Still, he was not all bad. Once face to face with the end of the tether, he, like the prodigal of old, came to himself, and to his right mind, a feeling of intense self-shame swept over him, and—he fled.

A visit to the recruiting depôt at St. George's Barracks; a brief interview with a complaisant sergeant-major of the Foot Guards; a rapid, but satisfactory medical examination, and magisterial attestation, and Harol Daubigny passed out of his own "set," into the society of Tommy Atkins.

All this happened eighteen months or more before the period of the episode in his career herein related.

Officers, it is well known, have a rooted dislike to the "gentleman ranker," and for obvious reasons.

Harold Daubigny was no exception to the rule, for his high spirit, his aristocratic contempt for authority, and his reckless disregard of discipline, both moral and military, brought him into frequent and unpleasant collision with the "powers that were."

It seems that three days before the night initially referred to, he had been sentenced to "Confinement to barracks" for fourteen days for insubordinate conduct on parade.

Early in the evening in question he had been missed; and as his haunts and habits were at least more than suspected, the ordinary street "patrol" were instructed to keep a special look-out for him.

It was known that that morning he had received a letter which had appeared to considerably disturb him.

All through the day his comrades had observed that he was uneasy, and more than usually irritable, although there was no official suspicion that he would attempt to "break barracks."

It was therefore thought that there might possibly be a connection of some sort between the letter and his escapade. Anyway, it was technical desertion, and as such, must be promptly punished.

All very well, but the cooking of the hare must, undoubtedly be preceded by its capture.

So with Harold. The cooks were ready; but of the hare not a sign was to be seen or heard.

In one way this was not surprising, as his real name was unknown in the regiment, he having enlisted in the name of Henry Shaw.

Still, the military authorities thought he ought to be found (they never admit the possibility of failure in their subordinates) and "combed" unmercifully the unfortunate patrol sergeant for not finding him.

"Tower Crecy" is a landmark for miles; the central keep with its flagstaff and machicolated battlements rising well above the wooded land surrounding the buildings on every side.

The village of the same name nestles near the gates, forming, with its noble neighbour, a charmingly picturesque example of bygone simplicity and grandeur.

Up the long, dusty road from Canningford station, in the dim dawn of the winter's morning, trudged a figure, clad in a long ulster and a golf cap.

A quarter of an hour later, and the lodge-keeper saw the same man pass rapidly through, and along the drive leading to the house.

There was not time to stop him, and enquire his business, even had she been able for the stranger was energetic, and the lodge-keeper old and rheumatic.

"Go round to the back. You've no bus——"

"Get out, Byles. I'm going up to my mother's room. Is Miss Cicely there?"

"I beg pardon, Mr. Harold. I didn't know——"

"Never mind that. Answer my question."

"Yes, sir, Miss Cicely has just gone up to my lady's room. Can I get you any——"

With a bound, Harold was past the butler, and in a moment was at the door of his mother's room.

What should he see? He was afraid, this "six-feet-three" guardsman, to face the possibility of death.

Then, while he hesitated, the door gently opened, and his cousin Cicely, the adopted daughter of the house, stood in the entrance way.

Harold's cap had fallen off, disclosing his fair, curly head, while his outer coat, now unbuttoned, revealed beneath it "Her Majesty's scarlet."

"Harold! You had my letter, then? Hush! Come in and close the door. See, you are only just in time."

It was not a cry; it was a wail of bitter remorse and anguish.

"Mother!"

The big fellow dropped on his knees by the bed and buried his face in the coverlet, the sobs, which shook him from head to foot, making the very room to tremble.

Presently a thin, white hand stole out from above him, and sought his head. Cicely saw it and went out, leaving the mother and son together.

No one knows what passed within that death-chamber, only that when Cicely returned a little later she found the dead mother with her hand still upon her boy's head as if invoking a blessing.

The morning after the funeral a soldier passed through the gate of Wellington Barracks to be immediately challenged by the sergeant of the guard.

When brought before the Colonel, he was asked what he had to say in his own defence.

"Not much, sir. Just this. I broke my mother's heart—God forgive me! and—I have just returned from her grave side."

"Yes, very sad, no doubt, but you should know that the true point of honour is to be faithful to your colours."

"Colonel, I'd fight for King and country like a devil! but the point of honour with me being a last look of the face of the mother, whose life I had made to be one long sorrow. I have only to say that I don't regret it, and would do the same again if I had to be shot for it!"

* * * * * *

Punished, of course he was, but he had gained a place in the estimation, both of his officers and of his comrades, that as long as he wears uniform (and he has no intention of quitting soldiering) he will not readily lose.

THE WIFE OF THE MAYOR

CHAPTER I.

When the Mayor of Uptown Station lost his mother bets were freely taken in the township as to whether he would marry.

Everybody knew that he had made up his mind to remain single as long as the old lady, who idolised him, was alive. It was just like his unselfish good nature. Now that she was gone, we were on the tip-toe of expectation to find out how great his sacrifice had been. We were all romantic in Uptown Station, and the chance of discovering a hidden love story in the history of Tom Carwithen made the whole settlement excited.

I was one of the unfortunate people who gave long odds that the Mayor would marry within a year, and I lost twenty pounds over the business.

For the year went by, and no sign of a romance peeped out in the life of Tom Carwithen, the most popular man in Uptown Station.

I felt quite aggrieved about it, and told him he ought to pay me over twenty pounds.

Carwithen laughed.

"I am awfully sorry," he said, "but who was I to marry?"

"Why surely you used to be in love once, in the old country; perhaps before you came out here?"

"I don't remember ever experiencing the sensation!"

"On your honour?"

"On my honour!"

I knew then that Tom Carwithen was, for a man of thirty, a phenomenon. For there was no doubting the word of our Mayor, who had been elected again, as usual. When he solemnly said a thing, you might take it for gospel.

I was startled to hear, therefore, not three months after this declaration of his, that Tom Carwithen was going to marry a lady from England. Old Lamont, the store-keeper, gave me the news. He and Carwithen had emigrated together from the same town, and he happened to know the girl.

"Belle Aruth and Tom were playfellows together in York," said Lamont over his counter, beaming with the satisfied consciousness that he was the best informed man in the place on a subject of such popular interest. "I remember seeing them playing together there about twenty years ago now. She'd be five or six, and he a year or two older. Old Aruth had a shop in Coney Street—cornchandler's or something—and when Tom's father died, he took an interest in the lad and took him on, first as errand boy and then as shop boy. He was the making of him, Carwithen always says. You've heard him talk about old Aruth?"

"Yes, but I never knew he had a daughter."

"And I never thought Tom cared for her. I suppose she wouldn't marry, like him, while her old people wanted looking after. Old Aruth is just dead, I believe."

"Well, old Aruth has robbed me of twenty pounds, by not dying a little sooner," I said. "I shall want a little explanation from Tom Carwithen concerning this, and I went straight to the Mayor's big house to demand it."

"Look here, Carwithen," I said, "you told me you had never been in love!"

The Mayor appeared rather worried, I thought. He looked up almost angrily.

"Well?"

"And you were waiting all the while to marry your boy-love, as soon as the coast was clear. It seems to me, old man, the nearest thing to a lie I've ever heard from you, and six years we've been chums together."

The Mayor pushed me his cigar box.

"Lamont told you, I suppose?"

"Yes; did you tell him?"

"No, he got it from friends in York. But it is true enough that I am going to marry Miss Aruth. I guess Lamont has spread it all over the township by now!"

"He is doing solid business in that direction. The only thing that made me think his news was wrong was the talk we had a month or two ago."

"When I said I had never been in love?"

I nodded.

"Well it was true enough."

"But you haven't had much chance of forming an attachment since then?"

The Mayor puffed steadily at his cigar.

"Well, I suppose I had better tell you the truth of the matter," he said, after a few minutes' pause, during which I suppose he had been considering the question. "You can let out a little, judiciously, to the boys, too, or else they'll be looking at me and my marriage in far too romantic a light, which would make it unpleasant for both of us. The truth is that my marriage to Miss Aruth is not the result of an old love affair exactly. We were always good friends, and I never thought of marrying Belle till her father died. I owe everything I am or have to that man, you know. When he died, a few months ago, he left nothing behind him, and he wrote to me almost in his last moments, begging me to see that his daughter did not want. He was unable to make any provision for her, and she had no friends, unless I would prove myself one. Of course, there wasn't a moment's question on the score."

"Yes, but seeing that a girl does not want does not necessarily imply that you must marry her," I said, feeling a good deal disappointed to find that good Tom Carwithen seemed as intent on self-sacrifice as ever.

Tom took a puff at his Havana.

"If you think the thing out, you'll see that it does imply marrying," he said deliberately; "it is the only satisfactory way of doing it. At any rate, I thought so and wrote back at once, and asked Miss Aruth if she would come out here and be Mayoress. I did not, of course, pretend to be in love. I said we had always been good friends, and had no doubt we should make each other happier."

"And she accepted promptly?" I interrupted.

"She wrote me a very nice letter by return, thanking me, and saying she would come out if I wished it, and marry me. She arrives in three weeks time, by the White Lion. I shall meet her of course at Melbourne."

"Very promptly arranged," I said whistling. "I hope you'll like it old man."

"Thanks. So do I," said Tom gloomily, with the ghost of a twinkle in his eye, all the same. Then he got up and laid his hand on my arm. "Look here, old fellow," he said earnestly, "I've been telling things to you to-night, that I wouldn't tell anybody else in the world. I feel a mean sneak telling you, but I felt I must have a little real sympathy from someone; and I want you to spread an impression—I would rather hang myself than let you tell the boys I am marrying like I am——"

"From generosity," I interposed.

"Well, call it what you like; but you must not tell anybody. Only, you might spread it round that my marriage is more or less a business arrangement. I could not stand everybody getting romantic over it, nor, I am sure, would Miss Aruth like it."

"All right old man; you may depend upon me giving the exact impression," I said; and I set about doing it at once.

But I found it pretty hard work toning down the enthusiasm of Uptown Station over the marriage of their Mayor. They began right away, making presentations, and arrangements for public celebrations on a big scale. There was no restraining their exuberance. The township had come to the conclusion that the occasion called for a grand effort, and it rose to the performance of its duty like a man. It was only by argument that the Mayor was allowed to go to Melbourne alone to meet his bride-elect. The popular wish was to send the whole town council with him, in full civic dress —and we boasted some remarkable civic dresses at Uptown Station—to receive Miss Aruth in a manner befitting her future position as wife of our popular Mayor. I voted dead against it, of course; but it was only with the greatest difficulty that Carwithen got off by himself, and the disappointed council set to work at once, running up elaborate triumphal arches for his return.

CHAPTER II.

THE White Lion was expected to arrive on a Sunday. Carwithen was to meet the lady on board, conduct her to her hotel, and bring her next day to Uptown Station, where the wedding was to take place on the same afternoon, with all the pomp and glory that the township could think of. Everybody was wild with excitement to see the happy woman who had secured Carwithen and when on the Monday the couple arrived, they found the decorated streets full of people. I suppose every able-bodied person in Uptown station was in the crowd which followed Carwithen and his bride-elect under the triumphal arches and bedecked clothes-lines from the station to the hotel, where they rested, and from the hotel to the church. At the hotel I had to give an address of welcome on behalf of the town, to the lady, and a very good opportunity of forming an opinion on her charms,

On the whole it was a very favourable one. Her hair was of a shade which I had always associated in my mind with hair-dye; and even under her veil, her black eyebrows lent support to the idea that she understood cosmetics; but there was something very sweet and girlish in her voice, manner and figure, which won my admiration at once, and knocked 75 per cent. off the feeling of pity with which I had been regarding poor Carwithen. Old Lamont had privately told me—and everybody else in the township—that Miss Aruth was no beauty. From his remembrance of her, and a description which his York friends had sent, he had managed to conjure up in my mind the image of a bony and masculine person, with a large nose and a cast in her eye.

The lady to whom I had to present the address of welcome formed a very pleasing contrast to this imaginary personage. Perhaps it was the contrast and surprise which made me fall in love with her at sight—as much in love that is, as a man may honestly be with the wife of his chum.

When the ceremony at church was over and I got the opportunity of speaking to old Lamont, I took him to task roundly for spreading such a misleading description of our future mayoress throughout the township. I did not speak quite as severely as I had intended to do, however, because I found a score of men at him on the same point.

"My dear friend," said Lamont smiling blandly, and addressing himself to me as the latest opponent, "allow me to explain. It was desirable, wasn't it, that the lady should creat a favourable impression when she arrived? You agree. Well, if I had accurately described all her charms, you might all have been a little disappointed at the reality. Instead of saying, 'What a charming figure!' you would have grumbled that she dyed her hair"—Lamont had evidently the same opinion as myself about the bride's golden tresses—"now you are all pleased, because she is better instead of worse than what you expected."

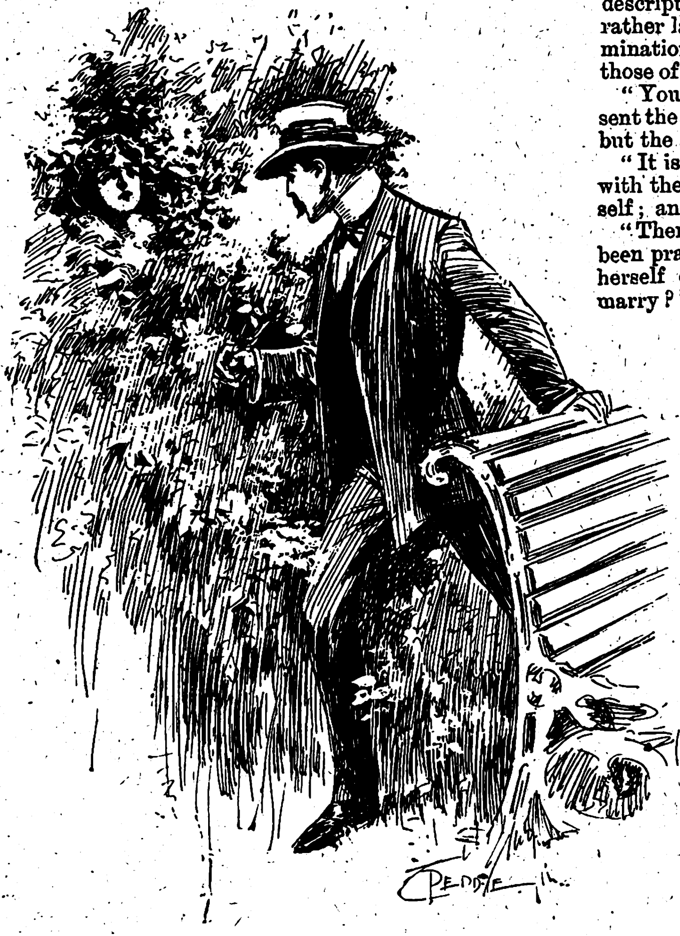
There was a grand guffaw at this piece of worldly wisdom on the old storekeeper's part, and the score of men went away apparently satisfied. But I knew

Lamont better than they, and put my arm in his as we marched off to the wedding feast at the town hall.

"Look here, Lamont," I said, "your explanation is good enough for men who don't know you, but I'll eat my hat if you weren't in earnest when you described Miss Aruth as a gawky fright, with dull black hair and a squint."

"That is so," said Lamont.

"Then how do you account for the transformation?"



"She was crouching there among the shrubs where she had been hiding ever since her escape from the hotel."

"Hush," said my companion, dropping his own voice to almost a whisper; "I am as puzzled as you, my boy, and a good deal more so, although I did not care to tell the other fellows. As you say, I was in dead earnest when I described Carwithen's girl; and I'll eat a whole hat-shop if the woman Tom married just now is Belle Aruth, of York. Why, I remember that girl as well as I remember anybody. I saw her when I went my trip home, five years ago, and she had black hair, a squint, and a bottle nose. It was certainly five years ago, and she may have changed a little in the time, and, of course, a woman can do a good deal with cosmetics; but my sister in York sent me a full description of her and a photograph, and they both make her out just the woman Belle Aruth would grow into. We have plenty of time before we begin; come in and see the photograph."

We were passing his store, as he spoke, and I followed him inside and upstairs to his parlour, thoroughly interested in the old man's bewilderment. The photograph did not make Miss Aruth quite so plain as his description. The squint was only a slight one, and the rather large nose gave character to a face full of determination. But the face and figure were certainly not those of the lady who had just been married.

"Your friends in York must have made a mistake and sent the portrait of the wrong personage?" I suggested; but the storekeeper shook his head.

"It is impossible. My sister lives in the same street with the Aruth's and got the news from the girls herself; and besides, I saw her myself only five years ago."

"Then, what do you think? Has some adventuress been practising a fraud on poor Carwithen, and passed herself off to him as the woman he had agreed to marry?"

"Tom does not suffer if she has," said Lamont, energetically. He was evidently prejudiced against Miss Aruth.

"And what do you propose doing?" I asked next.

The storekeeper threw the photo into the fire.

"Nothing!" he said, promptly. "Whoever this lady may be, Tom Carwithen has married her, and if you can judge anything by appearances, she will make him a better wife than the bona-fide Belle. If he has been cheated, I am not going to open his eyes. If he knows what he is about, I don't want to interfere with his affairs. Trouble enough to mind my own. Come along. We must not be late, as we have both healths to propose."

"But you have been showing that photo all round the place, haven't you?" I said, as we passed through the store again, on our way out. "How shall you explain the photo?"

"As you heard me just after the wedding. It was a happy idea of mine, and will satisfy most people, I think. The rest will have to remain unsatisfied."

CHAPTER III.

I cannot deny that Lamont's assurances made me very uneasy. It seemed impossible that he could be mistaken. Besides, I had heard from Tom Carwithen himself that Miss Aruth's age was only a few years less than his own, and the lady with whom he had gone through the ceremony of marriage looked scarcely twenty. I wished that I could feel as satisfied as the old storekeeper about my duty in the matter, and be content to let things take their course without my interference. But I could feel none of Lamont's confidence. Was it a friendly thing to do, I kept asking myself, if my chum had been cheated, to stand by and give him no enlightenment?

If the sweet-faced woman, who had taken my fancy so, was proved to have married the Mayor by passing herself off as another woman, under that other woman's name, surely the marriage was not a legal one, and could easily be annulled. If I had not heard such an unfavourable opinion of the real Miss Aruth, I should not have hesitated to tell Carwithen all I knew. But from all I heard, I thought the Mayor might come off worse by keeping himself free for that young lady than by sticking to the fair pretender, whose appearance had certainly prepossessed me in her favour. So I let the day go by and said nothing, behaving at the wedding feast in the Town Hall as if everything was as it should be.

It was not a very merry business, however, in spite of the labour and expense which the town had expended on it. The bridegroom seemed to make himself gay by an effort, and Mrs. Carwithen was pale and nervous throughout the whole affair. I, for one, was devoutly pleased when it was all over, and I was left free to go home and wonder what on earth I ought to do.

I was foolish enough to go on wondering after I went to bed, with the result that I did not get a wink of sleep all night, which I might not have regretted if I had found myself any nearer a solution of the question in the morning, but I was as far away as ever.

You may guess how glad I was, then, when Jack Elliott dropped in to breakfast.

Elliott was the very man of all others whom I would have chosen to consult over poor Carwithen's business. He was as much the Mayor's friend as I was, and he could see further through a mystery than most men; as he ought to do, seeing that he was Chief of the Melbourne police. The Mayor's influence—and his own abilities—had secured him the post when he left Uptown Station.

He had coolly given my housekeeper orders to bring in double breakfast, and was calmly attacking the meal when I came down, all the worse for my sleepless night. It would have surprised me to see any other man, whom I had imagined 200 miles away, sitting at my table, but nothing surprised me about Jack Elliott. It was just like him—pouncing upon a fellow whom he had not seen for a year, and nodding coolly, as if he had met him an hour before.

I had learnt the Chief's way, and acknowledged his presence with nothing more than a smile and a nod till I had cracked my egg. Then I ventured to remark:

"Down here on business?"

Elliott took a sip of coffee.

"Partly," he said. "I am having a holiday, but there is an interesting little case which I am looking after at the same time, just to pass the time."

"A fraud?" I asked.

"A murder. You have heard of it, of course—the murder at Lean's Hotel?"

"Oh! yes it was in the papers. A rich Melbourne man was murdered in his bedroom at the hotel, by a woman, whose acquaintance he had made. She escaped."

"Exactly so. I mean to find her. After finding out a little of her history, I marked down six places she might try to reach. I shall take a little holiday tour through the lot."

"And has Uptown Station the honour of coming first?" I asked.

"No; it is not on the list. I just came here on the way to see you and old Carwithen. Is he all right?"

"Is it possible you have not heard?"

"What?"

"That he is married."

"Gracious! No! What has he done with his mother, then?"

"Buried her! You are more than a year behind date."

"Yes, that is the worst of forswearing friendly correspondence and newspapers. They both interfere with business. But to whom has Tom given the best husband in the market?"

Whereupon I told him the whole story.

"Oh! yes," he said, when I had finished, "it sounds as though there may be something interesting in it. I'll find out who the lady is. And, meanwhile, you had better say nothing about it to Carwithen. If I am lucky, I'll give you his wife's genealogy in full to-morrow. Meanwhile, I may as well have a look round at her, if she is in town still."

"Yes. They are having no honeymoon. Carwithen is too busy, he says."

"Then I will call. You may expect me to-morrow to supper."

And till supper-time next day I did not catch a glimpse of my friend, the Melbourne policeman.

He came in with his usual air of expressionless calm, just as the meal was ready, and nodded to me as he sat down in his chair at the other side of the table.

"Well, have you discovered anything?" I asked, eagerly, when he was seated.

Elliott nodded.

"Is it Miss Aruth that Tom has married?"

"No."

"Who on earth is she then?"

Jack Elliott looked straight across at me.

"She is a Miss Dorothy West—the woman who murdered Mr. Langley five days ago at Lean's Hotel."

I started up from my chair.

"What! the woman you are searching for?"

Elliott nodded.

"And Tom Carwithen has married her?"

"It appears so."

I burst out laughing.

"Why, man, it is impossible!"

"It is perfectly true," said the policeman. "I recognised her directly I saw her, from a photograph I have with me. But, of course, I made quite sure before telling you. I was in Carwithen's house less than an hour ago, ransacking the place for any stray belongings of the lady. I did not find any, though. Didn't it occur to anybody here that 'Mrs. Carwithen' didn't bring a scrap of luggage with her?"

I had given no thought to the matter, and said so.

"Not a scrap," repeated Elliott. "They are buying everything here, or ordering it from Melbourne. Tom sent off five letters to-day to different firms. Mrs. C. did not even bring a handbag with her. I had to wait till she came home, and to pick her pocket, while I was talking to Tom."

"Pick her pocket? What for?"

"To see the initials on her handkerchief, of course. I was luckier than I expected, for it had her whole name written in the corner—Dorothy West. That is pretty conclusive, eh? And I have other evidence on the point."

"Why, this is terrible!" I said. "Poor old Tom! What are you going to do?"

"Have my supper, if you'll be good enough to carve that fowl," said the Chief of the Melbourne police; and he would not say another word about his startling discovery till he had made an excellent meal.

For my part, the news had taken away any chance of my eating; and I was thankful when my companion pushed back his chair from the table.

"I can never come to a decision when I am hungry," he said. "If you'll hand me the cigar-box, we will think out what to do."

"You will arrest her, I suppose?" I said somewhat regretfully.

I could not forget that Jack was a policeman, and the remembrance of Mrs. Carwithen's sweet face made me feel absolutely sick to think of the position in which she was placed.

Elliott took a puff at his cigar.

"It is not certain that I shall make an arrest," he said. "The affair of the murder at Lean's Hotel is not in my hands, you know. But we must find out how our friend the Mayor really stands. I wonder if he knows who his wife really is?"

"Let us go and ask him," I suggested. "We three ought to act as friends in this matter, Elliott."

And, to my surprise, Elliott agreed with me, and accepted my suggestion.

CHAPTER IV.

It was after ten when we got to the Mayor's, and the servants showed some hesitation about admitting us at that hour. The Mayor usually retired at ten, they said; but when we were finally shown into the drawing-room, Carwithen and his wife were both there. The latter was singing to her husband's accompaniment a pathetic little ballad, which we both knew.

"That is not the voice of a murderess," whispered Elliott, before entering, as we stood in the passage with the servant, waiting till the song should be finished; and I thoroughly agreed with him. For the singer had one of those sweet voices which win our hearts instantly.

The music ceased suddenly. They had evidently heard that slight commotion in the hall, and Tom came to the door of the drawing-room, and pushed back the heavy curtains to see what it was.

"What, Elliott, is that you again?" he said, catching sight of my companion first. "Do you want a bed? I forgot to ask you whether we could put you up, when you were here this afternoon."

He led the way into the room as he spoke, and I was quite startled to see how lovely the woman looked, whom my companion called a murderess. She had changed the travelling dress which she wore at the wedding, for a creamy dressing-gown. I suppose she must have improvised it, if Elliott's news about her luggage was true, but nothing could have suited her more perfectly. She looked in it a lovely, ethereal spirit, as she came towards us slowly from the piano. Perhaps she looked all the more spiritual from the fact that her face was perfectly pale, and her great, dark eyes seemed full of fear; but she spoke and acted quite calmly and with a charming grace which seemed natural to her.

It seemed absolutely absurd to me that we could come to accuse such a beautiful creature of a terrible crime. If I had been alone, I should have lacked confidence to go through with the affair.

But Jack Elliott was not so susceptible to womanly charms as I, perhaps; and in the fewest possible words he told Carwithen—who seemed to get more agitated every moment that we had something important to talk over with him, and should like to be alone.

He apologised gracefully to the lady as she left us together, for disturbing her and her husband at such an hour, and in another moment or two we had Carwithen to ourselves.

I had not the heart to watch his expression, nor that of the lady as she left the room, but now that I happened to catch sight of the Mayor's face, it made me feel quite bad to see how nervous and ill he had grown.

Jack Elliott formed his own deduction from the fact, and said, as soon as the door was shut:

"Well, old man, you seem to know what we have come about?"

"Oh, no. I am quite in the dark," said poor Carwithen, with a feeble attempt to appear at ease.

"It is about your wife, then," said the Chief of the Melbourne police.

"Yes?"

The Mayor's voice plainly trembled.

"Come, it is no use pretending, old man," said Jack, with something of his police manner; and, hating to hear my chum tortured, I put in quickly.

"We have found out that your wife is the Melbourne murderess."

Carwithen showed no shock or surprise.

"She is innocent!" he said, with a dogged defiance in his voice.

"Of course," said Elliott with his police manner again, "but the case looks pretty black against her, and I will admit that I should have arrested her on the spot if it were not for the unaccountable fact that you appear to have married her."

Carwithen seemed to jump hopefully at the "if."

"Oh, yes, I have married her," he said, eagerly coming forward.

"You won't send my wife to prison, Jack?"

It struck me that Elliott was beginning to look a trifle uncomfortable for the first time in my experience of him.

"Sit down, man, and let us talk it over calmly," he said. "I am not likely to forget what I owe you. But I certainly shan't let you make a fool of yourself over this business. Suppose you tell us the whole story from beginning to end? We are both in the dark. Where is the real Miss Aruth? How on earth did you pick up this pretty murder—well suspect? And what possessed you to marry her? If you'll take us into your confidence, we'll do the best we can to make things straight for you. If not, of course, I shall have to take the police view that Miss West—or Mrs. Carwithen—is a murderess, and arrest her."

"For God's sake don't do that," pleaded the Mayor, his whole soul in his voice. "I shall be glad to tell you the story from beginning to end and I don't care if you call me a fool for what I have done, as long as you don't spoil my plans."

"Well, start ahead with the story," said Elliott, looking round for the Mayor's cigar-box.

"I will just go and tell my wife what you have come about, first," said Carwithen. "The truth is bad enough. I did not think anybody would imagine, however great the resemblance, that Dorothy West and my wife were one and the same person. But, to know it is found out, is better than suspense. Will you excuse me for a moment?"

The wife will enjoy "Short Stories." Take it home.

"Certainly," said Elliott, who had taken the matter into his own hands and ignored me; then he added, as the Mayor walked to the door, "Of course, you won't be so silly as to try and spirit the lady away. I assure you it would be very bad policy on your part."

Carwithen conjured up a sickly smile.

"I perceive that perfectly, Jack."

CHAPTER V.

We were both silent while poor Carwithen was out of the room. Elliott discovered the cigar box for which he had been looking lighted one of Tom's Havanas and stretched himself out luxuriously in an easy chair. By the time that he was fairly settled, the Mayor came back looking more haggard than ever. He stood in front of the fire and started his story straight away, He had evidently been arranging it on his way.

"It begins with my going to Melbourne to meet Miss Aruth, whom I had asked to marry me," he said; and Elliott interrupted him.

"Excuse me, you really intended to meet Miss Belle Aruth, and marry her? It was not a blind?"

"Oh, yes, I never dreamed of not meeting or not marrying her, although, as I explained some time ago to our friend here, I did not pretend to be in love with her. I reached Melbourne two days before the White Lion was expected, took rooms in the New Hotel, and in order to be quite proper, engaged others at another Hotel for Miss Aruth when she should arrive. The next day I thought I would have a look round the town, which I had not seen for more than three years. I turned into a public park—I forget its name—and sat down on one of the seats to read a Sunday paper, which I had just bought in the street. It contained a full account of the murder at Lean's Hotel. A young lady, found in the room with the corpse, had been accused by the hotel people of being the author of the crime; she had protested her innocence, and in the general excitement over the finding of the body, she had managed to disappear. A rough sketch and a description was given, and the impossibility of her really escaping was enlarged upon. There was a shrubbery behind me, and while I was reading, something made me turn round and look among the bushes. I thought I could see something moving there; and, after taking a look round to see that there were no gardeners or officials about, I took a few steps into the shrubbery to satisfy my awakened curiosity."

"And there you found the suspected woman hiding?" asked Elliott.

"Yes, she was crouching there among the shrubs, where she had been hiding ever since her escape from the hotel. Well, she made no attempt to explain her presence there; she just fell on her knees, begging me to spare her, and not to deliver her up to the police. Then, before I could say anything, she told me she was quite innocent."

"And looked so beautiful that you took her word for it?" said Elliott drily.

"No, Jack. I did not until I had heard her account of it. I made her come out and sit on the seat near me, thinking that would be safer than talking in the shrubbery, and tell me all about it. I will call her and ask her to tell you also, and then you will believe her innocent, as I did."

"Possibly," said Elliott. "But suppose you tell us your story first without troubling Miss West."

"You ought to hear my wife," said Carwithen with a stress on the last word, and he took a step towards the door as if to call her, but Elliott stopped him.

"I shall hear the lady's story with more sympathy, most likely, when I hear what her relationship really is to my friend," he said gravely. "For the present you might give us her statement of the case briefly in your own words."

Carwithen looked unwilling, but he felt, no doubt, that he was in the policeman's hands, and he told us a most remarkable story which the accused woman had given him as an explanation of her position.

According to her own story, Miss Dorothy West was staying a night at Lean's Hotel, before leaving the country on the morrow to seek her fortune as a governess in England. She was quite alone in the world. She was writing till late, and went to bed shortly before midnight. After undressing and blowing out her candle, she discovered that a valuable ring had disappeared from her finger. It was the only memento she retained of her dead father, and the very thought of losing it made her quite miserable. Then, when she tried to recollect where she could have dropped it, or had it stolen, a remembrance flashed back into her mind—as remembrances will do in such cases—of a slight sound she had noticed in coming up the hotel staircase twenty minutes before.

She had stopped a moment then, wondering if she had dropped anything, but seeing nothing in a cursory glance down at the carpet, had proceeded to her room. Now there occurred to her, of course, the hope that the sound had been caused by the falling of her ring, and that the trinket might still be lying on the stairs. If so, of course she ought to secure it before anybody passed. With this intention, the girl slipped on her dressing-gown which she had hung on the door, without re-lighting her candle.

Then she passed out into the empty corridor outside her room, which was lighted dimly by a gasalier at each end, and down the stairs to the spot where she thought she had heard the ring drop. She did not find it, but was obliged to retreat quickly to her room by hearing steps approaching. She ran back hurriedly, afraid of being seen with bare feet and uncoiled hair, and must have gone into the wrong room, where Mr. Langley was already lying murdered.

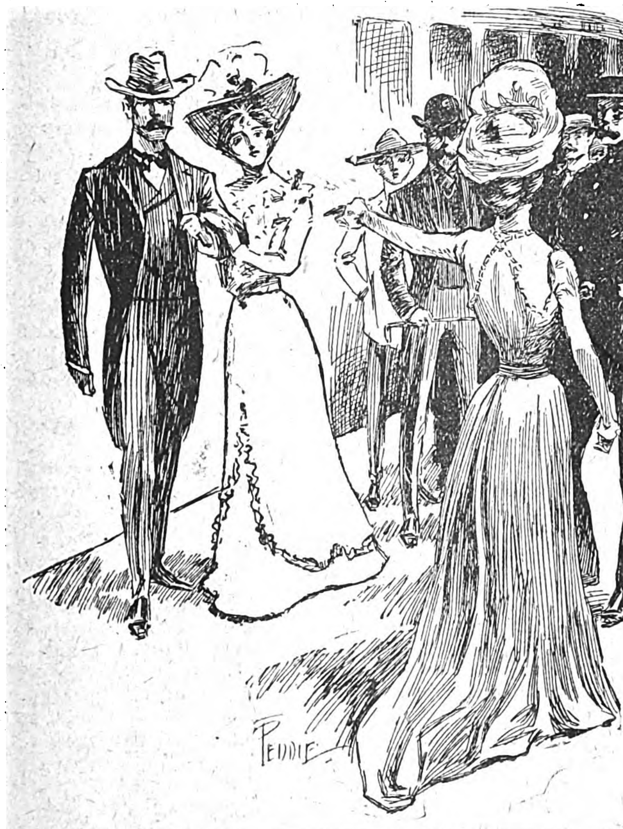
She remembered afterwards feeling the carpet wet under her feet, but was so excited at the time by her hurried flight from the approaching steps, that she did not think anything about it, and she was too frightened to venture out again, even for her father's ring. So she lay panting with her exertions till the steps passed her door, and then after lying awake some time, wondering whether she would get her ring back, she fell asleep, and did not wake till she heard a loud battering at her door in the morning. A servant in passing had seen a tiny stream of blood coming under the mat, and had run to call assistance. At the moment that Miss West awoke the butler forced the lock, and half-a-dozen servants burst into the room. The poor girl wakened suddenly, sat up, rubbing her eyes, and inquiring what this extraordinary commotion meant. For reply, she found everybody pointing dumbly at the foot of the bed.

"Where Mr. Langley lay murdered, I suppose?" said

Jack Elliott, when the Mayor reached this point in his story.

"Yes. He must have been lying there when she entered the room," Carwithen went on. "The poor girl sprang out of bed horror-struck at her position. As she did so, the servants fell away from her, screaming and pointing at her feet. They were stained with blood.

"Well, it was not long, of course, before my wife discovered that she was considered by everybody to have killed the man beside whose corpse she had passed the night. When she realised the impossibility of making anybody believe the true explanation of her presence in his room, she seized an opportunity when she was for a moment unnoticed, to escape from the place before the police who had been summoned had arrived. She took refuge immediately in the park, where I found her, and had remained in that shrubbery hiding. That is my wife's story," Carwithen wound up.



"Why it is the woman who murdered Mr. Langley in Lean's Hotel at Melbourne. Here, policeman, arrest her!"

"Not a bad one," said Jack Elliot, in his dry way. "An exceedingly good one, under the circumstances. The case is certainly interesting."

I thought it was my turn to make a remark.

"You may think what you like, Elliott," I said, "but I, for one, believe that explanation. It is much more easy to believe, than that such a gentle and beautiful woman should commit a terrible crime."

Elliott sniffed and took no further notice of my remark, but poor Carwithen grasped my hand and wrung it.

CHAPTER VI.

THE Chief of the Melbourne police selected another cigar and lighted it.

"We have not heard how you proceeded, Carwithen?" he said, and the Mayor went on with his story.

"I can understand you," he went on, "imagining, from hearing my account of it, that the story was a clever invention; but if you had heard it, as I did, from the lady herself, I am sure you would have believed it. I did, thoroughly, and all my sympathies were aroused for this beautiful, friendless girl, who found herself in such a terrible position."

"So you threw Miss Aruth over, and brought the lady here instead?" said Elliott, with a laugh.

"No," said Carwithen quickly; "wait a moment. I told her to remain in hiding in the park, and promised to return with some disguise or other for her to wear. Then I went into the streets, and bought a ready-made dress and other things—all I could think of that a woman would wear—and took them with me to my seat by the shrubbery. I must have looked rather comical idling around the place with half-a-dozen drapers' packages; but, luckily, nobody seemed to notice me, and our part of the park was quite deserted. All my packages went into the shrubbery—and out came a new young lady, not so badly dressed, either, I flatter myself. She wore a veil, so that her face could not be recognised, and walked out of the park arm-in-arm with me. She left her own clothes in the shrubbery."

"But, unfortunately, brought her handkerchief," put in Elliott. "I suppose you forgot to supply that detail?"

"Yes—we never thought of it."

"I did," said the policeman drily; "that was the most important point in my discovery. But I must congratulate you on the idea of walking together. Of course, everybody was looking for the suspect among unaccompanied girls."

"So I thought," said Carwithen. "So I rooted up still another hotel, and took rooms there for 'Mr. and Mrs. Smith,' and sent for a dressmaker to measure 'Mrs. Smith' for a new dress."

"Good," said the police officer.

"Yes, but the worst of it was that the lady who really should belong to me—Miss Belle Aruth—might turn up at any moment. Her arrival would complicate the affair very much."

"Well?"

"I called at the Steamboat Company's office to hear the latest about the White Lion's arrival, and was surprised to find a note waiting for me there. It was from Miss Aruth herself. She had changed her mind and come by the King of France, so she had actually been in Australia three days when I reached Melbourne, She left a note to thank me for my kind intentions with reference to her, and to inform me that she had been better suited, and was about to marry a gentleman whom she had met on the way out and who had proposed marriage. It was the coolest and most comical note in the world; but you may guess how it relieved my mind. Of course, things were still sufficiently arkward. I could not think, for the life of me, what I was to do next. Here was a young girl staying at an hotel in the town as my wife—and what on earth was I to do with her?

"Then I began to think how foolish I should look when I came back to Uptown Station, with all its triumphal arches built for my wedding, and told the boys that I had been jilted. I felt mad about it, although I was glad to know the bride-elect was out of the way. Then, of course, a brilliant inspiration came into my head—a way by which my two puzzles might solve each other. Why not take back 'Mrs. Smith' in Belle Aruth's place? I thought that by making the poor girl my wife, I should remove her from the very possibility of being suspected, and the boys would not be cheated out of a grand wedding. I had a little trouble persuading her, of course, but the poor girl was so distracted by her danger, that I believe she would have agreed to anything. I made sure, of course, that she had no love affair in the way, to prevent her tying herself. Of course I had none.

"Well, after seeing her and arranging everything, I gave out at the hotel that I was leaving Melbourne on business and slept two nights in the room I had originally taken at the New Hotel. Next day we came down here and were married."

Elliott coughed.

"Of course you know the marriage is not a legal one?"

The Mayor started perceptibly.

"Why not, man?"

"Because the lady married you under a false name, and you both knew that it was a false name."

Carwithen turned red and white in turns.

"For Heaven's sake don't tell that to Dorothy," he said earnestly. "It would kill her. I am sure she never suspected such a possibility, and I smothered what little doubts I had on the subject. Swear you won't tell her. I shall marry her again as soon as we can manage it safely; but you must not tell her till then."

"Oh, no, I will not tell her," said Jack Elliott; and I said the same with my eyes.

"And you will not arrest her?" Tom went on pleading. "For my sake Jack, promise you will help me to save her? I swear she is as innocent as the driven snow."

"Excuse me asking the question," said Jack, "but are you in love with the lady?"

The was a long pause, while the police officer puffed at his cigar, and Carwithen looked straight before him. Then the Mayor looked up with his face all red that had been so white.

"That is the wonderful part of it all," he said. "I love her as my own life."

"And she cannot very well help loving you, old man," said Jack Elliot.

"Of course, that settles the matter. I think Mrs. Carwithen did a foolish thing in running away, but it is too late to think of that now. What little chance she had of getting people to believe her story, she has lost now, by her flight. You know, of course, that you are making yourself liable to a long imprisonment for helping her?"

"I'd serve twenty years to save her from arrest," said Carwithen, eagerly.

"I am afraid we shall have to bear him company if we meddle any further with the business," said the Chief of the police with a smile at me.

"Which we certainly shall do, eh Jack?" I responded, and Elliott's face puckered into a grimace.

"As our old friend has got himself into a mess I suppose we shall have to stick by him," he said mournfully.

CHAPTER VII.

"CARWITHEN is pretty hard hit," said Jack, as we left the house.

"I rather like the girl myself. She certainly does not look like a murderess, but you never know."

"I'd wager my existence on her innocence," I said.

"Possibly. I wouldn't. But I'll admit that I've felt some doubts of the lady's guilt from the first, which her story strengthens. If she had told it at the time, she might have got off. You see it is absurd to think of a woman sleeping voluntarily in the same room with a man she has murdered, and the doctor decided that the man had been dead ten hours or so when the discovery was made."

"Was there anything to connect the two?" I asked. "I did not read the newspaper report through."

"No; but there was nothing to connect Langley with anybody else in the town. He had a wife in Australia, but she did not know of his arrival. He had been to Europe, and only reached Melbourne a few days before the murder. It was supposed that Miss West had come to the hotel by arrangement with him, but had been careful not to show that they were friends for fear of his wife hearing. One of the waiters saw a lady entering the room with him about ten o'clock on the night of the murder, but could not say whether it was Miss West or not. Our people are now trying to find some previous connection between the two, but the whole affair is in my substitute's, Denver's, hands, so I know nothing about their success. If they find any connection at all, her chances are nil."

"And do you think Carwithen's plan will save her?" I asked angrily, for Jack Elliott's opinion must be nearly infallible on the point.

My heart sank when he shook his head.

"No, Carwithen can't save her," he said. "His plan is clever, and has been managed admirably, but there are a host of dangers to encounter."

"But she was going to marry and change her name."

The police officer merely shook his head.

"It must be found out sooner or later."

"And nothing will save her?"

"Oh, I did not say that. If she is really innocent I think I shall."

"How?"

"By leaving her alone altogether and dropping on the real murderer."

"Perhaps it was a case of suicide?"

"No; the doctor's evidence at the inquest proved that to be impossible. I shall return to Melbourne to-morrow, and take up the case."

"Losing your holiday?"

My companion only shrugged his shoulders for reply.

We had reached by this time the end of the street where the Mayor lived. In the light of the street lamp at the end, a four-wheeled cab crowded with luggage had stopped, and the driver who must have been new to the township, inquired which house was Mr. Carwithen's.

At the same moment a lady who occupied the cab, put her head out of the window.

"Please tell him very clearly," she said, in a shrill voice, "I am afraid he has been drinking. I shan't get there to-night."

Her face showed clearly, as she spoke in the light of the street lamp—a determined face, which was only prevented from being handsome by a slight cast in her eye.

"I seem to know her face," I whispered to Elliott, who had been pointing out the Mayor's house to the driver.

And then, as the remembrance flashed into my mind of the photograph I had seen at Lamont's, I added, in a forcible undertone.

"Great Scott, Jack, it is Belle Aruth!"

The police officer took in the words instantly, and was ready to act upon them.

In a moment he was at the cab window, with his hat in his hand, speaking in a bland voice, as different from his ordinary voice as oil from emery cloth.

"Is it possible that I have the honour of speaking to the intended bride of my dear friend the Mayor?" he asked; and I heard a pleased reply in the affirmative from the cab.

"I expected Mr. Carwithen to meet me at Melbourne," said the lady. "I have been waiting there since my arrival, and have just decided to come on here. I suppose Carwithen will see that I have rooms at an hotel. I do not like calling at his house so late; but, of course, I am a stranger."

Jack's voice had evidently won her confidence. His calm answer surprised me.

"Mr. Carwithen, our beloved Mayor, has already set apart rooms for you at our provincial hotel, madam. I shall feel it an honour if I may have the pleasure of conducting you to them. Carwithen is ill, unfortunately. Surely you were met by the friend he sent in his place?"

"Indeed, I was not," said Miss Aruth, shrilly, "I am sorry Mr. Carwithen is ill. I suppose I had better go to the hotel."

She seemed a little undecided; but Elliott did not allow her to remain so.

In a few minutes the horse's head was turned, and my companion whispered hurriedly in my ear:

"Run like the wind to Swan's. See that they have the best room ready for the lady. Say it is Miss Aruth, Mrs. Carwithen's sister. Be sure they seem to expect her."

Then he stepped into the cab, and the man drove down a street which certainly was not the nearest way to Swan's, the best hotel in Uptown station. I cut along the nearest way, and did my best to carry out the police officer's instructions. Luckily I was pretty well known there, or I might have had more trouble at that hour. By the time that the couple drove up on the cab, they found everybody expecting them, and the proprietor himself ready to lead Miss Aruth to her sumptuous apartments.

We waited till he came down again, and Elliott chatted a little while to him in an easy way, and then drew me out, with his arm through mine, into the street.

"This is getting hot," he said, as soon as we were alone. "The old girl swears she never wrote that letter to Carwithen—it must have been an hoax from somebody in Uptown Station. Says she came by the White Lion, as she had agreed. I asked her flatly about the letter."

"It is fearfully awkward!" I said.

"Awkward! Why, it is scarifying!" said Elliott. "It would be a tight enough fix for Tom, if the murder and his wife's danger in that direction were out of the question. But as it is—why, the moment that woman says who she is, everybody will ask who is the Mayor's wife, and the moment that question is asked the game is up."

"Well, what are you going to do?" I asked. "You have shown yourself a genius so far."

"I am afraid I have committed myself irremediably. There is nothing for it but to go on now. You would not like to marry Belle Aruth yourself would you?"

I was surprised that he should joke at such a time, and said so; but Jack protested that he was in sober earnest.

"We must keep the woman quiet in some way," he said, "till we've shipped the Mayor and his wife off on a honeymoon to America or Japan, and that would be the best way of keeping her quiet, I guess. I have a night to map it all out, thank Heaven! Do you think you could furbish up another supper? I am getting hungry again, and can't think."

CHAPTER VIII.

It did not take the Chief of the Melbourne police twelve hours to arrange his plans. The cold supper which I raked up from my larder, the household being in bed, was so successful that in half-an-hour everything was arranged. To my dismay, I was to be entrusted with the carrying out of the whole of the arrangements.

The first thing in the morning I was to call on Carwithen, tell him of the new turn of affairs, and advise him to leave Uptown Station with his wife, nominally on a quickly-decided honeymoon, travel to any port other than Melbourne, and ship to the States. Then I was to keep Belle Aruth quiet until he was gone. I was to call upon her early, state that the Mayor was too ill to be seen, but that he had entrusted me with the pleasant duty of seeing that she was not dull. Then I was to escort her as quietly as possible to our show-place on the river, twenty miles away, and so keep her out of Uptown Station. Next day I was to take her somewhere else, if necessary. At all costs I must keep her in my sight, and prevent her worrying after Carwithen, or informing anybody who she was.

"And what are you going to do?" I asked when my companion had given me these directions in much detail.

"Oh! I must slip back to Melbourne as soon as possible to get to the bottom of that murder."

"Then we had better turn in," I suggested, "as we shall both have to rise early." And Elliott's reply surprised me.

"Oh, I am starting in half-an-hour, as we have everything arranged. A train passes through at half-past two, and every moment is important."

I tried to persuade him to have a sleep first, but it was no use.

"Look here, old man," he said, "I owe a good deal to Tom Carwithen, and this is the first chance I've ever had of making things level. It would upset him a good deal to have that girl arrested, whatever is proved afterwards; and to prevent it. I'd do anything short of marrying this Miss Aruth. And I might do that, if the worst came to the worst. Now that things are so critical, every moment is important."

"Yes," I said, "perhaps you had better go;" and I put on my hat to accompany him to the station. But Elliott insisted on my going to bed at once.

"Remember you have a trying day before you," he said as he left me.

In spite of the need for sleep, however, I got none that night. The responsibility placed upon me weighed too heavily on my mind, and I tossed about all night trying to arranged every detail of my procedure.

Perhaps that is why, when the morning came, I got through my duties so badly.

It was all right calling at the Mayor's and there was no doubt that I made him feel thoroughly the urgent need for him to leave Uptown Station with his wife. He began to make preparations at once for leaving that very afternoon.

But with Belle Aruth I was altogether unsuccessful in my attempt to carry out Jack Elliott's programme. She absolutely refused to go with me sight-seeing. She must see the Mayor, she said. If he was ill, who so fitted as his future wife to see that he was properly attended to. I talked, and talked, and talked, and the upshot of it all was simply that Miss Aruth put on her hat, and asked me whether I would escort her to the Mayor's house, or whether she should go alone.

Elliott, I knew, would have thought of some excellent way out of this embarrassing contretemps, but all I could do was to delay her visit a little on one pretext and another. If we only waited long enough, Carwithen might have started on his flight.

But the most energetic talking of which I was capable could not delay the inevitable visit long, and as Miss Aruth was perfectly determined to call on the man she was expecting to marry, I thought my best plan would be to accompany her.

The way to the house turned out to be rather a long one under my guidance, and when we finally arrived, I was rejoiced to hear the servant's declaration that Mr. Carwithen was not at home.

"But he is ill!" said my companion. "Where has he gone?"

"No, indeed, ma'am, master is quite well," said the servant. "He has just gone to the railway-station."

I thanked my stars that the girl did not add—"with his wife." She had said enough, however, to ruin Miss Aruth's confidence in me. I shall never forget the look she gave me through her crossed eyes as we turned away from the door.

"I shall not need your escort any further," she said, coldly; and calling a passing cab, told the man to drive to the railway station.

I seemed left to follow on foot; but as I managed to fall in with a friend driving in the same direction, I succeeded in reaching the platform at the same moment as she did.

The news of Carwithen's departure had managed to creep out, in spite of his efforts, and the town band had come out in full force on the platform to do honour to the occasion.

As I reached him, he was standing on the platform with a smile on his white face, shaking hands with quite a formidable band of his admirers and well-wishers, while his wife hung trembling visibly on his arm.

It was a pathetic sight to one like myself who knew the real state of affairs, and I could have cried to see Tom Carwithen smiling.

I felt that I ought to do something; but before I could decide what, Belle Aruth was upon him. She advanced to him with open hands, and then drew back, while everybody looked at her.

Poor Carwithen looked like a sheet, as the two stared at each other. Then the woman said so clearly that everybody could hear:

"You don't seem glad to see me, Mr. Carwithen? And pray, who is this lady?"

"My wife!" said the Mayor, in a whisper; and the woman broke into a discordant laugh.

"I thought there was something wrong. Allow me to introduce myself to you, madam. I am Miss Belle Aruth, to whom your husband promised marriage not two months ago."

Then, as she looked into poor little Mrs. Carwithen's face, her eyes lit up with malicious delight, as she cried aloud, in genuine surprise:

"Why, it is the woman who murdered Mr. Langley in Lean's Hotel, at Melbourne. Here, policeman, arrest her!"

She looked round, and had caught sight of Jack Elliott in full uniform, who seemed to have sprung from the ground.

He had really just left the train which came in from Melbourne just as they were speaking.

I was so ashamed of my failure to carry out his plans that, at the sight of him, I shrunk back behind the band, which kept on playing the "Wedding March," quite unconscious of the turn that affairs had taken.

Elliott strolled up slowly, and Belle Aruth turned to face him.

She did not appear to recognise him as the police gentleman who had escorted her to her hotel.

"Don't you hear?" she called to him, in her shrill voice. "That is the woman who murdered Mr. Langley. I was staying at the hotel, and can swear to her face, although the creature has dyed her hair."

Carwithen and his wife both stood motionless, with white, scared faces; while the friends who had been showing them off stood motionless with astonishment in a ring, and the band stopped one by one, as it dawned upon the players that something remarkable was happening.

Then I think a very admirable idea came into my head by which the Mayor might, at least get a start of his pursuers. I pushed my way into the ring, and said that the woman was evidently mad—that everybody knew who Mrs. Carwithen was—and that as the train was just about to start, it was a pity to delay the pair by listening to a mad woman's ravings.

The speech seemed to enrage the lady from York all the more.

"She is not Mrs. Carwithen," she screamed. "She is a murderess and is running away with my promised husband."

Elliott tried to calm her wrath, but the woman would not listen to him.

"You are a policeman. Why don't you arrest her?" she said.

And Jack answered coolly:

"Because she is innocent, Madam. You do not seem to have much respect for her feelings," he said, "making a public accusation like this."

"Respect for her feelings? I should think not," said Miss Aruth.

"Then you cannot blame me for producing this warrant here. It is a warrant for your arrest."

The woman's red face turned quite white.

"My arrest! What on earth for?"

"The murder for which you try to make this innocent lady accountable. I think you will have more trouble than she to prove yourself innocent of it."

Miss Belle Aruth must have been a woman of courage, for she managed to laugh quite naturally.

"And pray what is your evidence against me?" she asked coolly.

"Do you care to have it recited before these people?" inquired Elliott, who was dying all the time, I know, to let us hear what a very remarkable discovery he and his staff had made.

The woman certainly had nerve.

"I have no objection to them hearing your nonsense," she said, and my friend, the Chief of the Melbourne police, stated the case against her in a concise and masterly manner.

Miss Belle Aruth had travelled in the King of France with Mr. Langley, and had given out that she was engaged to him.

She had written the letter to Carwithen, which showed that she expected to marry Langley.

A letter of hers had been found among the dead man's papers, from which it appeared he engaged the room she occupied at Lean's Hotel for her, but wished her to keep their connection a secret for reasons which he would not explain.

And, lastly, the knife, which had been left in the dead man's heart, had just been identified by a passenger on board the King of France as one belonging to Miss Aruth.

"Rather damning evidence," said Elliott when he had finished, "and when all the details are heard, conclusive. Perhaps you will accompany me to the waiting-room, madam, until you return to Melbourne in my charge. I don't think it will be necessary to detain you or your wife, Mr. Carwithen. The train is about to start."

* * * * *

The evidence which Elliott managed to collect against Miss Belle Aruth was certainly conclusive. The eminent counsel whom Tom Carwithen engaged—for her father's sake—to defend her, accepted the impossibility of refuting it, and directed his wonderful energies to proving that her crime was manslaughter, and not murder.

The deceased man had made love to her during the voyage to Australia, and passing himself off as an unmarried man, led her to believe that he wished to marry her.

Then, on the night of the murder, in his room, he had explained his desire to keep their tie a secret. It was because he was already married. He brutally laughed away his promises. Did she imagine that a woman so old and ugly was good enough for anything but to relieve the monotony of a voyage on a ship which contained a woman worth looking at?

"Was it to be wondered at," the eminent counsel eloquently asked, "that this poor, outraged woman, stung to frenzy by his words, and the thought that he had ruined all her prospects, should reply with a knife in her betrayer's heart?"

A sympathetic jury decided that it was not to be wondered at, and Belle Aruth only disappeared from the world for a twelvemonth, after which she returned to England, I believe, on a small pension which Tom Carwithen allowed her.

"But what I liked about the woman," I said to Jack Elliott when we talked the matter over afterwards, "was her supreme impudence in trying to disown her own letter and marry the Mayor after all."

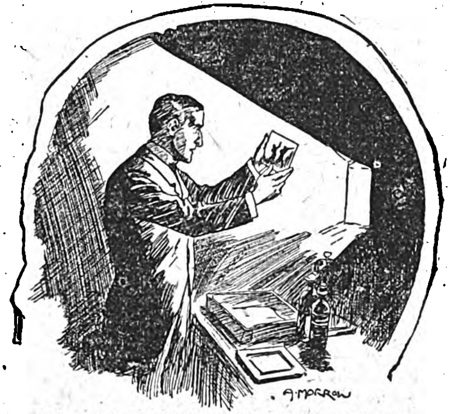
"It was her only chance," returned Jack. "She stayed a day or two at Lean's Hotel, so as not to excite suspicion by leaving too hurriedly; but, when we began making inquiries into her history, she had to marry Carwithen then to explain her presence in Melbourne. So she packed up in a hurry, and things would be queerer than they were, if we had not met her before she found old Tom out. It has been an exciting little story all round, hasn't it?"

"Yes," I said; "but I don't think the Mayor regrets it."

And both Tom Carwithen and the lady—who is really and legally Mrs. Carwithen now—assure me that they thank Heaven every day for the dangers and difficulties which brought them together. H. F.

The Clue of the Lightning Flash.

A thrilling story of innocent and guilty, wherein figure the famous characters of Graydon Garth, Kenyon Ford the Up-to-Date Detective, and his pupil, Nestor Keen. Written by Herbert Wentworth.



IN THE PHOTOGRAPHIC DARK ROOM.

He took the last film from the acid bath, and looked at it through the ruby light of his lantern: a cry of astonishment burst from his lips, and the film almost fell from his fingers. For there, in photographic image, was shown the last moments of the death struggle between Geoffrey Masterton and his murderer.

Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a Stereoscope to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, July 15th. Postcards only, please. The first prize of One Guinea has been awarded this week to Mr. A. W. Henton, 5 James Street, Rugby, whose contribution is denoted by a star thus.*

"THEY are talking of putting in long distance telephones for the farmers' use." "How charming! Of course they can be utilised in calling the cows."

MERCHANT (to his clerk): "I am sorry I cannot let you have to-day your last month's salary; but since, as you very well know, time is money, I will give you a month's holiday."

"YOUR lawyer made some pretty severe charges against the other fellow, didn't he?" said Ford. "Y-e-e-s, but you ought to see how he charged me," said Smallwort.

HUSBAND (reading): "Nobody has ever seen a dead mule." Wife (who is thinking of something else, and not listening): "Don't you think that the money paid for your life insurance is spent uselessly?"

"AH, Miss Nightingale, that 'Winter Song' was charming; it carried me back to the days of my childhood." "I am so glad you like it," said Miss Nightingale. "Why, I could actually hear the cattle bellowing, the old windmill creaking, and the discordant winds howling about the door."

A WOUNDED soldier opened his eyes and asked: "Where am I?" "On the operating table," answered a surgeon, putting away the chloroform bottle. "We have taken out of you a fragment of a shell, a grape shot, two rifle bullets, and the point of a bayonet." "Just my luck!" mused the wounded soldier. "Everything goes against me." "It seems to me," the surgeon said, "that everything comes your way."

* DURING the recent interational occupation in China, a team of eleven Highlanders played a game of cricket with twenty men of the French force. The Scots won by a handsome margin, and the French captain could not conceal his chargin. "We don't care much for cricket," he said, "we are more at home on the battlefield." "I shouldn't wonder," replied the victorious captain with a smile, "you would doubtless make more runs there."

A YOUNG man and a young woman lean over the front gate. They are lovers. It is moonlight. He is loth to leave as the parting is the last. He is about to go away. She is reluctant to see him depart. They swing on the gate. "I'll never forget you," he says, "and if death should claim me my last thought will be of you." "I'll be true to you," she sobs. "I'll never see anybody else, or love them as long as I live." They part. Six years later he returns. His former sweetheart of former years has married. They meet at a party. She has changed greatly; between the dances the recognition takes place. "Let me see," she muses, with her fan beating a tattoo on her pretty hand. "Was it you or your brother who was my old sweetheart?" "Really, I don't know," he says. "Probably my father."

"PAPA, what do football men do in the summer?" "Oh, they brag about what they did in the winter."

WE cannot impress too strongly upon all correspondents, when in doubt whether the postage of a letter is a penny or twopence, the force of the old proverb, "Two heads are better than one."

CLEVERTON (at the seashore): "What have you got that life-preserver on for, old man? I thought you were a good swimmer." Dashaway: "I am; but I am going to give a girl a swimming lesson."

"IT'S a mighty good thing to have a retentive memory," said Figg. "That depends," said Fogg. "If the memory is yours, it is a mighty good thing, as you say; but if it happens to be the property of your wife, that's another matter."

"WOMEN are still pushing their way into every trade," said George. "That's so. I have just been discharged to make way for a woman," replied Jack. "You have. Well, well! What are you going to do now?" "I am trying to marry the woman."

YOUNG BURGLAR: "These spoons ain't silver. They are the cheapest kind o' imitation." Old Burglar: "That's lucky." "Lucky?" "Yes, take 'em along." "What for?" "The lady of the house will be afraid to set the detectives after us, lest they should find them spoons an' describe 'em in th' papers."

"I HARDLY know whether to be angry with little Charley Tapecounter or not," said Miss Summermaid. "Why, dear?" asked Miss Ennygirl. "He said he could guess my age, and when I dared him to, he said he thought too much of me to do so before others."

"TELL me honestly," said the novel reader to the novel writer, "did you ever see a woman who stood and tapped the floor impatiently with her toe for several moments, as you describe?" "Yes," was the thoughtful reply, "I did once." "Who was she?" "She was a clog-dancer."

DR. BINKS (head of young ladies' seminary, delightedly): "Ah, my dear Mr. Smith, so glad to meet you. The father of my dear pupil, Miss Smith, I believe. Ah, yes. What a large and devoted family you must have, Mr. Smith?" Smith: "Large and devoted family—really, my dear sir, I don't understand ——" Dr. Binks: "Why, yes; all last year nine of Miss Smith's brothers used to call on her constantly and take her out almost every evening."

WIFE (who has just returned from the dentist's): "I shall be awfully stupid now." Husband: "Why so, my dear?" Wife: "I have had all my wisdom teeth pulled out." Husband (with the best intention in the world) "Of course, my love, you know its nothing but a superstition the idea that wisdom teeth have anything to do with wisdom. If you were to have every tooth in your head drawn it couldn't make you any stupider, you know." He succeeded in smoothing matters over, but it was a narrow escape.

IN railway travelling one meets with curious characters. Recently there was a crowded third-class compartment in a slow train on a railway which had better be nameless, and one of the passengers thought to beguile the tedium and relieve his feelings by descanting on the proverbial slowness of that particular train. "I've been travelling," he said slowly, "on this railway for twenty years now, and——" "Twenty 'ear," exclaimed an inexperienced lady, breaking in, "good gracious me! And what station did ye get on at?"

Mr. GEO. R. SIMS'
HAIR RENEWER.

Called by him "TATCHO."
Romany: "GENUINE," "GOOD," "TRUE.")

Now Mr. G. R. Sims, as many people know, is one of the busiest men in the kingdom, but hastily affixing his signature to a letter, he looked up and extended a characteristically cordial welcome. Then he said: "I will explain. I found that I was rapidly going bald. Not seriously, you understand, but the thinning out was sufficiently marked to set me thinking out a remedy. I went to two specialists, both of whom cheerfully assured me that I should be absolutely bald in two years.

"Then I discovered the preparation which is now placed upon the market. I found that I had hit upon a remedy capable of working wonders. Look at my hair now, isn't that convincing evidence of the value of my preparation.

"Ladies confirm my good opinion of it as a dressing for daily use. Mrs. Brown-Potter, whose beautiful hair is the admiration of the entire lady world, writes that she uses nothing but 'Tatcho.' There is nothing to prevent every woman from making her hair silken in texture and bountiful in volume, for she can obtain a bottle of 'Tatcho' now in every town or even village."

In order that the public may be able to test the superlative value of Mr. Geo. R. Sims' discovery, the Company is issuing large 4/6 size test bottles post free for 1/10, under plain cover, one of which may be had on application. Please cut off the corner of this advertisement where marked, and send with name and address, legibly written, to the—

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Mrs. Darnley-Smith, of Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, says: "Tablets have reduced me very much." Mrs. Crossley, of Rose Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

THE EDITOR'S PAGE.

DOUBTLESS by this time you are thoroughly interested in "The Golden Dwarf." Personally, I have rarely read so fascinating a novel, and those of my friends whom I have spoken to on the matter agree with me as to its merits. And scores of letters which I have received confirm the testimony.

Probably, in some remote corners of the country, there are people who are not reading it. I want to reach them—through you.

I want you to persuade your sister to read it, or your brother, or your wife, father, mother, uncle, aunt, sweetheart, neighbour, landlady, or lodger.

All will be delighted. And the beauty of it is, they can start it this week with the help of the specially-written summary of previous chapters. This fact is worth bearing in mind when you mention the tale to your friends.

BY the way, I shall be glad to hear from you regarding "The Golden Dwarf," and the other features of the paper. Anything you don't like, mention, and I will do my best to remedy the defect. It is your paper, and I am desirous of meeting your wishes in every possible manner. So drop me a line.

"MISS DOLLY" has been engaged to a man for two years, and he has now told her that he has been mistaken in his feelings towards her, and it is her younger sister whom he really loves. He asks her to forgive him the pain he has caused her, and says he will not speak to her sister until she has had time to give him his congé, and so behave as though she had tired of him. She feels very sore and miserable, and asks my advice as to the best thing to do.

Be a brave girl, "Miss Dolly," and show your lover that you, too, can be straightforward and honest, as he has been. Give him up, and in time you will see how far better it is that he should have told you how matters stood. Your sister need never know the real facts of the case, and you, I am sure—hardly as you have been treated—will be too sensible to wear your heart upon your sleeve.

A CORRESPONDENT sends me the following all the way from Yokohama:

Even the most gentlemanly of British burglars have much to learn from Japan in the way of politeness. Three men broke into a dyer's house while he was away, and gently asked his wife how much money there was in the house.

She answered that there was just twenty-four yen and eighty-four sen.

The robber laughed and said:

"You are a good old woman, and we believe you. If you were poor we would not rob you at all. Now, we only want a couple of kimono and this," laying his hand on a fine silk overdress.

The old woman replied:

"All my son's kimono I can give you, but I beg you will not take that, for it does not belong to my son, and was confided to us only for dyeing. What is ours I can give, but I cannot give what belongs to another."

"That is quite right," approved the robber, "and we will not take it."

"BILL-POSTER." — The largest amount ever paid for a single advertisement was the sum given by a jeweller for a model of the Eiffel Tower, which was ordered to be executed in diamonds as an advertisement. The model was complete, including the monumental fountain under the tower. This golden marvel, wrought by one of the most celebrated Parisian goldsmiths, is 20ft. high, and the fountain, of gold, seven to eight inches, the cost being £20,000.

The proprietors of an American patent medicine offered a subscription of £5,000 towards the gigantic Statue of Liberty at New York Harbour, provided they were allowed to affix an advertisement upon it for one year.

The largest advertisement in the world is that of the Glasgow News, cut in the shape of flower beds on the side of a hill, back of Ardenlee, Scotland. The words Glasgow News can be seen and plainly read at a distance of four miles; the length of each letter is 40ft., the total length of the line 323ft., and the area covered by the letters 14,845 square feet.

As to newspaper advertising, the biggest advertisement on record was that giving the signatures to a Conservative address to the King agreed to at a public meeting in London on December 23, 1834. The words amounted to nearly 6,000, and occupied twenty-four columns of The Times.

On October 16, 1860, the whole libretto of Macfarren's opera, "Robin Hood," was inserted in The Times as an advertisement, and occupied four and a half pages.

"AN ENQUIRER."—We occasionally get an excellent definition in an anagram; as, for example, when astronomers are described as "Moon-starers," and telegraphs as "Great helps." Old England is characterised as "Golden land," and Parliament said to be made up of "Partial men." Readers can probably tell me of others.

CHAPTER I.

PAPA GUILBERT.

EVERYONE knew Papa Guilbert, who kept the queer little poky curio store in the Petite Rue Trois Etoiles, at the back of the Palais Royal—everyone, that is, who took an interest in curios, and, of course, his immediate neighbours.

A queer little place it was, that shop of Papa Guilbert's. You went down three steps from the street, and the tall, handsome Englishman who came in one day, had to bend his curly head to pass through the low door.

He had stepped in in passing, and asked the price of several curios—two he bought. The prices of two or three more were beyond him, he said, smiling. Then he noticed—he had keen eyes, for it was not prominently forward—a bronze statuette of Persephone, and before Papa Guilbert knew what he was doing, he had it in his hand. It was an exquisite work of art—a gem. and the customer's handsome dark eyes glowed as he looked at it.

"What is the price?" he asked.

"One thousand francs, Monsieur."

The Englishman laughed, and shook his head. Beautiful though the figure was, the price was preposterous—and this was intentional. In truth, Papa Guilbert was in no hurry to sell the Persephone.

His daughter Jesuita had taken an immense fancy to it, and the old man was torn between his love for her and his desire of gain—gain which was mainly for her, though, perhaps, some of that strange, miser love of bald acquisition found also a place in his heart. He had scanned the Englishman when the latter entered the shop, and noticed the outward signs of a wealthy customer.

Monsieur looked an aristocrat, was extremely well dressed, wore a diamond ring, but when he rejected one article because it was three hundred francs, another because it was two hundred and fifty francs, Papa Guilbert perceived that, despite his air of distinction, his faultless apparel, and his diamond ring, he was not a rich "milord," and therefore he named a prohibitory price for the Persephone.

The customer put down the statuette.

"You take me for a rich man Papa Guilbert," he said, laughingly; "but I am only a poor dramatist. Eh, bien! I will do without the Queen of Hades."

He gathered up the few comparative trifles he had bought, bade the old curio dealer "adieu!" and departed.

Half-an-hour later Jesuita came in from a rehearsal, and Papa Guilbert told her about the tall foreigner who wanted to buy Persephone.

The handsome Englishman came again two or three days later and had quite a chat with Papa Guilbert, and asked the prices of several articles of interest; but he only bought a curious little sixteenth century crucifix, which was comparatively cheap because it was a little damaged.

"Adieu, Papa Guilbert," he said as he was leaving; "or, I hope, au revoir. I am off to Italy this afternoon."

Nevertheless, Papa Guilbert thought he saw the stranger that evening. He passed the shop, crossed the road and disappeared down a court nearly opposite—a not very reputable place, so perhaps the old man was mistaken. But, then, what would you? Who knows where a man may go?

Still, it was nearly dark, and Papa Guilbert's sight was not what it once was. He only thought he saw the Englishman—he was not sure; but he had told Jesuita about ce beau monsieur coming again and chatting with him, and when she paused to bid him good-bye on her way to the theatre, he said:

"I think I saw Monsieur l'Anglais just now."

"Then he is not gone to Italy," said the dancer, laughing. "Au revoir, chéri!"—and away she went.

Then old Marthe, the charwoman, bade her master au revoir, and trotted off to her own dwelling, and Papa Guilbert was left alone.

The shop did not close until quite an hour later, and there were no shutters put up, the window being defended by a close iron cage-work.

Jesuita, when she came in from the theatre, let herself in with a key, and barred up the door behind her.

It was just on twelve when Jesuita returned home to-night. There was a smile on her pretty lips as she put her key in the lock—a funny incident had occurred at the theatre, with which she would make her father laugh, and the smile deepened, as she pictured the old man's enjoyment of the joke.

She opened the door. "Me voici," she began. Then, with a choking cry: "Chéri—chéri!" she flung herself down by the dark form lying prostrate on the floor, and lifted the grey head on her arm.

Even in the dim light she could see that the old man was dead. She felt his face—it was already cold; the lines were settling into rigidity. She felt his heart—there was not the faintest throb; and as she withdrew her hand, she saw that it was covered with blood.

Blood! Then her father had been murdered! Half frantic with grief and horror, yet preserving a singular presence of mind, the girl sprang to her feet, and turned up the light that she might see more clearly.

Yes, Papa Guilbert had been stabbed to the heart. His shirt and vest were saturated with blood, but the wound was not large. There was scarcely any blood on the floor.

Murder! Who could have done it? For robbery, of course!

But Jesuita cared nothing for that; she thought only of her father. He could not be dead—he could not!

She pressed her warm young lips passionately to the cold lips that could give no response, that would never speak again; then she rose once more, to go for the doctor.

On his arrival Dr. Simon saw in a moment that he could do nothing.

"My poor child!" he said, looking up to the agonised young face, "your father has been dead more than two hours. He has been murdered—stabbed to the heart. He could not have lived more than two seconds."

"I will find out who has done it, and kill him!" said the girl, fiercely, the fiery Spanish blood leaping in her veins, flashing in her splendid dark eyes.

"We must not move him," said the doctor, "until the police have been."

The motive of the robbery was clear. The till had been rifled, though of how much could not yet be known and some of the curios had been taken also, as would appear from others being knocked over, as if the thief had been hurried in his work.

CHAPTER II.

MISSING.

THE next day Jesuita was taken before the commissaire.

She was able to answer questions now, and to tell what she knew. Indeed, a strange, stony calm seemed to have taken possession of her—as if she had wept away last night all power of weeping.

She was as white as marble; but her beauty looked all the more pathetic for her grief, and even the commissaire—few people are less sentimental—was deeply moved when he questioned her.

Well, she knew little enough. She could not tell how much was taken from the till, she did not know what was in it.

She mentioned two curios that she missed, but she had only a limited knowledge of the stock, she was busy with her own profession. She was never in the shop, knew of no one likely to rob her father. She testified to his habits and those of the household generally; had not seen anyone about last night when she went to the theatre.

Then she was questioned about her own life.

Had she any lover?

She flushed at the question, but answered it quietly.

"No—no one."

The police spoke to the same end. Mlle. Jesuita had led a blameless life.

Old Marthe was examined, but could throw no light on the matter. The sergent de ville had noticed no suspicious character in the street.

Other witnesses were called with a like result. Nothing had been seen to excite suspicion. In truth, the crime was, in itself, commonplace enough; the only wonder was that Papa Guilbert had not been murdered long ago, when you came to think how easy it was, with that disreputable alley, too, opposite, to run down and hide oneself.

The old dealer's stock was sold, and the proceeds and the money he had saved made pretty Mlle. Jesuita quite a well-off young lady. She received (though she was not yet sixteen) many offers of marriage. The management of the Opera offered to double her salary, and the management of the Eden wanted her as première danseuse; the double attraction of her beauty and of her father having been murdered would be quite a "boom" for the management.

But Mlle. Jesuita turned a deaf ear to all offers, legitimate or otherwise, and disappeared from Paris; but within a year she came back and entered herself as a pupil of the Conservatoire, where she speedily became a favourite scholar, and carried off the first prize in tragedy.

But why had Jesuita Yvetot kept back from the police what she had heard about the handsome Englishman who came to the shop twice, and the second time bought a mere trifle, but chatted with Papa Guilbert?—the man, who, though he was a gentleman and dressed well and wore a diamond ring, had not much money; who, though he said he was going to Italy in the afternoon, was seen near the shop in the evening, and went down a very shady street. There might not be anything suspicious in all this—or there might be. Jesuita could not have forgotten it, surely? and certainly she could not have forgotten that she missed the Bronze Persephone; but she kept that to herself, too.

CHAPTER III.

MLLE. SAINT LYS.

"I HATE matinées," said the dramatist, laying down his cigarette, and leaning back in his chair.

He was a tall, slightly built, decidedly handsome man, with curly, dark hair and moustache, brilliant dark eyes, and finely-cut features; but, despite the grey on his temples, he did not look more than two or three and thirty.

"Naturally enough," said the young man—an ordinary-looking man of the journalistic type, to whom the above remark was made; "but you might come to this one."

"What's the attraction of this one, Clement?"

"This new girl—the French girl—Mlle. Saint Lys."

"Oh, yes!—I remember. I forgot for the minute whether she was playing in to-day's matinée, or Thomson's next week. But, my dear boy, you know as well as I do, what these 'new people' generally are. This girl isn't an amateur, certainly. She's a trained artist—has played in Paris—why didn't she stop there if she's so good?—but she isn't likely to compensate for sitting out a stupid piece."

"They say she's awfully good-looking."

"The new people always are," replied the other cynically; "and if she really is beautiful, she is so much more likely to act badly; the beauties generally do. However," he said rising, "I'll come with you, and if your Mlle. Saint Lys is a fraud, I'll hold you responsible."

"Very well," said Clement laughing, and Caerlyon went off to change his coat.

He joined his friend in a few minutes, and the two walked across to the Vaudeville where the matinée was. Caerlyon's chambers were in Adelphi.

The beginning of the first act promised fairly; towards the end Mlle. Saint Lys made her appearance. She had not what dramatists call an "effective" entrance, though she was playing the principal part in the piece. No matter, she made her own effect, without any aid from stage craft. She was young, she was beautiful, she was charming, she was an artist.

Clement said, "by Jove!" under his breath, and looked at Caerlyon. Other people, the men especially, applauded. It was spontaneous—the newcomer was so handsome, so altogether out of the common; but

Hazel Harlow's stage career will fascinate you.

Caerlyon said nothing, and didn't applaud, he drew in his breath silently; he was moved to something more than admiration, but Clement saw only the admiration, and whispered, "What do you think of her, eh?"

Caerlyon half smiled. He didn't feel as if he could criticise just yet. He was of impassioned, emotional temperament, as an artist should be; and the face of that girl on the stage had touched deeper chords than calm criticism could reach; but he was the last man to give out the sound of those chords, being, as regarded his own inner life, intensely reserved. So he said:

"She is very beautiful. Her face would make her fortune, even if she couldn't act."

"You make sure she can act, then?"

"Of course. There's brain as well as heart and soul there."

The actress swept the scene and the audience along with her, whirled them up on the top of her passion, and made them weep with her pathos; it was verily a making of bricks with a modicum of straw, if not altogether without straw. The triumph was the artist's, not the dramatist's, and it was a complete triumph.

"Are you going round to be introduced to Mlle. Saint Lys?" asked Clement, as they rose.

"No, thanks. There'll be a dozen press men bowing and smirking about her. I'll keep my illusion for a little while."

Mlle. Saint Lys had an offer from a London manager the same day; it was not a big part—there was none such open, but it was worth playing, and she accepted it. She was to attend a rehearsal the next day at two o'clock.

She sat in her apartment the morning after the matinée and read the daily papers. She had taken rooms in Bloomsbury-square, because they were large and old-fashioned, and near the Strand. All the notices praised her—her beauty, her talents, her "sympathetic charm;" all prophesied for her a great future. She laid the last down and covered her face, the hot tears fell through her fingers.

"How proud and happy chéri would have been!" she whispered. "How he would have taken me to his heart and kissed me, and that would have made me happier than all that the whole world can say of me!" Then she lifted her face; a change had come over it—it looked stern and resolute, almost pitiless. "But I will never rest, father," she said, as if addressing a living being, her eyes gazed upwards, "until I have found your murderer and avenged you. I am here—in London—at last. Shall I find him? Is he the guilty man—the Englishman? How shall I know him? It seems so hopeless." She dropped her head in her hands again. "And yet I cannot help hoping. I know I shall one day find him. He said he was a dramatist; but that might not be true. He was tall and handsome —a dark man, and spoke perfect French; those are guides. But then, he may be innocent—perfectly innocent. Still, I shall find who is guilty, and I will not spare him. It is my right to avenge my father. Our Lady will help me to find his murderer."

CHAPTER IV.

MEETING.

"Is Mr. Darley here?" asked Caerlyon at the stage door of the Ionic Theatre.

"Yes, sir; he's on the stage, I think."

"A rehearsal?"

"Yes, sir."

Caerlyon went on, and in a minute was on the stage; and the first person he saw, coming out of the light into the semi-darkness, was Jesuita Saint Lys. She was standing by a table in the centre of the stage, going through a scene with the villain of the piece, of course reading her part. Darley, the manager of the theatre, was standing near the "T" piece with the stage-manager. A few other artists were standing about the wings, two or three looking sulky; actors hate to be called down to rehearse a piece they know backwards and forwards, just for the sake of a new comer.

Caerlyon's business was with the manager; but he paused at the side, waiting until the scene was over, and he was not sorry, for his own sake, to do so. It was something more than pleasure to watch Mlle. Saint Lys; but Darley saw him, and went up to him at once.

"You've lost no time," said Caerlyon, as they shook hands.

"No, indeed. I'm lucky, I take it; the town will go wild over her. I'll introduce you in a minute. She's reading the part charmingly. Did you want me, old fellow?"

"Only about that front piece; there's no hurry. I'll look on at the rehearsal."

"All right. The scene's over now. Come and be introduced. Mlle. Saint Lys——!" as they went forward; the girl turned, and glanced up in the dark, handsome face of the tall man by Darley's side.

"Mr. Caerlyon," said the manager, "I daresay you know his name. He speaks French as well as you do, and Castilian also."

The simple words sent a strange, swift shock to the girl's heart. Yes; she knew Caerlyon's name. She had seen a one-act piece of his abroad, which she had admired as a gem; and here he was before her—the dramatist, who spoke a Frenchman's French; who was tall and handsome, with dark eyes and dark, curly hair. Surely this was the man who came to the little shop in the Petite Rue Trois Etoiles! But an assassin—with that face, that mien! Impossible! Just a moment was the change in her face—a startled and pained look in the large eyes, which Caerlyon noticed and wondered at; then she held out her hand frankly, and said, in her pretty English:

"Of course, I know your name, Mr. Caerlyon. I saw a play of yours—in Berlin—and liked it so much."

"You are very good to say so, Mlle. Saint Lys. And what shall I say of your performance yesterday?"

"Pretty things—naturally—to my face," said she, with demure gravity. "What else?"

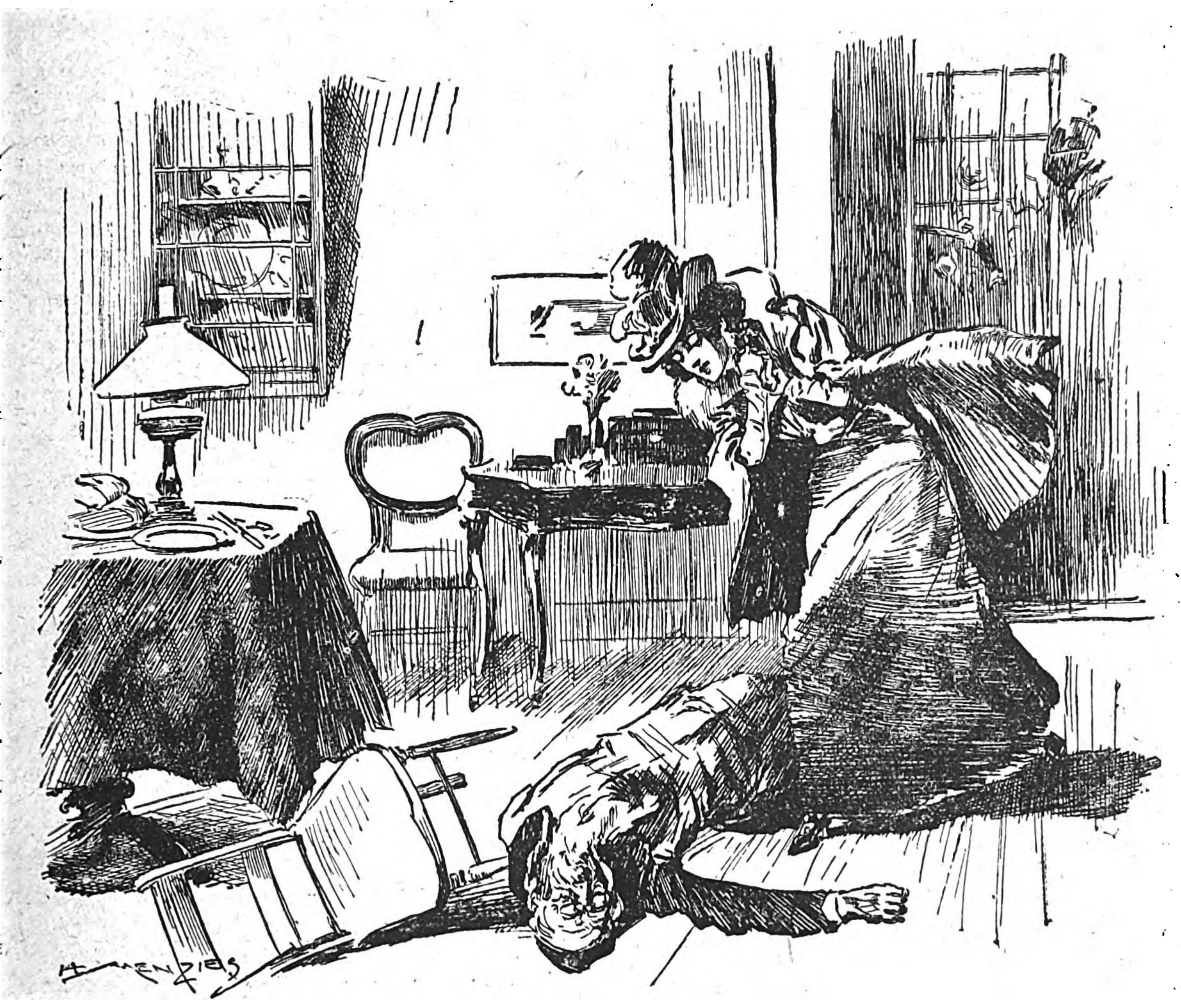
"To your face—or to anyone," he answered. "Only 'pretty things' won't cover the ground. I mean to say that I was simply charmed. You have your future in your own hands."

"You really think that?" said the young actress, with an earnestness, a manifest belief in the value of his judgment, which was clearly genuine.

"Don't you know it yourself?" Caerlyon said, smiling at her naïveté, marvelling how she had kept it till now, how long she would retain it.

"Not fully," she replied, with a touch of perplexity on her mobile features. "I feel so distrustful of myself, often."

"You have no cause to be, believe me; though some self-distrust is good for an artist. I must not detain



Then, with a choking cry, she flung herself down by the dark form lying prostrate on the floor.

you now. Perhaps I may have the pleasure of seeing you again when the rehearsal is over."

He bowed and turned away, and Jesuita went back to her work with a tumult of emotion in her heart.

Caerlyon got through his business with Darley during the rehearsal, and by that time it was over, and the dramatist went up to Jesuita again and walked with her out into the Strand. There they paused.

"I must run home to study," the girl said. "I play to-morrow night."

"I shall come and see you," Caerlyon said.

"The first night? I shall be nervous."

"Never mind; you will play well, all the same. Can I put you in a cab?"

"Thanks so much."

A hansom cab was near; the driver had his "weather eye" on the well-dressed couple, so it was only for Caerlyon to hand his beautiful young companion into the vehicle.

"What address?" he said, as she gave him her hand.

"99A, Bloomsbury Square. A thousand thanks, Mr. Caerlyon."

Then he released her, and, lifting his hat, turned away and gave the address to the driver.

The cab drove off, and Caerlyon walked to his chambers in Adelphi. He had work to do that afternoon, but he could not get on with it. Jesuita's face was between him and the paper; her words—all she had said, trivial or not—kept repeating themselves in his mind; the touch of her hand lingered in his.

He met the young artist on Sunday, at Darley's house. The rooms were crowded, and Jesuita was surrounded. Everybody wanted to speak to her, and Caerlyon at first made no attempt to get near her. Presently there was a break, and Caerlyon made his way to Jesuita's side. She turned and gave him her hand, with a bright smile.

You've spoken to your friends about "The Golden Dwarf," of course?

"I saw you when you came in, Mr. Caerlyon," she said, "but you were talking to someone at the time."

"And I," he said, "have been waiting my opportunity to get near you. But let me find you a seat. Have you had any tea or coffee?"

"Oh, yes, thanks."

Caerlyon found seats; they were somewhat out of the way of the crowd, and for that reason had perhaps, hitherto escaped observation, but they were so much the more attractive to Caerlyon; and Jesuita would have been quite content to spend the rest of the afternoon in his company. She did feel flattered, or rather, happy, that this gifted, brilliant man singled her out, as it were. Of course she knew she was beautiful, and that all men liked the society of a beautiful woman; but Caerlyon talked to her as if she had brains, and not merely a huge capacity for swallowing compliments.

"I am afraid," he said, as they rose, "that I have been playing the part of usurper. You must do your best to forgive me—mercifully considering the temptation."

"But, then, I have nothing to forgive, Monsieur," said the girl, "but a great deal to be grateful for!"

"Grateful?"

"Why yes. You have made the time pass so pleasantly, and it is so good of you to talk to me."

"Is it?" Caerlyon said, with a slight smile. "I think—if I am good at all—it is in resigning you to others."

A faint colour crossed the girl's cheek, but she laughed. "I prefer it my way," she said, as they moved slowly towards the principal room—they had been sitting in the back drawing-room.

"Very well," returned Caerlyon quietly, "I hope you will let me have the pleasure of calling upon you one day, Mlle. Saint Lys."

"I shall be very pleased, Monsieur. By-and-bye I must have an 'At Home' day; but I think I shall be at home in the afternoons for the present. I might have to be out——"

"Never mind, I must take my chance, and call again if you are out."

Then they mingled with the crowd, and Caerlyon did not speak to Jesuita alone during the remainder of the afternoon.

CHAPTER V.

A GIFT.

"MLLE. SAINT LYS!"

It was two days later, and Caerlyon and the actress came face to face in a street off Soho; she was just emerging from the low-browed shop of a curio-dealer. There was a flash of something more than pleasure in his dark eyes as he held out his hand; in hers, for a second, that odd, strained look he had noticed at their first meeting, and noticed again now; but it passed, and she smiled, giving him her hand over which his closed fast and close.

"Who would think of meeting you here?" he added smiling. "How did you find your way to such an out-of-the-way place?"

"I make inquiries and find out things!" she said. "I am fond of curios—but there was nothing in that shop I cared for."

"So you prowl about Soho, curio-hunting! Is that it?"

"Sometimes. I used to poke about among the curio shops in Paris. Do you care for such things?"

The question was put with a purpose; her eyes went to his face as she asked it.

"I don't know that I do care very much," he answered; something in the tone—or was it her fancy?—implied, "not now!" He added, almost directly:

"Am I detaining you? Where are you going—if I may ask?"

"To a curio shop in Greek Street—and then home."

"May I escort you to this curio shop?"

"Will you? That will be a great pleasure."

So they walked on to Greek Street, and at the door of the shop Jesuita paused.

"You will not come in?" she said. "I shall tire out your patience!"

"You could not!" he said, his hand on the door, and something in look and tone brought a quick throb to the girl's heart. "I will come in—if I may?"

"Oh, yes," she said, a little hurriedly, "only I was afraid you might be bored."

"There is no danger of that."

He opened the door and they entered the shop.

Jesuita certainly looked the stock well over, but she bought two or three things which were tolerably expensive, so the dealer had no cause of complaint, and Caerlyon stood watching her, and wishing he could buy any and all these things she admired, and give them to her.

"I shall have finished in a minute," Jesuita said, turning to her cavalier.

She had been rummaging at the opposite side of the shop.

"I am in no hurry for you to finish," said Caerlyon smiling. "I shall be sorry when you have done so."

She did not answer that, but bent over some things on the counter.

The dealer brought out a small, curiously-chased silver bowl.

"A gem, miss," he said. "It is from Spain—you see—underneath—the name and date—one hundred years old—and so beautiful! Only five pounds—that is very cheap."

Jesuita looked wistfully at the curio. She could see it was genuine; she knew a great deal about such matters, from her father; but she shook her head.

"No," she said. "I have enough for to-day. Put the things up, please."

"And the bowl with them," said Caerlyon, taking out his pocket-book. Jesuita flushed, and spoke in a quick undertone, in Castilian:

"Señor! you must not!—indeed, you must not!"

"You cannot deny me so small a pleasure!" he said softly, in the same language; and he gave a five-pound note to the delighted dealer.

"Ah, Señor!—it is so good of you!—but you take me at a disadvantage! What can I say?"

He laughed a little then.

"Is it unfair to snatch happiness when one can?" he said. "There is not too much of it in this world, is there?"

"And you give me some of what there is!" said Jesuita. "I don't know how to thank you!"

"You have done it—if thanks are needed—full measure, well pressed down."

He took the package from the dealer, and they went out into the street.

"Is it home now?" Caerlyon added. "Let me drive you up. I have almost to pass your door."

"The Adventures of an Actress" are coming. See Editor's Page.

That was an elastic way of putting it. His destination was a good bit wide of Bloomsbury-square; but Jesuita could not suggest that, even if she suspected it. He handed her into a cab, and took his place beside her, devoutly wishing that Bloomsbury was ten miles off instead of one, and that he could tell the cabby not to drive so fast! He asked Jesuita if she would be at home to-morrow afternoon, and she answered, yes.

"Then I will give myself the pleasure of calling," he said, "if convenient."

"Oh, yes!—quite convenient!" and then the cab stopped, and he sprang out and handed her down.

"And I must thank you again for that dear, old bowl!" she said, her hand in his.

"You honour me infinitely by accepting it," said Caerlyon; unconsciously his clasp tightened as he spoke.

Jesuita put down her treasures tenderly on the drawing-room table—the tenderness was for the silver bowl. Her lips were parted, in a half-dreamy smile; a strange, sweet tremor was thrilling through her veins. How happy she had been that morning, and she had not dreamed of being so; and to-morrow again!—and then, athwart the golden haze, rose a shadow—the vision of the little, dark, old-fashioned shop in the Palais Royal, and a dark, handsome man standing there, as he had stood in the shop to-day. Did he remember? Why should he? Yet—the tone in which he had answered the question. Did he care for curios? Oh, but what frightful thoughts to have of him! Noble, chivalrous, tender! What then? Was she at a deadlock?

"If I could only find the Bronze Persephone," she said, inwardly.

CHAPTER VI.

"JESUITA."

THE next two days Jesuita spent among the curio shops; the third she had to commence rehearsing for the matinée, for she found the part to be a good one, and the piece was far better than that in which she had made her London début.

She met Caerlyon as she came out from rehearsal, and they walked down the Strand together, she telling him about the play; and when they parted, he asked her if she had seen the piece at the St. James's—it was very good.

"Why don't you go on Saturday?" he added.

"Not this Saturday," said Jesuita. "I am going to see your play."

"You have seats?"

"Yes; I was going to write for them, but the stage-manager at the Ionic gave them to me."

"Do you know," said Caerlyon gravely, "you are treating me very badly? You were going to write for seats to the theatre—instead of asking me!"

"Monsieur! You are so kind already—and you must have so many people troubling you; it would be like an impertinence for me——"

"Hush! child; don't talk so!" Caerlyon interrupted in quick pain. "I can't bear it! Yes. I know how you felt; only, if you had asked me! Well, never mind"—as her colour rose and her eyes dropped—"I mustn't scold you here—in the Strand. Who are you going with on Saturday?"

"With Miss Morton, at the Ionic."

"You have asked her?"

"No, monsieur; I shall ask her to-night."

"Please, don't! Be very good to me! Let me take her place?"

The girl glanced up, under her long lashes, with a kind of flash in her dark eyes, a sort of quiver on her whole face; her heart spoke for her before her lips answered: "I shall be so pleased, monsieur!"

"Will you? Thank you so much! Then I will call for you. You can give away the seats you have; they won't be needed."

Then they separated, and Jesuita went home, walking in a haze of rainbow tints. And on Saturday—this was Thursday—Caerlyon came in a hansom, and they drove down to the theatre, where Caerlyon led his young companion to a grand tier box.

Unlike most authors, he had no particular pleasure in seeing his own plays; but he wanted to know what she thought of this one. For himself, all his pleasure was centred in her.

And Jesuita certainly enjoyed the play the more because Ernest Caerlyon had written it, though it would have delighted her whoever wrote it.

He leant back, watching covertly every change of the mobile features, as she followed, with absorbed interest, the action of the opening scene, and when the act-drop fell, she turned and met his smile.

"Oh, monsieur," she said with glowing eyes, "I like it so much!"

"I knew that, by your face," he said softly. "I am so glad—so glad that you like my work!"

In the second act, the interest, as it should do, deepened, and it closed in a powerful and pathetic scene.

Jesuita flung all her dramatic soul into the scene. Her lips trembled, her dark eyes burned, filled with tears; her colour went and came. She was as much excited as if she looked on reality; and Caerlyon, in the shadow, held his breath as he looked at her. And had she, in her profound interest in the play, forgotten him? Or was there a subtle sense of his presence, shedding—though she might not know it—its own glory on that scene on the stage?

She sat quite still when the curtain had gone down, too deeply stirred for word or movement, and Caerlyon knew far too well in himself what such emotions are, to break through the spell that was on her. But when she turned with a tremulous smile on her lips, but her eyes not meeting his full, he smiled too.

"You couldn't say more," he said, in that soft, almost caressing tone, "with any words your tongue could utter."

She shook her head.

"No," she answered in a half whisper, and paused.

"It is hard," he said in the same tone, "to come back to the everyday world."

"Yes." She spoke in a half-dreamy way. "Only—I don't seem to have come back—yet."

The curtain rose on the third act almost directly afterwards; but for a little while Jesuita did not know what went on on the stage.

When the act-drop fell, Caerlyon said nothing for a few minutes. The girl, too, was silent; her heart was beating fast; she had no power to break the silence that was so sweet, yet that, in a way, frightened her.

Then Caerlyon spoke in his gentle way. How did she like the heroine's part?

"A glorious part!" she said, half turning to him then.

Hazel Harlow's stage career will fascinate you.

"And you would play it gloriously," he answered; "but you are too young, that is all; you could not look a woman of thirty."

Jesuita flushed and caught her breath. Praise from him was incense indeed. All other praise seemed poor and worthless beside it. Would he, perhaps, one day write her a part? She dared not ask him now.

Caerlyon drove her back home. He would not relinquish her until he was compelled to do so, and on the way asked her if she was very busy just now. She answered, yes. To-morrow she must study her part in the matinée piece—a long part—for it was only ten days to the performance; the lady who was to have played had fallen ill; and there were the rehearsals and dresses to see to. Caerlyon bit his lip, but said, quietly:

"Well, I must try, in spite of all, to see you soon again. If you are too busy to see me, you must send me away."

"I couldn't do that," she said, in a low voice. "In a few days I shall have more time, perhaps."

A few days! A day seemed cruelly long to him—dividing him from Jesuita! But he said nothing of this, for the cab stopped just then, and so they must part. Jesuita knew he could not come in, for he had told her he had an appointment at twenty minutes past six, and it was six now, so they said good-bye on the step. It was a very close clasp he gave her hand.

"It is so hard," he said, in a sort of suppressed way, "to say good-bye, even for a little time. Au revoir"—he bent lower—"Jesuita!"

He dropped her hand, and turned away.

CHAPTER VII.

The Story of Persephone.

Hard to say good-bye—hard, indeed, for Jesuita, as for Ernest Caerlyon; hard to go down to the theatre and play; and, oh! hardest of all to study, with that soft, half-passionate "Jesuita" in her ears, in her heart; while she lived over again all that time of exquisite happiness with him, and wanted only to give herself up to dreaming—to bathe in "the light that never was on land or sea."

"He loves me—he loves me!" kept throbbing in her heart; and lines grew blurred and confused, and would not range themselves in her memory. How could they, when all that Caerlyon had said yesterday took their place? It took Jesuita longer to get part of the first act of that part in her head than to learn a whole play at any other time.

There was a rehearsal on Monday morning, but it was over before one—the stage was wanted for someone else and Jesuita took her way, before returning home, to a curio shop in Wardour Street, of which she had incidentally heard at the theatre,

The dealer had an immense collection, and Jesuita at once professed her liking for bronzes, of which she had seen several in the window and in the shop. The dealer, a French Jew, was ready to display his best wares; the lady was handsomely dressed—she evidently did not mind spending money.

"If mademoiselle will come upstairs," he said, presently, "I have some lovely bronzes."

And he led her up to a fair-sized room on the first-floor, where there were bronzes galore.

She looked at gods and goddesses, horses, stags, Jacoöons and saints, lamps and inkstands; and suddenly she caught her breath, and went white to the lips.

The dealer, moving some things to get at something he wanted to show her, was beginning, "Here, mademoiselle, is something——" But looked up at a movement from the customer, and saw that she had a little statuette in her hand, and was looking at it intently.

"This—Persephone!" she said—she spoke quietly, lifting her eyes—"how much is it?"

"That, mademoiselle—ah! that is a gem—twenty pounds. I could not take less. That is quite a bargain."

"I will have it," she said. She felt as if something were gripping her round the heart. She had found it at last—by a mere chance, as it seemed—the bronze Persephone! And now what would be the end? She almost shrank from asking the question that quivered on her tongue, yet it must be asked. She spoke with an effort, though it was not apparent. "Do you mind telling me who sold you this statuette, and how long you have had it?"

The man looked at her a little curiously.

"Mademoiselle knows the statuette?"

"Yes—it belonged once to a friend of mine—he must have sold it. I should like, if I can, to know to whom. There is no harm."

"Oh! mademoiselle, no. I have had it—it is now nearly nine months. A gentleman sold it to me."

"You can describe him?"

Her heart was throbbing heavily.

"Oh, yes. He was a man you would notice—very handsome, tall, with dark hair, curly hair and moustache—no beard or whiskers. And very distinguished looking."

Ernest Caerlyon! What could it mean? The description was the same Papa Guilbert had given! If Caerlyon had bought the statuette of anyone, he would not have sold it again. Yet there was scarcely a pause before Jesuita spoke again.

"Would you know this gentleman again?"

"Yes."

He looked interested. Was there some romance connected with the Persephone?

Jesuita drew out a photograph of Caerlyon, which she had bought in a shop—there was no name under it. She held it before the man.

"Yes," he said at once; "that is the gentleman who sold me the statuette."

"Thank you. Ah! then I understand," the girl said, with admirable self-control.

She gave the dealer the bronze to wrap up for her, and paid him for it in notes, taking her treasure with her. He whole soul was in a tumult. She could not believe Caerlyon an assassin; but how had the Persephone come into his possession? That could be accounted for, if it were not for his having sold it. He was not a needy man—nine months ago he was well off; he was a lover of art; he had wanted to buy this very statuette. Why should he sell it, and for what must have been to him a paltry sum?

If he bought it, it would not be to sell it again; if it was a gift, so much the more would he be bound to keep it. He knew something—he must know something—of the murder of Guilbert Yvetot.

Torturing thoughts, memories, came to the girl, to be hurled back with horror; but suspense, uncertainty, was unendurable—she must find out the truth. All that night she lay awake, every pulse in her body beating, her brain on fire.

What was she to do? How probe this mystery? And gradually thought shaped itself from an idea, essentially dramatic, that sprang to her mind.

"He knows the truth," she said to herself, her lips parched, her eyes burning. "He shall tell me, or I will never see him again—and he loves me! Though I should break my heart I will avenge my father!"

There was no rehearsal to-day. She would anticipate any chance of Caerlyon calling in the afternoon. She wrote a brief letter to him:

DEAR MR. CAERLYON,

Can I see you to-day, if possible, on a matter of business? Shall I call upon you, or will you call here—any time in the afternoon? Please forgive me for troubling you.

Yours faithfully,
JESUITA SAINT LYS.

That letter puzzled Caerlyon not a little. It seemed somehow—and yet he could hardly tell why—a strange letter for Jesuita to write to him, especially after all that had passed between them on Saturday; but he telegraphed that he would be with her by three o'clock, and waited with what patience he might, torturing himself, as lovers are wont to do, with all manner of fears and conjectures.

And to Jesuita the time of waiting was far more terrible. How would Caerlyon meet her—how would she meet him? It is so useless thinking of such things in these crises of our lives, and yet we always do it, and never by any chance act as we imagined we should do.

Jesuita started with a rush of almost sickening emotion, as she heard a cab stop outside. But she did not move from where she stood, near the window. She heard the door close, steps on the stairs, then the room door opened, and the servant said, "Mr. Caerlyon," and he was in the room. She turned then, and went forward to meet him, but something in her face checked the almost passionate words on his tongue, though he caught her hand in both his.

"Jesuita!" he said, involuntarily, "what is it—what has happened?"

"What should have happened?" She drew her hand away. "Please sit down, I wanted to—to ask you something."

"Ask me what you will, only don't speak to me like that. Jesuita, I——"

He would have taken her hand again, but she drew back.

"No, no!" she said, almost vehemently. "Let me speak to you first—it is an idea I have."

She swept her hand over her forehead.

"Will you sit down, please?"

Caerlyon looked at her sorely perplexed, as well he might be, his cheek paling. What strange mood was this? But he must for the present yield to it.

He did not sit down, but drew back to the mantelpiece, leaning on it.

Jesuita sat down in a low chair opposite. It was better like this, she felt, then if he was more on a level with her.

She bent her head, clasping her hands round her knee.

"I have been thinking," she began, "what you said on Saturday, about that part; and you have told me before that I could do anything. Well, I wanted to ask you if—if you would write me a play."

"Is that all?" said Caerlyon, with a quick indrawn breath; and yet he felt, in his heart, it was not all. "You only anticipate me; it is what I long to do, what I mean to do."

"Yes—yes!" she said hurriedly. "But I want a play written partly on my own idea—a story, at least, part of a story, that I have in my mind—and you might not like to do that."

"I would do anything for you that it is possible to do," said Caerlyon, more and more puzzled, yet resolved to let this scene, as he would have put it dramatically, "play itself out." "What is the story?"

"It is fragmentary—of course, it would need working out. I can only give the opening idea ——"

"Yes—go on!"

She caught in his tone the strain of suspense, and it made her task yet more difficult; but she obeyed, speaking hurriedly:

"The story should open with a murder!" she did not lift her head; she dared not look at Caerlyon—"an old man is discovered dead—stabbed to the heart! It is in France—in Paris; the old man is a dealer in curios—works of art, and so on. He lives a blameless life; there seems no motive for the crime ——"

"A rather melodramatic idea!" said Caerlyon, calmly, as she paused. "Yes?"

"Suspicion, of course, points to the hero," Jesuita went on, "who is—guiltless. But he has been to the shop; he has asked the price of certain things and has not been able to buy, saying, at any rate, that he could not afford them. On another occasion he has called and talked for some time with the old man, seemingly to find out when he was likely to be alone. On the night of the murder ——"

She stopped, for Caerlyon had made an involuntary movement then. Her eyes crept upwards to his face; it was bent down, shaded by his hand; but something about it gave her a sense of tension in the man. Her breath failed her for a moment. Caerlyon broke the pause.

"Are you speaking," he said, in a quiet, level voice, "of some real case?"

"One might think of such things," the girl answered.

"Oh! yes. Go on from where you stopped."

"On that night," she said, "the old man had seen the man who is accused of the murder; but the man is not taken at the time. There is a clue of which only one person knew at the time——"

"What person?"

"Why, naturally, the heroine. The till has been robbed and several objects of art stolen; among them is one which is not mentioned to the police or to anyone——"

She stopped again.

"What is it?" Caerlyon said, without moving.

"A little bronze statuette of Persephone."

She rose as she spoke, stretching out her hand to a little table near her. For a second her eyes met Caerlyon's full; his face was ashen white, even his lips are bloodless.

"And who," he said, slowly—the words came in a hoarse whisper—"who is the heroine?"

"Guilbert Yvetot's daughter—and the bronze Persephone is here."

She placed it on the mantelpiece before him. He looked at it—at her.

"Great heaven!" he said, under breath, and as he moved, staggered slightly. He caught the back of a chair near him, and dropped into it, covering his face. There was a minute's deathly silence. Then Jesuita made a step towards him; he lifted his face.

"Do you think," he said slowly, "that I am guilty?"

She flung herself on her knees at his feet.

"No! no!" she broke out, almost wildly. "Not that! never that! But you know who is guilty! Tell me who it is—tell me!"

Caerlyon took her hands in his, holding them fast.

"The man is beyond your vengeance," he said, "beyond all vengeance. He is dead."

"Dead?" She looked into the speaker's agonised face. "Dead!" she repeated. "But who—who?"

"My brother!"

He dropped her hands, and rose; the girl started to her feet with a smothered cry.

"Your brother!" she repeated. Her hand was at her throat; she felt choking. She sank down in the fauteuil, trembling like a leaf.

Caerlyon made a step nearer to her.

"I only knew it when he was dying," he said. "He sent for me and confessed his crime. I'll keep back nothing from you now. You shall know the whole truth; you have a right to know it."

He was close to her now; she did not shrink from him. He sank to his knee by her side.

"Jesuita," he said passionately, "is there blood between us? Does my brother's sin part us?"

"Darling! No! no! You are guiltless!"

She turned to him, and as he gathered her to his breast, wrapping her close, she clung to his neck sobbing.

"My love! my love!" Caerlyon said brokenly, and again and again his quivering lips pressed hers, she giving herself up to him in perfect faith, in love that never questioned or doubted.

By-and-bye, when both had grown a little calmer, Caerlyon spoke again, very low and tenderly, caressing the dear head laid on his heart.

"Dearest, let me tell you now that terrible story! Can you bear to hear it?"

"Yes," she whispered. "Tell me; but, oh! how you have suffered!"

"Suffered——!" He broke off and bowed his head for a moment on hers. "But if you had turned from me," he went on after a pause, "I could not have endured—I could not. Jesuita, look into my eyes—let yours tell me. There is no shrinking in your heart from me for that hideous wrong to you?"

"You know it," she said passionately, "you know it!" But she lifted her eyes to his, and all her soul went out to him in the look he met.

Then he told her that miserable story of how the bronze Persephone came into his possession.

"My brother Bernard," he said, "two years younger than I, was always an idler and a profligate. There were only he and I—no other brothers or sisters. In our youth we lived a great deal abroad; and before I came to England, Bernard had left home. He got involved in some shameful entanglement, and I managed to get him out of the way. That is how scarcely anyone I know in England was aware I ever had a brother; those who did know thought he was dead, and I did not undeceive them. Heaven knows I tried my utmost to redeem him, Jesuita, but it was thankless work. He was only happy in low haunts, among his inferiors, who made much of him, and thought his superficial cleverness talent. He sank lower and lower, and at last I lost sight of him altogether. I tried to find him, but failed, for I would never have let him want, or descend to crime, for the sake of bread. For the honour of our name I would have warded off the last. It was I, Jesuita, who went to Papa Guilbert's shop. I remember the old man well, and the Persephone I admired, but could not buy. But it was not I, it was Bernard, he saw near the house on the evening of that terrible day. Bernard was nearly of my height, but not like me otherwise; but his figure, seen in the dusk, might easily be mistaken for me by anyone who knew me imperfectly. I went to Italy that afternoon. I read the first account of the crime, but missed the rest. The matter seemed to have no very special interest for me, and I was very busy at the time. I remember a daughter being mentioned, but forgot it later."

Involuntarily he pressed the girl's yielding form closer to him, and was silent a minute before he went on.

"Two years ago, I received a letter from a priest in Rome. My brother was dying; I went at once. Bernard was dying in a poor lodging-house in the Trastevere. To him he had already confessed what he told me. He was in Paris three years before, herding with gamblers—and worse. He was poor, he grew desperate. He heard at first by chance of Papa Guilbert and the secluded life he led. He made further inquiries, and found that robbery would be comparatively easy. But he vowed to me, Jesuita—he was a dying man—that he had not intended to commit murder. Yet he took a murderous weapon with him, for self-defence, he said. Still I dare not believe he was anything but reckless as to whether he took life or not. When he knew Papa Guilbert to be alone, he entered the shop and shut the door. The old man, instantly suspicious, made an exclamation, and Bernard sprang upon him——!"

He stopped abruptly. Jesuita was clinging to him, trying to keep back her bitter weeping, trying, too, to soothe the man she loved, in his anguish. How awful a burden he had had to bear! Murder wrought by his own flesh and blood—his mother's son!

"Your father died—without a groan," Caerlyon said, almost in a whisper. "Bernard, panic-stricken when the deed was done, robbed the till, and seized a few of the smaller curios in the shop, among them that bronze Persephone, and fled. But the crime was his own death-blow; he lived in an eternal terror, tortured by remorse; the things he had stolen he dared not part with, or even throw away—he kept them. So he came to his death-bed. Then he gave these things to me, to do with what seemed best to me. To restore them to the rightful owner was impossible; I did not know who that owner was; and how could I confess the story of my brother's crime—the foul blot on my father's name? The money value was not great. I did at least what seemed best to me. I could not keep things stolen; I could not restore them. I sold them, and sent the money to the good priest who heard my brother's confession, for the church, or for the poor, as he should judge. That is the story, Jesuita, of the bronze Persephone."

She did not speak for a long time; she only clung to her lover's breast, giving and taking comfort. So vengeance was, after all, taken out of her hands, and her own life given to the man who was flesh and blood of her father's murderer. But would Papa Guilbert, who so loved his child, have wished it otherwise?

By-and-bye, when she could speak, Jesuita told Caerlyon of her quest, and of her strange conviction that she would one day find the Persephone, and that it would prove the clue to the truth.

"But why," Caerlyon asked, "did you keep back all you knew from the police?"

"Why?"—her dark eyes flashed—"I wanted to keep vengeance in my own hands. I knew how such crimes are punished in France. They would easily find excuse for the murderer, and he would be sent to prison or to New Caledonia for a few years. Heaven took vengeance away from me, Ernest. It was better so," she said, laying her head on his breast, and he held her to him, and kissed her in silence.

The play was written for Jesuita Saint Lys, but she was the author's wife before it was even commenced; and it was certainly not written on the lines she had suggested. It is now running at a leading theatre to crowded houses, and Jesuita is the most admired, most popular actress in London. But she remains unspoiled. She loves her art; she loves applause—what true artist does not. But her husband's smile of approval is worth it all, and her happiest hours are the hours spent with him—her true Elysium, to sit by his side while he works, or rest within his arms, leaning on his heart.

The murder in the Petite Rue Etoiles remains, and will ever remain, upon the roll of undiscovered crimes. Only three living people, an old priest of the Trastevere, and Ernest Caerlyon and his young wife, know the story of the bronze Persephone.

CARMILITA.

"You wouldn't think now," said Inspector Robert Bruce, of the N.S.P.C.C., (popularly known among us as "Bobby B."); "that innocent little mites of children would have such tragical life-stories, as I know from personal experience, many of them do have."

"Have you any particular one in your mind?" said I.

"Well, as a matter of fact, I have; and one, too, that shows up a certain sort of human, or rather inhuman nature, in a way hardly conceivable."

"Let us have it, then, Bobby," said I; (I don't know why, but somehow I am generally looked for to act as spokesman on these occasions); "The 'cry of the children' is just now being not uncertainly heard, and you, of all people, ought to know something about it worth the telling."

"Yes, poor little beggars!" said Bobby B., sadly meditative; "I ought to know, and I do know. Sometimes—very often, in fact—I wish that I didn't, for it makes me not only sorrowful for the helpless, but to lose all faith in my fellow-man, as being a good and true example of his Maker's image!"

Bobby B. is, I think, one of the kindest-hearted creatures on all God's earth. The proverbial fly is in no danger from him, children, animals all love him, and he them.

It is with the mature cruelty, hiding its unseemly doings in the "dens and caves" of the stately capital of the world, that he wages ceaseless, and relentless war. His "no quarter may well be bracketed with Grant's famous "Unconditional Surrender," for he implicitly believes in thoroughness; and that the detection and due punishment of the guilty, is the only way of Salvation for the innocent.

The following story: (true with the truth of fact) from his own lips, will exemplify this better than can any description I may be able to give of him.

* * * * *

"About two years ago," said Bobby, "at the close of the year, all amusement-loving London were going literally mad over the wonderful acrobatic, and sensational trapeze performances of a girl—a mere mite of ten.

"The child was certainly in her way a genius; accomplishing, as she did, eqilibristic feats that would have put to shame the best efforts of any adult artiste in the same line, then before the public.

"She was a winsome little creature, small, and tiny-limbed; but altogether without that sadly sterotyped professional smile, so typical of her class, little or big, and which to my mind is so pathetic, in that it may hide a sorrowful and aching heart.

"I don't know that I should have particularly interested myself in Carmilita, (her stage name,) though I must confess to having from the first thought the child to be somewhat thin and delicate-looking; and therefore, to all appearance, but little fitted for the strain and excitement of such a life; but that something I happened accidentally to hear concerning her awoke in me a desire to inquire a little into her history.

"It seemed that she was presumably the youngest of the three children of one, James Passmore, and Guiletta his wife; the woman being, as her name indicates, an Italian.

"It was not known exactly where the family lived, beyond the fact that they invariably came from and returned to some neighbourhood in the S.E. district.

"It was from the theatrical agent who did all their business that I got my information, but he could not really tell me much, except with regard to one point, viz., that the wardrobe-woman of the 'Odeon' had been heard to say that, while preparing the child for the stage, the mother would allow no one connected with the theatre (the largest variety house in town,) to be present, and that it was just the same at the close of the 'turn.'

"This set me thinking.

"Where there is unnecessary concealment, there is almost sure to be wrong-doing of some sort; something of which folks are ashamed.

"I was a bit suspicious of this class of people: such, I mean, as have a child, or children upon the stage. I have an idea, indeed, that somebody is making all the profit, while the little performer is doing all the work.

"Besides there have appeared, from time to time, strange revelations in the newspapers; showing how that boys and girls of tender age lead lives of hard, grinding, cruel slavery; the taskmasters being ex-gymnasts; acrobats; circus-riders; who during the best years of their little victims lives, drain the very last drop out of their endurance and intelligence.

"The other side of course, deny all this, and equally of course, it is open to me, and those who think with me, to take the denial as being genuine—or, the other thing.

"My first step was to attend a performance at the 'Odeon,' so that I might study 'Carmilita' at her business and to the best advantage.

"I could not but admire the gracefulness, and neat cleverness of the girl; but I was also peculiarly struck with her strange lack of healthy, wholesome freshness.

"I could see, through my glasses, her poor little arms quiver and tremble to a painful degree, as she threw the whole weight of her body upon them, when raising herself by sheer muscular power from a hanging to a sitting position on the bar of the trapeze.

"Too, I could see, plainly, the little lips whiten and droop at the corners, until my heart was sore with pity for the child.

"And yet it was not Carmelita alone that I watched and studied.

"Superintending the performance was a man in irreproachable evening dress, even to white kids, and with an expensive flower in his coat.

"A big man; brawny of breast and limb—swarthy to; and given to an ugly contraction of brow.

"This was, of course, James Passmore himself, who, however, contrived to preserve an appearance of fatherly tenderness of manner; a hovering protectiveness, which, to the majority of the audience may have seemed excessively charming, but which did not in the least deceive me.

"I was in the stalls, on the extreme left of the fourth row.

"'Q'vite—vat you call—marv'lleuse! eh!'

"The voice in my ear, the suddenness of it, startled me.

"Evidently the speaker, a foreigner, was immediately behind me.

"'I beg pardon!' I said, half turning my head.

"'Carmilita! is she not une belle charmante?'

"I am ever suspicious of strangers—especially foreigners—and mistrust them, and the glance I had of this somewhat obtrusive specimen, served but to confirm me in my prejudice—or opinion—which ever you like to call it.

"He let me alone for the remainder of Carmilita's turn; but upon its conclusion began again.

"'You know heem, M'ssieu Jims Passmore? Sacré! vat a spich is yours! it makes me to pain my tongue! So!'

"Upon finding that I did not answer him, he went on.

"'Ze large man vith Carmilita,' he said, Charmante Carmilita! You not know heem?' (Here he leaned over closer to me, and whispered me. speaking rapidly). 'I know heem! Vat you vatch heem for so close? Come outside. I tell you then all about Jim Passmore. You vill come?'

"I did not by any means like the look of my interlocutor, but I saw in a flash, that of his mouth, I might learn what I sought.

"'Certainly,' I said, rising, 'wherever you please.'

"'Dis vay! dis vay!' he whispered excitedly, and following him I speedily found myself outside the theatre, and in the wet street.

"My companion led me up by the side of the building to opposite a small, ill-lit, narrow entrance, the 'stage door,' in fact.

"In the shadow of the shuttered shops, we had a fair view of anyone passing out of the theatre.

"There was a brougham waiting with—on the box—a large professional costume basket.

"'Dat is hers—Carmilita's!' said the Frenchman softly. 'Now, vatch you! and you vill see!—you vill see!'

"Presently Passmore came out carrying the girl—a bundle of shawls and wraps, her face, deadly white, alone being visible—in his arms. Close behind him was the woman.

"Depositing his burden—none too tenderly, as I thought—upon the back seat, and, handing in his wife, he got in himself. It was what I saw by the light of the street lamp while the carriage was in the act of moving away from before the door, that told me, unmistakably, that I was on the track of a crime.

"The moment he had fastened the door, after taking his seat, I distinctly saw him take the child by the throat, shake her savagely, as does a bull-dog a rat, and deliberately strike her with his other, and clenched hand, a terrific blow upon the side of the head.

"The Frenchman at my side saw it as well as I, and, as the vehicle disappeared up the narrow street in the direction of Waterloo Bridge, he hissed in my ear:

"'You see! You see! Vell, I vill tell you more! me! André Secompt vill tell you of dat canaille—dat cochon—vat you call—peeg! Yes!'

"And truly his revelation, while it in no sense surprised me, certainly affected me powerfully.

"It was to the following effect.

"Passmore, it seems, had at one time been a 'strong man' in the same travelling circus company in which Secompt figured as 'droll'

"The two men in course of time became, well, not exactly friends, but—social intimates.

"Passmore, who was the husband of the 'star lady-rider' of the troupe, Guiletta Simondi, had two children, who, from a professional point of view, were a source of bitter disappointment to him.

"He could make nothing of them. They evinced—poor little souls!—no aptitude for any recognised line of 'business.' Whip them! Kick them! Starve them! The result was the same—a blank!

"Both he and his wife were past their youth, and were looking forward to a near termination of their course as active members of the profession.

"That they could depend upon their childrens gains, as a future means of livelihood, was now out of the question.

"Casting about for a likely substitute for their own unprofitable offspring they were not long in meeting with their opportunity.

"It was at Nimes, the last pitch Saroni's Circus was to make on fair French soil, before returning across the Channel for the English touring season.

"'Hola!' said Saroni to Guiletta, the day before departure. 'Vere you get de nice leetle "enfant" eh?'

"'Vich you mean?'

"'De fair-'air petite!'

"'Ah!—si!—si!—cara Carmilita!—si! she is my bambino!—my leetlest one!'

"'Dat so!' said Saroni, puzzled. 'Vere you 'ide her all dis long time-eh?'

"'My sister—in Milan—come back last night,' said Guiletta, a trifle confusedly.

"'Ah—bien!—she is charmante, the leetle Carmilita! Yes!'

"Guiletta moved away, as having had enough of the conversation; Saroni just muttering: 'Ver' strange!—from Milan, last ni'!—Non!—bien; pauvre petite! she vill 'ave ze bad time vith Guiletta—yes!'

"This little encounter had taken place in the ring during morning rehearsal.

"Quietly turning somersaults in a corner, on a square of old soft carpet, Andre Secompt, the 'droll,' appeared to be absolutely unconscious of everything in his vicinity.

"The others gone, however, he sat down; his legs tucked under him, the fingers of his left hand slowly stroking his chin in a meditative way, the while a peculiar smile played about his eyes and lip corners.

"'Cara Carmilita!—bou! Ah! mon chere Jims you not know I know. Zat Madame in ze Rue d'Etoiles; she veep dis morning for her leetle fille. I say not'ing, —I—Non. Some time I speak! and zen! look out you! mon cher Jims!—but yes!'

* * * * *

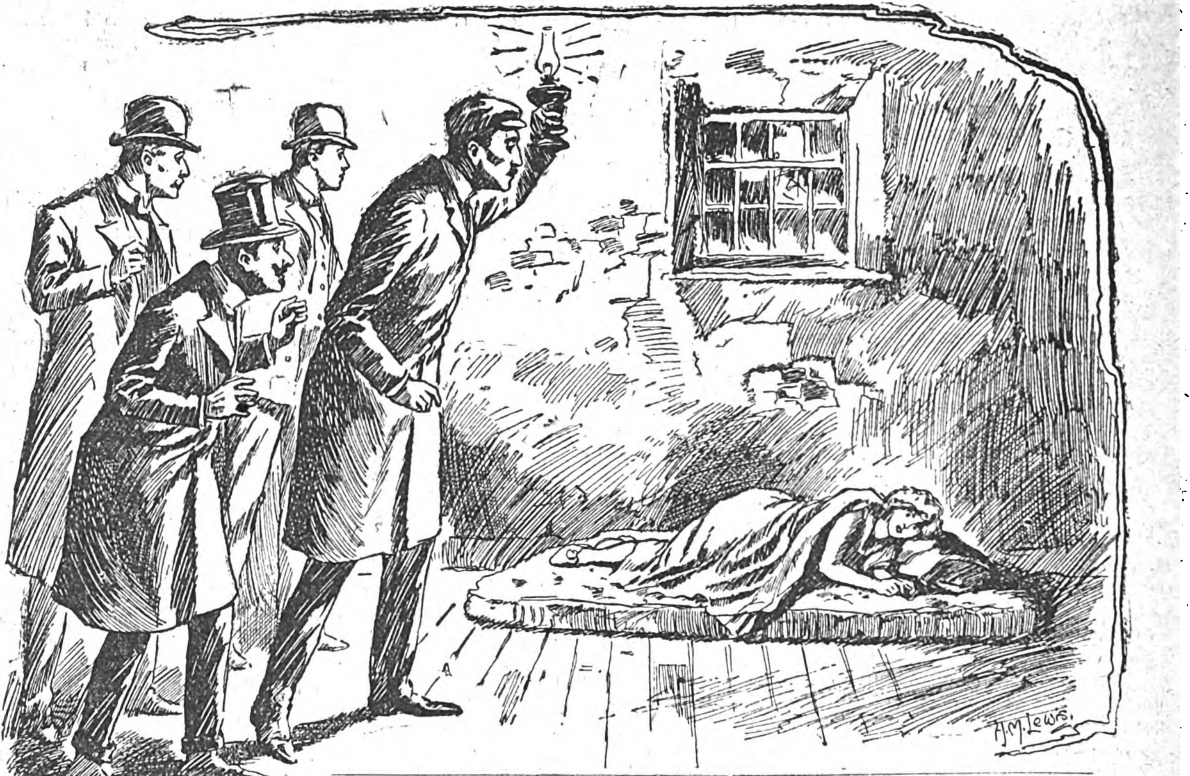
"During the telling of his story, Secompt fidgeted and shook with excitement.

"I couldn't quite make out why he should be so exercised in spirit.

"'Has this man, Passmore, ever injured you in any way?' I asked him.

"'Injure me! But yes! He marry Guilette!' spat

You've spoken to your friends about "The Golden Dwarf," of course?



Upon it, dressed precisely as when she left the theatre, was poor little Carmilita.

out the ex-droll, his teeth grinding viciously. 'He play "faro" and cheat! cheat! cheat! He rob me of my moneys! me! I would kill heem!'

"'No, you mustn't say such things,' said I, 'or you'll be locked up.'

"'It is that he should be locked up!' almost screamed the infuriated Frenchman. 'But come, my friend! come! Tere is something more for you to see! Come!'

"'Hold!' I interrupted him. 'Steady, man! just tell me where we are going?'

"'Going! to save de pauvre Carmilita! to make vat you call sving, mon cher Jims!'

"'Well, then, look here, wait a moment! I want to see someone I know! Get you a cab—a growler—wait at this corner for me, I shan't be ten minutes.'

"'Renton!' cried I, breathless; 'you are not on duty, I see!'—he was just putting on his coat in the hospital vestibule. 'Come with me, there's a good fellow! Now—at once!—it's a matter, for all I know, of life and death!'

"'All right, Bobby! I'm your man. Lead on, and—explain afterwards.'

"Diving into a certain restaurant, I found, (as I knew I should find him at this hour,) Detective Inspector Manacle, enjoying a 'chop and chips.'

"'I want you!' was all I said to him, and he, with the alacrity of discipline, rose and joined us on the instant.

"In the cab now, with Secompt, who, in the company of my two friends, (one of whom, I see, is listening to me now,) became suddenly silent.

"'You have told the man where to drive to?' I put to him.

"'But yes!'

"It was a long journey; and a chilly one; for the night was cold, and misty, though the rain had ceased.

"Over Westminster Bridge; along Kennington Park; and past the 'Gate' where the busses and trams stop.

"A little way up the Brixton Road, and then a sharp turn to the left up a bye-street of villa built houses of a fairish size and style.

"The street was not a long one, a cul-de-sac in fact. At the fourth house down, something special was evidently afoot.

"Lights gleamed in every window from top to bottom of it, while sundry hansoms and a few single-horse broughams set down festively-garbed people one after another.

"At Secompt's signal, our vehicle stopped at the first house in the street.

"We all got out; I telling the cabman to wait for us just round the corner in the main road.

"'Can I see Mr. Passmore?'

"'No, I don't think you can,' said the servant. 'We've a party on to-night, and he's busy.'

"The house appeared to be well, and even handsomely furnished and appointed.

"The Adventures of an Actress" are coming. See Editor's page.

"Through the half-open dining-room door, I could just see a gorgeously-spread supper table shimmering beneath an electric light chandelier, with the glitter of silver, and sparkling crystal.

"Flowers were everywhere; and from above came the strain of a lovely waltz, mingled with the hum and chatter of a throng of people.

"Secompt and the two others had remained outside, a couple of doors off.

"'My business is urgent,' I said. 'Give Mr. Passmore my card, and I am s——'

"'Hullo! what's the matter? Who's this? I can't see anybody! Shut the door!'

"It was Passmore, flushed with wine and, perhaps, with a presentiment of coming evil.

"'Pardon me!' I said, maintaining my ground, 'but I think you had really better see me.'

"'I'll be d—d if I do! Why should I? Who are you?' and the bully in the man showed not only in the tone of his voice, but in the savage thrusting of his clenched fists in my face.

"'Well,' said I, 'since you elect to take things in this way, I must needs do my duty in my own.'

"A shrill call on my whistle, and Renton and the Inspector ran up the steps into the hall.

"It would take too long for me to tell everything in detail that then happened.

"After a lot of trouble, and no end of obstruction from Passmore's male guests who by this time had interested themselves in what was going on, we made our way to the top of the house, halting at length before a closed garret door.

"It was locked.

"Kicking it open with a vigorous application of my right foot, I pushed into the room.

"The contrast with the downstairs display, was simply appalling.

"There was absolutely nothing in the room (which was abominably dirty) beyond a mattress (none too clean) on the bare floor.

"Upon it, dressed precisely as when she left the theatre, was poor little Carmilita; for all the world as though she had been dumped down and left.

"But a closer inspection disclosed a state of things more serious.

"Renton, after a hurried examination, found that in addition to the child being in a dangerously advanced stage of consumption, she was literally a mass of sores and bruises from head to foot.

"These the doctor pronounced to be the result of beating with some heavy instrument.

"Wrapping her in his Inverness cloak, Renton carried her in his arms down to the hall, where we found the way barred by Passmore and his wife.

"'Vere you take my child?' cried Guiletta.

"'You will know to-morrow,' I answered her meaningly. 'Let us pass please!'

"Probably we should have had more difficulty than we actually did have, but for Secompt, who hitherto in the background, now pressed forward, and confronted the pair.

"'Mon cher Jims!' he said, suavely, but very white. 'Madame Dardique—you know her, eh? Rue d'Etoile. Nismes, you know her?'

"There was no need for further fighting, both the man and his wife, seeming to shrink with fear and apprehension.

"Womanlike, however, Guiletta had the last word.

"'You think you win ze trick!' to Secompt, who just smiled in quiet derision, 'but we shall see who vins ze game!—beast!'

* * * * *

"The precious couple disappeared the next day not only from their house, but from all their haunts; so that the summons issued at the instance of the 'Society' fell abortively to the ground. In the interests of justice it was a pity, for if ever wrongdoers deserved the due reward of their evil deeds it was this pair.

"After all, however, it didn't much matter; we had the child, and that was the main thing.

"In due course Carmilita, or rather Adele Dardique was handed over to her mother's care, that lady having arrived in London, in quick response to my telegram.

"Madame Dardique then told me how that Adele's nurse had taken the child to see the show, and had suddenly missed her. Every inquiry as to the little one's whereabouts was fruitless, and until my communication, following hard upon Secompt's repentant information to the bereaved mother, nothing had been ever heard of her.

"The 'droll,' for his share in the business, was not forgotten, his almost criminal long-silence being quite forgiven. He was not at bottom a bad fellow, and in the end fully deserved the substantial appreciation he subsequently received.

"The public, of course, wondered for the usual nine days' over Carmilita's absence from the 'Odeon' programme, but were vouchsafed no satisfaction from either the management or from us.

"Marvellous to say, the child took a favourable turn that night; for following the course of treatment advised by Renton; now becoming widely known as a phthisis specialist, progress towards complete recovery was sure and rapid.

"Only a week ago I received this from Madame Dardique:—

"'Adele is becoming a perfect romp, and sends her love and kisses with both hands to dear M'ssieu Bruce and M'ssieu Renton.'"

The Golden Dwarf

A Sensational Romance of To-Day.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "A Keeper of Secrets," "Hate, the Destroyer," "A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS OF "GOLDEN DWARF."

"It is the body of Sir Christopher Dering!"

The words are spoken by a pretty girl—fair-haired, blue-eyed. She stands, horrified, by a grass-grown ditch in a country lane, out of which a great mastiff is climbing. The ditch contains the corpse of a stalwart man—a handkerchief bound over his mouth and nostrils.

Close to there is a strange figure, graceful, well-dressed, even handsome, but with the stature of a boy and the face of an adult. He carries a heavy dog-whip, and stares, fixedly, at the dead body just discovered by his mastiff, Cerberus.

The girl is Esther Carew; the dwarf, Otto Hare, the richest landowner in Derbyshire, and the mystery of Wyresdale, a village in that county. For the first time in fifteen years he has set foot in a public thoroughfare, to attract the attention of Esther, whom he has watched from his park.

Sir Christopher Dering was alive at seven o'clock the preceding day. He and his nephew, Felix, had quarrelled over the latter's love for Esther. Sir Christopher wanted Felix to make a good marriage—the birth of his little cousin Brian has put him out of the succession to the baronetcy. Felix is faithful to the penniless Esther Carew.

Much turns on the whereabouts of Felix on the night before. It appears that he was in Duchester, some miles off, whither he went on business, and spent a night at the theatre. Could he have killed the squire?

Otto Hare would like to suggest that he did—Esther's mercenary mother accepts his hints. She wants the Golden Dwarf for a son-in-law.

Felix is secretly loved by Judith Garland, a striking brunette, Lady Dering's companion. She has a wastrel brother, Neal, who is unaccountably in Wyresdale, and who is demanding money. This, by an affectation of sisterly solicitude, Judith obtains, as a cheque, from Felix Dering. The cheque is payable to bearer.

Otto Hare has an ally, a strange German physician, Joseph Kraft, who lives with him at Wyresdale Park, the Golden Dwarf's residence. He is an object of much curiosity to Archibald Geddes, a clever assistant at the Wyresdale Pharmacy, which is kept by a drunken old chemist, Caleb Forester.

Caleb has a charming daughter, Connie, whom Geddes is making bashful love to. She is Esther's friend, and quarrels with Geddes for crediting the rumour that Felix killed his uncle.

A one-armed sailor has suddenly appeared in Wyresdale. At the chemist's shop he encounters Kraft, whom he follows, and on the strength of some past episode attempts to blackmail. Kraft repulses him, but is dexterously tracked by the sailor to a curious fort-like structure in Wyresdale Park.

While spying on this the sailor is attacked by a huge dog, which he stabs. He is seen by Kraft and the Golden Dwarf.

Esther tells Felix of her mother's plan to marry her to Otto Hare. They swear constancy in an old and picturesque oath. Felix returns to Dering House, to be asked by the child Brian if it is true Felix has taken his father away.

Judith Garland shows Felix several links of a chain he has been in the habit of wearing. They are bloodstained. She adds that they were found near the cross roads, where Sir Christopher's body was discovered, and that, moreover, Felix was seen near the place at ten o'clock on the night when he was supposed to be in Duchester. She assures him she will keep his secret.

Felix in vain protests his innocence. At this moment an inspector of the local police is announced.

Felix Dering staggers—is he dreaming, the prey of some hideous nightmare?

A caution sounds in his ears; Judith Garland is speaking to him. "Don't look like that," she whispers, "pull yourself together."

Notwithstanding their alarm, the police-officer—one Inspector Brasher—has merely called to arrest, on suspicion of being concerned in Sir Christopher's death, a certain Edward Spencer, a young Irish groom whom the baronet, shortly before his death, had given notice to leave. Protesting his innocence, Spencer is taken away. While on the route to the little country police-station, he was seen by Foley, with whom Dr. Kraft has been holding a mysterious consultation. Almost immediately afterwards, Foley, by chance, makes the acquaintance of Neal Garland. "Here, my hearty," asks the sailor in his maritime lingo, "what was it you picked up yonder and gave to the taut little craft you had with you?" He is referring to the meeting of Judith and Neal at the stile.

The scene changes. During a walk in the meadows on a pleasant Sabbath morning, Felix tells Esther that he was indeed in Wyresdale that fatal evening, and explains his return. A new sensation interrupts their conversation, Felix is called to the small local police-station. It has a single cell, and in this Ted Spencer had been confined over an adjourned inquest. This cell is now empty, Spencer has vanished. The barred window has been broken through—from the outside!

With the help of Neal, Esther kidnaps little Brian Dering, to further her ends with Felix.

CHAPTER X.

Caleb Forester is Indiscreet.

"Wilful murder against Edward Spencer."

The afternoon sunshine was streaming through the front of Caleb Forester's shop in a golden shower, tinged here and there with the colours of the large ornamental flasks behind the upper panes. A crimson bar fell on the stern, self-satisfied features of Inspector Brasher, and seemed to bathe his palms in blood as he rubbed them together. It was he who had spoken.

"Just so," remarked Archibald Geddes, pausing, with his finger on the lever of his pharmaceutical scales, to peer round the edge of the wooden screen which hid the dispensary table. "And allow me to say, Inspector," he added, as he tilted the drug he had been weighing on to a piece of white paper, "that the verdict is an outrage upon the intelligence of Wyresdale. Luckily, it's nothing but the view of a coroner's jury."

The Inspector fingered his smart black beard.

"You'll be telling me next, Mr. Geddes," he observed drily, "you're glad the station strong-room was broken into and Spencer helped off."

Geddes sniffed and proceeded to fold the last of a set of teething-powders.

"I can't say I'm overpleased by that fact," he owned; "till you catch the poor lad again there can't be a trial, and I imagine a trial would be most interesting. Yet I'd lay odds it wouldn't have been Spencer who'd have been found guilty."

Inspector Brasher leaned on the long glass case at his back that, stacked with bottles and packets, formed the counter of the establishment.

"You're obstinate, Mr. Geddes," he said; "even for a Scotchman you're obstinate. But answer me this: If Sir Christopher's groom wasn't responsible for his master's death what did he want to escape for?"

Archibald Geddes began to write a label.

"Perhaps," he looked up to suggest, "you should ask the person who got those bars out of the strong-room window and persuaded Spencer to take flight. Not that you or I would need much inducement under the same circumstances, whether we were guilty or innocent."

"And who," propounded the Inspector, "do you reckon that person to be?"

Geddes finished his parcel and set it aside.

"My theories," he declared evasively, "wouldn't stand your expert criticism, Mr. Brasher. Nor do I wish to improve my acquaintance with the law of libel."

Brasher wrinkled his brows.

"If you are thinking," he said, "of a certain rumour about a quarrel having taken place between Sir Christopher and—a—relation the day prior to the discovery of the late baronet's body I will admit it reached our ears. But the—the relative in question spent the night at Duchester; I have checked his movements myself. He simply could not have committed the murder."

Geddes glanced from behind the screen, his small, keen pupils expressing some surprise.

"Upon my word," he ejaculated, "you are a smarter hand than I believed you, Mr. Brasher. And are you quite sure there is no doubt of Mr. Felix Dering's——"

"S-s-sh!" muttered the Inspector; "no names—better not, much better not."

"Well, of the relation's innocence," said Geddes; "as you prefer the mysterious way of putting the case."

Inspector Brasher nodded.

"If it could be proved," he answered, "that, at any moment of a particular night, the relation was in Wyresdale, I would nab him without hesitation. But since he spent the whole of the evening in Duchester, at his hotel, or at the theatre, he is free, Mr. Geddes, and, as you observe, there is the libel law to consider."

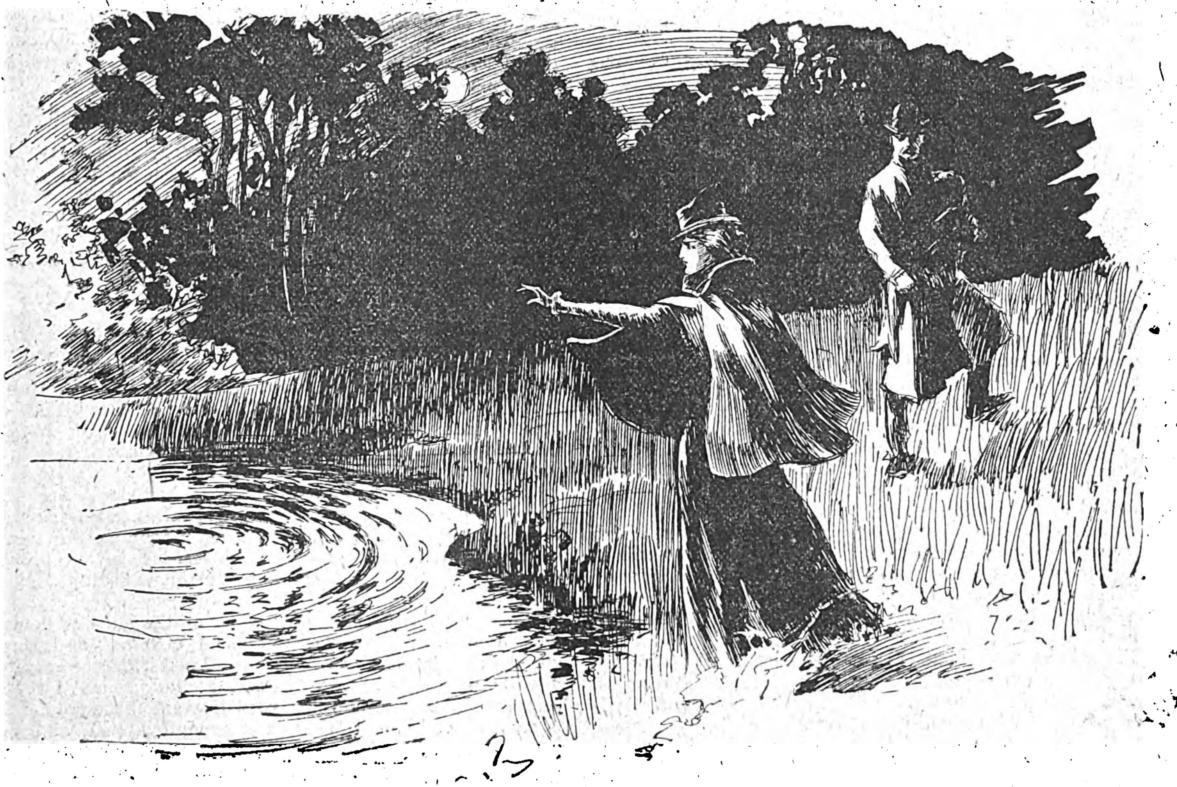
Archibald Geddes whistled.

"You see, Inspector," he said, "I was right when I warned you my theories would not survive your analysis. However, I am charmed to know that the Wyresdale scandalmongers are wrong again, and that I am a failure as a crime investigator."

Brasher smiled loftily; he was pleased with the Scotchman's discomfiture. Before he could pursue the subject a quick step sounded at the back of the screen, and Connie Forester entered the shop by the private door.

A warm glow suffused Mr. Brasher's cheek, all his official dignity deserted him; he bowed with an embarrassed eagerness. Geddes flushed also, but he devoted himself to clearing away his apparatus.

"I—I dropped in," stammered the Inspector, "to convey the verdict to Mr. Geddes."



Judith ran down to the water and hurled out into the lake the package she had made of Brian's bedgown.

You've spoken to your friends about "The Golden Dwarf," of course?

Connie's pretty face lost its air of elaborate indifference.

"Yes," she said; "may I know, too?"

"They found it murder against poor Ted Spencer," explained Geddes scornfully, "and I think less of a Wyresdale jury than I ever did."

Constance Forester sighed.

"Esther—Miss Carew will be sorry," she murmured. "Barbara, the housemaid at the Rosary, was walking out with him, and Miss Carew is very fond of Barbara."

She gazed pleadingly at the Inspector.

"Don't you fancy, Mr. Brasher," she urged, "that there is a horrible mistake somewhere? Sir Christopher must have dismissed Ted a dozen times when he was a little excited, but Ted was always kept on, and Sir Christopher and he were the best of friends. Getting notice is supposed to be the only reason for his harming the squire, isn't it?"

Inspector Brasher conceded the point.

"True," he said, "but Spencer was seen near the place that night, and when he was accused he had a cock-and-bull story about having noticed a horse, led, with a figure like Sir Christopher on it. If he'd volunteered the evidence before his arrest it would have been singular enough, but to bring it out after he was in custody made it more incredible. And, to crown all, he must escape from our strong-room and remove the last doubt in the jury's mind."

"Oh," cried Connie, with a fine burst of contempt, "why shouldn't he get off when he knew he hadn't done it? You police have no hearts. Mr. Brasher, I'm certain if I were accused of murdering Sir Christopher, you would arrest me."

Brasher drew himself to his full height, very red and bashful.

"If I had such a warrant given me to execute, Miss Connie," he said, "I would go down to the Black Pool, tie a stone to my neck, and jump in."

Constance Forester was no coquette, but she could not help a throb of flattered feminine pride at the tremulous significance of the big voice. Archibald Geddes, behind his screen, had a sudden thrill, yet it was one of jealousy.

"You are growing quite gallant, Mr. Brasher," Connie rallied her admirer, "though I'm afraid your being in the Black Pool wouldn't help me. I'd rather, instead of drowning yourself, you found the real criminal, which wouldn't be me any more than it is Ted Spencer."

The Inspector twisted his moustache.

"If I can pitch upon somebody else, Miss Connie," he promised, "against whom there is a crushing piece of evidence, or if I can obtain a clue which seems to vindicate Spencer, I will be the first to inform you of it. I assure you I shall be sufficiently rewarded by that privilege. Good-day to you, Miss Forester. Good-day, Mr. Geddes."

And, with a tender glance at Connie and a stride that would have done credit to one of the Three Musketeers, he marched into the High Street.

As he walked down the sunny thoroughfare, in which groups of Wyresdale folk were still discussing the result of the coroner's inquiry and the disappearance of the accused, the Inspector beheld Caleb Forester returning, as his demeanour showed but too plainly, from the Wheatsheaf Hotel.

The short frame of the chemist, beneath its silver tresses, swayed to and fro like an inverted pendulum. His mouth was expanded into a foolish smile, his arms stiff and dangling. Near the Inspector he halted unsteadily.

"So it's you, Mist' Brasher," he stuttered. "How do you 'preciate the verdict, eh? It's a great load off my mind—a great load."

"That I should guess," said the Inspector, scanning his neighbour's reeling form; "but don't you imagine you were better with the load on?"

Caleb Forester grasped himself by the lapels of a worn velvet coat.

"I told myself," he mumbled, the indistinctness gradually passing from his speech, though the limp quality of his limbs increased, "all will be well if he only lies low and says nothing. I will never betray him. He lent me money when my wife died and I nearly lost the shop. 'Let us hope nobody but me saw him,' I said, 'but we must chance that. Crouch down and let the hounds go by.' And he did—he did!"

Inspector Brasher seized the old chemist's arm and guided him up High Street.

"Yours was excellent advice," he observed quietly, "and, as you remark, it has been justified by events. I trust he is grateful."

"Grateful!" repeated Caleb. "Why should Mr. Dering be grateful to me? I should have been driven out of house and home but for him. No, no, I gave him no advice, but I kept his secret—yes, I kept his secret."

"Mr. Dering!" gasped the Inspector under his breath. "Michael Brasher, go easy—this is the case of your life."

The acute ear of the drunkard caught the opening part of the whisper, and a belated caution flared up in his brain. He wrenched himself from the affectionate Brasher, vaguely conscious in his muddled state that he had committed an indiscretion.

"Excuse me," he quavered, "but I am in a hurry. My daughter will be waiting for me—a dear girl, yet her mother's child, and impatient, just a little impatient. Good afternoon, Mr. Brasher."

He tottered off, morosely polite. As he swerved into the entrance of his shop a spider-phaeton and a pair of roans whirled by, Otto Hare driving the swift cobs. The Golden Dwarf was yet a novel sight in the thoroughfares of Wyresdale, and many a head was turned to mark his tiny figure, handsome profile, and the diamond rings that glittered on his child-like fingers.

"They say," muttered the Inspector, gazing at the impassive owner of the phaeton, "that you are in love with Felix Dering's sweetheart. If it be true you would be glad to know what I know now. He will not block your path for long, not for long."

Then the stalwart form of Michael Brasher lounged thoughtfully onward in the glow of the setting sun.

CHAPTER XI.

A Door is Knocked at.

The July moon looked down at Wyresdale between the driving storm-clouds, which, from time to time, threw their giant shadows over the panorama. A deeper blot of gloom against the dim perspective of the night, Judith Garland hurried on, the little baronet slumbering in her arms.

Once the breeze flung open a fold of her cloak, and the sweet, childish face, with its veined eyelids and fair curls, became visible. Judith contemplated it for a moment, then covered it up again. There was something in her proud, relentless features that made her strange beauty almost diabolical.

Among the lawns and plantations of the home-park she glided, to emerge on the vast meadow that skirted, hereabouts, the Dering estate. The wind buffetted her angrily, yet she pressed forward, directing her course by the scattered clumps of tall elms that diversified the field.

Beyond the last of these the ground dipped, and she perceived, carried on the air, the sharp scent of water. She had neared the curious and miniature lake known to Wyresdale as the Black Pool.

Vague under the changeful sky, it spread a ruffled brown sheet, the waves lapping the flat lee-shore like some thirsty animal. Close to, a bluff hillock commanded the pool.

"The Adventures of an Actress" are coming. See Editor's Page.

Here Judith paused, put one hand to her mouth, and uttered a single low call. A man crept out of some sheltered niche in the irregular mound. His muddied vesture, his unshaven chin, his defiant bearing, served to indicate the personality of Neal Garland.

"You've been a deuce of a while," he growled; "I'd given you up, almost. Have you got the kid?"

His sister divided the heavy wrap which concealed her burden. The child still slept. Grunting approval, Neal Garland led them to a recess shielded from the wind, but lighted intermittently by the moonbeams.

"I secured the toggery this morning," he said. "Walked to Duchester on purpose and bought it at a slop-shop there. I didn't pawn your ring, they wouldn't lend enough, so I sold outright for a fiver; that will enable us to keep intact the precious bit of paper with Mr. Felix Dering's signature."

He chuckled as he knelt down, unwrapped a parcel, and produced a tiny woollen shirt, soiled, a patched jacket and knickers, a pair of stockings, a cap, and a brace of cobbled shoes.

"Will the youngster howl?" he asked, coarsely, taking the first of the articles in his fingers.

"Let me manage it," recommended Judith, and took the thing from him.

Hollowing her cloak, she slipped off her charge's loose bedgown and whipped the rough garment into its place. Brian Dering woke and wailed.

"Curse the brat!" muttered Neal, and he would have laid a brutal palm on the small lips.

But Judith Garland evaded the motion.

"Don't be a fool," she snapped, and turned to the sobbing child, "Brian," she said, "you must be a good boy and you shall go to mother in a moment. There has been a big fire and Dering House is all burned up. But mother is safe, and when you are dressed you will be taken to her."

The little baronet checked his grief.

"Was it a great, huge fire?" he asked, "oh, I do wish I had seen it. And were my own clothes spoiled; these are not mine, you know."

Judith was completing his toilet with quick, feminine skill.

"They are the best we could get, dear," she told him; "fancy if we had not been able to find any for you!"

"Where did they come from?" inquired the child, shivering in the night breeze.

"This gentleman has borrowed them for us," said Judith, pointing to Neal.

Brian peered at him through the shadows.

"Thank you," he observed; "it is quite dark, isn't it, so I can't tell who you are. But I am much obliged, really."

Neal grinned. "You would be, my lad," he assented; "if you understood how far I had to go for them."

The child did not hear this retort, his head had sunk upon Judith Garland's shoulder and he slept again. Judith was rolling the bedgown, which Brian had worn, in the sheet that had contained the apparel fetched by Neal. She had enclosed with the packet a large stone and tied the bundle firmly.

"Hold out your arms," she whispered to her brother, and straightened herself from her crouching position. Neal obeyed; she yielded the boy to him. "Walk into Derby," was her advice; "don't risk Duchester. At Derby take the express to London. Where shall I write?"

"Hattaras Street, Pimlico," he instructed; "care of Mrs. Schwartz, but don't trust ink with anything dangerous."

"Am I the sort?" queried his sister, "and, by-the-bye, you had better leave that cheque with me, hadn't you?"

"What's the matter with my having it?" objected Neal. Judith sneered.

"You'd pass it the instant you struck a nasty corner," she said, "and deprive us of our best card. Felix Dering is powerless if we, who alone can explain the disappearance of this baby, possess a cheque for twenty pounds to bearer, signed by him. That cheque is worth more uncashed than cashed—it was paid to you, we will suggest, as the price of kidnapping Brian Dering, the child to whom Felix is heir. So he dare not repudiate the fortune we will procure him—for our private ends!"

"By Jove, Judith," ejaculated Neal Garland, settling the unconscious boy on his dingy bosom, "you are a perfect marvel! I had some idea of using the cheque as a lever, but my notion was hazy in the extreme. Yours is all cut and dried."

He dived into a cavity of his costume and fished up a document—a document showing at its edge the unmistakable traces of a counterfoil. Judith examined it—it was the cheque she had obtained from Felix, with a few artistic equivocations, a few mock tears.

Consigning it to her pocket, she ran down to the water and hurled out over the lake the package she had formed of Brian's bedgown and a suitable boulder. Then she stole up the bank; the wind had subsided abruptly and the massed clouds veiled the moon.

"Ta-ta," she said; "your share of the work will be finished by to-morrow. You shall hear how I progress with mine."

Neal nodded and would have moved off, but she detained him by a gesture, and, snatching the shawl from her neck, wrapped it about the slumbering boy.

"He will sleep sounder if he is warm," she murmured drily, as though to explain her action; "au revoir, my dear Neal."

She waved a hasty farewell and vanished in the gloom. Neal Garland balanced his burden and set out athwart the meadow.

Gaining the high-road, he adopted a characteristic stride that devoured the miles with singular speed. When the dawn began to suffuse the East he was still on the march, a lean, tireless figure. The sun sprang clear of the horizon, the odours and noises of the day grew to right and left, the wind rose again. But Neal Garland pushed forward, carrying the drowsy child.

Once he halted at a grassy knoll, and, gathering some mould, smeared the little baronet's hands and face—their delicacy was too conspicuous in the fresh light.

His sleep over, Brian Dering awakened; Neal felt him stir

"It's morning," said the child, endeavouring to sit up; "I want mother."

"Lie quiet," ordered Neal; "we are not come to mother yet—we have a long way to go. Be a good lad."

"I am so hungry!" sighed Brian, pushing a brown fist free of the shawl.

"You shall have a cake soon," growled his custodian, and added to himself, "Curse it, how am I to feed the brat!"

Neal's pace quickened—the spire and chimneys of a hamlet loomed in front. He stepped aside and deposited Sir Brian under a hedge.

"Stay where you are," he said; "I am going for your breakfast."

"I don't like my breakfast out here," demurred the child. Neal frowned.

"If you are not sensible you shan't have any," he intimated. Brian did not venture upon a reply—famine is a stern tutor.

Neal Garland hastened onward, purchased bread and biscuits at a village dealers, and revisited his charge. The boy ate the biscuits, though with a certain nervousness; Neal devoured the bread in silence.

"Shall we get to mother soon?" Brian paused to ask. "I do want to go home to mother."

Hazel Harlow's stage career will fascinate you.

"Oh shut up about your mother," snarled the elder; "you've got your breakfast; what more do you wish for."

"I love my mother," announced Brian; "and, please, I should like something to drink. Waters always used to bring me my milk when I woke."

"You can't have one just now," said Neal; "I'll buy you some milk at the railway station."

The child caught at the remark. "Are we going in a train?" he queried.

"We are," assented Neal Garland, irritably, and crumpling the biscuits and their tissue bag together, he bade Brian grasp them, and lifted the boy into his arms. The little baronet dosed, despite the awkwardness of the cradle.

Shortly before noon, after a second halt to consume a further portion of the biscuits, Neal stalked into the Midland depot at Derby. He procured a glass of milk from the refreshment room and brought it to his charge. Brian drank it thirstily. Satisfied, he glanced up to say, with a slow, soft, smile, "Thank you." Neal Garland shrank away, went to the buffet, ordered sixpennyworth of brandy and swallowed it, neat!

The express arriving, he bore the child into an empty compartment. Hardly had the train started than he thrust Brian from him, urging the boy to look out of a window.

During the journey Neal spoke but seldom and Brian Dering slept much—not in his custodian's arms, but on the seat of the carriage. At St. Pancras Neal resumed his burden, and hailing a hansom, had himself driven to Victoria. There he descended, reckoned with the cabman, and plunged into Pimlico.

Near the middle of a decayed and slatternly thoroughfare he mounted a flight of crumbling steps and knocked at the door.

CHAPTER XII.

"People are Saying a Horrible Thing."

"Is she not beautiful, Kraft? Can even your cold scientific intellect deny her worth the winning?"

The Golden Dwarf checked his mare—a spirited, finely-limbed Arab—and contemplated the picture to which he had called his companion's attention. A faint smile illuminated the pale orbs behind Joseph Kraft's gold-rimmed glasses as he regarded—from the saddle of a tall, weight-carrying bay—the sweet, unconscious figure of Esther Carew.

"You are scarcely the most unbiassed of critics, my dear friend," he said, "but you are right, nevertheless. That turn of the head, those blonde locks like spun sunshine, the delicate proportions, so just, so elastic, the piquant foot and ankle! Otto, she is, indeed, a type of loveliness too ethereal to deserve the term British."

Otto Hare frowned.

"You describe her," he retorted jealously, "as if you might be an artist instead of a sawbones."

The German did not answer; he was watching Esther Carew. She had paused in her walk by a low hawthorn hedge which bordered the small plot of ground about a tumble-down cottage on the way-side. From the garden a man pruned the thorn-bushes by means of a bill-hook. His one arm enabled Joseph Kraft to identify him—he was Nicholas Foley.

A moment more and the sailor had noticed Esther's presence. He stopped his work and pulled at a greasy forelock. Kraft strained his ears to catch across the green bend of the lane some scrap of their conversation.

"Arternoon, miss," Nicholas observed; "I'll lay you don't mind me, do you now?"

The girl made a shy motion of dissent.

"I wondered who could have rented the cottage," she faltered; "it has been empty since——"

"Since my old mother, rest her soul," cried the sailor, "died here five years agone. Don't you remember Nick Foley as used to cut faces on cherrystones for you, Miss Esther, Nick Foley as sailed ships for Connie Forester and you on the Black Pool, Nick Foley as was Connie's uncle. You've growed, miss, but I knew you by your curls and your eyes."

Esther grasped the brown hand extended to her.

"I—I am sorry you've had an accident," she said, glancing at the loose sleeve of the other's jacket.

Nicholas grinned. "A lost flipper don't amount to much," he assured her, "and I've had enough of the sea."

He hesitated, staring over her shoulder as if fascinated. Esther followed his glance, and perceived, at the curve of the leafy bypath, the two riders—Otto Hare and the German.

They lifted their hats, and the Golden Dwarf, with a full, vindictive look towards the sailor, raised himself in his stirrups and spoke to Kraft.

Nicholas Foley ducked behind the hedge. "Excuse me, miss," he said, "but I shouldn't wish the little beggar on the slim nag to spot me, though it's the Bank of England to a Mexican dollar he's done it already. Is he on your visiting-list, miss? I saw as how they dipped their ensigns to you."

"I know Mr. Hare slightly," admitted Esther, colouring, "it is Dr. Kraft who is with him."

The sailor popped up from the rear of the thorn-bushes. "'Ware Dutchy!" he whispered, "he's a wrong un, a dead wrong un. Prick him down on your chart, Miss Esther, shoal water, foul anchorage, cannibals. Luff and keep away."

And emphasising these hints by many distortions of his tanned visage, Nicholas Foley dodged athwart the garden plot, and vanished into his cottage. He was not a second too soon, Otto Hare had ridden forward, abandoning the German, who wheeled his bay and cantered back along the lane.

The swift Arab that bore the Golden Dwarf brought him into Esther's neighbourhood at a gallop. Otto Hare dragged the slender creature on its haunches and leapt off.

"This is an unexpected pleasure, Miss Carew," she was told. The strange being at her side, a child in stature, a man in symmetry and feature, flung the reins over an arm and bowed. "I trust you are well," he added.

"Oh yes," answered Esther, experiencing the nervous tremor that invariably shook her at the advent of the Golden Dwarf.

"I think," pursued Otto Hare, "that you can do me a service, Miss Carew; the fellow to whom you were speaking an instant ago. May I ask his name—some ragamuffin parishioner, I suppose."

Esther trembled—so grim a scowl had darkened the Golden Dwarf's countenance. She remembered Nicholas Foley's trepidation.

"I am afraid you don't wish to do him any particular kindness, Mr. Hare," she ventured bravely.

Otto Hare tapped his switch against his riding-boots. "You have a gentle heart, Miss Carew," he said: "this blackguard, trespassing in my park, stabbed a favourite mastiff. It died. If I loved the brute for nothing else, I valued it for bringing me the priceless boon of your acquaintance."

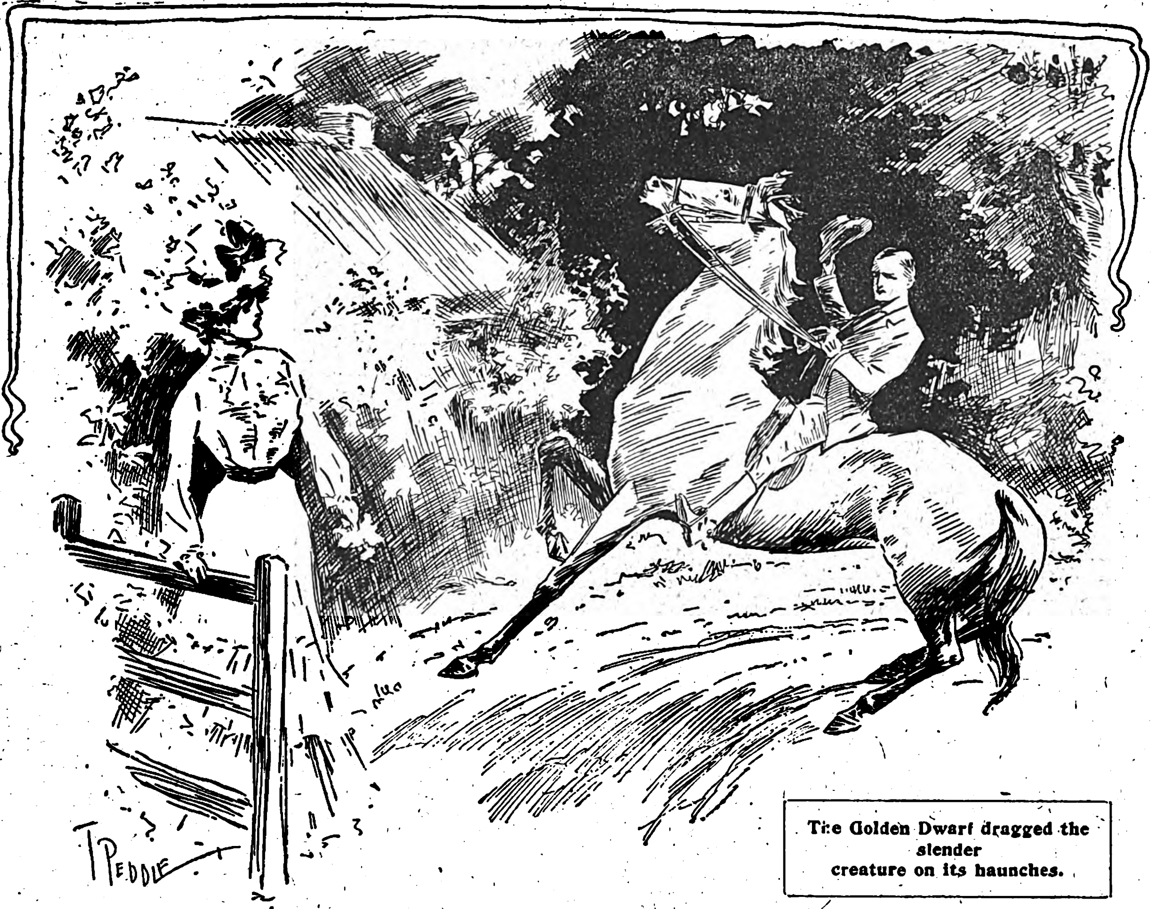
"That dog!" gasped Esther, and recoiled. The Golden Dwarf changed colour.

"You did not appreciate poor Cerberus's good qualities," he declared drily. "Perhaps you would be glad if I pardoned his slayer?"

"I should, indeed," cried the girl.

Nicholas Foley had once been a rare miracle worker to her and her playmate Connie Forester.

Stage Life Revelations. See page 96.



The Golden Dwarf dragged the slender creature on its haunches.

Otto Hare snapped his fingers.

"He is forgiven from this minute," she was informed.

Esther blushed. The situation had betrayed her into begging a favour from the Golden Dwarf.

To disguise her embarrassment she patted his mare.

"How very graceful your horse is," said Esther, "I did not think a horse's limbs could be so slender."

"A pure Arab is not a common piece of property," observed the Golden Dwarf. "Mine is as swift as she is gentle, as loyal as she is swift. Permit me to consecrate her to a fitting mistress—Miss Carew, I shall esteem myself honoured if you will accept the mare for your own."

Esther Carew started. "You overwhelm me, Mr. Hare," she stammered; "but really—"

Otto Hare bit his lip.

"No one," he said, "will ever possess anything after I have offered it to you and you have refused it. The filigree bracelet you would not have, I broke—this evening the mare dies."

Esther Carew quailed at the suppressed passion of the miniature man before her. A dangerous anger blazed in his small face and his nostrils twitched ominously.

"Please," begged Esther; "you couldn't be so cruel, Mr. Hare; you are just trying to alarm me."

Otto Hare considered her quietly, his cheeks were white and his mouth drawn. "The mare dies!" was all he would say.

"She shan't!" stormed Esther, at last, waxing desperate, "for I will have her. And I shall hate you, Mr. Hare, all my life."

The Golden Dwarf paid scant heed to the threat.

"That must be as it will," he vouchsafed, "Miss Carew, with your leave I shall ride the mare home. She shall reach the Rosery this afternoon."

He stepped closer and the unnatural pallor of his complexion was exchanged for a scarlet tinge.

"Miss Carew," he said, "hitherto, you have underestimated Otto Hare, an excusable error, in view of his physical deficiencies. Learn, henceforth, to regard me more justly. I have a presentiment that—for good or for evil—our fates are linked."

His words struck Esther numb—they had the ring of stern and unmistakable conviction. While she shuddered—averting her head, lest she should be fixed by his masterful gaze—the Golden Dwarf leapt to the saddle and spurred off at a gallop. Esther walked on, feeling as though she had dreamed it all.

The direction she had chosen led her past the gates of the avenue that debouched from Dering House. Here she was drawn out of her semi-stupefaction by a welcome encounter. She met Felix Dering.

He was pacing towards the High Street—pacing with an abstracted gait and a despondent mien. Esther hastened to overtake him; when, at her call, he halted and turned, she was shocked to see how ill he appeared.

You've spoken to your friends about "The Golden Dwarf," of course?

"THE CAPTAIN'S ROMANCE."

THE "tramp" Caledonia was a type of steamer now, happily, fast becoming extinct. Lloyds and the Board of Trade are so lynx-eyed in these latter days, so watchful of the interests of sea-going people, that it is practically impossible for such ill-built, ill-found craft as the Caledonia to navigate the high seas with impunity.

In this particular instance vessel and commander may safely be said to have been fairly on a par.

A good seaman, as average foremast hands go, presumably too, a man to be relied upon where brute courage, and dogged endurance were required, John McTaggart as a navigator had but little reputation, that little, indeed, being of a decidedly doubtful character.

Two ships in his time had he lost, on each occasion having had his certificate suspended; an official intimation of absolute cancelment being given should "misfortune" befall him a third time.

But this troubled honest John not a whit, for there are owners in plenty only too ready to employ masters with a damaged certificate at a small wage; the very fact of the skipper's shadiness giving them a possible opportunity of using him to advantage, so that, given an unscrupulous and greedy owner, John might always be sure of a ship—of a certain sort.

So much for the Captain; it being merely added that he was a hard-headed Scotchman of early middle age; keen on the dollars, and alert at all times and seasons, and in all places to make things work together for his own benefit first, and then, if there was anything left worth having, for the good of his employers.

The Caledonia was a worn out, patched-up specimen of its class, hailing from Dundee; its crew being made up of contributions from well-nigh every nationality under the sun. With the exception of the mate and the engineer, and, of course, the skipper, there was not an English-speaking tongue on board. As with every community of "all sorts and conditions," there was good and bad, the latter decidedly predominating.

One Ah-Lu, a villainous-looking Chinaman from Singapore, and an insidious breeder of mischief, was an easy first in an estimate of forecastle wickedness. More than once had he been caught by Harris, the mate, in some flagrant act contrary to rule, discipline, and even the elementary principles of common honesty. But Ah-Lu was a true Celestial, and took everything, warning and threat alike with imperturbable good-humour. That he did not forget will be seen later on, when opportunity came for a full revenge without let or hindrance.

The Caledonia, according to the nautical habit of "tramps" in general, pursued her wandering, vagabond course from month to month, and from year to year.

At the time of this writing she was cruising, apparently idly, but with her eyes very wide open, in that Pacific region which borders closely upon the famous Barrier Reef and New Guinea.

That she was on the look out for a paying cargo was evident, she being light in ballast, and with an unpleasantly suggestive wealth of freeboard.

Chief Officer Harris had vainly tried to worm the ship's destination out of the "old man," but with proverbial caution the canny Scot declined to bite.

In the neighbourhood of New Guinea, there are islands innumerable; some absolutely unknown to the ordinary navigator. It is from the natives of these islands that a large percentage of the so-called "hired labour" for the Australian continent is recruited. That it is a thinly veiled system of slavery goes without saying, and is hardly denied. Harris knew all this well, and was shrewdly suspicious as to the description of cargo contemplated by Skipper McTaggart. Undue scrupulousness was not the mate's strong point, but on this subject he had opinions; opinions that were not shared by his superior officer.

It had always been a matter of surprise to him that Ah-Lu the Chinaman and Captain McTaggart were, to say the least, on better terms, than would be ordinarily warranted by their respective positions; but when, as quite recently, he had seen them in earnest confab during his own watch below, and when he was supposed to be out of harm's way, he began to think thoughts, not altogether favourable to Captain McTaggart's personal straightforwardness, and immaculate respectability.

About the third day after this incident, and when they were threading their way through an archepelago of small islets, each beautiful, each romantic enough for place in fairy story, the skipper so far communicated his plan to the mate, as to assure that officer that his suspicions as to legalised kidnapping were unfounded.

"Alter the course three points to the Westward," he said at the close of the second dog watch. "If you make land before 'eight bells,' rouse me and muster all hands. I'm going to turn in now."

The Captain's cabin was a deck house, just abaft the bridge and Harris could easily see from over the weather-cloth right into the place, as long as its occupant kept a light burning.

Shortly after two bells, he saw Ah-Lu, who belonged to the "starboard," or second mate's watch, creep round from the waist, and quietly opening the door of the Captain's room, slip silently inside. It may be interesting to describe in brief what took place.

"All right!" said McTaggart in a low voice, "stand over by the door," he himself was lying in his bunk; "Now, you're sure about this woman: that she has the gold and other things you say; and that it will be an easy matter to get her on board, and afterwards bring off the treasure?

"You're sure, eh? For if you're making a fool of me I'll wring your yellow neck as I would a rat's."

"Allee same good, allee same light," replied Ah-Lu, "me makee showee you; you givee me plenty dolla; allee same velly much glad."

"Well I hope so," said the skipper again, "for if not, you know what's in store for you. You've got everything ready for'ad as we agreed?"

"Eblyting."

"Good! then go below again, and keep awake till you hear that land's made, and then come aft to me, sabe?"

"Me sabe," and the Chinaman disappeared as silently as he had come.

The mate could not well notice this contravention of discipline, the wandering about the deck during watch below, seeing that the Captain himself was implicated, but he had seen enough to tell him that something unusually underhanded was afoot, and that he would probably be called upon before long to declare for or against Ceasar.

"The Adventures of an Actress" are coming. See Editor's Page.

At seven bells the look-out forward announced "land" in sight, and, agreeably with his instructions, Harris roused McTaggart who, in less than five minutes, was on the bridge beside him.

In less than half-an-hour the Caledonia steamed at half-speed through a narrow inlet, wooded on either hand down to the water's edge, into a land-locked little harbour, and immediately dropped anchor.

The mate watched with astonishment the Chinaman, Ah-Lu, with three Malays, go, as by preconcerted arrangement, to the starboard quarter boat, and casting loose its lashings, rapidly lower it. Into it they descended and rowed away quickly for the shore.

They had scarcely made half the passage, when Harris hurriedly addressed McTaggart.

"There's a boat putting off, sir. I can't see very clearly, but it seems to me that there's only one person in it."

The Captain appeared a bit disconcerted, but said nothing, although evidently irresolute in the face of an unexpected difficulty.

The shore-going boat held on its way, only stopping a moment that Ah-Lu might see if there was any signal of recall from the Caledonia's bridge.

Meanwhile, the long, narrow canoe, impelled by sweeping steady strokes of the paddle, drew near the ship.

In anticipation of a visitor the mate cast over the side a rope ladder, the captain looking on and still saying nothing.

A grating noise along the vessel's side, and before either of the two men could prepare themselves for whatever might eventuate, a girl, tall, dark, lissom as a panther, and clothed in nothing save a brown cotton robe, wound round her in oriental fashion, and leaving her arms free, lightly ascended the side. Her hair, very plentiful, was worn in a large knot at the back of her shapely head. Both Harris and McTaggart stood for a moment puzzled beyond expression.

She did not look to be exactly native to the locality. There was something about her features and general appearance that suggested Western birth and blood. But then that idea was absurd! It couldn't be! This notion might have strengthened had not the first salutation of the fair visitor dissipated it once and for ever.

"What ship's this?" she said, in the purest "north of the Tweed" vernacular, which the reader is spared out of sheer merciful consideration for him or her.

"I beg pardon!" stammered McTaggart, "do they raise Scotch lassies in these parts?"

"Sometimes," she laughed, showing a set of white teeth that a society beauty might envy. "What is your boat gone ashore for?" she continued, with a contraction of her brows.

"Just to see after water and fresh provisions," replied the other, a trifle unhesitatingly.

"What? In the night? I'm afraid I must beg leave to question the wisdom if nothing else of that explanation, Captain——"

"McTaggart, ma'am."

"Captain McTaggart; and to set your mind at ease with regard to your men's safety, and so on. I would say that by this time they have been received, and well looked after by my servants."

"Oh!" that was all McTaggart could say.

"Should you really desire the things you mention," said the lady. "perhaps you will be good enough to send your chief officer (this gentleman, I presume, indicating Harris graciously) on shore at daylight."

"At once ma'am, at once," replied McTaggart hastily, over whom a curious feeling of admiration for his visitor was creeping almost unconsciously.

"As you please," she replied.

"Mr Harris, you hear! take Chips and bring back what's necessary. Steward!" a white clad Malay appeared at the call. "Make tea and set it in the saloon."

The lady did not seem in the least afraid at the prospect of a tête à tête with Captain McTaggart, but appeared highly amused.

During the meal, she told him that many years before, her father, Captain Hector Johnstone had been taken ill while anchored in this spot. That she, who always sailed with him, had accompanied him on shore, nursed him for a month; and when, at the end of that time he died, she, (the ship, the Rothsay Castle of Glasgow, having sailed under the command of the mate) was left alone with the natives who had been more than kind to her, and with whom she had remained ever since. Into further particulars or details she did not enter, although her companion was eager to know everything to the fullest extent.

His attempt to ingratiate himself with Miss Johnstone met with little encouragement, for once in his life, at any rate, he had met with his match. She read him like a book, the more extraordinary, seeing the lonely life she had led for so long, and the small opportunity she had had for the study of nature, human and otherwise.

Anyway McTaggart's love making was a miserable failure, and when, in the course of a couple of hours, Harris returned with a tale, not altogether unexpected by one of his listeners, of attempted robbery and murder, he felt that the romance he had chalked out for himself had vanished as completely as his own good name in British seafaring circles.

It seems that on landing Harris had found that Ah-Lu and his satellites had overpowered their guard, who had had them in custody since arrival, and that but for his intervention and prompt use of a certain weapon of precision, the conspirators would have been enabled to work their will.

"I had turned," said the mate, "after disposing of the three Malays, to settle matters with that Chinese devil, when he anticipated me by nearly burying his knife in my back. It's a nasty smack, but might have been worse; so I'll be content and thankful. Captain McTaggart, you'll have to take four names off your ship's books, for Ah-Lu has gone to join his three mates in the 'happy hunting grounds,' and needs but an undertaker now to make things all square and comfortable."

* * * * *

With the morning light the Caledonia up-anchored and got under weigh, leaving behind her Chief Officer Harris, whose wound promised a good two month's cessation from active life.

The fairy princess, Helen Johnstone, was a more than efficient nurse, and should you be in that part of the world, and seek hospitality at the hands of Mrs. Harris, née Johnstone, you will find as devoted a couple and as happy a home as is to be found in the whole wide world.

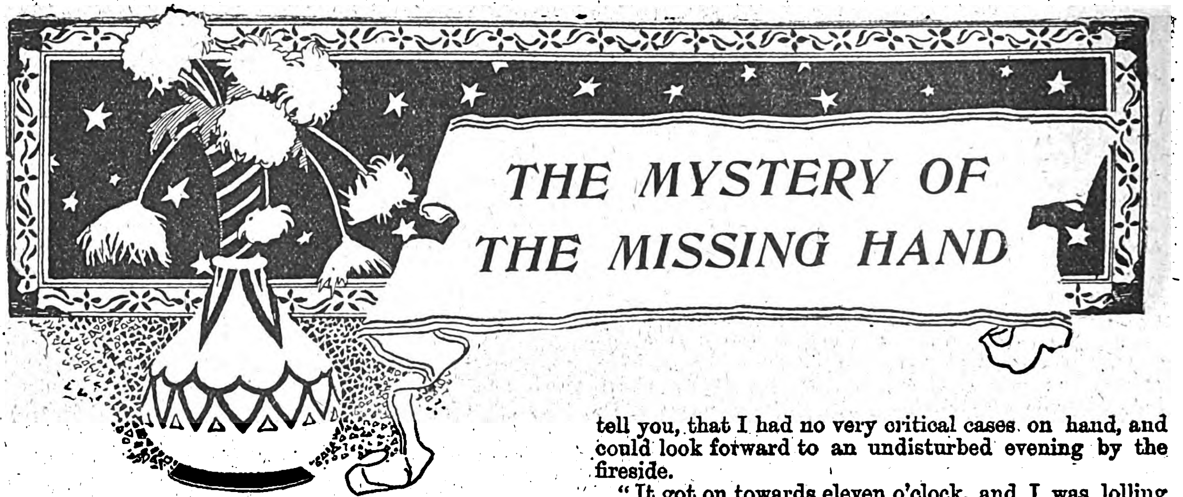
Hazel Harlow's stage career will fascinate you.



THE MYSTERY OF THE MISSING HAND

Maxwell Travers, a young surgeon from Guy's Hospital, whom I happened to know very well, was acting as locum tenens for a Dr. Hayward in some out-of-the-way corner of Norfolk; and, feeling rather cut off from the world I suppose, asked me to run down and spend a few days with him.

As I had nothing particular on hand at the moment, I packed up my traps at once and started for Norfolk. I did not anticipate anything in the way of excitement or adventure; indeed, I was inclined to imagine that I would find the life down there as humdrum and monotonous as it usually is in one of these sleepy little country towns.

But I was mistaken. On the first evening of my arrival a very tragic and sensational affair was brought under my notice, which presented all the elements of a deep and baffling mystery.

Travers, I discovered, was buried away in a little place called Frinton, a good five or six miles from the nearest railway station.

It was situated on the shores of the Wash, just where the south-west corner of it eats into the land between Norfolk and Lincoln.

We were seated before the fire after dinner, the pair of us, making ourselves comfortable over whiskey and cigars, when Travers suddenly looked up as if he had some interesting communication to make.

"By the way," he said, "I had rather a curious adventure last night, which you might like to hear about."

"What was that?" I asked, pricking up my ears at once.

"A very singular and mysterious affair, indeed," he returned, with a puzzled expression upon his face. "I can't for the life of me imagine what was at the bottom of it."

"Out with it, then," I urged. "Let's hear all about it."

"Well," he said, turning to me, "I don't know what sort of weather you had in town last night, but here it was raining cats and dogs, and blowing half a gale at the very least. The Wash was roaring and tumbling about in a boisterous manner, and the rain drove hard against the windows. I was thankful enough, I can tell you, that I had no very critical cases on hand, and could look forward to an undisturbed evening by the fireside.

"It got on towards eleven o'clock, and I was lolling in the armchair here, half-lulled to sleep by the raging of the storm outside, when a thundering knock at the hall door made me jump as if a pistol had been discharged close to my ear.

"I shuffled out into the hall in my slippers, wondering if some accident had occurred, or what could be the meaning of this hasty and imperative summons.

"The moment I opened the door my eyes fell upon the tall, dark figure of a man, standing there in the darkness and wet. He was so muffled up that I could scarcely distinguish his features; but yet there was a certain nameless air about him, that told me I had no ordinary person to deal with.

"Before I could open my lips, he hurriedly inquired if I was the young surgeon who had come down to take Dr. Hayward's duty. I assured him that I was, and asked what I could do for him.

"In a quick, abrupt, and somewhat agitated manner, he jerked out that a friend of his had met with a serious accident, and urged me to accompany him without an instant's delay. I verily believe he would have dragged me off just as I was, so great was his impatience.

"I tried to get in a question regarding the injury, but he cut me short by saying that there was not a moment to be lost. I gathered from him, however, that it was something in the nature of a severe wound, which had occasioned considerable hemorrhage, so much so, indeed, that the patient's life was in imminent danger. With this scanty information I had to be content.

"I begged him to step inside until I was ready, but he preferred to remain where he was. When I joined him again in a minute or two, he strode off at once through the darkness, and I had to step out pretty briskly in order to keep pace with him.

"We had not gone far when, greatly to my surprise, my companion turned aside abruptly and made straight for the beach. I stumbled along, half-blinded by the rain, and wondering where on earth the stranger was leading me to. As we neared the water's edge I made out the outline of a boat, hauled up on the strand, with two dark figures in oilskins standing beside it. Towards this spot we directed our steps.

"Before I had time to put a question the stranger hurried me on board, and took his place beside me in the stern. The next second the men shoved off; the boat was headed in an oblique line across the corner of the Wash, and we made for a point on the Lincoln shore with all possible speed.

"On the way across my unknown friend never opened his lips. Once or twice I thought of questioning him, but a glance at his dark, silent, brooding figure chilled me and threw me back upon myself.

"I was not sorry when we got to land, for it was not at all the sort of night one would choose for an excursion on the water. As I jumped out on to the strand and looked around me, I caught the glimmer of a lantern twinkling through the wet on the road above us. A trap was waiting there under the dripping trees. I was bundled into it with scant ceremony; the tall stranger swung himself up beside, seized the reins, and off we drove.

"The blackness of the night and the driving rain prevented me from noting what direction we took, especially as the trap was without lamps. I am inclined to think, however, that we did not proceed far inland, for I could hear the roar of the Wash distinctly the whole time.

"In about half-an-hour we swung round into a bye-road, through a regular tunnel of trees, where it was so dark that you couldn't see your hand before you, and finally came to what looked like a huge iron gateway. The groom sprang down from behind, threw open the gates, and we dashed up a fairly long avenue. The next minute we alighted before a large, solid-looking country mansion.

"I had not the faintest idea where I was, or what was the name of this house. Nor was I given much time to look around me.

"The stranger hurried me through the hall, and led the way to a great, gloomy dining-room, furnished in the cumbersome, old-fashioned style.

"At one end of the room I noticed a sort of alcove across which heavy curtains were stretched, and tightly drawn together.

"My companion placed a chair before this screened opening, settled a soft cushion upon it, brought the lamp across, and stood it on a small table close at hand.

"'Will you be good enough to remain just here?' he said, indicating the chair, when he had completed his preparations.

"Without another word, without the slightest attempt at an explanation, he hurried away and left me to my own thoughts.

"Up to this moment I had been given little time for reflection, for it was more or less of a rush from start to finish.

"But now, as I stood there alone in the silence of this great, dimly-lighted room, one or two very singular circumstances forced themselves upon my attention.

"In the first place, why had I been brought here from such a distance? Surely, in a case which appeared to be so urgent, these people could have obtained the services of a medical man nearer home. But instead of that, they had gone to the trouble of fetching me all the way from the other side of the Wash.

"I was turning this over in my mind, and seeking in vain for a satisfactory explanation, when my attention was attracted by a sound in the adjoining room. At first there was a confused shuffling of feet, a murmur of voices, amongst which I detected the deep tones of my late companion, and then a long-drawn, shuddering moan. After that it seemed as if a couch or something was wheeled into the alcove, and I could hear the laboured, painful breathing of the patient within a few feet of me.

"As I stood there, wondering what would come next, I noticed a slight movement in the centre of the curtains. The next moment they were drawn aside an inch or two; a long, slender arm was protruded through the opening, and laid gently upon the cushioned chair. The lower extremity of the arm was swathed in blood-stained bandages; but there was something about the shape, from the wrist downwards, which struck me as being remarkably odd.

"It was in a very perplexed and disturbed state of mind that I set about removing the bandages; and then—good Heavens!—I got such a shock that I almost collapsed on the spot. The hand was gone! It had been severed from the wrist by a clean, sweeping cut, and there was nothing before me but the jagged, unsightly-looking stump.

"Upon making this startling discovery, it was some little time before I could brace myself to proceed with my duties. I found that the wound had been attended to with considerable surgical skill, otherwise the patient would undoubtedly have bled to death.

"It took me a good long time to tie the severed arteries and do all that was necessary. Beyond a low moan or a stifled gasp occasionally, the patient—I could not tell from the appearance of the arm whether it was a man or a woman—never uttered a sound throughout the whole operation.

"When I had replaced the bandages again, the arm was withdrawn behind the curtain, and I turned to find the tall stranger standing silently behind me.

"I saw by the look on his face that it would be perfectly useless to address a single question to him, and so contented myself with giving a few general directions. He thanked me very courteously, expressed his regret at having been compelled to call me out on such a night; and, more to the purpose, laid five guineas upon the table.

"He said nothing, however, about me repeating my visit, but conducted me to the door and there took leave of me.

"I was driven back to the spot where we had landed, stepped into the boat again, and reached home about two o'clock in the morning, drenched to the skin, and pretty well done up into the bargain.

"That was my adventure," he added, after a pause. "And I think you will admit it was a singular one."

Without a doubt it was; one of the most singular which had come under my notice for a long time. I felt convinced that there was something very queer at the bottom it all.

One fact, the significance of which had probably escaped Travers, struck me forcibly. It was clear to me that the stranger's object in fetching a medical man from such a distance was to avoid giving rise to talk in the immediate neighbourhood. Taken in conjunction with all the other circumstances, it showed that these people, whoever they were, had something to conceal. What it was exactly, I would have given a good deal to find out.

"Did you form any opinion as to how the accident occurred?" I asked. "That is, if it really was an accident."

"No," replied Travers. "I can't say that I did."

You've spoken to your friends about "The Golden Dwarf," of course?

"And you saw nothing of the person behind the curtains?"

"Nothing, except the arm."

"Which arm was it?"

"The right."

I was silent for some little time, pondering deeply over this extraordinary and inexplicable affair. Then I looked up at Travers again.

"I suppose you have a general idea as to the situation of that house?" I said.

He saw what was in my mind, and refused to be drawn.

"It won't do, old boy," he said, shaking his head. "You mustn't go prying into these people's secret. It would be distinctly dangerous. I can assure you, from what I saw of him, my friend of last night was not at all the kind of man to be trifled with."

Nevertheless, in the course of the next day or two, I managed to pump him very effectually by displaying a well-feigned interest in the topography of the country adjoining the Wash. When I considered that I had enough information to go upon, I slipped away quietly one afternoon while he was out of the way, leaving word that I might not be back until late that night.

I hired a small boat and pulled across to the point where I reckoned Travers and the stranger must have landed.

On reaching it I dragged the boat well above high water mark, hid the oars among some bushes, and took to the road.

It was a long and weary hunt, and more than once I felt half inclined to abandon the thing altogether. But at last, by dint of much questioning at wayside cottages, I reached the tunnel of trees described by Travers, and a minute or two later stood before the massive iron gates that gave access to the grounds.

It was quite dark by this time, which suited my purpose admirably, for I had no wish to be seen prowling about the place.

The gates were locked, but I managed to clamber over the wall a little lower down and approached the house in a very wary and circumspect manner.

It seemed, at first sight, to be almost deserted, so silent and gloomy did it appear. There was scarcely a light to be seen anywhere.

As I stood behind a tree a little way off, and gazed up at the darkened building, I could not help wondering what secret was hidden behind those four walls.

Gradually, by slipping along from tree to tree, I worked my way round to the back. Here there was a long, narrow strip of sward, something like a bowling alley, bordered on either side by a thick hedge and tall elm trees. At the further extremity, about fifty yards from the house, was an ivied ruin, which must have been the former residence of the family.

I was peeping over the hedge, and looking cautiously around, when I saw a dark figure gliding along at the opposite side of the alley. The man, whoever he was, made straight for the ruin, stood for a moment or two under the ivy-clad wall; and then—vanished! He disappeared as suddenly and completely as if the ground had opened and swallowed him up!

This was getting interesting. I felt I was upon the track of the mystery now, and that if it could be brought to light it would prove something of a very startling nature.

I was debating as to my next move, and wholly absorbed in watching the ruins meanwhile, when I was considerably startled by hearing a footstep close behind me. The next second a cautious voice whispered in my ear:

"Seen anything?"

I whisked round at once; and, to my utter amazement, found myself face to face with a police-inspector.

I really think that, for the first second or so, he was almost as much taken aback as I was myself. He had evidently men on the watch, and had mistaken me for one of them.

But he quickly recovered from his surprise.

"What are you doing here?" he asked in gruff and suspicious tones.

The situation was decidedly an awkward one, to say the least of it, and I thought it better to be perfectly candid with him. I told him my story in a plain, straightforward manner, winding up by relating the curious incident I had just witnessed. That appeared to impress him rather in my favour, but still he displayed an unmistakable desire to keep me under his wing until he had more convincing proof as to the honesty of my intentions.

"We'll sift this yarn of yours later on," he said, in a non-committal sort of way. "Meanwhile, you had better stick close to me; and let me warn you that if you try to give me the slip you will get yourself into trouble."

He moved back a little, got behind a tree, and flashed his lantern cautiously. In less than a minute we were joined by about six or eight constables in plain clothes, who looked at me very curiously as they came up.

A whispered conference followed; and then the inspector moved away towards the ruins, motioning me to follow. At his request I pointed out the spot where I had seen the man disappear, but at first we could not discover an opening of any sort.

I was groping about amongst the ivy when my hand suddenly encountered an iron knob. I drew the inspector's attention to it at once. Upon investigation it proved to be the handle of a small door, which was completely hidden by the thick tangle of ivy that hung loosely down in front.

The inspector got the door open, lifted the matting of creeper, and stepped inside. I followed closely at his heels. Three of the constables accompanied us; the rest were left on guard outside the ruins.

We groped our way along a musty passage until we were brought up by a second door. Passing through this we descended a flight of stone steps, where we had to tread with the utmost caution, and found ourselves in a dark underground cellar, as damp and chilly as a vault.

We moved across to a door in the opposite wall, which gave access to an adjoining cellar; upon entering which we saw at once that our quest had well-nigh come to an end, and that we were close upon a discovery.

Straight opposite us was another door, the upper portion of which had been perforated with a number of round holes, as if to admit the air. A strong light streamed from all of them,

The inspector tiptoed across, and soon had his eye glued to one of the holes. I followed his example. As I gazed through that tiny aperture the sight I beheld was so astonishing, so extraordinary, that it was with difficulty I repressed a gasp of amazement.

The "Adventures of an Actress" are coming. See Editor's Page.

Before me was a long, underground chamber, lighted by lamps suspended from the ceiling and shaded so as to throw the glare downwards. Along each of the side walls ran something that looked like a workman's bench, upon which were ranged a number of tools, copper plates, and jars which seemed to contain chemicals.

A rough deal table occupied the centre, and upon it stood a couple of curious-looking machines, some smooth, polished stones, and other remarkable paraphernalia, of which I could not even guess the use.

If you add to all this the fact that four or five men were busily at work there in their shirt-sleeves some at the benches, some at the table, you will scarcely wonder that I was both bewildered and mystified. I could think of no other explanation than that we had stumbled across a secret lithographic establishment or something of the kind.

And then, like a flash, the truth dawned upon me. Forgers! Forgers of bank notes!

Scarcely had I made this startling discovery than the inspector pushed me aside, threw open the door, and dashed into the room with his men at his heels.

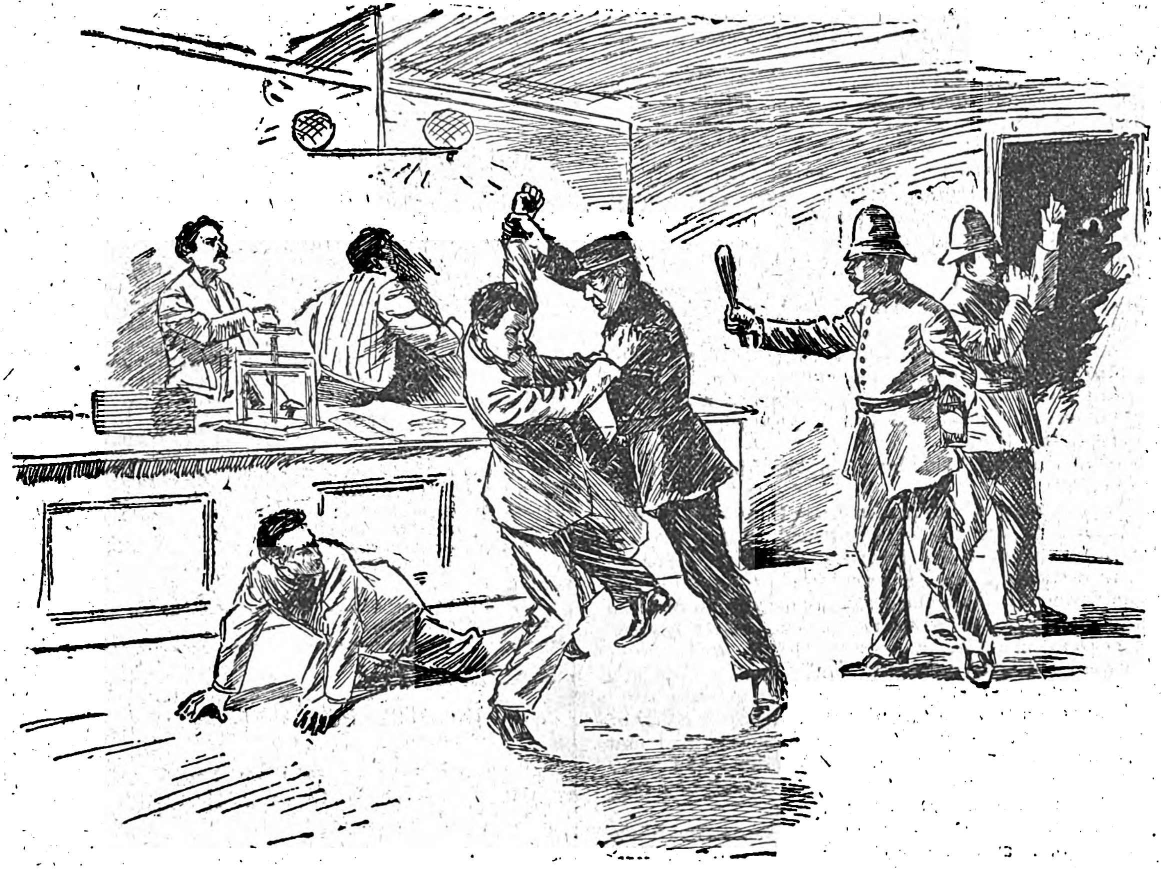
Taken so completely by surprise, the astonished forgers offered a feeble resistance. One or two of them showed fight though, and for the next five minutes or so there was a lively time in that cellar. A tall man, whose appearance differed very materially from the rest, and whom I took for the leader of the gang, had contrived to dart out through a side door, but the police did not take the trouble to follow him, knowing that he would fall into the hands of their comrades outside.

I took no part in the fray, of course, merely standing at the door and looking on. But through it all I was conscious of a most unearthly clamour behind a closed door at the other end of the cellar. And now, when the scuffling was over, the attention of the others was attracted by the extraordinary racket.

"Hi, there! What the dickens is up? Let me out, will you?" bellowed a voice from behind the door.

The inspector looked around the place, took down a key from the wall, and opened the door. Out stepped a very reckless-looking, dissipated character, of the sporting type, blinking his eyes as he came forth into the strong light.

"Who on earth have we got here?" said the inspector, looking at him with the utmost curiosity.



The Inspector threw open the door and dashed into the room with his men at his heels.

Hazel Harlow's stage career will fascinate you.

"Bill Benton, if you want to know," was the cool reply. "The Johnny who chopped off the fellow's hand."

The inspector glanced across at me, and I was glad to find he had so soon received confirmation of my story.

"That's the reason they clapped me into that confounded hole." Mr. Bill Benton went on, "and would have kept me there, I suppose, until they were ready to clear out. But where's that rascal Seaton?" he added, evidently missing the leader of the gang. "Thunder! You haven't let him slip through your fingers, have you? He's at the head and tail of all this. To think of his having a nest of this kind here, where he hatched these bad eggs," and he pointed to a number of forged notes on the table.

At the inspector's request Benton and I accompanied him to the house, the constables being left in charge of the prisoners. We had some difficulty in gaining admittance; but when we got in at last, and proceeded to make a search, we found the injured man lying in one of the rooms upstairs. He was a slight, good-looking young fellow, almost effeminate in appearance. I noticed that his remaining hand was as slender and delicately-shaped as a woman's. He was, in fact, a skilled engraver, a regular artist in that respect, and the most useful man in the whole gang.

When we went downstairs again Benton told us his story, and I also learned some interesting facts from the inspector. From the two combined I gathered that the ringleader of the band, Hartley Seaton—who, by the way, was the individual who had routed out Travers on that stormy night—was a man of good birth, but one who had gone utterly so the bad. He had got into touch with this gang in London.

Some months ago they disappeared from their old haunts, and were lost to sight for the time being, though it was known that they were still conducting operations in some part of this country.

It appears that Seaton, who knew Norfolk well, had rented this house from the owner, and established himself there with the whole gang. One or two of them passed as his guests, the rest as his servants.

Having fixed upon the cellars in the old ruin as the best place for their work, it became necessary to scare away any chance intruder, for there were a number of people about, labourers and others, who might wander in there at any time.

They accomplished this by a simple trick—and a pot of red paint.

Seaton sent one of the gardeners in there at nightfall, and the fellow was almost frightened to death by the appearance of a hand dripping with blood, which protruded from the wall right before his eyes. That was quite enough. The place got the reputation of being haunted, and not a soul would venture into the ruins even in broad daylight.

All went well until the worthy Bill Benton appeared upon the scene.

He happened to be in the neighbourhood for a day or two, dropped across Seaton by accident—he had met him frequently in sporting circles in London—and coolly invited himself to the house. Seaton could not very well refuse for fear of exciting suspicion.

In the course of the evening some reference was made to the ruins; and the host, wishing to keep this troublesome guest from prying about there, related the incident of the bloody hand.

Benton said nothing at the time, though he immediately suspected some trickery. Later in the evening, while Seaton's back was turned, he armed himself with a cutlass which he found in the hall, procured a lantern, and slipped out to explore the ruins.

He prowled about the rooms on the ground floor, and then made his way down to the cellars. As he was moving along the passage below, the bloody hand appeared out of the wall straight before him.

On the spur of the moment he made a desperate slash at it with his cutlass, and severed it from the wrist.

The appalling yell which rang out on the other side of the wall so startled him that he remained standing there in a sort of bewildered stupor.

He was soon surrounded by the forgers, who dragged him away and confined him in the cellar from which we had just released him.

Meanwhile the police had been put on the track of the gang by a former associate of theirs. They planned this raid, at which, by the merest chance, I happened to be present.

The curious part of it was, though the place was surrounded by police at the time, Seaton contrived to make good his escape. It was generally supposed that there was another secret passage leading to the cellars, besides the one by which we had effected an entrance which was known only to himself.

He had probably reserved it for his own special use in such an eventuality as this, and had made tracks the moment he saw the game was up.

POWERFUL NEW STORY IN PEARSON'S WEEKLY
WHEN THE ROPE BURNS THROUGH STARTS AUGUST 1.

"FETTERED LIVES."

BY HENRY FARMER.

Be sure you order "Pearson's Weekly" to-day as you may be equally sure you will miss it if you do not.

ORDER TO-DAY.

Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a Stereoscope to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, July 22nd. Postcards only, please. The first prize of One Guinea has been awarded this week to Mr. C. R. Fletcher, 53 Hagley Road, Birmingham, whose contribution is denoted by a star thus.*

It is probably the number of tars on board which makes a vessel pitch.

Customer (entering poultry shop): "I should like to see a nice, fat goose." Small Boy: "Yes, sir, father will be down presently."

Winks: "Folks say you always leave immediately after the sermon, so as to escape the contribution box." Jinks (hotly): "It's a base slander! The only reason I start so early is simply to get first pick of the umbrellas."

"Where is Tommy?" asked Mrs. Brown, uneasily, one night last winter. "Well," answered her husband, as he proceeded to fill his pipe, "I won't say for certain. If the ice is as strong as he thinks it is, he's gone skatin', an' if it ain't, he's gone for a swim!"

First Burglar (bursting into bedroom): "Where do you keep your money? Come now, tell us, or I'll put a bullet through your head." Smith: "Oh—er—it's in the pocket of my wife's—er—dress." Second Burglar: "Come on, Bill, we ain't no explorin' expedition, I tell you."

Timid Lady (about to buy a ticket for America) "And is the boat that sails on Saturday perfectly safe?" Agent (gravely): "Madam, I can assure you that in all the time this ship has been in service, and that is now a number of years, not once has she gone to the bottom." Timid Lady (reassured): "Oh, then it must be all right."

The other day a Gordon Highlander invited his wife to visit him at the barracks in Scotland. She did so, taking with her their six-year-old girl. When they arrived, as it happened, the husband was engaged on sentry duty, and so they could not approach him. The child eyed her daddy with a rather sorrowful expression as he passed up and down the square, shouldering his rifle and wearing a kilt. "Mamma," she said in a voice that betrayed a trace of childish covetousness, "if daddy finds the man what stole 'ees trousers, will he gimme dat lickle frock?"

In one of the schools in the East-end where children of all nationalities sit beside each other on the forms, three small boys—one of Irish, another of German, and another of Jewish parentage—all passing as "first-class" in their exams., received from their parents each a silver spoon with a superscription thereon. The day after receiving them they came together and began boasting of their gifts. "On my spoon it says 'A good boy,'" said the little Irish fellow, proudly. "Ya, and on my spoon it says 'A nice boy,'" chirped in the young German. But the youthful Israelite looked contemptuous. "Ach," he said, "on my spoon it says 'Hotel Cecil.'"

Advice to any dramatic author who has written a lengthy piece: "Cut and run."

The man who made "a clean sweep" had a lot of washing to do.

He (impatiently): "You bet if I were a woman I'd make up my mind pretty quick." She: "Then you wouldn't be a woman."

Doctor (to Irish patient): "Do you sleep with your mouth open?" Irish Patient: "Sure, Oi don't know, doctor. Oi've never seen myself whin Oi've been aslape, but Oi'll have a look to-night!"

"Why will you persist in drinking tea and coffee?" asked the doctor. "A milk diet is the healthiest; it contains all the elements of the human blood." "Very true," replied Fogg, swallowing a third cup of tea, "but then, you know, I'm not bloodthirsty."

Waggs: "I see there is a good deal of talk about London having a horseless fire-engine. But that is nothing; horseless fire-engines were in common use a hundred years ago." Jaggs: "You are mistaken." Waggs: "No, I am not; they were hauled by the firemen."

Mrs. Tropford is not as young as she was, but is fairly well preserved, and keeps her age a secret. The other day she was showing a lady friend an old photograph. "Yes," she remarked, "that is a portrait of me when I was five years old." Whereupon Tropford interjected, "Now, my dear, you see I was right after all when I maintained that photography was invented not less than fifty years ago."

Mistress of the House (widow): "Well, Johnson, of course, I'm very sorry to lose you. At the same time I must congratulate you on your good fortune in having this money left you." (Pleasantly) "I suppose you'll be looking out for a wife now." Johnson: "Well, mum, beggin' your pardon, and I'm sure I feel greatly honoured at what you propose, but—er—I'm engaged to a young woman already."

The City Council of Auckland placed a price on the head of every rat in the city, and a grocer's boy became a perfect Nimrod and slew about thirty. At the risk of contracting the plague, he carted his dead along, obtained his scalp-money, and came back jubilant to his master, and told him how much he had made. The master cast upon him an eye of Aberdeen grey, and then remarked quietly: "Weel, weel, ye'll just pay the money to oor cashier, for ye ken the rats is mine, not yours!"

*A rough racecourse tout was hauled before a magistrate charged with assaulting his wife and the police-constable who apprehended him. Asked by his worship what he had to say for himself, he replied: "Well, yer see, it was this way. I comes 'ome, and my missus she jaws me for being boozed, so I gives her one for herself. D'ye brown?" Magistrate: "I scarcely understand what is meant by 'brown.'" The Clerk: "It means 'Do you understand?'" Magistrate: "Oh, yes, I brown. Go on." Defendant: "Then this 'ere copper comes along and begins interferin' wi' us; so I gives 'im a prop for hisself. Do you tumble?" Magistrate: "Do I what?" The Clerk: "Another eccentric word for 'understand,' sir." Magistrate: "Oh, yes, my friend; I tumble. Now, for the assault upon your wife you will go to hard labour for six months. Do you brown? And for interfering with and assaulting the police you will go to gaol for another six months. Do you tumble?"

THE DEAF AT THE TIME OF MOSES.

It is a confirmed fact that fourteen centuries before the beginning of the Christian Era, probably at the time Moses was guiding the exodus of his people towards the Promised Land, learned men were already intent on discovering a remedy for deafness. In the course of translating an ancient Egyptian Papyrus, the origin of which appears to date back to the reign of Rameses II., and which is preserved in the Berlin Museum, there were found two prescriptions for ear complaints, which were then classified under two headings: Heaviness of hearing (deafness) and leprosy of the ears (suppuration).

After these primitive exertions of the contemporaries of the Great Jewish Legislator, more than thirty centuries were to elapse before any important progress was made in the study of aural diseases, and it is scarcely twelve years ago that the remedial treatment for these diseases was discovered by a French doctor, named Drouet.

After a series of unsuccessful experiments, based on the same lines as those of his colleagues, who insisted on treating affections of the ear internally, or through the Eustachian Tubes and the Auditory Canal, Drouet one day reflected that since the diseased conditions of the auditory membranes proceeded from the same causes as those of all other organs, they ought consequently to yield to the same therapeutic remedies. So it was that he conceived his external treatment, based upon the absorptive properties of the skin, which, as is known, are utilised whenever it is impossible to act upon any part of the body by natural means of egress.

The Drouet system consists of a regular application of plasters, which exercise conjointly a revulsive and soothing action. Cut in the form of a crescent they fit exactly behind the ear, upon the Mastoid Process, and while their active properties penetrate the tissues, the healing effects begin to show; the unhealthy secretions and the suppuration diminish, the buzzing noises grow weaker, while the deafness decreases. Gradually the ear recovers its normal condition; all the symptoms have disappeared, and the deaf man now hears

It is right to add that simultaneously with these applications, which are used during the night, an adjuvant medication is usually prescribed to assist the external treatment. In this manner rapid cures are effected. For readers who are interested in this subject let us quote a few extracts from letters which are received daily from patients by the Drouet Institute.

Mr. Edward P., a gardener, twenty-six years old, of Penrith, had suffered with deafness and a discharge from the ears since childhood. "I remember," says Mr. E. P., "having a very bad attack about ten years ago, with both ears. From that time they have grown worse. The doctor says the drums are perforated."

At the time of submitting his case to the Institute, the discharge was still running, and gave out an offensive smell. Deafness was very great. The only treatment that had been tried was syringing of the ears to keep them clean as far as possible. The following letters, written by Mr. E. P. whilst under the Drouet treatment, will show the successive phases of his cure:

May 10th, 1901.

I now write you, as requested, a report with regard to the treatment. I am glad and thankful I am on the way, I hope to a complete cure. I have got perfect relief with the right ear, and can hear with it as well as anyone, the left ear is also improving very rapidly. I can hear splendidly after only one week's treatment. I am also improving in other ways, the nervous and giddy, or unsteady, feeling has left me, so that I cannot complain in any way on any point, as I feel like a new creature altogether. I will write you later.

(Signed) E. P.

Penrith, May 22nd, 1901.

I now write to inform you that after only a fortnight of your valuable treatment, I have now gained a complete and genuine cure. My friends are quite surprised at such a great change in so short a time. Thanks to Providence that I was led to consult you. I shall recommend you to everyone whom I may meet with similarly afflicted. My left ear is now perfectly cured, along with the right one. I can hear splendidly. I caught cold a few days ago, but it did not have the least effect upon my ears as formerly.

Hoping you may be as successful in future cases,

I remain, &c. (Signed) E. P.

Note.—The Drouet Institute have been authorised to give the full name and address privately to any applicant.

While ear diseases are so successfully dealt with at the Drouet Institute, affections of the nose and throat, which are closely connected with the former, are also the subject of special treatment. Here is a case in point:

Miss V. A., of Hove, as the consequence of an ordinary cold in the head, became affected, eighteen months ago, with throat disease. There was constant inclination to clear the throat, the tonsils swell sometimes, and when swallowing there seemed to be a lump in the throat; the voice lost its tone and grew weak, and at times the deafness was very great.

Twice Miss V. A. was treated for "Throat deafness and Catarrh," by means of inhalations and the use of tonics; but, deriving no lasting benefit, this young lady applied to the Drouet Institute for advice. Following the Institute's prescriptions, she soon found great relief, and ultimately a complete cure was obtained, as may be seen from the following letter:

Hove, May 21st, 1901.

I have much pleasure in informing you that your treatment has been quite successful. I have discontinued the medicines for nearly a fortnight (during which I have used my voice a great deal), without any sign of the throat trouble reappearing. So think I may safely say the cure is complete. With thanks, etc.,

(Signed) V. A.

The original letter, with all the others of which extracts have been given above, may be seen in the Autograph Room of the Drouet Institute, where hundreds of letters emanating from grateful patients are kept. The Autograph Room is open to the public every day, except Sunday, from ten a.m. to six p.m.

Let us state again, that a copy of the "Journal for the Deaf" will be forwarded gratis to any applicant. All persons affected with a disease of the Ear, Nose, or Throat should read it, and also ask for the Report Form, which will allow them to submit their case to the Drouet Institute. This form is sent free of charge, and the advice given is always gratuitous. For all additional information write to the Secretary of the Drouet Institute, 72 Regent's Park Road, London, N.W.

Personal consultations are held daily, except Sundays, from two to four p.m. In this case a fee is charged for examination. Special consultations may also be had at any time by making an appointment with the consulting physician.

ANOTHER treat coming! I am pleased to be able to announce that I have secured the absolutely exclusive right to publish a new series of long complete stories, entitled :

"THE ADVENTURES OF AN ACTRESS."

The stories are written by that well-known author, Mr. Donovan Mart, and deal with the career of Hazel Harlow, a young and beautiful actress. In these stories will be vividly told how Hazel Harlow, daughter of a country farmer, came to London; how she joined a touring theatrical company and moved about from town to town; and how she met with countless temptations and trials, and emerged spotless through them all. They will reveal little known sides of stage life; will shed a lurid light upon its dark corners; will tell of its infinite difficulties to a pure and innocent girl, of its petty jealousies and its violent hates; and, in short, will lay bare the naked truth regarding the stage and its votaries in a way never before attempted. The series will begin in the August Bank Holiday number.

Apropos of a subject I referred to last week, the following is interesting:

Some time ago a notice appeared in the Chicago newspapers which dazed some people and shocked others. It was printed in heavy block type, and was as follows :

"DEAD!

"THE FOLLOWING CABLEGRAM EXPLAINS ITSELF. READ IT.

"Nice, March 21.—M. ——, Chicago; I have the misfortune to announce to you that Mr. Blank, after much suffering, died to-day at 2 p.m. MRS. BLANK.

"In consequence of the sad news of the death abroad of a member of our firm, our store will remain closed to-day, Friday, March 22. Not only a dissolution sale, but the immense stock will be sold at your own price to settle the estate. We must expedite matters.

"Three hundred thousand dollars' worth of ready-made clothing at 27½ cents on the dollar of the original wholesale price. Here is your chance! Avail yourself of it! Our unfortunate necessity is your opportunity, etc., etc."

Though people thought the taste of the surviving partners was execrable, the sale was a success. Then it came out that there was no such person as Mr. Blank, and that no member of the firm had died. The whole thing was an advertisement.

"INVESTIGATOR."—"You are a daisy" is used by Dickens in "David Copperfield" in the sense of calling a person a daisy in the way to express admiration and at the same time to laugh at one's credulity. Steerforth says to young Copperfield: "David, my daisy, you are so innocent of the world. Let me call you my daisy, as it is so refreshing to find one in these corrupt days so innocent and unsophisticated. My dear Copperfield, the daisies of the field are not fresher than you."

"Dun" is a word, the meaning of which is known to everyone who understands the English language. About the beginning of the century a constable named John Dun became celebrated as a first-class collector of bad accounts. When others would fail to collect a bad debt, Dun would be sure to get it out of the debtor. It soon passed into a current phrase that when a person owed money, and did not pay when asked, he would have to be "dunned." Hence it soon became common in such cases to say: "You will have to dun So-and-So if you wish to collect your money."

HERE is a little history help that should be cut out by young people and pasted on the fly-leaf of their English history. By referring to it as they study they will soon learn it, and carry it always :

First William the Norman, then William his son,
Henry, Stephen, and Henry, then Richard and John;
After Henry the Third, Edwards one, two and three,
After Richard the Second, three Henrys we see.
Fourth Edward precedes the Third Richard, then press
Two Henrys, Sixth Edward, Queen Mary, Queen Bess,
Next Jamie from Scotland, and Charles must be reckoned,
By Cromwell succeeded, and then Charles the Second.
After him we had James, who relinquished the throne
To William and Mary, then William alone.
Till Anne, the four Georges, Fourth William all passed—
Victoria then reigned, Seventh Edward is last.

NURSE EVA.

BIBLIOTHECA·BODLEIANA

A Complete Story.

By Mrs. Hungerford.

A WARM, bright day in golden June, a crowded Park, a rushing of dainty wind, soft and pure, such as one seldom feels in this smoky London of ours; and over all a brilliant sun, grown drowsy now, as it seeks its rest, and sinks languorously into the fond arms of the evening.

The stream of carriages are growing thinner. One young man riding a handsome chestnut in a somewhat careless fashion, as though his thoughts were elsewhere, quits the Row, and turns towards the ugliest thing in creation.

Having reached the Albert Memorial he passes through the gate a little further on, and finds himself presently in the midst of a hopeless jangle, composed of cabs, hansoms, drags, and so forth.

Something in the jangle disagrees with the chestnut's temper.

She starts, throws up her sleek head into the very midst of her master's day-dreams, makes a false step, and comes heavily to the ground, flinging her rider, with a horrible crash, right under the wheels of a passing carriage.

It is all done in a moment. There is a cry from the bystanders, a vain attempt to make a clear space, and then a senseless form, soiled and disfigured with dust and blood, is raised by half a dozen rough if kindly hands, and conveyed to the nearest hospital. They pull the bell, and the door being opened, they enter with their ghastly burden, and lay it down within the hall. It is all that remains of the careless gay young man, so full of happy life, who had left the Park only a short time ago.

The house surgeon, passing through the hall at this moment, casts a sharp glance at the unsightly object on the bench.

"What is this?" asks he, and coming nearer, bends over it. His face changes. "Good heavens, it is Sir Rawdon Dare!" he exclaims, in a horrified tone. "Send the matron here at once—see what has happened," he says presently as a tall, handsome woman comes hurriedly up to him. His tone, though low, is agitated.

"An accident?" says she, stooping in turn, over the prostrate Baronet.

"And a very serious one. It is Sir Rawdon Dare. Is there a special ward?"

"One empty."

There is a touch of curiosity in her glance as she examines the death-like features beneath her.

"Let him be taken there. It is impossible he can be conveyed to his own house in his present state."

"It is a chance whether he will ever be conveyed there—alive," says the matron, turning away to give her orders.

"There is another thing," says the surgeon, detaining her. "He must have a careful nurse. You can recommend me one from the wards?"

"Certainly," says the matron, pausing as if to consider. There is a good deal of kindly interest in her compassionate, if somewhat austere, face, as she gazes at the poor crushed figure; just as kindly, however, would she have looked at him had he been the veriest beggar that crawls our streets. "There is Nurse Eva," she says hastily; "she can undertake the case. She is both careful and sympathetic."

And now the wounded man, mercifully oblivious to his pain, is carried by experienced tender hands to a small private ward, and laid upon a bed. The doctors cluster round him. A young woman in hospital cap and apron comes quietly into the room, and stands beside the bed. She glances earnestly at her patient.

Surely that poor blood-bestained creature can have no life in him? There is a long pause; then one of the doctors, who has been stooping over the senseless figure, lifts his head.

"He is not dead—yet," he says. There is little or no hope in his tone.

After a long sleep, as it seemed to him, the sick man woke. He lay silently gazing at the four white walls of the small room in which that strange sleep had taken place, but without wondering why he was there. Thinking, as yet, was too great a task; and so he put it from him. The window was open, and beyond, in the outside distance, there was a waving of green branches, and from still farther on there came to him the subdued roar of unsubdued populace. Inside there was some very curious furniture—or, at least, so he thought it, as his languid glance travelled over it—a huge branch of crimson roses on a small table, a wicker chair, and a girl.

The girl's head was turned from him towards the window. Her body also slightly bent in its direction. It occurred to him that she must be lost in thought. The idle way in which her hands lay upon her lap helped him, too, to this conclusion.

As he watched her, a little sooty sparrow perched upon the window-sill, and looked at her knowingly out of his small eye. She rose, found some bread-crumbs in a funny little cupboard, and returned with them to the window. Of course, when she got there the bird was gone. She seemed in nowise disconcerted by this, but sat down and fell back again into her former thoughtful attitude, and then presently not one but three little sparrows came and carried away some of her donation. She had not glanced at the bed when getting her crumbs, believing her patient to be dozing; but he, watching her with newly-opened eyes, had seen her face.

It was a revelation. It was beauty perfected. He lay quite still after he had seen it, dwelling with a drowsy pleasure on the remembrance of it until some minutes had gone by, and then a growing desire to see it again took possession of him. He felt still so weak and tired that he shrank from giving his voice sound, so, to attract attention, he clutched feebly at the bed clothes, and then made a sorry effort to tap upon the quilt.

In a moment she was alert and eager. She came quickly to him, and bent over him.

"Why, this is good news," she said, in a low, ex-

Sensational stage revelations appear in "Adventures of an Actress."

quisitely soft voice, and with a smile, "you are beginning to be yourself again, are you not? No, do not answer; I know what you would say; I understand you quite."

She laid her hand with a soothing touch upon his forehead; she settled his pillows, and then, going to the door, pressed her fingers on a knob in the wall outside. This brought the house-surgeon to her in a few minutes.

"Come," said he cheerily, nodding to the patient, "this is well; you are to be congratulated, nurse. Our patient is getting on, eh?—eh?"

He said "eh?" a good many times in a pondering fashion, and then took the nurse aside and whispered to her in quite a confidential manner. As he did so, it occurred to Sir Rawdon, in quite a feeble inconsequent way not to be accounted for, that he hated the house-surgeon. Nurse, he had called her. With that face—a nurse. Of course she wasn't a lady, poor thing; but with those little white slender hands to be—a nurse. And with that charming figure and that high-bred—— "No, no thanks, old man, nothing more. See you by-and-by at Lady Stanhope's. Look out, Alys; those bull-terriers are often treacherous——" And so on, again falling into the old delirious state, and babbling over this Alys, whose name had been so frequently on his lips all through his illness.

The nurse was at his side again directly.

"You must expect these little relapses for a while," said the surgeon with encouragement, patting her kindly on the shoulder.

Then came a week when he felt much stronger and could lie contentedly gazing at his nurse with certain recognition in his eyes and no fear of its slipping away from him.

"When may I go?" he asked her suddenly one morning when she was giving him his breakfast.

His question was somewhat ungraciously put. He was, indeed, a little querulous at times; but she, accustomed to the vagaries of sick people, didn't appear to mind it.

"Not for a short while yet," she said. She spoke to him with the intonation one might use to a fractious child, and with a lenient smile. "Are you tired of us already?"

"Not tired of you—no."

"But you want to get back to the other life? Of course, it is only natural." Did a faint, faint sigh escape her here? "Your friends want to get you back there, too."

"It is hardly that," said he quickly. "It is more—that I want to feel myself—myself again. A man!—I am sick of coddling, and physic, and so forth."

This, too, was ungracious, and he knew it when the words had passed his lips. He glanced at her furtively, to see if he had offended her; and though he would have been miserable had he succeeded in paining her, he was still angrily disconcerted at finding she had taken no heed whatsoever of his petulance.

"It is a matter of indifference to her whether I am pleasant or the reverse," he said to himself, with a frown.

"I am afraid you must be content with us for a week or two longer," she said brightly. "But that should not be so great a hardship to you. In your present state, how could you be better off there than here?"

She was looking frankly into his eyes, and the beauty of her expression killed his small touch of rancour.

"I would be worse off," he said, flushing warmly; "I should be without my nurse."

"No; we supply nurses to private cases. You would probably have had one in your own home as good as I am," returned she calmly.

"Still, it wouldn't be you," said he. Then, "Do you like the life here?"

"Yes."

There was as much No as Yes in this answer, and it puzzled him.

"It is a hard life," he said.

"Most lives are hard," returned she sententiously.

This checked him for a time, but the demon of curiosity having made him his prey, he was compelled to go on again.

"What is your name?"

"Nurse Eva."

"I know that. I shall never"—gratefully—"forget that. But your other name, I mean."

It had tormented him inconceivably in his sick moments to think it might be Smith or Jones.

There was a short, but eloquent pause. When it had gone by she turned and looked him fairly in the face.

"I have no other name," she said icily.

She got up from the seat, and moved towards the window.

"I beg your pardon, I'm sure," exclaimed he, horror stricken with shame at his mistake. "I assure you I didn't mean it—I—"

"If you excite yourself you will have a relapse, and not be able to leave us as soon as I have said," interrupted she, with increasing coldness. "Think of the misery of that, and compose yourself."

A suspicion of scorn in her manner checked further speech on his part. He turned on his side and feigned slumber. But he could not get her face out of his thoughts. That last little touch of hauteur had become her. Strange to say—for one in her class—it had suited her, and had seemed to belong to her of right. What a brute he was to ask her such a question. Surely she had a right to her own secrets; and yet—yet he wished now her name had been honest Jones or Smith, and that she had been able to say so.

But he had angered her, and could not sleep without her forgiveness. He was still so weak that sleep at all times was essential to him.

"Nurse," he said presently, in a tone that reminded him of the days when he was a schoolboy and in disgrace.

"Well," said she.

"I—am very sorry I said that," mumbled Sir Rawdon from beneath the bedclothes, "it was abominable of me."

He had now evidently come to the point when a good sound caning was reasonably to be expected.

"You want me to say I forgive you," said Nurse Eva softly, coming up to him again and looking down upon him. "Very good—I say it. Now go to sleep."

"You don't look as if you forgave," protested he anxiously. "If you could only know what I feel about it. You must think me so contemptible—and you so kind to me—and——"

"If that is all, be comforted. I do not think you contemptible," returned she; and even as she spoke a sweet soft smile overspread her lovely face, falling like a healing sunbeam on the repentant invalid.

With a sigh of relief he closed his eyes, and sank into a refreshing slumber.

Then came a day when his nurse entered his room with a very jubilant air. Perhaps it was rather too jubilant an air.

"Rise, prisoner," she said; "the hour of your release has arrived."

He answered her with a reproachful glance, but no word.

She laid the little breakfast tray upon the table near, and began to busy herself with its contents.

"It seems a shame to give you any trouble, now I am so strong again," he said. "And yet—I like to see you doing that."

"You like to see me getting your breakfast ready? A very sensible fancy."

"You misunderstand me," he said hastily, and then stopped abruptly. It was difficult to go on with those large, clear eyes fixed coldly upon him. And, after all, what was it he wanted to say? Yet the very repellency of those eyes only made some vague, unanalysed feeling within his breast the more unendurable.

"Eva," he said suddenly, with a vehemence that suggested hidden passion.

She laid her tiny teapot down slowly, without a suspicion of agitation, and turned her eyes fully upon his.

"Nurse Eva!" she said, with indescribable dignity.

She then gave him his tea, and arranged the tray as carefully as ever before him. If her hand trembled a little, she took very great care it should not be seen.

As for him, he seemed dissatisfied with all she gave him, and toyed discontentedly with his food, and finally told her, almost rudely, to take it away from him.

"This is foolish," she said gravely. "You will want strength for your removal. Try to eat something."

"The very thought of my removal takes away my appetite," retorted he sullenly, rejecting with angry persistence the little dainty trifle she sought to press upon him.

Then the surgeon came in again, and felt his pulse, and asked a question or two, and went through the usual formula.

"All going on as well as we could wish," he said at last. "You have, indeed, made a wonderful recovery my dear Sir Rawdon. Give you my word, there was a time—eh?—eh? Well, and so the carriage is to be here for you at twelve? Hah! glad to run away from us, eh?—eh?"

"Is it safe for me to move to-day?" asked Sir Rawdon languidly. There was no languor, however, in the deep anxiety of his eyes. "I don't think I feel so well as I did yesterday."

"Eh? what? Pouf! nonsense, my dear sir!" said the surgeon gaily. "Invalid's tremors, nothing more. I tell you, you are getting out of our hands more hopefully every moment. We shall be ashamed to prescribe for you soon."

"Perhaps if my going were to be postponed until——"

"Not at all—nothing of the kind. The very change will do you good," said the surgeon cheerily. "Come, come now—speak to him, nurse."

"But supposing I should have a relapse—that would be unpleasant," said this remarkably careful young man.

"Eh? How is this, nurse?" said the surgeon, somewhat perplexed by his patient's pertinacity.

As he appealed to her, Sir Rawdon raised himself slightly on his elbow, and appealed to her too—with his dark eyes. Her glance, passing from the surgeon's face to his, rested there for a moment.

There was entreaty, longing, hope, and something far more than all those in his gaze. She turned away from it slowly, but resolutely.

"There will be no fear of a relapse," she said to the surgeon, in cold measured tones, her eyes bent upon the ground. "It is better, far better he should go to-day as arranged."

A swift change altered the expression of Sir Rawdon's face. Whereas before it was almost imploring it was now proud and stern.

"To-day, then, be it, by all means," he said, in a decided tone. "The sooner the better;" after which he sank back with an angry jerk upon his pillow.

The surgeon laughed a little, and presently went away.

The nurse busied herself in tidying the already scrupulously tidy room.

"In what mad haste you are to get rid of me," said Rawdon at last, finding the silence unbearable.

How cold, how calm, how unfeeling she appeared with that beautiful unreadable face of hers.

"You see I have your interests at heart," she said.

"Mine?"

"Yes. Do you forget how you were pining for your freedom only a short two weeks ago? Now it lies before you."

"You are ungenerous," he said. Then more slowly, "A fortnight is a long time. One may learn many things in it."

"True, you have learned to get well," said she quietly.

"More than that." He flushed a dark red, and held out his hand to her. "I have learned besides to——"

He paused with terrible, unmistakable suddenness. The colour died from his face, and a quick pallor succeeded it. His very lips grew white because of the severity of his mental struggle.

What was it he had been about to do? To tell this nameless girl—this worse than nameless girl, who was ashamed to declare aloud her honest appellation—that he loved her? To ask her to be his wife? He, a Dare, and the head of his house!

His hand sank once more to his side, he breathed heavily, and at length, without looking at her, turned his face from her to the wall. Here a bitter strife took place between his heart and him, but when it was ended his heart remained the victor, and he roused himself and looked round for her.

Of her, however, he found the room empty. During that short but violent battle with prudence and affection, in which prudence had been slain, she had left him—had vanished, as it were. In her chair sat a probationer, a young woman with pale eyes and a snub nose, and a generally afflicted air. He had seen this probationer before. She spoke with a little snuffle in her throat, and was otherwise in many ways most hateful to him.

Now, the knowledge that Nurse Eva was never absent from him for longer than thirty minutes at a time became an intense consolation to him. She would soon be here, and that odious young woman would vacate her chair, in which it seemed a positive sacrilege that she should be allowed to sit. But the minutes crept on, and the half-hour grew into an hour, and the hour into two, and still the probationer sat on, and Nurse Eva made no sign.

The dragging hours were at first a bore to him, and at length became intolerable. And when the probationer rose, and declared it was time for him to rise, as the carriage would soon be here, and when a nurse from another ward came to assist her, he was almost rude to them both.

But time was inexorable and wore away, and at last the carriage was announced, and two or three of his friends and relations came in to congratulate him and help him down to it. The house-surgeon was present also, looking really pleased at his recovery. To him Sir Rawdon turned with a somewhat hurried air, and an amount of passionate anxiety he vainly tried to conceal.

"Where is Nurse Eva?" he said, his voice trembling slightly; "I cannot go until I bid her good-bye, and thank her—thank her for——"

He stopped, and cleared his throat huskily.

"I'm afraid you can't see her to-day," said the surgeon, cheerfully. "She has been somewhat over-worked of late, you see; so when she asked the matron, a couple of hours ago, to give her a holiday to take a run down to Putney, or somewhere, you may be sure she got no refusal. The matron—indeed we all think a good deal of her, and she did seem pale and fatigued, poor girl, when she came down from your room about ten o'clock. I'm glad the day is so fine, both for your sake and hers. She said, by the bye, that you were so thoroughly convalescent that you would require her services no longer. She seemed to me in bad spirits—a little over-done, no doubt."

"No doubt," said Dare.

He said even this with difficulty. Of course he understood it all! That brutal hesitation of his! What woman but would have taken fire beneath such an insult.

His manner in itself was unbearable, presupposing as it did that if he uttered his proposal it would of a surety be accepted. With what sweet dignity she had behaved! She had uttered no taunt, had looked no scorn. She had only withdrawn herself, and taken measures to insure herself against the annoyance of ever being face to face with him again.

But it should not end here. Of that he was determined. He would at least see her once more and compel her to believe that when his craven wavering had drawn to a close he knew himself to be hers, body and soul.

He got down to the carriage some way, and was driven home.

But he was a good deal knocked up by the exertion of removing and suffered a slight relapse that kept him to his bed for a week or so. The old familiar scenes were now, too, changed to him, and touched him as being barren and wanting in many ways.

When he rallied a bit, and found himself in possession of a little of his former strength, the first use he made of it was to drive to the hospital. He was shown into the matron's room, where he thanked her cautiously, if a little absently, for the care conferred upon him whilst under her roof. After that he said casually that he thought he should like to thank his nurse also.

It was with a paling cheek he said this, and with eyes downcast.

"Nurse Eva?" said the matron. "Oh, she left us a fortnight ago. We were all so sorry to lose her, she was such an excellent nurse. I am sure you too. Sir Rawdon"—with a smile—"will have a good word for her on that score."

"Left!" It was all Sir Rawdon could say.

"Yes, almost the day after you did."

"You know her address perhaps?"

When he asked this, he felt like a drowning man grasping at a straw, and he knew the straw would fail him.

"No," said the matron regretfully. She thought him a very kind young man. Gratitude, as a rule, is not an overpowering passion with the many. "But do not fret about that," she said. "I am sure she understood that you would wish to thank her. Yes, she was an excellent nurse—so sympathetic; we were sorry to lose her."

Sir Rawdon rose to bid her good-bye.

"I suppose Dr. Bland would not know her address?" he said.

"No I am sure of that. She went away very suddenly—for family reasons, as she told me—and left no word with any one as to where she was going. Good-bye, Sir Rawdon; so glad to see you thoroughly restored," &c.

Sir Rawdon, returning her farewell, told himself he was not so fully restored as she kindly imagined, and that his strength was by no means what it used to be.

* * * * *

It is a year and a half later, and Christmas Eve. There is no suspicion of invalidism about the handsome young man who, sitting in a first-class carriage with a rather bored expression on his face, is being whirled swiftly northwards.

He had checked his journey by spending one day in Edinburgh, and he felt it dull in the extreme. Even now, when he is hastening on to Aberdeen, the stupidity of his lonely stay there has not worn off.

But he is always dull now, he tells himself, with a disdainful shrug of his broad shoulders, and grows moodier and moodier, until, his journey coming to an end, he finds himself on the chilly platform, with two gleaming carriage lamps awaiting him.

The drive is a long one, and bitterly cold. The change from it to the soft brilliant warmth of a huge hall, hung with many skins and bristling with antlers, is almost more than he can endure with fortitude. As in a dream, he follows the servant across the hall—rose-lit from the two large shaded lamps upon the dark oak staircase beyond—and valiantly suppresses a desire to stay beside the huge log fire for ever.

But the servant mercilessly marches him onwards, and presently he finds himself in a long, low, many cornered room full of people, all more or less in the reposeful attitudes that border upon sleep.

There is a soft sweet subdued hum of slumberous voices, a tender tinkling of delicate china, the music of many spoons.

There are no rose-lamps in this room; nothing but the leaping light of a glorious fire that renders all things clear as day. The divan-looking lounges are covered with tartan, so are a good many of the men, and only a few of them have their nether limbs covered.

Sir Rawdon, still unthawed, stares idly round him. There is a pretty girl in a voluminous arm chair, who nods brightly to him—Miss Adair; and another crouched picturesquely upon the bearskin rug before the fire, who stops her chatter for an instant to gaze at him curiously, and ——

Good heavens! who is that? Who is that sitting over there, with her face, her figure, the very hands of her.

A slender creature, reclining in a low chair, and clad in an exquisite tea-gown—all satin and old lace. She is smiling. One arm, half naked, but mittened to the elbow, is lying gracefully across the arm of her lounge as she leans towards her neighbour; the other is trifling idly with a huge white fan.

Even as Dare gazes at her, spellbound, she laughs, softly, merrily, at some remark made to her by her companion—a red-headed young Scotchman. The laugh somewhat restores Sir Rawdon to his senses. Alas! she had never laughed; her lovely face had always been tinged with a deep melancholy. What madness possessed him to make him think he saw again before him the one woman he had ever loved—the only one he ever should love? And to dream of meeting her here, of all places! A hospital nurse as a guest at The Towers, in that gown, that——

"Dear Sir Rawdon, so glad!" says his hostess—a tall handsome woman—at this moment, coming languidly forward with a smile and a graceful gesture. "So nice to see you again."

Sir Rawdon murmurs something to the effect that he is positively overpowered with joy at the idea of seeing her again; but his words sound vague and unmeaning—to himself, at least—and his eyes are not his own to deal with; they wander incessantly to the low chair and its lovely occupant, and will not be controlled. Who is the owner of that tea-gown?

"I think you know everybody," says Lady Dalruth, at the end of a long sentence, not one word of which he heard.

"Not quite all. I have not the happiness of knowing your pretty friend on the hearthrug, or—or the lady in the low chair over there."

"No? Well, time will cure that. The latter is my cousin, Miss Monteith. You would like to be introduced to her? Come then."

"Evelyn, dear, let me introduce to you Sir Rawdon Dare," she says a moment later.

Miss Monteith, turning slowly, lifts her eyes fully to Sir Rawdon's, and, after a calm comprehensive glance, makes him the faintest salutation.

If he had ever seen this girl before, it is certain that she showed no recognition of ever having seen him. There is no surprised start, no faintest blush, no betraying pallor. Her little bow is cold in the extreme, but, nevertheless, civil. She answers his rather agitated remark with the utmost composure, it is some ordinary thing about the beauty of the scenery round, and hardly requires any acknowledgment save a bare "yes," to which she confines herself. If, indeed, some wild freak of Fate has suddenly changed the Nurse Eva—for whom he has been so persistently searching during all these past interminable months—into this stately, repellent girl before him, she is so clad in an inpenetrable armour of reserve that he cannot pierce it.

And, after all, is it she? Could even Fate play such a trick? Is not all this some cruelty of his imagination, born of his long dwelling on one engrossing desire?

Once or twice during the evening he tried to speak to her, but though she always answered him very gently, still her manner was so cold as to check on every occasion further conversation.

Dropping into the background after a last defeat, he finds himself close to an old beau, a certain Sir Harry Loune, who is well-known to everybody, and to whom everybody is known.

"Wouldn't look at you, eh?" says this old gentleman, with a chuckle. "Don't take that to heart, more than you have got the same tale to tell. She won't look at anyone, not even at the best partis. Pretty, isn't she? Good form, eh? Thing of the season next year, I shouldn't wonder. Lady Dalruth wanted right or wrong, to introduce her this year, but she wouldn't hear of it. Seems to shrink from publicity. No wonder too; beauty has made itself so dooced vulgar of late," says the old gentleman, with a shrug of disgust.

"Yes?" says Dare calmly, but his look is in itself a question.

"She's charmin'—charmin'," goes on Sir Harry, when he has refreshed himself with a pinch of snuff, "and mysterious as she is lovely."

"Mysterious?"

"Rather, my dear boy! Mustn't say a word about it, you understand; but when she was about eighteen, her father, Sir Pagan Monteith, you know—eh—what? Don't want to know? Ha, ha! Very good indeed! Well, he wished at that time to force her into a marriage with a most dilapidated person—an earl, notwithstanding—quite old enough to be his father. Girl wouldn't hear of this sacrifice at any price, and when pressed to it by angry parent, bolted—no one knows where, unless Lady Dalruth may. For three long years she remained incognita. Odd affair, isn't it? Nobody can explain it."

Dare thinks he could. Again the belief that Miss Monteith and his sweet nurse are one is full upon him; but he refrains from making his thoughts known to this old gossip.

"Why can't she say where she was, eh?" says Sir Harry, in a distinctly aggrieved tone; "this deadly silence is very injurious to her, eh?"

"Why should it be injurious to her?" asks Sir Rawdon fiercely.

He turns upon the old baronet with open wrath in his dark eyes. It is insufferable to hear her name bandied thus from lip to lip. And yet— Her name? Whose name? If he lets this madness overpower him, what will the end be? What has that haughty beauty over there to do with his gentle nurse?

Seeing Sir Harry's look of amazement, he hastens to change his tone.

"She looks too proud to be a subject for calumny," he says confusedly, almost apologetically.

But the old scandal-monger has found him slow, and in nowise a kindred spirit; so he hobbles away from him to where Lady Dalruth is standing. Dare, too wearily disturbed in mind to find amusement in his present surroundings, follows his movements with idle uninterested eyes, but presently is attracted by something he hears him saying to his hostess.

"Left him at the point of death," said Sir Harry unctuously, "as he thought; but it was nothing of the kind. Gordon recovered almost immediately. One of the Gordons of Clayne, you know. Fellow who upset him was a cousin, and thought to come in for the property, d'ye see."

"One of the Gordons of Clayne" is a bosom friend of Sir Rawdon's, so naturally he pricks up his ears.

"What did happen to him?" asks Lady Dalruth, looking interested.

"Oh, mere trifle! Nothing vital, at all events. One fellow told me it was a broken clavicle; another, a fractured humerus; but I haven't the faintest idea what either means."

Sound Advice.

If you want to enjoy your Summer Holidays you would be wise to take with you the following sixpenny novels. You cannot have any idea how much pleasure you will derive from reading them, when you are sitting on the beach, or under a shady tree in the country:

"Adventures of an Actress" begin next week.

"You should ask Evelyn for a translation," says Lady Dalruth, with a merry laugh.

Miss Monteith, who had been listening silently to the conversation, turns her eyes upon her. Is there entreaty or simple indifference in her glance? If entreaty, it comes too late; Lady Dalruth does not even see it.

"Miss Monteith?" asks Sir Harry.

"Yes. Didn't you know she has studied medicine, surgery, and all the rest of it?"

"You terrify me," says Sir Harry, with mock horror.

"That is quite a correct feeling for the occasion. She is terribly learned. Aren't you, Evelyn?"

She smiles at the girl, as though in pleasant appreciation of a jest that is known to them alone. But Miss Monteith's return smile is forced and very faint.

"Learned? no. But I really have some taste for that sort of thing," she says quietly, and then turns away, as if anxious to terminate the conversation. In so doing, her eyes meet Dare's.

There is a pause, in which each regards the other with strange anxiety. Then the blood slowly mounts to Miss Monteith's brow, until all her lovely face is dyed a warm crimson. Her breath comes quickly, she wavers, then, with a last defiant, contemptuous glance, she moves away and sinks into a chair at the opposite end of the room.

But to Dare there is no longer even a chance of doubt. Just so has she looked at him when, in a moment of passion, he had called her "Eva" in the hospital, and she had coldly corrected him, just so, no doubt, her large, scornful eyes had rested upon him during that last fateful hour, when he had half declared his love, and had hesitated—and been lost.

With a terrible sinking of the heart he tells himself that he has sinned past forgiveness in her eyes.

The next morning all the world is clad with snow. The soft white fleecy carpet is covering the land far as the eye can see, and is lying heavily on branch and bough.

The Christmas bells are chiming merrily. A soft grey mist is trembling between earth and sky, Over all, the merry sun is shining gaily. It is indeed an ideal Christmas morn.

Luncheon has come and gone, and they are all standing before the glowing fire in the billiard-room discussing the costumes to be worn at a fancy-dress ball, to be given in the neighbourhood some time in the ensuing month.

"One gets so tired of the art rags and the past centuries' gowns," says Lady Dalruth dejectly. "Oh, for something new, something bizarre, out of the common!

"I'm sure I don't know what is to be done about Evelyn. She and I are quite worn out trying to imagine a costume that all the world hasn't seen a hundred times before. The anxiety has robbed me of honest sleep for a fortnight past, I have so set my heart on making a success. But each of my ideas only seems more crude than the last. Dear Sir Rawdon, do suggest something."

An uncontrollable impulse takes hold of Dare. He glances at Miss Monteith, to find she is looking full at him that dreamy touch of scorn that had offended him last night now wide awake within her large eyes. It spurs him to his half-determined purpose.

"Why not try the dress of a hospital nurse?" he says to Lady Dalruth, pale but smiling. "I don't recollect having ever seen it at a ball before, and I think the pretty little cap and apron would suit Miss Monteith admirably."

"Sir Rawdon! What can you know about hospital nurses?" says a pretty girl from the opposite side of the hearth-rug, with an amused laugh.

"Didn't you know I was in hospital for many weeks—summer before last—when I smashed myself up?" returns Sir Rawdon distinctly. "I don't think I shall ever forget the kindness I received there; and at all events I know I shall never, under any circumstances, forget—my nurse."

"Ah, gratitude is a charming virtue!" says the pretty girl, with a second laugh. "Was it her cap and apron you were thinking of just now?"

"Yes. They are indelibly imprinted upon my brain." Again he glances at Miss Monteith. If she has grown a little whiter it is at least only perceptible to a lover's eyes.

"Do you know, the costume sounds well," she says quite calmly. "Let us think of it, Mirabel," turning to Lady Dalruth. "It is the one thing you desire—out of the common."

Lady Dalruth's answer is a little confused.

Miss Monteith looks full at Sir Rawdon, her eyes dilate, and

> "Oh, what a deal of scorn looks beautiful
> In the contempt and anger of her lip!"

With a little passionate movement of the hand, unseen by all but him, she crosses the room with slow graceful step, and disappears through the doorway.

It takes Sir Rawdon but a moment to invent some idle speech, that leaves him, too, free to quit the apartment without arousing suspicion of the real motive of his departure.

Finding himself in the hall, he comes to a standstill, and asks himself what is it he means to do. He cannot forget that last glance of hers, or the passionate anger contained in it.

He feels he would give half his possessions to be able honestly to hate her, and yet knows, by the sheer impossibility of his being able to do this, that he loves her.

As he stands irresolute, one of the footmen passes through the hall. Then and there a sudden resolution comes to Sir Rawdon.

He will go to her, tell her all—lay bare his heart to her, and if it must be, hear from her own lips the "No," that will blast his life for ever. Anything will be better than this crushing suspense.

"Where is Miss Monteith?" he asks the man as he goes by.

"In the library, sir. Saw her go in just now."

Opening the library door he enters the room, and finds himself alone with her.

She is standing at the far window, and with a little start acknowledges his entrance. He would have gone to her, but with a certain impulsive eagerness she too moves and meets him half way. That her late anger is still warm within her eyes is known to him at the first glance.

"So—now you know me," she says defiantly, "are you satisfied? Is your curiosity satiated?"

"I knew that from the first moment. Was I likely to forget?"

Sensational stage revelations appear in "Adventures of an Actress."

"That is the bitterness of it," she says. "Are those three sad years of my life never to be obliterated?"

"From my mind, never! The few weeks I claim out of them were the happiest of my life."

"What brings you to me now?" she demands suddenly "Is there more you would still learn as to the why and wherefore of my going into hospital as a nurse? I warn you I shall give no explanation."

"I do not desire one," says Dare humbly; "I know all about it. Your father's tyranny; your escape from a marriage with that vile old man; your life in hospital —everything. Do you hate me the more because I know all this?"

"Hate you—no!"

There is studied contempt in the curl of her lip.

"Hatred is a strong sentiment; what I feel for you is only indifference."

She goes back to her former position in the window. as though to terminate the interview. But he, having "cast his all upon the die," makes one more effort for dear life. He follows her there.

"Even the worst criminals get a fair hearing," he says. "Let me plead my cause."

"No. It would be waste of time."

"At least, tell me of what I stand accused."

"Listen, then!" exclaims she, turning to him with flashing eyes. "When unkind Fate sent you to that hospital a year and a half ago, and you saw me there day after day, a mere nurse, and—as you believed— unknown and obscure, you deigned to fancy yourself in love with me. Your momentary infatuation went even so far, that as the hour approached that was to put an end for ever to our intercourse with each other, driven by some puerile impulse, you deemed it even possible to declare your love, and offer me your name. But when it came to the point, you quailed; you drew back your half-uttered words; you shrank from allying yourself with one beneath you. My feelings were as nothing to you. Knowing myself scorned, rejected, without being afforded so much as the poor gratification of being able to refuse you, I left the room hoping, praying I might never see your face again. Do you think," with a painful sob, "I shall ever forgive all that?"

"Hear me."

"I will not. If your life, and heart, and title were all at my feet now, I——"

"They are at your feet."

"Then I reject them," returns she with vehemence.

"As you will. But at least you shall listen to what I have to say in my defence," says Dare with dignity. "That morning of which you speak—my last in the hospital—I truly meant, as you say, to tell you of my love."

"Meant! And then—you hesitated."

"I did," said Dare simply. "My name and the honour of my house is dear to me. Is it a crime beyond forgiveness that I should have paused before offering that name and honour to a woman who, though the most beautiful and lovable in the world, was still— unknown?"

"Why should you seek to excuse yourself?" interrupts Miss Monteith haughtily, "I know all that."

"There is, however, one thing that you do not know. You saw that I did battle with myself that morning, but you did not wait the termination of it. Love and duty fought a hard fight, but when it was over, you— that is Love—had won the victory; I raised my head again to tell you all—to beseech you to be my wife, but you were gone. Later on I searched for you everywhere; I advertised, all to no purpose. For eighteen months I sought for you—in vain."

Her face is turned away from him now, but a faint sound, that is either a sigh or a protest, escapes her.

"About all this you must believe me or not, as you will," says Dare quietly. "I have only my simple word to give you, but it is at least a word that has never yet been dishonoured. Will you not say something to me?"

"All I have to say has been said long ago. I cannot forgive you," says Miss Monteith, but as she says it she bursts into tears.

"I will not accept such words from your lips," exclaims Dare, with deep agitation.

And then all in a moment his arms are round her and his cheek pressed to hers.

"Beloved," he says, "have pity on me! Just think of it! You who have a name as old as mine, can you not understand the struggle I endured?"

"I can," murmurs she sadly; "and—yes, I honour you for it. But——"

Here her voice fails.

"Oh, if you could only know what I suffered!" she says, sobbing bitterly.

"I do know it. It was just half what I suffered," returns he, gravely. "Oh, darling, put an end to my misery now—here! Of the two I am the more to be pitied, because if you still prove unkind my unhappiness will last for ever. Eva, speak to me."

"Evelyn," corrects she softly.

"Ah, of course. But you must remember how long you have been 'Eva' to me. What an eternity lies in that year and a half! The very length of my wretchedness should buy my pardon."

"You are a special pleader," whispers she; and then she makes him a present of an arch little smile, and a glance from under her drenched lashes.

"Tell me you love me," persists he.

"I cannot yet. There is first something——"

"Nothing that shall separate us," declares he stoutly.

"There may be. Who—who was that 'Alys' you were always raving about during that dreadful time when you were ill?"

"Alys! My sister of course," says he triumphantly. "Had a letter from her only yesterday, She has been in India with her husband for the past four years, or probably you would have seen her at the hospital during that lucky time when I was ill. Now, what have you got to say?"

He is fast waxing into the wildest spirits.

"Nothing," returns she demurely; "so now let us go back to the others."

She makes a movement as though to go to the door, but he seizes her.

"Oh, yes, there is something!" he says, "and you shan't go without confessing it. Now then—you will marry me?"

"Yes."

"Soon?"

"Ye-es."

"And you are sure you love me?"

"As sure as sure can be!" says Miss Monteith solemnly, with a shameless disregard of maidenly reserve.

THE FOOL.

A Romance of Provincial France.

The fete of the little Brittany ville of Chateaulin was in full swing. From miles around had come the vendors of those things that are necessary to the fullest enjoyment of the day with their wares, and in their scores had flocked holiday makers from neighbouring villages; all merry, all happy, dressed in their Sunday best.

It was in the market place that the crowd was thickest, for here congregated the merchants, and of them all, none had claimed, perhaps, more attention than he who came not as a vendor, but to buy.

An envious, feminine crowd surged before his booth—women, old and young, middle aged, of the working class, and mostly peasants; and they jostled each other with the usual humour of holiday folk in their endeavour to approach nearer to those good lengths of muslins and calicoes, those fascinating bonnets, those handkerchiefs of silk of many colours and all brilliant, which constituted the purchasing powers of the many who had come to buy.

"Sell your hair, ladies, sell your hair," he invited, and he held those brightest flowered foulards right where the sunlight fell, and swayed them gently to and fro; now took a bonnet and placed it mincingly upon his black head; now displayed more of these rolls of cloths and calicoes and muslins that the country-woman might handle them the better.

And the women folk gazed at the bizarre finery, especially the younger ones; lingering over this or that article fondly; and from fingering the goods a hand here and there crept towards the head and entwined itself in the hair bunched thereon.

"Sell your hair, ladies, sell your hair."

The coupeur ran his business eye—an eye that was pleasant and invited confidence—over the crowd of faces that looked alternately at him and at the merchandise he so ostentatiously made show of.

"We take it short or long, black or white, grey or chestnut. Sell your hair, ladies, for a fine bonnet or a length of good calico, or what you will that I have."

"Ah, my dear," sighed one old dame who had tramped a dozen kilometres from her village, "that I had hair like yours."

She addressed her remark to a girl of eighteen summers whose face was crowned with a wealth of auburn hair that her coiffe blanche could not hide.

"I should buy that beautiful length of calico there; how I should like it."

But her hair was thin and short now, and of no decided colour; too thin, too short, and too mixed for the hair merchant to take at any price. It had bought many a bonnet and many a length of calico ere the grey streaked the black, for she was now well on in years.

"It grows again quickly, my dear," she went on, as though begging the loan of a few locks. "Oh, that I was young again!" and she felt beneath her bonnet with her skinny fingers and heaved a sigh.

"Sell your hair, ladies, sell your—Ah! that bonnet for you ma chère?" One girl had lifted her white cap from her head, and taking out the hair pins, her coiffure fell to pieces on her shoulders. The hair merchant felt her locks and eyed them critically. "Well, I don't know if it's worth it," he said, the artful rogue, knowing full well its real value was forty francs, and the bonnet cost not more than two, "but just to start business."

The girl stood on one side. She was soon joined by others, and together they laughed and joked.

"Ah! if I was only La Petite Blanche," said one. "She carries a fortune on her head."

"I have heard," said another, "that le tondeur offered her a hundred francs for her hair last jour de pardon."

"But she's proud, she won't sell it," said another.

"Proud, and a lot she had to be proud of. They are as poor as——"

"But," interposed another, "why should she sell if she doesn't want to? And I don't think they are so poor. Mère Durant has Jules in Paris. He's doing well there, too, I hear. Another year, and perhaps he and Suzanne are to be married."

Soon a dozen chevelures were waiting the pleasure of the coupeur's shears—a dozen heads of hair that would soon each find itself part and parcel of some grand lady's coiffure in Paris or elsewhere.

It was not long ere the women had passed in the chair under the coupeur's scissors and were shorn of their crowning glory, each rising to feel the happier in her possession of a much coveted silk neckkerchief, worth at the outside a franc, or a bonnet of little higher value, or a metre or so of calico or cloth.

When there was no further business to be done the buyer of hair packed up his booth, placed his newly-acquired spoils carefully away, hitched his horse to the trap and left. He was off to the town not far distant where there was a depôt of his patron to whom he sold the hair for hard cash or exchanged it for further merchandise.

He wondered he had not seen La Petite Blanche at the fair. He had ever an eye for her wonderful head of hair, and every time his gaze rested upon it he was tempted to turn thief and acquire by violence what he could not come by honestly.

His very heart ached at the thought of the hundreds of francs he would make was that hair but his. For had he not a purchaser ready waiting for it, the rich wife of Pelloux, the Parisian banker, who told him she would pay three thousand francs for such and such a coil of natural hair?

That was two years ago, but she still waited, for none of the many hair merchants who travelled the country had been able to satisfy her requirements. The coupeur knew that bit by bit, Raoul the great posticher of Paris, was getting a coil together; a thread or so now and then from Normandy, from Vendee, from Brittany, and he sighed as he thought he might lose the profit.

The hair was of the sort the most rare in the world—pure white and waving down a length of nearly thirty inches. Suzanne had not been blessed with it at birth. It was the result of a great fright she underwent when five years old. And with the change in the colour of her hair she passed from being Suzanne into La Petite Blanche.

Now she was nineteen and lived with Mère Durant at Poyran, had lived there ever since her own mother had followed her good man to the grave, lived there and played, and grown up with Jules, the fatherless son of Madame Durant. And Jules was now in Paris—had been there two years and was getting on well in life. At Saint Jean he was coming home for his holidays, and his mother talked and thought of nothing else. And in his weekly letter he spoke of hopes of marriage and a home with his old mother in the capital.

And Suzanne sighed and was happy, till came one Monday which brought no letter from him; miserable when came another and still no letter, and the coupeur, stopping on the way past their little cottage—he had purposely made a détour to see if time had changed the mind of La Petite Blanche—found her and her foster-mother plunged in misery; so miserable that much as he thought of those lovely francs he had no heart to try to persuade the girl to sell hair. He never even mentioned the subject, but learning the cause of their sorrow, laughed and tried to raise them from it.

"Here, ma petite," he said, pulling from his strap a bundle of folded newspapers, "read these and be happy. The course of true love never runs smooth. And, mother," to the old dame, "the lad's all right I'll wager; working hard as he's coming home soon. I'll wager, too, he has written, perhaps his letters have got lost. Anyway I shall be in Paris next week, and I'll look him up and scold him. There's a lovely new romance just commenced in the Journal, ma chère," to Suzanne, "read it and the time will pass the quicker."

The girl in no mood for reading, took the papers, thanking him, threw them on one side.

"I suppose you are going to the Pardon at Carhaix to-morrow," she hazarded.

"No, I am resting. Just going to Aune to arrange my business. Now, cheer up," and with a bon jour he was gone.

To drive her thoughts from their sombre course, Suzanne presently turned to the numbers of Le Petit Journal which the hair-buyer had left, and perused therein the new feuilleton. She could read and write, and was proud of the fact, though of many words she didn't know the meaning, while her writing and spelling were no evidences of high scholarship. But then, in the village no one could read better, and no one could write better, and seldom did either, for not all of them had sons in Paris sending them money, but had to slave from dawn to dark for their poor living; and he would be rich, indeed, who could have afforded the luxury of candle light to read by.

She finished the story so far as it went and wondered how the heroine could escape from the villainous hands of her husband, who was slowly poisoning her with arsenic that he might marry a certain little dressmaker whom he knew was heir to millions and who loved him dearly, unawares that he was married. And wondering she turned to the news, reading the suicides and murders, and love affairs, and thefts. Suddenly she seemed petrified where she sat, her eyes glazed, the type danced before them. Her Jules a thief and in prison! It could not be. And yet here it was in plain type. He had robbed his master of a thousand francs! It was impossible!

She turned to the date of the paper. It was two weeks old. And he had not written for over two weeks. He was to be brought up for trial three days from now. There could be no mistake.

She looked across at his old mother nodding peacefully in her chair, dreaming perhaps of her boy in Paris, a great man, earning lots of money; and Suzanne fell to the floor in a faint.

When she came to, her head reeled. The old woman still slept. It was growing dark. She sat up and again read the terrible news contained in a paragraph of four short lines. It was true. If his old mother knew. It would kill her.

She must be spared the knowledge. Luckily she could not read, and if she had been able to, her eyesight was now too bad; luckily too, no one in the village had read.

If they had known that piece of information she would have heard it ere this.

She tore the paragraph from the paper and held it in the flame of a match.

That night she slept not. She sat through the dark hours on the edge of her tiny bed and rocked too and fro in tears.

To save him, her Jules; that was her one thought. A thousand francs! What a fortune! How could she help to gain it?

It was beyond her. Both her hands flew to her head. There was the price of his liberty. Her hair flowed down on her shoulders. She looked in the tiny mirror on the wall.

She loved her hair, because Jules loved it; how often he told her the fright she would be without it. But what mattered it now? He was in danger, in prison, and might be kept there years.

The buyer of hair would be at Aune on the morrow he had said. He was there now. When it was daylight she would go to him.

He had offered her twelve hundred francs once for her hair. That had been his last offer. Then she was seized with a horrible fear. Why had he not spoken on the subject yesterday? Perhaps he no longer wished to buy her hair. She felt sick at the thought, and she shivered.

When the light came she would make to Aune. She would run all the way. She must see the hair-buyer ere he started off again. With the first streak of dawn she was away, waking the mère to tell her she was going. The old woman dully wondered why, but she never asked; Suzanne often made these excursions.

She returned in the afternoon, but not through the village street. She came to the cottage by way of the fields, for she wished to avoid everyone, but some children playing there saw her, and running home to their mothers told them that La Petite Blanche had lost her hair.

Mère Durant was astonished and angry, and the more because Suzanne placed two hundred francs in her hand and said she had given the rest to the Monastery.

"I confessed to a great sin to the priest," she said. "This is my repentance. And then we have no food, and Jules has never written and sent you money. That two hundred francs will last, no doubt, till we hear from him."

In her anger the old woman threw the notes at her, and she went upstairs and cried, and cried, and cried.

The hair-buyer set out for Paris with his much prized coil of hair. An intimation of his business soon gained him admittance to the presence of Madame Pelloux, and three thousand francs and the hair changed owners, the latter being at once dispatched to the cleaners.

"And now I've a favour to ask of you, madame," said the hair merchant, the business completed.

She signified her willingness to listen to him, and in his plain matter-of-fact way he stated his case.

"Your husband has in his employ a clerk named Durant," he said.

"He had," she interrupted, "he is now in prison; a thief."

"I know," he replied. "The girl from whom I bought this hair is his sweetheart. She lives with his old mother down in Brittany. I could never persuade her to part with her hair. But she came to me two days ago and asked her price for it. She confessed to me her lover was in prison. He had stolen a thousand francs of his employer's money. She was coming to Paris to plead with the employer herself and pay him back the money. She sold her hair, not knowing for whom, for of course I never said, and I told her I was going to Paris and would see the banker for her. She waits now in an agony of fear to hear from me. Will you, madame, can I pray of you to intercede with your husband to set this young man free. Here is the money he stole;" and he put forward the notes for a thousand francs.

The woman had a woman's heart, and there were tears in her eyes when the man had finished. She had a son and daughter of her own.

"It shall be done," she said.

"And she doesn't wish the young man to know anything about this."

"He shall not."

Jules was with his mother and sweetheart in four days' time.

His employer had forgiven him his crime, talked to him of the sin of gambling, given him a thousand francs and told him to go away and be a better man.

He told himself going home he now could marry Suzanne—La Petite Blanche—and live happily ever afterwards. But when he saw her shorn of her beautiful hair, his soul revolted in horror. And she had done this for charity!

He called her a fool, and it angered her.

"A fool for your sake," she said.

He coloured and shivered. Could she know he had been in prison? It was impossible.

"Where is your beauty now?" he asked.

"In your pocket," she said.

A fear gripped his heart. He understood now, she knew. He knew, now, the sacrifice she had made, and would have drawn her to his breast, but she repulsed him.

"She doesn't know?" he asked, pointing to his mother.

"No; she, too, thinks I'm a fool."

"No, no, forgive me, Suzanne," he cried.

And she forgave him.

"A" or "B"? A Story of Diplomacy.

The ambassador looked at me and I looked at the ambassador. It was not by any means the first pause in an exceedingly awkward conversation.

"You see," he remarked suavely, "you also are concerned in this affair. I am glad to observe that you contrive to retain your cheerfulness, but I am bound to point out the fact that—diplomatically, at any rate—you are in a parlous state."

I assumed as lugubrious an expression as possible and ventured to contest his point of view.

"I don't exactly see——" I began, but he stopped me.

"Perhaps not. I will explain. If I am—what shall we say?—removed, my first secretary will certainly go with me. He is supposed to be equally to blame when anything goes wrong; he shares the reward when a small triumph is gained. Now, you are my first secretary, Hamblin, and we are in the devil of a mess; in your own interests I should recommend you to bestir yourself."

I drew a little breath. If I had not been in a way attached to my chief, I should certainly have used it for a different purpose.

As Sir George had remarked we were certainly in a devil of a mess, but it was he himself and alone who had landed us there.

"If you could suggest any way, sir, in which I could be of the slightest use," I remarked deprecatingly, "nothing would give me more pleasure. Unfortunately, we seem to be sitting down before a great wall; it's too high to climb, and there's no way round."

"A very charming simile," Sir George said dryly. "Nevertheless, if you don't get over yourself, or help me to, you won't marry my daughter."

I came to the conclusion promptly that Sir George was an unreasonable and disagreeable old man, but I kept my convictions to myself.

"I hope you will reconsider that, sir," I said most respectfully. "I am very fond of Clara, and I think she cares a little for me."

"Work for her, then," was the prompt answer. "Here's your chance. Get us out of this wretched muddle, and you shall have her—as soon as she likes!"

I pondered. I was very fond of Clara. I began to wish that the situation were not so hopeless. Sir George took up his penholder and marked time with it.

"The affair," he said, "lies in a nutshell; it is as simple as A B C."

"Oh, it's simple enough," I assented—"painfully simple!"

"England," the ambassador continued, ignoring my interruption, "is at war with the Transvaal Republic. Last week there appeared in an issue of a foreign newspaper what purports to be an interview between the monarch of this country and the European representative of the Transvaal Republic. The interview—or, let us say, purported interview—you have read yourself. It is sufficient to remark that, if it was authentic, it was tantamount to a declaration of war against England. Now, you know what an artful old beggar Highbury is! He sends me across by Queen's messenger two sealed dispatches for the Emperor, addressed to him privately. One is marked 'A,' the other 'B.' Now, if the interview had been genuine, I was to have dealt the first blow by presenting 'B,' which is tantamount to an ultimatum, couched in most formal and war-like language. If, on the other hand, its authenticity is denied, I present 'A,' which is a friendly little note, assuring his Majesty that no notice was taken in England of what was obviously a ridiculous canard. You know, of course, what has happened."

"The Emperor has denied the whole story contemptuously from beginning to end," I remarked. "The Transvaal representative was never even accorded an interview."

Sir George flourished the penholder with new vigour.

"Precisely. I accordingly left at the Palace the letter marked 'A,' and, returning here, proceeded to open and destroy letter 'B.' I read it first, and to my horror found that its contents were as per specification of letter 'A,' and that, consequently, the lettering must have been wrong, and the ultimatum left at the Palace."

"I don't quite see where we are to blame, you know," I interposed.

"Perhaps not," my chief remarked dryly. "You see, you are very young. But there is an axiom in diplomacy which you will do well to lay at heart. If anything goes wrong at your charge, no matter who is to blame, you are responsible. Those letters have been changed by spies, most likely, and I think I know who is at the bottom of it. It was probably done while they were in the possession of the Queen's messenger—he admits that he took no extra precautions. That is of no consequence. It is upon us that the blame will fall. There awaits the Emperor a letter which will either plunge us into a ruinous, unnecessary and unpopular war, or else will mean Highbury's resignation, our retirement to a colony, and a most awful climb-down."

"The Emperor," I remarked, "is still at Meritzburg."

"Manoeuvring?"

"Yes he returns to-morrow. To-morrow night that letter will be handed to him."

"You're sure it hasn't been sent on to him?"

"Certain. I happen to know that his commands were most absolute. Nothing was to be forwarded. Von Butz has the letter, and knows its contents."

"Sure of that?" I ventured.

Sir George tossed an evening paper over to me.

"You see what the beast is doing," he said. "Strange rumours at the barracks, all-night work at the arsenals, mysterious notices to the railway companies. It all means one thing—mobilization."

"Von Butz has read the letter by fair means or foul. The Emperor will receive it in person to-morrow night. The letter awaits him at Von Butz's house," I remarked, thoughtfully.

"Marvellous!" Sir George remarked with sarcasm. "You have the insight of a Mazarin."

One must put up with sarcasm from one's prospective father-in-law, especially when he is in a tight place, as Sir George undoubtedly was. I had sufficient magnanimity to ignore it.

"Have you made any effort to regain possession of the letter?" I asked.

Sir George shook his head.

"I might as well try to fly," he said, "as attempt to regain possession of it by fair means. Von Butz is our enemy and the enemy of our country. All the ill-feeling and friction of the last few years has been his making, and his alone. This letter is the summit of his desires. In the light of the Emperor's frank and downright statement, it is nothing more or less than a brutal insult. I cannot imagine any apologies which could possibly be offered sufficient to atone for it. It will mean war for England, and the colonies for us."

"If the Emperor reads it," I remarked softly.

"If the Emperor reads it," Sir George repeated, looking over at me.

I buried my face in my hands and tried to think. There came a knock at the door, and a telegraphic dispatch. Sir George fetched out the code book with shaking fingers. He groaned as he read it out.

> Understand mobilization secretly commenced. Panic on Stock Exchange, owing to rumours from Merlin. Presume you only delivered letter "A." What does it mean? Have you blundered? Reply. HIGHBURY.

"We haven't much time, have we?" I remarked. "Let us make the most of it."

"How?"

I took up my pen and code book, and wrote a telegram.

> To Highbury, Downing Street, London.
> Discredit all rumours. Mobilization ridiculous. All quiet here. Duly delivered letter 'A.' Probably stock exchange rig. Will request audience to-morrow.

"We'll start boldly, at any rate," I said, rising. "Send this and I will be back in an hour."

"Where are you going?" Sir George asked.

"To call on Fräulein von Butz," I answered.

Youth is dauntless and excitement is sweet. So I walked through the broad, sunlit streets of Merlin with a smiling face, a cigarette of delicate flavour between my lips, and tried to persuade myself that it was not a forlorn hope upon which I had embarked. In my pocket was letter "A," which should have been marked letter "B," in my right hand a fragrant bunch of Neapolitan violets, whose faint, sweet perfume had stolen out to me from a florist's shop in the avenue. As I passed up the broad steps of the mansion where Von Butz lived, the Fates did me a good turn. The door before me opened and Fräulein von Butz came out, dressed for driving.

I bowed low and held out the flowers.

"A farewell gift, Fraulein," I said sadly. "You will deign to accept them, I hope!"

She held out her hands, and her bright smile of welcome changed to a look of interrogation.

"I will accept them," she said, "with very much pleasure, and I thank you indeed for thinking of me. But why a farewell gift, Mr. Hamblin? Are you going away on leave again?"

I shook my head sorrowfully.

"It is no matter of leave, dear Fräulein," I said. "I am quitting the service. I should have left to-day, but I wanted to say good-bye to you."

She turned back into the hall.

"Come inside," she said, "I do not understand."

I heard her instruct the hall porter to send back the carriage. She led me into her own tiny sitting-room, as neat and dainty as herself, and motioned me to an easy chair. She sat down close to me, and loosened the furs from her neck.

"You are giving up the service," she said, "you are leaving Merlin? Is it not very sudden, Mr. Hamblin?"

"It has come upon me," I said gloomily, "like a thunder-clap."

"You shall tell me," she insisted, raising her bright eyes to mine, "all about it. Have you come into the title, is your health bad, or are you promoted?"

I was silent for a moment. It was my silence which told. Then I shook my head.

"Fräulein," I said, "when I have gone you will hear from others what I would rather tell you myself. I have longed for this opportunity, yet now it has come—it is not easy."

Her piquant little face was full of sympathy. By accident my hand fell upon the arm of her chair and touched her fingers. She drew them away—slowly.

"Fräulein," I said, "there is one profession in the world in which a single mistake is fatal. That profession unfortunately is, or was, mine—and that mistake—I have made."

"Oh!" she cried.

It was enough. My humiliation now required no pretence. It came natural to me. I felt that I was a cad.

"Won't you tell me a little more?" she begged. "I am so sorry for you—and sorry that you are going away."

Her hand once more fell upon the arm of her chair, Never were fingers more soft and velvety to the touch.

"Fräulein," I said, "if I may tell you, I will. I should like you to know the truth. It is this. Two letters were intrusted to me, one of which was to be delivered to the Emperor, the other destroyed! I delivered—to your father as it happens—the wrong one."

She was perplexed.

"Is that all?" she asked.

I nodded.

"The action," I said, "is a small one—but the result is terrible."

"Terrible?"

"It is too weak a word," I assented. "Do you know what war means, Fräulein?"

She shuddered.

"Do not speak of it!" she begged.

"You will hear it spoken of before long, Fräulein," I said; "and, alas! I shall be the unhappy cause. War between your country and mine! It is fearful!"

I am afraid my fingers tightened upon hers. I am sure that the pressure was returned.

"The letter you spoke of," she asked—"has the Emperor received it yet?"

"Not yet," I answered; "your father has it. The Emperor returns to-morrow night."

She leaned forward suddenly, pale.

"He returns to-night!" she exclaimed. "Only an hour ago my father had a telegram from him."

"To-night or to-morrow night," I muttered—"what matters. The letter is gone from my hands beyond recovery. He opens it, reads, and war is as certain as to-morrow's sun. Oh, it is enough to make a man mad to think of it! War between the two nations who have brought the science of killing to perfection! It will be the greatest massacre the world has ever known, and the everlasting shame of it will be upon my head."

"Adventures of an Actress" begin next week.

"Don't!" she cried—"please don't!"

I drew myself up.

"At least, Fräulein," I said gently, and with real tenderness, "I have no right to come here and make you miserable. Only I could not go away without seeing you and asking you to sometimes remember—a most unfortunate man!"

I stretched out my hand for my hat. She stopped me.

"No, no!" she cried, "sit still! Let me think."

I watched the colour come and go from her cheeks. She pushed back the pretty fringe from her forehead. Ah! Gertrud von Butz, you wrote the memory of your dainty little self into my heart for ever in those few minutes!

She turned toward me.

"What if the letter were destroyed?" she asked slowly.

"It is impossible!" I answered, with thumping heart.

"But if it were!"

"There would be no war," I said, "there would be no disgrace for me; I should remain in Merlin. But it is impossible."

"Should you know it if you saw it?" she asked.

"Of course."

She rose up.

"Come with me," she said. "Do not speak. If we meet my father it would be a convent for me. You must do what seems best to you."

She was as pale as a sheet, but she walked firmly and without hesitation.

As we crossed the hall where several servants were standing she turned to me.

"Your own conservatories," she said, "are so much more beautiful. But there, you shall judge."

We turned off down a long passage. At the end was a conservatory, but she paused and listened at the last door on the right. It was empty; she turned the handle.

We passed inside; she took a bunch of keys from her pocket and unlocked a cabinet which stood in the middle of the room. A pile of letters were there. My head swam with joy.

"Quick," she whispered. "Ah! We are lost. It is my father."

I dashed at the letters, seized a handful, but dropped them again as the lid of the cabinet fell upon my wrist. She whirled me across the room, behind a curtain into a long annexe into the conservatory. I could have cried with the disappointment. But for her sake, I would have rushed out and torn the letter to pieces before Von Butz's eyes. Gertrud came close to me. I passed my arm round her waist; she was trembling violently.

Voices approached, and footsteps. The door of the room opened. Through the crack in the curtain I saw Von Butz enter, and my heart stood still. For behind him came a tall, familiar figure in a brilliant uniform, partially covered by a long military cloak.

"And now, Von Butz, the letter at once," he exclaimed brusquely.

"Your majesty shall have it," was the quiet answer, as Von Butz produced his keys.

"When you read it you will say that I have done well in starting the great engine which your Majesty has constructed with such marvellous and wonderful forethought."

There was a moment's pause. Then I saw the letter pass into the Emperor's hands.

"You yourself, Von Butz," I heard him say, "are well acquainted with the contents?"

"My secret agents," Von Butz answered, "ever keen in the service of the Fatherland, borrowed it from the King's messenger, and brought me a copy. We have saved hours which are worth millions."

The Emperor broke the seal. He stood up and a fierce light burned in his eyes.

"Von Butz," he said, "you will be my witness that these things which are to come are of God's ordination, not mine. With the finest army in the world, trained and brought to perfection under my own care and governance, I, the certain master of this great continent from the firing of the first guns of battle, have ever refrained from violence or provocation. With the warlike spirit of my grandfather in my veins, I have yet held out to all nations the olive branch instead of the iron grip. History must acknowledge this. When I am all conquering and almighty, I have yet been slow to strike. You will remember this, Von Butz."

"Always, your majesty."

The Emperor tore open the letter and bent over it with serene forehead and expectant eyes. He read, frowned, re-read, and flung it passionately upon the table. He turned upon Von Butz with a fury that was paralysing.

"Dolt! Fool!" he cried. "You have been tricked! You have made me a laughing-stock! You have betrayed the nation!"

"Your Majesty," Von Butz faltered, "the copy I sent you was a faithful one. My agent copied it himself in the express."

"Listen then," cried the Emperor.

He read out letter "A."

* * * * *

I walked home, my nerves tingling with excitement, relieved, but very puzzled. Sir George called me into the study immediately I arrived.

"Hamlin," he said in an airy manner, "I'm afraid you have been disturbing yourself about a mare's nest!"

"Oh, indeed!" I found breath to say.

Sir George nodded and tapped an open letter with his finger.

"It seems," he continued, "that Bucknell, the messenger, is rather a smart fellow. He found out that his dispatches had been tampered with, so wired Highbury for instructions. Immediately he received them he destroyed letter 'B' and duplicated 'A.' The duplication was to catch the thief, if possible, and I should imagine that it did."

"I should think so, too," I answered, smiling.

"One word more," Sir George said, coughing, and assuming his most dignified deportment. "With regard to Clara, I have talked to her seriously, and found her, as I expected, amenable to reason. You are both too young to think of marriage, and an engagement does not seem to us desirable. In short, we have other views for Clara."

I drew a long breath—not of despair, but of resignation. That night, at the Russian embassy, I sat out four dances with Gertrud von Butz.

The GOLDEN DWARF

A Sensational Romance of To-Day.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "A Keeper of Secrets," "Hate, the Destroyer," "A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS OF "GOLDEN DWARF."

"IT is the body of Sir Christopher Dering!"

The words are spoken by a pretty girl—fair-haired, blue-eyed. She stands, horrified, by a grass-grown ditch in a country lane, out of which a great mastiff is climbing. The ditch contains the corpse of a stalwart man—a handkerchief bound over his mouth and nostrils.

Close to there is a strange figure, graceful, well-dressed, even handsome, but with the stature of a boy and the face of an adult. He carries a heavy dog-whip, and stares, fixedly, at the dead body just discovered by his mastiff, Cerberus.

The girl is Esther Carew; the dwarf, Otto Hare, the richest landowner in Derbyshire, and the mystery of Wyresdale, a village in that county. For the first time in fifteen years he has set foot in a public thoroughfare, to attract the attention of Esther, whom he has watched from his park.

Sir Christopher Dering was alive at seven o'clock the preceding day. He and his nephew, Felix, had quarrelled over the latter's love for Esther. Sir Christopher wanted Felix to make a good marriage—the birth of his little cousin Brian has put him out of the succession to the baronetcy. Felix is faithful to the penniless Esther Carew.

Much turns on the whereabouts of Felix on the night before. It appears that he was in Duchester, some miles off, whither he went on business, and spent a night at the theatre. Could he have killed the squire?

Otto Hare would like to suggest that he did—Esther's mercenary mother accepts his hints. She wants the Golden Dwarf for a son-in-law.

Felix is secretly loved by Judith Garland, a striking brunette, Lady Dering's companion. She has a wastrel brother, Neal, who is unaccountably in Wyresdale, and who is demanding money. This, by an affectation of sisterly solicitude, Judith obtains, as a cheque, from Felix Dering. The cheque is payable to bearer.

Otto Hare has an ally, a strange German physician, Joseph Kraft, who lives with him at Wyresdale Park, the Golden Dwarf's residence. He is an object of much curiosity to Archibald Geddes, a clever assistant at the Wyresdale Pharmacy, which is kept by a drunken old chemist, Caleb Forester.

Caleb has a charming daughter, Connie, whom Geddes is making bashful love to. She is Esther's friend, and quarrels with Geddes for crediting the rumour that Felix killed his uncle.

A one-armed sailor has suddenly appeared in Wyresdale. At the chemist's shop he encounters Kraft, whom he follows, and on the strength of some past episode attempts to blackmail. Kraft repulses him, but is dexterously tracked by the sailor to a curious fort-like structure in Wyresdale Park.

While spying on this the sailor is attacked by a huge dog, which he stabs. He is seen by Kraft and the Golden Dwarf.

Esther tells Felix of her mother's plan to marry her to Otto Hare. They swear constancy in an old and picturesque oath. Felix returns to Dering House, to be asked by the child Brian if it is true Felix has taken his father away.

Judith Garland shows Felix several links of a chain he has been in the habit of wearing. They are bloodstained. She adds that they were found near the cross roads, where Sir Christopher's body was discovered, and that, moreover, Felix was seen near the place at ten o'clock on the night when he was supposed to be in Duchester. She assures him she will keep his secret.

Felix in vain protests his innocence. At this moment an inspector of the local police is announced.

Felix Dering staggers—is he dreaming, the prey of some hideous nightmare?

A caution sounds in his ears; Judith Garland is speaking to him. "Don't look like that," she whispers, "pull yourself together."

Notwithstanding their alarm, the police-officer—one Inspector Brasher—has merely called to arrest, on suspicion of being concerned in Sir Christopher's death, a certain Edward Spencer, a young Irish groom whom the baronet, shortly before his death, had given notice to leave. Protesting his innocence, Spencer is taken away. While on the route to the little country police-station, he was seen by Foley, with whom Dr. Kraft has been holding a mysterious consultation. Almost immediately afterwards, Foley, by chance, makes the acquaintance of Neal Garland. "Here, my hearty," asks the sailor in his maritime lingo, "what was it you picked up yonder and gave to the taut little craft you had with you?" He is referring to the meeting of Judith and Neal at the stile.

The scene changes. During a walk in the meadows on a pleasant Sabbath morning, Felix tells Esther that he was indeed in Wyresdale that fatal evening, and explains his return. A new sensation interrupts their conversation, Felix is called to the small local police-station. It has a single cell, and in this Ted Spencer had been confined over an adjourned inquest. This cell is now empty, Spencer has vanished. The barred window has been broken through—from the outside!

With the help of Neal, Esther kidnaps little Brian Dering, to further her ends with Felix.

The Golden Dwarf pesters Esther with his attentions. She meets Felix one day, and from his manner guesses there is something amiss.

"FELIX," she faltered; "something dreadful must have happened."

Her lover assented, yet by a gesture rather than speech. Esther experienced an indescribable terror.

"Tell me quickly," she murmured; "I—I can't wait; you frighten me."

Felix studied her frank countenance and anxious blue orbs; he seemed reluctant to begin.

"Brian," he said at length; "our little Brian, Esther ——"

Esther Carew trembled. "Not—not dead?" she whispered. Felix Dering's reply was a hopeless movement.

"We cannot be sure," he confessed; "the child has disappeared; there is no trace to enlighten our darkness. All is blank ignorance."

He sat down abruptly on the bank of turf at the roadside and hid his face.

"I—I loved the boy," he muttered, "and people are saying a horrible thing."

Esther breathed heavily—his emotion appalled her.

"What can they be saying," she urged, "that need distress you so?"

A voice responded to her query—a voice which was not Felix's.

"They are saying," it answered; "that Mr. Felix Dering murdered his uncle, and has broken down the last barrier between himself and a snug fortune by doing away with his baby cousin."

Esther looked round in astonishment, and Felix, startled out of his despair, glanced up. Before them stood Inspector Brasher.

CHAPTER XIII.

"SHE SHALL BE YOURS, OTTO."

"IT is the same, Kraft, beyond a doubt; I remember his figure distinctly—short, athletic, and the left arm missing."

Otto Hare flung the end of his cigarette across the room on to the marble hearth. Joseph Kraft shrugged a couple of large shoulders and pursued a rather delicate task. Bent over the wooden stand which supported the cage of tropical birds, he was engaged in capturing a brown morsel of existence, red-beaked and black-eyed.

The Professor's soft fingers imprisoned it at length. Then, by means of a small pair of surgical nippers, he trimmed its unwieldy claws. The contrast between the elephantine German and the frail creature in his grasp was extravagant. Yet he manipulated it with a singular gentleness.

"Why should this fellow, whoever he is," continued the Golden Dwarf, "want to come prying about Wyresdale Park?"

Kraft smiled as he released his feathered patient.

"You must not forget, my dear friend," he said, "that you are a local mystery, and sailors are inquisitive folk."

He opened the cage and allowed the flock of birds to flutter round him. When he had poured a tiny mound of rape-seed upon his palm they hurried down to devour it. The German's hand was hidden by the restless bodies and half-expanded wings of his pets.

Otto Hare had risen from the leather-covered lounge which fronted the window of the Professor's apartment. An impetuous stride brought him close to Joseph Kraft.

"How did you know," queried the Golden Dwarf, staring at Kraft's bland features, "that he was a sailor?"

The German's pale blue orbs flashed behind their thick lenses, but the amused expression did not quit his countenance.

"By a certain roll in the rascal's gait," he answered smoothly, "which, to a habitual observer such as I am, denotes the sea-goer. Also, by a tattoo-mark on the fist that held the knife with which our lamented Cerberus was stabbed."

Otto Hare sneered.

"You perceived the last detail no little distance away," commented the Golden Dwarf, "though man and dog were on the ground, and yet, a few days back, you assured me that he had both his arms, while I myself could tell that he had only one. Kraft, for some reason or other, you are hoodwinking me."

Joseph Kraft collected his favourites and prevailed upon them to re-enter their cage.

"We live too much alone, my poor Hare," he opined; "this morbid imaginativeness proves it. Since, however, you are interested by the assassin of your biggest—and worst—mongrel, I will learn what there is to be learned about him and report to you."

The German rinsed his finger-tips in a bowl of water that was surrounded by the scientific litter of his work-bench, took a straw hat off his desk, a key from his pocket, and turned to Otto Hare.

"I have the best temper possible," he announced casually, "but I am not a child or a fool, Otto. You permitted yourself, Otto, to suggest that I was hoodwinking you. In my excess of good-nature I almost omitted to say that I ought not to tolerate such liberties. I mention it now."

The Golden Dwarf spun on his heel, his diminutive frame quivering with resentment. Kraft moved towards the door of the bright, strange chamber. There he paused and scrutinised the proud visage of Otto Hare.

"Otto, my friend," he murmured, "do not neglect your new character of Romeo to call names at your stage-manager. You want Esther Carew for your Juliet. You should not offend the only person who can mould her to your will. She loves Felix Dering, and he is five feet eleven in his riding-boots. You are forty-seven inches and she dreads you."

Joseph Kraft doffed his spectacles, polished them, and chuckled. The Golden Dwarf muttered an oath. Kraft mounted the glasses again and beamed on him.

"But she shall be yours, Otto," cried the German; "I promise you—I, Joseph Kraft."

He put his key in the lock and waited for Otto Hare to pass out of the room. The Golden Dwarf did so, the lines of anger puckering his low brow and compressing his cruel mouth. Kraft secured the door and marched downstairs, his adieu a wave of his plump hand.

As he threaded the lush alleys of Wyresdale Park, to gain its ring-fence of brick and the iron wicket, he grumbled to himself.

"Otto is restless," he said under his breath; "these midgets they are all nerves. If I had left it in his power he would bite me. As it is he would but break his teeth. Yet I shall not let him try—he must be soothed and kept quiet, soothed and kept quiet."

Mumbling to himself, he reached the private exit, unfastened it, stepped through, and strolled along the high road. A few moments later he was rapping at the tarred portal of a cottage on the grassy margin of a narrow lane. In the brief period that elapsed before the summons provoked a response he had transferred something from his coat-tail to his starched cuff.

A cropped and bullet-shaped cranium thrust itself out suddenly. The visitor identified, its owner retreated.

"What cheer, Dutchy?" he exclaimed. "Warp your fat hull in—blowed if you haven't as much beam as a collier! You're overdue, Dutchy; I was to have had the dollars days ago."

He dropped the latch and followed the German within, pulling his clasp-knife free of his pocket and fixing on Kraft a glance of profound distrust.

The Professor sat down unconcernedly, dragged his chair to the table, and revealing a linen bag of the type used by bankers, drew the tape, and tilted the article bottom up. At this point he halted and desired the sailor to close the shutters. Nicholas Foley grinned but complied, lighting a candle, which, stuck by its base to the painted shelf, ornamented the chimney-piece. In the artificial dusk thus created Kraft counted out a rouleau of sovereigns.

"Twenty-four, twenty-five, twenty-six," he finished, and stacked the coins in a double pile. Foley gazed, but made no criticism, saved that he clutched the haft of the weapon which nestled in the unbuttoned pocket on his hip. Kraft rose and indicated the money.

"You are a bad diplomatist, Foley," he said, secreting the linen bag about him. "I have a pistol in my sleeve, yet I did not flourish it under your nose. Pray cease to fidget with your knife; you bored me by the trick when we had a previous consultation."

Crestfallen the sailor obeyed, and his redoubtable antagonist proceeded.

"This," explained Dr. Kraft, "is a first quarterly payment of twenty-six pounds—two sovereigns a week. That amount shall be yours so long as you devote your attention to—to your garden. The slightest symptom of curiosity on your part will lose you an income of a hundred a year. You comprehend?"

Nicholas nodded and gathered up the instalment of his annuity. Kraft motioned him aside, walked to the exit of the cottage, and stood thoughtful.

"Put the cash out of sight," he ordered, "and undo the shutters."

Sulkily and in silence Foley performed the command. Joseph Kraft lifted the latch and peered forth.

"By the bye," he said, lingering, "no more poaching at Wyresdale Park. You were poaching, you recollect, the morning on which you killed Mr. Hare's mastiff. You were simply in search of a rabbit to flavour your modest lunch; no other motive, eh, my friend?"

"I reckon that was about it," growled the sailor, extinguishing the candle.

"You are an apt pupil," declared the Professor, and slid a nickel-plated revolver from his sleeve to the breast of his frock-coat. The door creaked and he was gone.

Nicholas Foley stalked to the casement and for several seconds studied the retreating German. Then, without uttering a single syllable, he approached a corner cupboard, reached down a whiskey-bottle almost drained, shook the last of the fluid into his hallowed palm, and gulped it from that primitive bowl.

"Took me flat aback," he owned confidentially; "ran into wind'ard of me slick with his dashed popgun. What's the odds? I've got the specie. Nick, you're a made man and you'll splice the mainbrace at the Wheatsheaf arter sprinkling them sallids."

He clapped on his slouched felt, caught up a metal pot, rolled into his garden, and filled the utensil at a rain-butt under the eaves. As he sprayed the contents upon a plot of cress a cool inquiry sounded behind him.

"Evening," it said, "and how is the malaria?"

Nicholas Foley set his can down.

"Why," he ejaculated, "if it isn't the first mate from the physic-shop! Thankee, malary's not obstropolus for the moment."

The chemist's assistant leaned on the gate.

"I'm glad of that," he rejoined, and added: "Oh, I notice you've struck up an acquaintance with Professor Kraft—saw him come out. Tell me, why were you so startled when you met him in our place a week past?"

Nicholas hauled up a clay pipe and began to stuff into the bowl some of his choice red Virginian.

"Ask me anything else, messmate," he protested, "and I'll show my papers frank and fair. As to Dutchy and me, mum's the word."

CHAPTER XIV.

"ARE YOU MAD, MISS GARLAND?"

"WHY do you tell me this. Mr. Brasher; am I to be publicly accused of the crimes in question?"

Felix Dering had started up, and, with Esther clinging to his arm, put these stern queries to the passive Inspector. Brasher regarded the lovers for a moment. A glimmer of emotion crossed his sedate visage and he lowered his glance; Esther Carew's piteous gaze was more than he could sustain. He rubbed his hands together and shifted his service boots upon the dusty kerb.

"No," admitted Michael Brasher, "not yet; there isn't any evidence worth a name. But what is the use of pretending to ignore the rumour when Wyresdale discusses nought else. So, as I happened to catch a few words of your talk, sir, I thrust in, and hope Miss Carew and yourself will pardon the liberty."

The Inspector scrutinised, while he spoke, the expression of Felix Dering's countenance and the attitude of his stalwart figure. They did not seem to enlighten the astute police officer. He wrinkled a pair of prominent brows and changed his harsh manner for a less repellent air.

"It's hardly a nice position, sir," he continued, "from your point of view, is it? You might think, now, of taking some legal course to vindicate yourself, say a libel suit against one of the parties who may have helped to spread the allegations."

Felix grew pale; he knew that Inspector Brasher, firm, polite, deliberate, was feeling his mental pulse. Esther fathomed the Inspector's purpose, her fingers trembled convulsively on Felix's sleeve.

"I will not stoop," declared Felix Dering, "to notice or dispute such infamous suggestions. I would not have harmed a hair of my uncle's head or a curl of little Brian's. It is not my fault if the murder of Sir Christopher and the disappearance of his infant son redound to my advantage. After what has occurred, I would not permit myself to profit by either. Should it be possible, I will find the child Brian; whether or no, I will never accept a penny of the Dering fortune or an inch of the Dering lands."

Michael Brasher pulled at his stiff beard.

"Such a sacrifice would," he hinted, "be looked on as purely politic."

"By fools," burst forth Felix, "who can suppose that I should surrender that which I had committed crimes to obtain. You, Mr. Brasher, when you unearth a clue to associate me with the death of my uncle or the spiriting away of his child, will do your duty as if I were the meanest labourer in Wyresdale."

The Inspector saluted, bowed to Esther, and passed by. Once he slackened his speed and turned, as if puzzled. But his tall frame steadied itself, he shook his loose limbs, increased his stride, and faded from their sight.

Felix breathed heavily.

"Fate is cruel, my darling," he said. "There goes an honest fellow, and he, too, shares the suspicion that has fallen on me like a curse."

Esther pondered the difficulty, the glow of a woman's splendid confidence in her blue orbs.

"Why will not people understand you?" she asked. "I know you could not even dream of doing the terrible things they charge you with."

A sad smile flickered over Felix Dering's features.

"You love me, darling," he said, "and yet—you might be mistaken in me. Hundreds of tender hearts such as yours have trusted as you trust, and have been deceived. Alas, guilt and innocence are matters of proof. If I had only not come back that night! The realisation of what it may involve chills me like the shadow of the scaffold."

Esther hid her face and a sob broke from her.

"It was my fault," she wept. "But for me you and Sir Christopher would not have quarrelled, or, if you had done, you would have stayed in Duchester, where you are believed to have been."

Felix sighed.

"Do not reproach yourself, dearest," he answered. "It was inevitable that Brian's disappearance, with which you have nothing to do, should cast a slur on me, who am next in the succession, and was, for the moment, his male guardian. I must begin my vindication by tracing him, a task that might appal the united forces of Scotland Yard. The search may carry me far afield, and we shall not be able to snatch those delicious interviews. The egregious Mr. Hare will lay uninterrupted siege to your affections."

Esther coloured.

"You—you are not jealous?" she stammered.

"If jealousy necessitates distrust, no," said her lover, "but if it signifies envy, yes. He will feast his odious eyes on your sweet countenance, as I shall pine to do; he will whisper into your pink ears those romantic vows that I would fain be privileged to utter. I could not doubt you, my own, but I could wring, with a vast amount of comfort, the millionaire neck of the Golden Dwarf."

"He will do neither of the things you fear," objected Esther, "for my prettiness will be spoiled by crying, and he could not talk as you talk if he had ten millions instead of two. And now I must go, my poor Felix; I slipped out for a scamper, and couldn't resist the chance of peeping at the gates of Dering House since I am not allowed to pay it a visit. I shall run home across the meadows and steal in at the kitchen door. Don't bother to see me back."

She sought to render her tone coquettish, but the tears choked it. Felix drew the grief-stricken girl into the shelter of the hawthorn hedge and kissed her. A moment later she was flying athwart the pastures that lay between her and the Rosery.

Felix re-entered the avenue and threaded it towards the quaint gables and ivied turrets of Dering House. A hot August noon brooded over the park but a faint breeze stirred the great boughs around him and ruffled the grass to right and left.

A species of contemptuous pride froze Felix Dering into an unnatural calm. For a week blow after blow had descended on him; the advent of an extraordinary rival to his love, the rumour of his probable connection with the fate of Sir Christopher, the insinuation that he had removed the child Brian to clear his own path to rank and prosperity —the accumulation had been too much. He could endure, he could not rebel.

At the end of the sunlit terrace he paused and threw himself down, the velvet turf which formed the slope supporting him—a perfect couch. The dizziness of his brain forbade meditation, he trifled with a string of creeper that hung from an antique stone vase.

While he lounged there, a very wretched and bewildered young Englishman, a rustle of skirts surprised him, and he leapt to his feet. Judith Garland had glided past the principal gable of Dering House, her filmy mourning-gown sweeping at her French heels, the white interior of her parasol fanning her piquant face, smart toque, and dark tresses. A damask rosebud at her throat lent a note of warmth to her sombre but graceful costume.

"Ah, Mr. Dering," she said, "this is unexpected. I fancied you absorbed by the search for our lost treasure, and I find you tired already."

Felix groaned.

"I cannot bring myself," he told her, "to challenge any further the sneers which greet my inquiries. Since seven o'clock this morning, when the nurse discovered Brian's cot to be empty, I have covered thirty miles and wearied two horses. I have telegraphed east, west, north, and south, visited the local stations on both systems, and, finally, arranged for a set of drags and a punt to be expressed from Derby. The Black Pool will be searched as soon as they arrive."

Judith Garland stepped to the plaster seat on the upper level of the terrace, her dark cheeks a fraction less brunette, her bosom heaving.

"I can bear no more," pursued Felix; "the ghastly scandal which associates with my uncle's murder flourishes everywhere. I am gaped at as though I were in the dock, and Brian's disappearance is attributed to my machinations. Oh, it is horrible, horrible!"

His companion laughed shrilly.

"Well acted!" she cried. "I am almost inclined to demand an encore."

Felix Dering contemplated her in amazement.

"Are you mad, Miss Garland?" he ejaculated.

The occupant of the stone bench leaned on a sculptured extremity.

"Do not try to cheat me also," she adjured him. "Remember I have the blood-stained links."

The other shuddered. There returned to him the memory of an evening, in the old mansion behind them, whereon he had seen, in Judith Garland's small palm, the fatal portion of chain which might be made to demonstrate his presence at Wyresdale the night of Sir Christopher's murder.

"You should have allowed me to explain," he said nervously, "how I parted with those links of my watch-guard. I should have done so but you have evaded me for the last few days, yet you assured me quite recently that you were my friend."

Judith Garland experienced a throb of triumph. His words gave her the opening for which she had awaited.

"Mr. Dering," she replied, "I have showed myself to be far from an enemy. Had I wished you evil I had but to deliver these links to the police."

"True," assented Felix perplexed; "though you would have been wrong, Miss Garland, for I am not guilty, in spite of them. I caught my chain vaulting the stile near the cross-roads, and, at the same time, tore my hand. Before actually dropping the shattered links I must have touched and marked them with my own blood."

Judith affected to consider this scrap of narrative.

"The chain was whole when you parted from Dering House for Duchester after Sir Christopher and you had quarrelled," she informed him. "The following morning it was broken; I observed it as you sat on your horse during our conversation at the cross-roads. If I am to be satisfied of your innocence I must learn at what hour the accident occurred."

Felix hesitated. Judith Garland had never won his confidence; but he was anxious to rid her mind of its frightful persuasion.

"I—I did return to Wyresdale from Duchester that night," he confessed, taking a share of the stone bench. "I was foolishly restless, and—and wanted to be near somebody whom I might not see often in the future. Mounting the stile I spoke of I broke my chain as I have described."

A peculiar gleam sprang to Judith's dark pupils. Her mouth twitched. She bent over to him, extending, it might have been involuntarily, her slender arms.

"Felix," she murmured, "how I have misjudged you! I also was miserable that evening; Sir Christopher had told us you were determined to leave Wyresdale. But I did not dream you—you cared—at least for me! So I have nursed the idea of avenging myself on you. Can you ever forgive me? It was because I loved you and was desperate."

She slid along the bench, her wild passion for him breaking through her mock misunderstanding of his reference to Esther. Judith Garland was beautiful, beautiful with a sullen beauty curiously Oriental. Her eyes shone, her scarlet lips pouted, her stooping form had about it something lithe and sinuous.

Felix Dering felt as if he were being tempted by the fabled creature which was half-woman, half-reptile. Her phrase "revenging myself on you" echoed in his ear. Judith seemed to be offering him a choice between death and disloyalty, death on the gallows or disloyalty to Esther.

A fortunate occurrence saved him the task of a hasty decision. A footman had come out on to the terrace.

"If you please, miss," he said, saluting, a stolid automaton, "there's a queer person wishes to speak to you in the hall. He says his name is Foley, but you won't know him—a common sort of fellow, miss, and mentioning a Mr. Neal."

Judith sprang up instantly.

"I will see him at once," she replied, and hurried after the servant. Pausing, she plucked the rosebud from her throat, kissed it, and flung it covertly backwards. It fell on the bench in front of Felix.

Stepping across the threshold of Dering House, Judith Garland encountered a short, stout mortal with a closely-cropped cranium. At sight of her he jerked his forelock, and his bearing became less impudently familiar. He slouched into one of the bay windows and lowered his voice.

"How goes it, my lass," he queried. "Will Dering plank down the ready?"

Judith gasped; the sailor's confident demeanour was plainly not assumed. He had greeted her as an intimate and an ally, and she did not dare to repel him.

"I reckon Neal logged me all right, eh?" went on Nicholas. "I arranged with him to stand in. Savvy? You had a plan to bring Dering into the shiners, and I calculate this missing kid's the idea. You are a clipper, my lass—a clipper!"

Judith Garland had strong nerves, but they quailed before the problem presented by this self-declared conspirator. She evaded the difficulty.

"No, no news yet," she stammered. "Thank you for calling."

Nicholas twisted his hat, embarrassed.

"Well," he added, "I only boarded you to report myself, that's all. I guess your brother told you my moorings—first cottage past the gate, steering for the cross-roads. So long, miss; I'll hail you again one of these days."

He pulled a fragment of his greasy thatch, shuffled through the hall, and let himself out. Judith put her hand to her heart; it was beating violently.

CHAPTER XV.

"Alive, the Child May Still Baulk Us."

"Your name's Jack, you little fool, and if you don't want to be beaten you will not forget it."

The maker of the announcement put her hands on her hips and frowned. She was an immensely stout person, with reddish hair, flattened to her skull in greased bandeaux. Her plump fingers bore a load of vulgar rings, massive pendants decorated her ears, and a giant brooch fastened a soiled lace fichu to the bosom of her dingy purple gown.

"I am not Jack," came the nervous answer, "but Brian Dering—Sir Brian Dering now my father is killed."

A blow on the side of the delicate head sent the child staggering across the room.

"Take that, you obstinate limb!" said his corrector irritably. "The next time I hear those words from your mouth I'll strip and flog you till the blood runs."

The baby baronet shrank before the virago into a corner of the apartment. It was a large chamber on an upper floor, crowded with out-of-date furniture, begrimed and unclean. A tortoiseshell kitten dozed on the skin hearthrug, and the yellow London sunshine lent a broad shaft of light for the motes of the place to dance in.

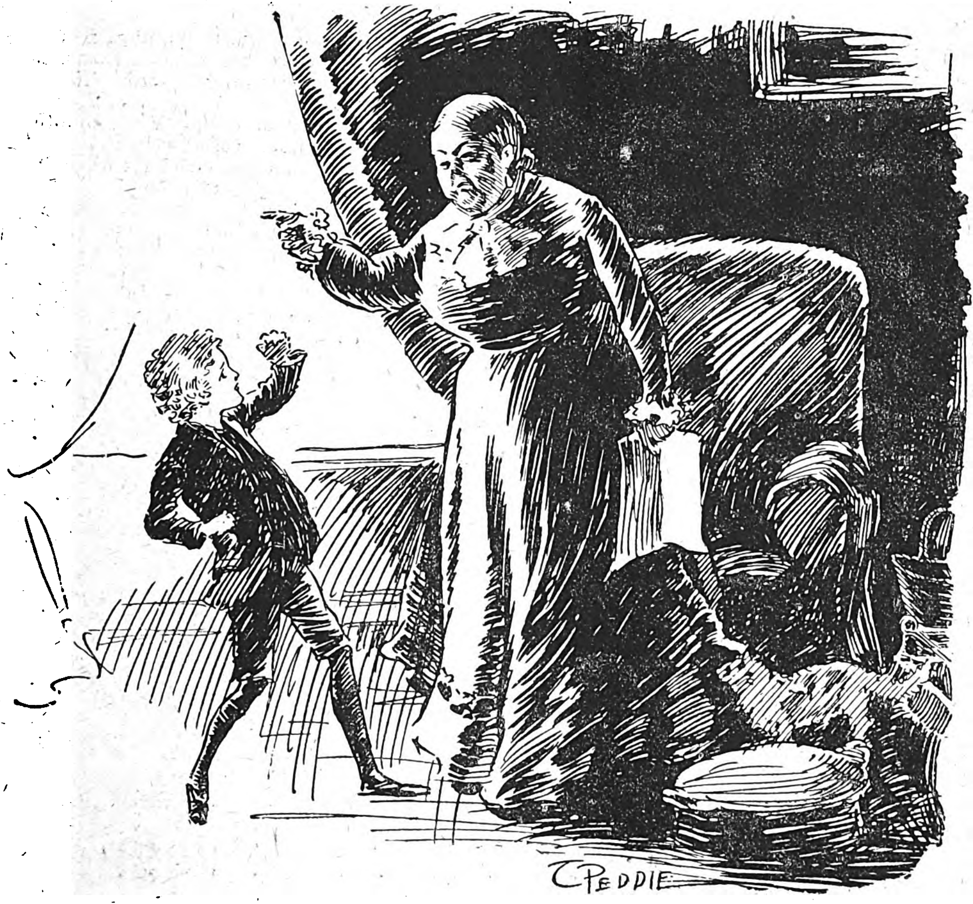
A knock at the door checked further dispute between

"Adventures of an Actress" begin next week.

Brian and his singular teacher, and a maid, wearing broken boots and a limp print dress, carried through a tray. This supported a plate of watercress, cut bread-and-butter, a brown pot, and a cup and saucer.

"Tea, ma'am," she gasped, "and please, Mrs. Schwartz, will you step down and see a party as has been looking at the front parlour. I showed it according to orders, ma'am, but could anything be took off the rent for a permanency?"

The lodging-house keeper smoothed out her garments and sailed out as the servant relinquished the tray and stole towards Brian. He had picked up the cat, which, nestled in his arms, purred its contentment.



The baby baornet shrank before the virago into a corner of the apartment.

"Bless your heart," murmured the girl. "I've been longing for a glimpse of you since they smuggled you up the other night. Do you like goodies? I've fetched you a pennorth. I nipped off and bought 'em an hour ago."

She showed a paper bag of mixed sweets. The child accepted them eagerly.

"What are you called," he asked, "Eliza or Jane? Our maids were Eliza and Jane."

The servant patted his curls.

"I am Louisa," she replied; "Lou for short. Who are you?"

Brian shook his fair locks.

"I am to be Jack," he said; "I must not tell you my real name. If I do she will whip me till I bleed."

"The brute!" cried Louisa, biting her lip. "Never mind, Jack, I'll bring you some chocolate-creams to-morrow. But don't speak of them or of these to her."

The child promised, and, Mrs. Schwartz's masculine tread sounding on the stair, Louisa hastened to the table and laid it for her mistress's repast.

The lodging-house keeper was in a bad temper, the effect of her experience below.

"Shabby respectability," she muttered, as she gained her padded lounge-chair. "I should be glad to learn, Louisa, what use shabby respectability is to me. I know the sort — a grumbling, fretful, cheese-paring lot. Get me the spirits out of the cellaret. I'm all of a flutter from annoyance."

Mrs. Schwartz delivered a key to her domestic, and Louisa produced a square, high-shouldered flask. Filling her cup with tea, sugar, and milk, the landlady added a quantum of gin and sipped it thirstily.

"Give the child a piece of bread-and-butter," she desired, "and don't drag me down again to no purpose."

"Yes'm," said the maid, secured Brian the biggest slice on the plate, restored the key of the cellaret, and slipped out sighing.

Mrs. Schwartz absorbed her meal with gusty pants betwixt each bite of food and drink of spirituous tea.

Wearied by his enforced quietude, the little baronet slumbered at length, the cat on his lap, Louisa's goodies clasped in his moist palm. Ultimately the eyes of the lodging house keeper noted the tiny parcel. She reached over, plucked it out of the hand that held it, and sniffed.

"Louisa!" she grumbled. "Sentimental idiot!"

As a commentary on the phrase, she bent a powerful elbow, flung the bag from the open sash, and proceeded to blend herself another strongly-flavoured jorum.

Her enjoyment of this was suspended by a quick step on the creaking flight close to, and she turned to regard the lean form and threadbare costume of Neal Garland.

Mrs. Schwartz waved him a jovial greeting, and pointed at a seat by the table.

Sensational stage revelations appear in "Adventures of an Actress."

"You don't care for gin, Neal, my man," she remarked, "but you'll find the sherry in the usual quarter. Here's the magic wand."

Neal made use of the implement thus humourously described, unfastened the compartment in the mahogany chiffonnier, and lifted out the wine.

"Kid's asleep," he said, brimming his glass. "Cause much trouble?"

The other grinned—a wide, yet repulsive grin.

"Howled a while," she responded, "but I soon shut him up. Taught him to christen himself Jack in two twos."

Neal munched a leaf of cress.

"Your methods are so convincing!" he yawned.

Mrs. Schwartz wiped her double chin and loose throat.

"What are you going to do with the brat?" she queried.

"Dashed if I'm sure," conceded Neal; "I'm waiting for an inspiration. The lad's safe enough under your hospitable roof until he has forgotten those three syllables—'Brian Dering.' He'll eat less than a bird, and when the game is played out there'll be money in it for both of us."

"Perhaps," said the landlady; "but I don't see all the cards. It may be cautious, but I do love to know where the ace of spades is."

"The ace of spades," pursued Neal, "being the Law. My dear creature, you are beyond its clutch; you understand nothing, and they can't prove you do."

"I don't deny I'm all right—as far as I can calculate," admitted Mrs. Schwartz; "but I want to be told how you propose ridding yourself of him. A kid is a nuisance, and that's the truth."

"Cure him of his fondness for his name," said Neal Garland, "and I'll have him adopted or shipped to a foreign port, or——"

He stopped, reflectively. His reverie was shattered by the entrance of Louisa.

"Please'm," she began, "would Mr. Garland wish to be out or in? There is a young woman downstairs as must speak with him if he's at home. I was to say 'from W.'"

Neal read his hostess's glance.

"Let her come up," he murmured, "and spare us a minute, like a kind soul. Judith won't comprehend your value at first."

Mrs. Schwartz grunted, but dragged her huge body up and tottered from the room, motioning to Louisa, who followed on her heels. A few seconds later Judith Garland hurried into the apartment.

She was thickly veiled and disguised by the same dark and ample cloak which she had worn on the night of Brian's abduction. After a rapid scrutiny of the chamber she pushed up the net that hid her features. Their expression was scornful, her bearing impatient.

"You are the last visitor I dreamed of," faltered Neal. A sudden alarm had seized upon him, his sister's gaze was so ruthless.

Judith, unheeding this observation, approached him deliberately, and with great precision uttered the one word "Foley."

Neal's jaw dropped.

"The deuce!" he said. "I omitted to explain about him. The rogue spied on us at that tête-à-tête near the Cross, when we discovered those links of Dering's chain. He picked me up in the lane by his cottage subsequently and demanded an arrangement. He had heard too much and I yielded. Of course I should have mentioned the matter to you, but it escaped my mind in the rush."

Judith sneered.

"You are a clumsy conspirator," she chafed; "you might have spoiled everything. I could not guess if this Foley were spy or colleague. He came to me, asked news of my plan, and spoke as one who appreciated all. Baffled, I obtained leave of absence and journeyed to consult you."

"Your plan!" repeated Neal. "I gave him no particulars. Did you?"

"He needed none," said Judith. "He told me he supposed the 'missing kid'—his elegant phrase—was my idea, and congratulated me as a 'clipper.' Is he knave or clown?"

"I would rather not risk an opinion," answered her brother. "Destiny has thrust him into our plot and we must do the best we can. Is the hunt up after the child?"

"Hot and hard," declared Judith. "I am not positive I myself was not tracked here. Have you disposed of Brian?"

Neal indicated the hearth-rug where the little baronet slept, the little kitten beside him. Judith Garland pondered the unconscious figure.

"Neal," she murmured, "the boy shall not be traced. It would ruin our grasp upon Felix Dering. What do you recommend?" She lowered her voice so that it reached him in an almost inaudible whisper. "Alive," she said, "the child might always baulk us."

DOUBLY BEATEN.

By John Henry Peat.

The autumn tints were fast giving place to the bareness of winter, and the balmy breezes were being succeeded by the biting winds.

The swallows were departing to warmer climes, and following their example, Harold Battersby was also making preparations for seeking fresh fields, or rather, renewing his acquaintance with old ones.

He had originally come to Watersbury to stay three months, but the three months had drifted on into almost a year, varied with brief visits to town, and the reason of this extension was, of course, a woman.

The dissipations of several seasons—late hours, wines, and other things which go to make up an idle and wealthy young man's programme—had resulted in a serious breakdown in health, and he had come to Watersbury to recuperate. A lonely stroll and an adventure had brought about his introduction to Alice Wharton. She was a farmer's daughter, and it was in crossing her father's meadows that he had met with his adventure. He had lost his way, and on inquiring from a rustic whom he met, he had been told that the nearest way back to Watersbury was by the footpath that led through Farmer Wharton's meadows.

The rustic had omitted to inform him, however, that in these same meadows was a bull endowed with dangerous inclinations, and this omission had led to a sharp race between Harold Battersby and the aforesaid bull. The biped, however, just managed to beat the quadruped by a short head, and landed, breathless and panting, on the safe side of a stone wall. The attention of the farmer had been drawn to the race and he had just landed at the wall, accompanied by his dog as Harold Battersby vaulted over and saved his person from the bull's unwelcome attentions.

While the angry bull bellowed on one side of the wall, the farmer apologised on the other, and eventually the two men walked off to the farm together, the farmer, with true countryman's hospitality having invited the visitor to rest and refresh himself before continuing his journey.

This was how Harold Battersby and Alice Wharton became acquainted. Alice Wharton was plump and rosy as became a farmer's daughter. She was also good-looking and intelligent, and Battersby, to whom country life was insufferably dull, decided that a flirtation with the farmer's daughter would be at least something in the way of diversion. Nothing was more natural, then, than he should stroll out to the farm next morning, ostensibly to thank the farmer for his hospitality, but really to improve his acquaintance with the farmer's daughter. Hence he was not at all displeased to find that John Wharton was away at a distant market, and that his thanks had to be received by Alice, who was her father's housekeeper.

Harold Battersby was a man of the world well versed in all its wiles and sophistries, while Alice Wharton was well versed only in the arts of the world in which she lived. Thus did the unequal contest begin. Like her sex Alice Wharton was not averse to receiving admiration, nor proof against flattery, and she soon began to look forward to the visits of the handsome visitor. The peeps she got into the gay world, through the descriptions given by Harold Battersby set her longing to partake of its gaieties, and the rest was easy. The woman unsophisticated, the man specious and unscrupulous, it was the old, old story of woman's trust in a man's honour, with the usual result. This brings us up to the time of the afore-mentioned preparations for departure. The trusting woman and the man she had trusted, stood together in the lane which ran at the back of the farm.

"Well, Alice, I must be going," Harold Battersby was saying, "I have my packing to do, yet."

"Adventures of an Actress" begin next week.

"I wish I could go with you," she replied tearfully.

"Don't I tell you it's impossible?" he answered irritably. "You must wait here until I send for you. As soon as I can arrange matters I will let you know."

"But you won't be long, because——"

"Yes, I know. I don't want it dinning in my ears everlastingly."

"Harold, you don't know how much I fear."

"There you go again. Why the dickens do you keep on worrying me? Hang it all, you women think only of yourselves. It never occurs to you that I am making sacrifices. I might have done better than marry a farmer's daughter."

This brutal speech only brought a flood of tears, and Harold Battersby saw that if he were to get away at all comfortably he must adopt a different tone. Putting his arm round the sobbing girl, he drew her to him, and in the tenderest tones he had hitherto been accustomed to use, he tried to soothe her.

"Come, Alice, don't be silly. Surely you can trust me. Once more I tell you that as soon as I can get matters arranged you shall join me in London. Now dry your eyes or you will have your father wanting to know the reason of their redness."

With a great effort Alice Wharton checked her tears. Her meetings with Harold Battersby had been mostly clandestine. In the early days of their acquaintance John Wharton had warned his daughter.

"Alice, lass, don't thee have too much to say to that London young feller. He may be reight enough, but lasses is apt to get fond o' good lookin' young men, and tha knows theer can niver be nowt between him and thee. He belongs to a different set to us. Even if he wanted to wed ma' lass, which isna likely, aw shouldn't consent, becos tha couldn't make thisen comfortable among his set."

Thus had the farmer spoken, but even then it was too late. The girl's eyes had been already dazzled, for Harold Battersby was not the man, once having decided upon his course, to let the grass grow under his feet. The only result of this warning was that thence forward their meetings were arranged secretly.

The interview shortly afterwards terminated and Alice Wharton stole home to begin her period of weary waiting. Though she had been troubled, she doubted not that Harold Battersby would keep his promise. True, in the course of her reading, which consisted chiefly of novelettes and the weekly paper which circulated in their district, Alice Wharton had become acquainted with characters such as Harold Battersby. She had read of men who had betrayed the trust of innocent girls, but in her lover she did not recognise one of these. Like many another she fondly dreamed that he was good and honourable. Though others were base, not he. Yet she was troubled, and would be until she received the summons to join him, and then all would be well.

In the meantime Harold Battersby departed. He had promised to write on his arrival in town. Two days after his departure, Alice Wharton received her letter, and as her father was away in the fields she sat down to enjoy her first love letter. Eagerly she tore it open, and then came disillusion.

"Dear Alice," it ran, "as I did not want a scene when I left you I deferred saying what I must now tell you. It is, of course, quite impossible for me to marry you. Such a course would not only ruin my prospects, but it would make you forever miserable, as you could not adapt yourself to the usages of society. It is better that things should end now. I enclose you bank notes for £20, and trust you will take a sensible view of the case.—Yours sincerely,

"Harold Battersby."

Alice Wharton did not faint. She did not cry. She simply sat and read and re-read those heartless lines. This man, then, was just like those others, she had read of. She had thought that such as he only existed in the novelettes she read, that they were the creations of the story writer's brains. Now she knew that they did exist, that Harold Battersby was a cowardly villain. As she realised what a mean, contemptible creature she had set up on a pedestal and worshipped, her love turned to hate.

She never wanted to see Harold Battersby's face again. Not under any conditions would she marry him now. She wanted a man—a true man—and he was not such.

Having decided what she would not do, the next thing was to settle what she would do.

To begin with she must leave home. She had let her father's warning go unregarded, and now she could not face his anger. She remembered that in the afternoon he would be going over to the market town to attend a farmers' dinner, and that he would be very late home. He would not expect her to wait up for him. On these occasions he always took the backdoor key with him and let himself in. Therefore, she would not be missed until the following morning. Anxiously she waited his return from the fields for then he would not be long ere he departed.

When John Wharton returned Alice was upstairs. Dearly though she would have liked to have kissed him before she stole away she dare not. The probability of her breaking down would be great, hence she must forego this last kiss.

As she sat she heard his voice in the yard. She heard him ordering one of the men to put the horse in. She heard him come up to his room to dress. She stole a glance at him as he descended the stairs when this operation was concluded. Finally, she heard him calling her.

"Alice, Alice," he called, "where art ta lass?"

It required all her efforts to answer without betraying her emotion, but she managed it.

"I am busy, father," she answered from her bedroom door.

"All right, lass. Aw'm off to 't dinner, an' aw shan't be hoam till latish. Tha needn't wait for me."

"Good-bye, father!" she called back.

"She might think aw wor gooin' a long journey wi' her 'good-bye.' muttered the farmer. "What's tha meean bi 'good-bye,' lass? Good mornin'."

"Well, then, good-morning," replied Alice, and to her relief he moved off with this. Had it been necessary to say more she would have given way, for she knew it was "Good-bye," and not simply "Good-morning" she was saying.

As she watched him drive out of the yard the tears welled up, but she dashed them away. They hindered her sight, and she must gaze upon that retreating figure as long as possible, for was it not the last time she would see him? Hungrily she looked until a bend in the road hid him from her view.

"Good-bye—good-bye and God bless you," she murmured as he vanished, and then flinging herself on her bed she abandoned herself to her grief. Not for herself was she weeping, but for the father whose home would be desolate on his return.

For a while she wept on, and then she commenced her preparations for flight. She had a little money—a very little—for she would not take anything but her own. She had the housekeeping money, but that was her father's. She had the twenty pounds, but that she would not touch. Dressing herself in her most serviceable clothing and hiding away in her pockets her few trinkets, she prepared for the next ordeal. When all her preparations were concluded—all, God knows they were few—she slowly descended the stairs.

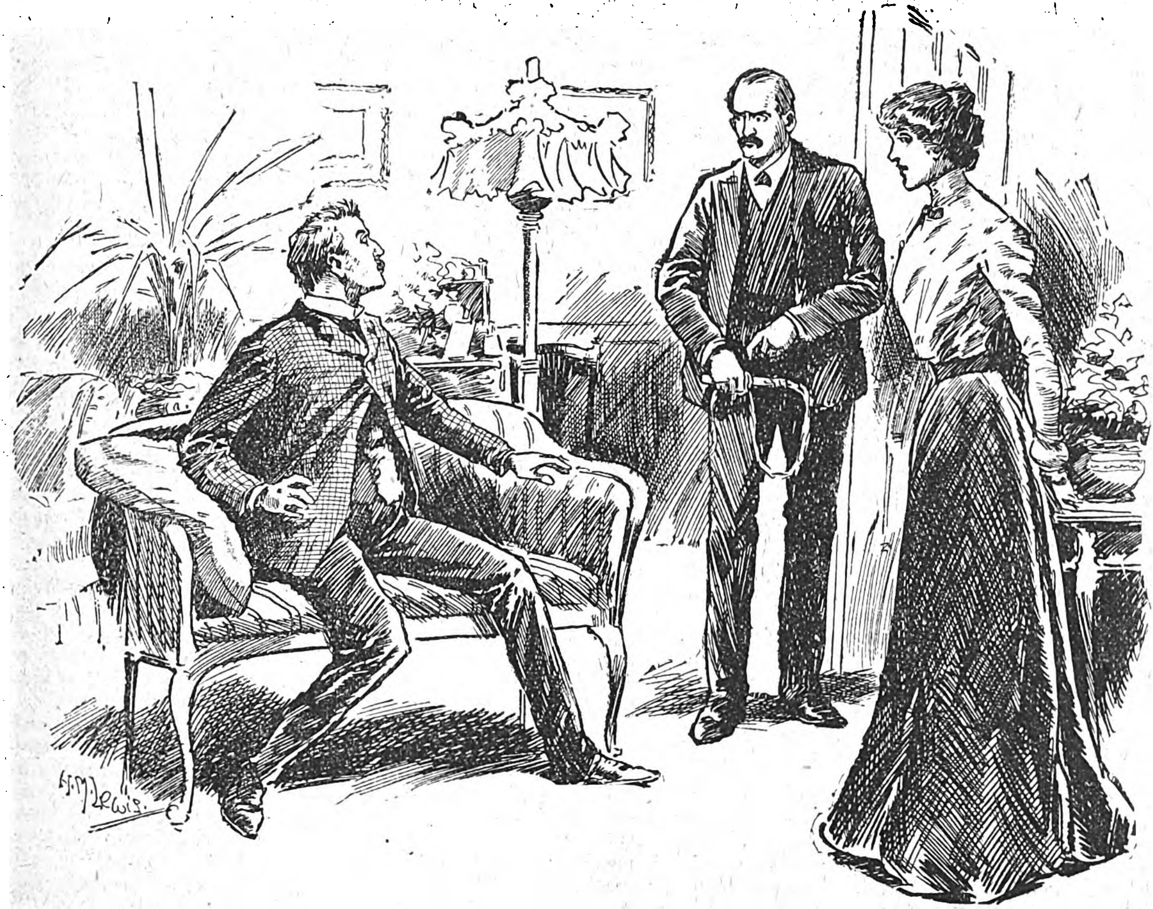
The maid who assisted her in the household work, and who slept at her own home at night, was busy with her duties.

"Sarah," said Alice, "I am going out for the afternoon. You can tell the men to look up to-night and not wait for me, as I shall come home with father."

"All right, miss," replied Sarah, and went on with her work.

There was only one more thing to do. Upstairs again she went to do it, taking with her writing materials.

"Father," she wrote, "it was good-bye and not only good morning. You warned me and I took no heed, so now I must bear my punishment. I am not going to him. I never want to see him again, and I shall never see you again. Once more, good-bye. Don't try to find me. Let me go my own way. Your sorrowing Alice."



To Harold Battersby's surprise and dismay, there stood John Hardcastle.

This she placed on her father's pillow, and then she stole out of the house, taking only a small parcel, and went forth to she knew not what. Straight to the station she went, and booked to a place only a dozen miles away. From there she continued her journey on foot, avoiding houses and people as much as possible. She was a good walker, and before night closed in she had covered a considerable distance, and was in a district where she was not known. On, on she went until she came to another railway line which crossed the country at right angles to the one on which she had first travelled. When she arrived at a station she went in and scanned the table of fares until she saw the name of Birmingham. Nobody in their district that she had heard of ever went to Birmingham, and she decided that she would be safe there. Accordingly she paid her fare, and late that night—the clocks were striking twelve—she arrived in the metropolis of the Midlands, hungry and weary. She wandered out of the great station into the still busy streets, for busy they were to her, not knowing where to go. As she looked helplessly around, a middle-aged woman accosted her.

"Are you looking for someone?" asked the woman.

"No," replied Alice nervously.

"Surely a bonny-looking lass like yourself is not alone?"

"Yes, I am. Can you tell me where I can stay to-night?"

The woman looked at Alice and hesitated before replying. Her scrutiny seemed to satisfy her, and so she went on.

"Well, my lass, I don't know who you are, but it's not a fit time of night for a girl to be wandering about alone. Come along with me, and I will find you a bed. Have you any friends here, or anybody you know?"

Alice sadly shook her head.

"Whatever brings you, a young girl, to Birmingham, without friends? I am glad I met you, for goodness knows what might have become of you. Now, come on home and have some supper."

Alice followed her guide. Leaving the busy thoroughfares, they turned up a side street, and then through several alleys into another street, badly paved and dimly lighted. Into one of the houses in this street her guide led her, saying apologetically. "It's not a very handsome place, my dear, but it's a good deal better than wandering about the streets alone, and, besides—I don't want to hurt your feelings—but you would not easily find a place where they would take a young woman travelling alone."

Alice's heart went out in thankfulness to her friend.

Very quickly a substantial supper was prepared—of which, however, the girl could only partake sparingly. When she had finished she drew out her purse, but the woman stopped her.

"Never mind about that now, dear. Just you come upstairs, and then in the morning we can talk about that."

Grateful for the woman's thoughtfulness, and anxious to escape any further questioning, Alice went up to her bedroom, and soon, from utter weariness, she was fast asleep.

She awoke early next morning, but her hostess had arisen still earlier and when she got downstairs she found breakfast was on the table. To her great relief the woman asked no questions during the meal. At the conclusion Alice again asked the amount of her indebtedness.

"Let me see—supper, bed and breakfast—that will be five shillings," replied the woman. "I am only a poor woman or I would not charge you that."

Alice once more produced her purse, but on opening it she gave a cry of dismay.

"What's the matter my dear?"

"I've—I've lost my money,"

"Lost your money. What do you mean?"

"I had over twenty-two pounds last night and now I've only this," and Alice took out a two shilling piece.

"Where did you lose it, do you think?"

"I don't know. I had it when you spoke to me a the station."

"What do you mean?" and the mask fell off. "Do you mean to insinuate I stole it. Give me the two shillings and get out. Aren't you ashamed to impose on a poor woman and then insinuate you've been robbed in my house. If you're not off at once, I'll call a policeman."

Terrified beyond measure Alice put on her hat and went out of the house. That the woman had robbed her she was sure, but she was helpless. Not knowing where she was going she hurried on, anxious to get away from the city. No more acquaintance did she want with city people.

All that day she wandered on, not daring to stop anywhere. At the sight of a constable she trembled. Darkness came on and still she pursued her course. She was now out in the open country, where the pedestrians were few and far between.

At last wearied out she sank down by the wayside and soon fell asleep. Ere she had slept long the slumber gave way to delirium.

The events of the last few days had been too much for her and she babbled on, until her mutterings attracted the attention of a passing member of the county constabulary.

"Hello! what's this?" exclaimed P.C. Jenkins, as he turned his bull's-eye on the unconscious woman. For the moment he was puzzled. She was not one of the tramp order, that was certain; neither was it a "drunk."

"Here, miss," he exclaimed, "you mustn't stop here."

"Good-bye, father—not good morning," murmured the unconscious girl.

Police-constable Jenkins scratched his head. What was to be done?

Then an idea struck him. John Hardcastle, whose house was close by, was reputed to be a good-hearted man. He would call him up, and procure a conveyance for the girl to be removed in. Acting on this, he proceeded to the house. In response to his ring at the bell, the head of the worthy householder appeared at the window, and after hearing the officer's statement, he was soon downstairs. Having looked at the girl, John Hardcastle quickly made up his mind.

"Give me a hand, officer—let us get her indoors."

"Wouldn't it be better to take her to the hospital, sir?"

"Hospital?—no! Bring her in, and we'll see what we can do for her here."

John Hardcastle was a bachelor, and his household was presided over by his sister, a lady as good-hearted as her brother. This lady had been aroused, and was waiting to second—or, rather, to take the lead in—the work of restoring the lonely wanderer.

For weeks Alice Wharton lay at the Grange, a victim to brain fever, which left her weak and helpless. During those days Mary Hardcastle learned to love the girl thus strangely thrown upon her hands. During the stage of convalescence the patient was not worried by questions, but when she grew strong again Mary Hardcastle tried to learn the story.

When she did eventually hear it, she felt nothing but sympathy which was shared by her brother.

Her father was communicated with, but his grief and anger at her treatment of him was equally great, and he refused to have anything more to do with her.

"Adventures of an Actress" begin next week.

John Hardcastle anathematised the stern father when this decision reached him.

"Well Mary, what's to be done?" he asked as he discussed the matter with his sister.

"John, she must stay with us. She is not fit to go out into the world alone."

"That's right, sister. I knew you would say so."

Alice at first demurred when this was proposed, but her objections were quickly overruled, and she became one of the family, despite the comments of the gossips of the district, whose knowledge was, however, very limited.

Several years rolled by, and there appeared on the scene one who desired Mary Hardcastle to come and preside over his home. When this happened, John Hardcastle took an early opportunity of having a long chat with his protegée.

"Alice," he said, "you know Mary is going to leave us?"

"Yes!" replied Alice with downcast eyes, for she had thought much on this subject.

"Well, look here, Alice, I am a plain fellow. I can't make long love speeches, but I want you to take Mary's place. I want you to become my wife."

Alice blushed and hesitated. She loved her benefactor, but she had never dared to hope to be loved by him. John Hardcastle guessed of what she was thinking. He took her hand in his.

"Alice, I love you. Never mind what has happened in the past. If you can love me, that is all I want. Say, lass, do you love me?"

"Yes," she murmured.

"Well, then, that settles it."

"But can you really love me, knowing what you do?"

"Yes, I can, and do, that's more."

The upshot of all this was that there was a double wedding at the Grange, and Alice Wharton became Mrs. Hardcastle.

For six months after the wedding Alice Hardcastle's life was one of happiness, the only cloud being the persistent refusal of her father to communicate with her. John had been over to Watersbury to try and effect a reconciliation, but his mission had failed.

During this intervening period what had been happening to Harold Battersby? After the despatch of that insulting letter, he had lived in doubt. True, he had given no address in his letter, but he was for some time haunted with a fear that the girl he had wronged might some day cross his path, even in London.

But as time wore on, and he heard nothing he almost forgot the incident. He went back and lived the old life, drinking, gambling, and the like, until at last he came to the end of his resources, and at the time Alice Wharton became the wife of John Hardcastle he was reduced to living on his friends, until they one after the other dropped him disgust.

It was just about six months after the date of Alice's wedding that an old chum offered him a berth in his office in Birmingham, and Harold Battersby accepted. He had only been there a few days, when Fate brought him face to face with the former object of his attentions. He was stepping out of a public-house when she passed the door.

"Alice Wharton!" he exclaimed.

On hearing her maiden name, Alice turned and gazed in astonishment at the speaker. At first, so much had he altered she did not recognise him.

Then she knew him, and the colour receded from her cheeks.

"You! Harold Battersby," she ejaculated.

"Yes! You don't seem pleased to see me, Alice."

"Is that surprising?"

"Well, no, I suppose not. But let byegones be byegones. Can't you forget and forgive?"

"I can do neither one nor the other, and I must ask you if you meet me again not to speak. Remember we are strangers now."

"Allright, my fine lady," muttered the scamp, "things seem to have gone better with you than they have with me. What the good people would call retributive justice, I suppose. Nevertheless I am not going to lose sight of you."

Mrs. Hardcastle had moved away and did not hear this speech. Shortly after leaving Battersby she was joined by her husband. John was quick to note the pallor of his wife and remarked thereon.

"Aren't you very well, dear? You look as though you had seen a ghost."

"I am not very well, John. I should like to get home as soon as possible."

"Very well. I have nothing more to do in the city, so we will go at once."

Accordingly they proceeded direct to the station. Harold Battersby had followed and just as the train was moving out he sprang into one of the rear compartments, bent on knowing more, and if possible, profiting by this chance meeting. John Hardcastle and his wife were the only passengers to leave the train at their station. It would never do for him to get out there so he went on to the next stopping place only a short distance away but as the train pulled out he heard one of the porters address the gentleman by name. This was something to work upon. He returned by the next train. As he alighted he saw the porter who had spoken to Mr. Hardcastle. To him he addressed himself.

"Can you direct me to Mr. Hardcastle's house," asked Battersby. Having received the directions he put another question, which brought him just the information he wanted.

"Can you tell whether Mr. Hardcastle is likely to be at home?"

"Sure to be, sir. He and his wife came down from the city by the last train almost half an hour ago."

"Thank you," replied Battersby, and he meant it.

Then Alice Wharton was married. This was good news to him. The appearance of her husband betokened affluence. It never occurred to Battersby that John Hardcastle was acquainted with her story. Such an idea never crossed his thoughts. What did occur to him was that here lay a chance of getting money easily. Mrs. Hardcastle, he doubted not would readily purchase his silence. He turned into the village inn until night came. Then he commenced operations. He wrote a note which he entrusted to a lad with instructions to deliver it to Mrs. Hardcastle. The note was brief and to the point.

"Dear Mrs. Hardcastle," he said, "I am happy to hear that you are married and have money. I have very little money, but I have a secret which might be of interest to your husband. My silence should be worth something to you, and I shall be glad to arrange terms. A line here will find me to-morrow evening.—Harold."

This missive was duly delivered. Mrs. Hardcastle was seated in the drawing-room with her husband when it was handed to her. She at once recognised the writing and she was in a critical position. She was not however, the simple girl that Battersby had known. Her experiences had altered all that. It took but a few minutes for her to make up her mind. Trembling with nervousness, but not fear, she addressed her husband.

"John," she said, "I must ask your advice on a subject which we had agreed was never more to be mentioned."

"What is it, dear?"

"I have just received this note from the man who deceived me. I met him in the city to-day, and he has evidently followed us down here. What his object is you will see from his note," and she handed it to him.

"What an infernal scamp!" exclaimed John. "He has a secret which might be of interest to me, has he?"

"What am I to do, John?"

"Let me think a minute, Alice."

For several minutes neither spoke, both being absorbed in thought. It was John who broke the silence.

"I have it, dear, that is, if you can bear to go through with your share of the plot. If not, I must think of something else."

"What do you propose?" she asked anxiously.

Quietly John Hardcastle unfolded his plan, and after thinking it over, Alice agreed.

Early next morning Mr. Hardcastle went to Birmingham. In the afternoon, the two servants were surprised by being told they could go out for the remainder of the day. The next move was to despatch a letter to the inn. The following were the contents:

"Mr. Battersby, I have received your communication. My husband left early this morning on a visit to a friend. I have sent the servants out of the way and shall be alone to-night. If you will call at eight o'clock I will discuss terms with you. Bring this note with you and come to the house as an ordinary visitor. But kindly remember to confine yourself entirely to the business which has brought you.—A. H."

When Harold Battersby read this he chuckled.

"I thought I should not have much difficulty with her," he muttered. "She is smarter than I thought, though. She wants the note back to destroy it. Well, that increases the price."

Punctual to the moment he rang the bell and was admitted by Mrs. Hardcastle who ignoring his greeting, led the way into the drawing-room. Battersby seated himself with the air of a man who has triumphed.

"Things appear to have gone well with you, Alice," he began.

"Mrs. Hardcastle, if you please, and please confine your remarks to business."

"Oh! we are coming the high and mighty game are we?" thought Battersby. "Very well, my lady, up goes the price again."

"Have you brought my note?"

"What! are you afraid of it being used as evidence against you?"

"Answer my question, please."

"Yes!"

"Very well. Now I shall be glad to hear what proposals you have to make. Be as brief as possible, as I do not want to prolong this interview."

This cool, business-like manner somewhat disconcerted the blackmailer. He had expected tears and entreaties. Instead of that Mrs. Hardcastle was much the cooler of the two.

"If you had not been so confoundedly cool I should ——"

"Confine yourself to business," interrupted Alice.

"Hang it all! What do you want me to say?"

"I want you to make any proposal you have in your mind as briefly as possible."

"Well, as I was going to say——"

"State your terms or leave!"

"Well, then, £100 now, and more when I want it," blurted out Battersby insolently.

Mrs. Hardcastle gave him a look in which she took no pains to conceal her disgust, and then she replied:

"You will probably remember that when you wrote to me after you left Watersbury you enclosed twenty pounds."

"Yes, I believe that was the amount."

"That is so. I have listened to your proposal; now you shall have my decision. I shall return you that amount, but let it be understood it is not with the object of purchasing your silence. Had you given me any address I should have returned it on the day I received it. I am only taking the opportunity now of doing what I always wished and intended to do, if ever it were possible. As for giving you anything further, you may take it as final that I have not the least intention of doing anything so foolish. The twenty pounds are your own, and I shall not give you more than that."

"So you think to get off as easily as that, do you? Then let me tell you you are greatly mistaken. Now, don't be foolish! Pay me my price, and I will leave you in peace. I would not ask you, only I am so awfully hard up."

"You have heard my decision," replied Alice coldly.

"Very well, Mrs. Hardcastle, perhaps your husband will pay to avoid his name being dragged in the dust."

"Yes, her husband will pay, and pay well!" broke in a voice from the doorway, and to Harold Battersby's surprise and dismay, there stood John Hardcastle.

That gentleman at once strode into the room, and it did not improve Battersby's state of mind to see that he carried a dog-whip in his right hand.

"Alice, leave me to settle with this gentleman," he said, and Mrs. Hardcastle left the room.

"You don't seem pleased to see me," remarked John ironically. "Well, I am very pleased to see you."

Battersby shuffled uneasily on his seat.

"Let us get to business. There's your twenty pounds for a start. Now hand over that note."

Harold Battersby's discomfiture was complete. The tables were turned upon him with a vengeance. He handed over the note and was just going to indulge in a sarcastic remark when another sight of the dog whip caused him to change his mind. John Hardcastle tore the note into fragments and flung it into the fire.

"Now, Mr. Battersby, may I trouble you to sign this?"

This was a confession of attempted blackmail.

Battersby refused.

"Very well, please yourself, my man, but the alternative is a police cell. Now then, are you going to sign?"

Battersby glanced at the face of the man opposite and decided to comply. Accordingly he affixed his signature to the document, remarking as he did so: "I suppose I must admit I am beaten."

John Hardcastle placed his confession in his pocket, and then coolly asked, "Is there anything more you would like to say?"

"No, I think not," feebly replied Battersby.

"I think you said you were beaten," went on John. "I agree with you. But you have another beating to take yet," and with this he pounced on Battersby and thrashed him till the coward fairly howled for mercy. That strong arm stayed not, however, until John Hardcastle was tired. Then he flung the whip aside and pointed to the door.

Harold Battersby slunk out like the whipped cur that he was, and they were troubled with him no more.

That night the train by which his smarting carcase was being conveyed from the scene of his just punishment was run into by another crossing it diagonally, the engine of the other train striking the very compartment of which Battersby was the only occupant. Several people were injured, but he alone was killed.

Next morning John Hardcastle read the report in his paper. The man had been identified by means of documents in his pockets. As he read, it came somewhat as a shock to his usually kind heart to find himself almost rejoicing in another man's death; but it was for the sake of the woman who sat opposite to him. Harold Battersby was effectually and eternally silenced; she need fear him no more.

Thenceforward the pair lived in unbroken happiness, for about this time the stern heart of the farmer, far away in that country district, softened towards his lassie, and her cup of joy was full.

MRS. JUDDENHEIMERS: "Oh, you vas awfully ill Isaac!" Juddenheimers: "Yes, Repecca, but dere is von goot tings about it—I'm getting the vort of my money out of the doctor."

"YOU'RE beautiful!" the young man cried,
His eyes with ardour all aglow.
"Oh, say," the modern girl replied,
"Do tell me something I don't know?"

I AM so weary—yet I fear to sleep!
How hard it seems to lose myself—to go
To that strange world where tyrant Dreams hold rule;
Where I may kill my friend, or wed my foe.

"YOU are rather hoarse this morning." "I am, and I can't account for it." "You have caught a cold, perhaps?" "To look at it in the light in which people ordinarily view it, I have, but as I haven't exerted myself in the least lately, it looks as if the cold had caught me."

"I'VE been taking nerve tonic," said Willie Wishington, "and it has worked first-rate, don't you know." "Indeed!" "Yes, I called on Miss Bankins last night, and the first thing her father said to me was, 'Well. young man, I like your nerve.'"

SMITH: "Now, I maintain that the words 'accident' and 'misfortune,' are pretty nearly synonymous." Brown: "Oh, no, they are not. If that mother-in-law of yours fell into the river it would be an accident, but if anyone pulled her out again that would be a misfortune." Smith: "Ah! now I appreciate the distinction between the words."

Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a Stereoscope to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, July 29th. Postcards only, please. The first prize of One Guinea has been awarded this week to Mrs. T. Gordon, of 44 York Street, Dover, whose contribution is denoted by a star thus.*

JIMMY: "What time do yer have ter get ter work?" Johnny: "Oh, any time I like, as long as I ain't later than seven o'clock."

EDITH: "Colonel Gore is the hero of many engagements." Helen: "Matrimonial?" Edith: "No; he hasn't courage enough for that."

PENN: "Can you suggest any way in which I might improve my new novel?" Editor: "You might put the last chapter first." Penn: "But all the characters die in the last chapter." Editor: "Yes, I know."

"MY dear," he said, with an ill-concealed ring of relief in his voice, "diamonds have gone up nearly fifty per cent. So I find the earrings I promised you will cost more than I can afford." "Oh!" she cried, "isn't it too bad?" "Yes, I am very sorry." "So am I, my dear. It's a shame that you'll have to pay more than you can afford."

CYCLIST (to sleepy-looking villager): "Are you a native of this village?" Villager: "Am I what?" Cyclist: "Are you a native of the village?" Villager: "Hey?" Cyclist: "I asked if you were a native of this place?" Mrs. Villager (appearing at the open door, acridly): "Ain't ye got no sense, Jim? He means wuz ye livin' here when yer wuz born, or wuz ye born before yer begun livin' here. Now answer 'im."

THE mayoral chair of a certain town was occupied by a gentleman of great generosity. Among the applicants who sought relief from him during his tenure of office was a well-known local character who asked the loan of a few pounds to buy a donkey and cart, and set up in the rag and bone business. "Well, Tim," said the mayor, "if I give you this money, how are you going to pay me?" This was a poser for Tim, but a thought struck him, and he blurted out: "Well, yer worship, if ye are kind enough to give me the money, I'll tell yer what I'll do—I'll name the donkey after yer worship!"

* A FRENCHMAN having eaten plum pudding for the first time was so delighted with it that he asked his English hostess for the recipe, which, of course, she gave him. He carried it home, gave it to his wife, and at the same time gave her an enthusiastic account of the delicacy. Not long afterwards the pudding came on the table in a soup tureen, and was ladled out into soup plates. "What is this, my dear?" asked the Frenchman. "Plum-pooding," answered his wife. He laughed at her, and she produced the recipe, which, as she declared, had been strictly followed, and so it had been, for the English lady had omitted all mention of the cloth. The ingredients had been put, according to directions, into a pan of boiling water, had been cooked for the prescribed time, and had come out—soup!

FOND PARENT: "No, he won't work! He never would work! He never will work! There's only one thing—he'll have to go in for the Civil Service!"

FRIEND: "Well, Doc, how's business?" Doctor "Fine. Got two new cases in the next room." Friend: "What, smallpox?" Doctor: "No, champagne."

GEORGE: "I assume to have some knowledge of women." Ethel: "I quite agree with you on that point." George: "What point?" Ethel: "That your knowledge is assumed."

"So she jilted you," said the sympathetic friend. "Yes." "Did she give any reason?" "She did. She said it was because of her philanthropic nature; that it was better to make a great many men happy by being engaged to them than to make one miserable by marrying him."

A MAN showed a lawyer a five shilling piece and asked him whether he thought it was a good one. The lawyer said that it was, put it in his pocket, said his usual fee for advice was 6s. 8d. and would the enquirer please send the balance of 1s. 8d. round to his office at his earliest convenience.

THEY watched the storm. The tempest howled and the rain dashed madly against the earth. "Darling," asked the living skeleton, "are you afraid of lightning?" The bearded lady smiled. "No," she answered confidently. "It is now well established that electricity will not remove superfluous hair." A crash of thunder made it impossible for them to resume their conversation for several seconds.

AT Blackpool the other day a rowing contest took place between crews made up of the single and married men of the town. One of the young fellows who was to row in the "single" boat on the morning of the race was asked what sort of a chance he thought his boat stood. "No earthly chance," he promptly exclaimed. "If we do win it can only be by a fluke." "How's that?" "Why," replied the joking bachelor, "don't you see we've got to row against the 'tied' all the way."

AN old lady came into a local post-office the other day and aggressively addressed the clerk thus: "How is it my son Tom, at York, hasn't got that ten shillings I sent last week?" "Really, I can't say," said the clerk. "Did you post it yourself?" "Yes, and paid you the money. I have your receipt for it." "Please let me see it," said the clerk. The old lady produced a postal order, and waved it triumphantly in his face. When it was explained that the order should have been enclosed in the letter she wasn't at all satisfied, but went out shaking her head and talking to herself.

DURING a recent case a lawyer of the bullying type was examining the prosecutor, who charged the defendent with assault and battery. Lawyer: "Where did the defendant strike you?" Witness: "He struck me on the bridge——." Lawyer (sharply interrupting): "How's that? You said a while ago that he struck you on the balcony." Witness: "So he did, sir, I am telling you no lie." Lawyer: "Did he strike you more than once?" Witness: "Only once, sir, and I was satisfied with that." Lawyer: "How, then, could he strike you on the bridge and on the balcony at the same time and with one blow?" Witness: "He did it, anyhow, sir." Magistrate (interrupting): "On what balcony?" Witness: "The balcony of the hotel, your worship." Magistrate: "But on what bridge?" Witness: "The bridge of my nose, sir. Had the gentleman waited, I'd ha' told him myself."

WONDERS OF FACE TRANSFORMATION.

Every year thousands of new books are published. They are read and forgotten. But once in a hundred years a new book appears which THE WORLD IS WAITING FOR. It contains some new truth which alters the history of mankind. Such a book has just issued from the press. You will read it. If not to-day, then some other day, for sooner or later it will be read by all men and all women. And when you have read it your life will be altered. It will become better, happier, more joyous. The writer of the book is Professor Boyd Laynard. The name of the book is "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH, AND LONG LIFE." It is pronounced by the Press to be the most remarkable work of the century.

"The book is not a novel! Then who wants to read it? People only read novels and newspapers nowadays." That is what you say immediately. But for once you are wrong. At the present moment hundreds of thousands of people are turning over, and eagerly reading, the pages of this book which is not a novel. They are telling their friends about it, and very soon everyone will be reading the book that is not a novel. If you want to be interested, if you want to be instructed, if you want to live long, if you want to be healthy, if you want to be beautiful, you must read the book that is not a novel.

The first part of this remarkable book consists of a practical guide to the attainment of good looks without the aid of art. Professor Boyd Laynard will have nothing to do with powder, paint, face-washes, and the like, but gives plain instructions for the scientific cultivation of beauty. The rest of the book deals with health and long life. These chapters are of the highest value.

This remarkable handbook to the three subjects embraced in the title has been a long period in preparation by the author; being, in fact, the labour of many years of diligent research and earnest investigation. The work is arranged in 127 chapters, the whole of which (in the popular edition now offered to the public) is bound in one volume. The book, although published at Two Shillings, will, if ordered direct from the Publishers, be forwarded to readers of Short Stories, carriage paid, at the low discount price of

ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE.

Amongst the numerous subjects dealt with in Professor Laynard's work the following are but a few. A Complete Syllabus, showing the contents of the whole of the 127 chapters, enumerating upwards of 500 subjects and divisions of subjects, can be had free on application to the Publishers:

The way we make our own faces—Secrets of face transformation—Changeableness of beauty and its causes—Some Strange facts concerning the variableness of beauty—"Odd-faced" beauty—The countenance the counterpart of the mind—How pleasing expressions become permanent—How a person's habitual look is acquired—How permanent expressions can be transformed—Metaphysical secrets of keeping young and preserving a youthful appearance—The author's investigations into the causes why some individuals look younger than others at a certain age—Discovery of a great metaphysical secret—Wonders of the skin—Relation of the skin to beauty—Effects of mental emotions upon the skin—Effects of heat, cold, and changes of temperature upon the skin—Bad complexions and their causes—Diet that spoils and diet that improves the complexion—General care of the complexion—Construction, growth, and wonders of the hair—Why hair falls out, and its remedy—Premature greyness: its causes and prevention—General care of the hair—Superfluous hairs and how to treat them—Wrinkles: their prevention and treatment—Freckles, tan, and blackheads—Oily skin, dry skin, and loose skin—How the nose can be improved—Protruding ears and their treatment—Offensive breath—Anatomy of the teeth—Why teeth decay—General care of the teeth—Tallness, and how to attain it—Round shoulders and how to cure them—How to acquire a full chest—Perfect form and figure: their proper proportions—Thinness, and its treatment—Excessive stoutness—Care of the hands—Care of the feet—Physiognomy; or, the art of reading character from the face—Mental influences upon health—Power of the mind over the body—Influence of the mind in curing diseases—How the mind can cause dyspepsia—Effect of the direction of thought to the heart—How real diseases often supervene upon fancied ailments—How violent passions injure health—Laughter as a medicine—Ailments cured by laughter—Wonders of digestion—Relative value to our bodies of the principal articles of food—Fruits and vegetables as medicine: their various influences upon the physical system—Health preserving diet and its consistency—Diet favourable to mental exertion and intellectual culture—Influence of various foods upon our passions and propensities—The influence exerted by the mind upon the appetite and digestion—Some perilous articles of food—Light, and its influence upon health—Exercise and its relations to health—Baths and bathing: their influence upon health—The marriage state, and its influence upon health—Statistics showing the comparative vitality of married and single persons—100 professions, trades, and occupations: their respective influences upon health and long life—Sleep, and its relation to health—Insomnia, and its treatment—The eyes, and how to preserve them—The ears and hearing: how to prevent deafness—The voice: its cultivation and preservation—Memory, and how to improve it—Sudden failure of memory—Rules for cultivating the memory—Effect of some foods upon memory—Stammering, and how to cure it—Prevention of disease—Nervousness—Blushing: its physiology and treatment—Rules of life for attaining longevity—How to live to a hundred—Premature old age and its causes—Short biographies of 30 modern centenarians, whose ages range from 115 to 185 years—General principles that can be laid down for the anticipation of longevity—The eight signs of long life.

Professor Boyd Laynard has indeed acted wisely in issuing a popular edition of the work, at the low price of one shilling and sixpence, which brings it within the reach of all. It will be forwarded for the sum named, carriage paid, to any reader of Short Stories. Kindly fill up the order form printed below, and send in at once with remittance.

THE EDITOR'S PAGE.

In next week's number will be commenced a splendid series of stories, entitled:

"The Adventures of an Actress."

As I told you last week, these tales will deal with the career of Hazel Harlow, an innocent, young, and beautiful country girl. They will recount the many temptations that beset her, and her triumphant issue from them pure and unspotted. The seamy side of stage life will be vividly exposed, and revelations of a startling character will be made.

In view of the tremendous rush which such a series is bound to cause, it is imperative that you should order your copy beforehand. You can do this by filling in this form and handing it to your newsagent:

Please reserve for me a copy of Short Stories dated August 10th.

Here is a pleasant letter from "S. P.," of Gaisford Road, Kentish Town:

"Just a word re Short Stories. I was recommended to take this in by a friend, and did so. Since then I have persuaded four of my friends to follow my example. I read the whole of the story, 'The Fate of Michael Standridge,' and a very interesting story it was. But the new one, 'The Golden Dwarf,' fairly (to put it in slang) 'takes the cake.' All my friends are simply mad over it.'

Which just shows the value of recommendation. Would that all my readers would follow the example of my correspondent, and get their friends to read the paper.

Apropos of "The Golden Dwarf," I have received the following from Miss Louie Spencer, who has been appearing recently at the Grand Theatre, Leeds, with great success:

"As an old subscriber and admirer of your charming little paper, Short Stories, I venture to point out a slight mistake in the new serial story, 'The Golden Dwarf.' The hero says he visited the theatre and followed the sorrows of Eily in The Shaughraun. Now, Eily is the heroine in The Colleen Bawn—the chief feminine parts of The Shaughraun being Moya, Claire, and Arte O'Neal.'

I am much obliged to Miss Spencer for the correction.

Another criticism of "The Golden Dwarf," but not a very serious one. "J. G.," having pencilled the names of seventeen characters on the back of a postcard, intimates that it is "too great a strain to remember them all."

For which I am sorry—for "J. G." For if the remembering of seventeen characters in a story is beyond his mental capacity his loss is considerable. It is quite a reasonable number, as he will see on comparing "The Golden Dwarf" with any novel of Dickens or Scott, or any play of Shakespeare, or for that, most of the novels or plays of note. In "The Golden Dwarf" the characters are so cleverly differentiated that no difficulty should be experienced in following the parts they take in the story.

"Eccentric."—Any man who desires to do so may easily become ambidextrous. All he has to do is to begin and systematically use his left instead of his right hand whenever it is possible. The ambidextrous man not only has the advantage over his opponent in sparring and all athletic sports, but he has a great advantage over others in games of skill, in almost any kind of business, and is a better man all round. The one-handed man is a one-sided man. The muscles on the right side of the right-handed man become developed at the expense of the muscles of the other side; that shoulder becomes higher, and the man grows lopsided.

To avoid this ought to be the effort of every youth, for then the muscular habit is formed. The difficulty may be corrected in some degree, however, by systematically using the left, or weaker hand and arm. Keep your keys and things in your left-hand pocket, reach for things with your left hand, pick up weights with your left. You will be astonished to see how rapidly your hitherto neglected member can be brought into active and useful service.

LATEST NEWS.

In the event of any important news arriving when the paper is going to press it will be found in this space.

Newsagents' shops will be besieged by people ordering next week's Short Stories containing "Adventures of an Actress."

TO CONTRIBUTORS.

I am open to consider original stories of any length from 1,500 to 6,000 words. The character of stories required may be best ascertained by a careful reading of the contents of the paper. All MSS. are dealt with promptly, and every effort is made to return rejected stories which are accompanied by stamped addressed envelopes. At the same time, I cannot hold myself responsible for MSS. accidentally lost. Communications of this kind should be addressed The Editor, Short Stories,

MY RIVAL;

Or, A WEEK AT AN IRISH WATERING-PLACE.

By M. J. GREEN, Author of "My Mother's Diamonds."

I WISH Madge Merrington had not been so provokingly pretty, a perfect gossamer fairy, weaving her webs on all sides, and ensnaring with equal facility the wary and the incautious.

She was seven years old when I first knew her. I was eight-and-twenty, and, as a matter of course, I took her on my knee, petted and caressed her.

But years pass on—lucklessly for some, happily for one who steps from childhood to the fuller fairness of maturity. When Madge was fourteen it grew to be a question of nicety when my friendly admiration should cease, or rather how far it should go.

If I had not seen her so constantly the matter would have been less embarrassing. I should have left her at one date a charming child, and found her after due interval a graceful girl. But I was on the most intimate terms at her home. Mr. and Mrs. Merrington were my oldest friends, and as I lived on the same terrace with them in a select suburb of the Irish metropolis, they extended their hospitality to me with the warmth and impulsiveness of the genuine Hibernian heart. Now on what precise day or at what precise hour I was first to cease my coaxing attentions and bestow my last kiss, was a point which puzzled me considerably. Wherefore should I be unchecked in my demonstration one day, restrained the next? What reason could I, or any one, assign for an abrupt change from freedom to frigidity? The difficulty, nevertheless, was solved for me in a manner which I had least expected.

One afternoon, in the month of May, I had returned early from my office, and had made my way direct to Merrington Villa, with a bouquet in my hand and a parcel under my arm. Madge had reached the mature age of fifteen on this memorable day, and this was an event I could not forget.

I found her alone in the drawing-room, which looked on a lovely little flower-ground at the back. She was in white muslin, with pale-pink bows, and large rosettes of the same hue on high-heeled shoes—rather a juvenile costume for the hour; but she was to have an early party of young friends, and was ready dressed for their arrival. I presented my gifts, and I don't think anyone can blame me if I accepted her thanks; but at that instant the door opened, and Mrs. Merrington appeared.

I do not wish to be evasive, but I really cannot distinctly recall in what exact attitude Madge was at the crisis. I have a faint recollection of the touch of some dear little fingers at the tips of my mcustache. Another shock, however, overpowers the memory of this electric thrill. It was that caused by the tone of Mrs. Merrington.

"Madge! come down this moment, miss! You are too great a girl to be on Mr. Hartwell's knee."

I started; but the young lady was more self-possessed.

"Dear old fellow!" she exclaimed, "Why shouldn't I thank him? Of course he must have a kiss for the big book and bouquet he has brought me on my birthday."

And then, with a sweet roguish look, she was gone. A quick knock at the hall-door had brought new excitement to her thoughts, and I and the reproof were alike forgotten.

"Madge is very wild and wilful," said Mrs. Merrington, drawing near to me, and fixing her hazel eyes full on mine. "She forgets that she is not a child any longer."

"She does not wish to forget friends, at all events,' I said quietly.

"Nor I either, Mr. Hartwell. But you see—you feel for yourself that she has grown up quickly; in fact, she is tall and old for her age, though her manners are so unformed. I must not let her turn into a romp."

"I shall not encourage the propensity, Mrs. Merrington," was all I could say, for somehow a blow seemed struck at me as she spoke; the gates of a too happy paradise were closed swiftly by an inflexible hand.

"That is all right," returned the mother, with a smile. "If Madge needs a hint again, I know you will not."

After this day I visited only occasionally at the Merringtons'. Yet whenever I saw my young friend I felt that she could never be tutored into worldliness, and that the warm heart of the child was being preserved true and guileless through the more difficult stage of girlhood.

Three years passed; Madge was eighteen, and a brighter being never dropped the garb of girlhood for that of lovely womanhood, and rose, fresh as a fairy in some dazzling transformation scene, before the enrapt gaze.

She was petite; but her figure was perfect with the slightness which develops into roundness; her hands small and white, with that rapidity and deftness in their grasp which marks the brisk decided character. Nothing betrays more weakness of temperament, more helpless indecision, than the limp touch which is given by some fingers. They seem to follow the slow motions of the brains, and to be unable to catch quickly or surely at any object upon earth.

Madge had large hazel eyes, like her mother's, with a short but dark fringe of lashes, and their gaze was clear and open, more penetrating than pensive. Her hair was wavy, brown in its tint, and she wore it brushed in curly ripples off the whitest of temples. Of her charming rosy mouth I will not speak. It was the feature of all others which spoke for itself, and which smiled too straight into the heart to leave actual impression upon the memory.

Mr. and Mrs. Merrington did not see much company, and thus it came to pass that an invitation to the young lady to spend a month with a friend at a northern watering-place was met by her with a joyous response. The consent of her parents had been gained, and she set out radiantly on her trip. The month was July, the weather propitious; Madge was to have sea-bathing, boating, riding, and dancing. If she were high-spirited before she left, what might not be expected from such exciting regimen as this!

The time for her stay passed over, and she did not return. A further extension of leave was asked for, and conceded amidst some laments from her parents on the loneliness they were left to. Meanwhile I saw them more frequently than before.

They were very kind to me, and when an office holiday came to both of us gentlemen, it was proposed at once that we should follow in the steps of the little truant, and taste for ourselves a week's refreshment among the Atlantic breezes on the far coast of Antrim.

Madge had been staying at Fairbank, an inland residence about two miles from the coast; but on our arrival at the fashionable hotel of the adjacent watering-place, she was to join us there.

Too well I remember the exquisite evening on which we reached our destination. It was in the middle of August. The sea was grand but not menacing; the sun was sinking in glowing splendour behind the bold promontory to the left of the town; and the air, blown across the crested waves from the far western world was borne like a breath of new life upon the heart.

The terraces were gay with promenaders, and every eye looked clear, every face bright, from contact with the exciting elements around.

Sea breezes and waters had been tasted of till mists and moodiness were swept away, till sunshine and brilliancy seemed the predominant features of life.

Just as the bell rang for the table d'hôte dinner a carriage drove up, and looking eagerly from the bow-window in front of the hotel I saw Madge spring out of it.

She ran up the steps. and was greeted by her father and mother who stood in the portico, and lastly with a quiet smile and a grasp of the hand by me.

"I am so glad you have come," was her pleasant welcome. "We shall be so happy all together. I have been longing for you to be here."

All three seemed included in this greeting, and indeed Madge, if more beautiful than ever, was unchanged in her sweet joyousness of manner towards myself.

After dinner we adjourned at once to the headland, which was a fashionable resort for an evening walk, and many a glance was attracted to the merry young lady of our party.

For some time Madge tripped along on the grass promenade of the centre platform, where numerous strollers were enjoying, like ourselves, the parting loveliness of sea and sunset.

Presently, however, she was off like a bird to the very verge of the surrounding cliffs, to catch a fuller view of the great Atlantic steamer bound for the New World. I sprang after her. A gust had risen, and Mrs. Merrington looked apprehensive.

"Oh, there is no fear," was Madge's rejoinder to my expostulation. "I am as sure-footed as a goat, I am made for high life!" and her sweet lips parted in their loveliest smile.

"Madge, come back!" cried her mother. "You are too giddy."

"No, not the least light-headed, I assure you mamma."

"Light-footed, rather?" I suggested.

"Yes, and light-hearted too, I hope."

"There is no doubt of that."

"Oh, how I wish Harry was here!" was her quick exclamation. "We should be all the merrier then."

"Harry? Who is he?" I inquired.

She looked at me for an instant; then lowered her eyes, and the slightest flush rose into her face.

"Oh, a great friend of mine. Did not mamma tell you?" she murmured. "We met at Fairbank."

"Indeed! And you like him very much?"

"Yes," with another mischievous glance. "Have you any objection?"

"Of course not. If you are pleased, that is enough for me."

"Well, Harry is delightful," she pursued. "You would think so yourself. We were inseparable at once. Mamma knows all about it, and has asked my dear Harry to join us here to-morrow. I shall be quite happy then." And then a beautiful light came into her eyes—a light which I could not mistake.

I was silent for a while, and we walked on together, Mr. and Mrs. Merrington having turned back on the promenade.

"I suppose he is young?" I hazarded, after a pause.

"Yes, not old, certainly, but a good many years in advance of me."

"And good looking?"

"Too handsome, I think. That is my one objection."

"It is no great drawback, Madge," and I sighed.

She caught the sigh, and the half-sad expression that accompanied it, for she questioned me the next instant, with her eyes fixed on my face.

"What makes you so grave, Mr. Hartwell?"

"I suppose because I am growing grey," was my response.

"What nonsense! Your hair is just the right hue, none else would suit you so well."

"But it does not make a younger man of me."

"And why wish to be young? What good would it do you?"

This was a poser certainly; and fearing I was getting on hazardous ground, I hastened to change the conversation. I began to think Madge something of a coquette. She knew—she must have known—what I felt, that I was wild enough to love her, and yet she restrained in no way her fascinations; she looked at me with her bewildering eyes, smiled on me with her enchanting lips, and then all but laughed at me if I showed sentiment or susceptibility. She could talk of "Harry" and her admiration for him with coy delight, and expatiate on his youth and attractiveness, while I, grave and saddened, was expected to listen and congratulate.

On returning to the hotel we adjourned to the inner saloon at the end of the long coffee-room, which we found pretty well filled with company. It was amusing to watch the groups of friends who chatted together, and of strangers who eyed one another. A scanning glance was given to each personage who entered, and there was either a quick greeting from some amongst the party, or the new-comer found himself condemned to a sort of suspicious isolation. We, being four in number, were independent of such scant courtesy as might be offered, and contented ourselves with the accommodation of a comfortable couch and the entertainment of watching the scene from a theatrical point of view.

"Adventures of an Actress" next week.

There were several Americans amongst the assembly, and these were easily recognised by their gesticulations, their elaborate dress on the ladies part, and their harshly attuned voices in the case of the men.

Madge could scarcely restrain her smiles at one specimen of the fraternity, who wore his red hair in a flame-like pyramid with a sort of crater in the middle. He spouted forth volubly as he stood in a conspicuous position in the room, his small eyes making the most of their vision, and a long hand extended "right ahead," as he would himself express it.

"Your Cosway," he exclaimed, after some expatiation on the scenery of the locality, "your Cosway, as I take it, is a worked out viaduct, overwashed now by our big ocean; and your two specks of islands were once one ——"

"Won! by whom?" said a supercilious-looking gentleman, who twirled a yellow moustache.

"One, I said—run up together."

"I'm as glad they're a trifle apart now," interposed a bluff black man, whose accent flavoured somewhat too strongly of Tipperary. "We are near enough to please me an' many others too. The farther off the better from those who are neither kin nor kind."

"You're a bit of a Home Ruler, I guess?" rejoined the American.

"I'm for Home Rule, if that's what you mean. We haven't got it yet."

"Nor won't for many a day, while there's a stone on the Giant's Causeway or a northern foot on the ground."

This was declaimed in a vehement brogue by another listener.

His staunch figure, broad open features, and freckled face stamped him at once as the genuine Orangeman of the North, who is proud of his country, his prowess, and his Protestantism.

"You're a Belfast boy, perhaps?" retorted the representative of the South. "You can spin a yarn of linen, I make no doubt, but you had better leave the talk alone. You can't run on there."

"I can cut short if I can't run on," was the retort, "and that's sometimes more to the point," and he turned off abruptly.

At this juncture a lady with prompt tact rose to propose some music. She glided over to a friend who showed herself pleasantly acquiescent, and in her turn moved to the piano, which a gentleman opened for her.

The southern, apparently an old acquaintance of the musician, at once sprang forwards.

"A song of my own choosing, then, Mrs. Lanyon," he said. "You can't refuse it to me. Let us have 'The Wearing of the Green.'"

"No, no!" cried a dozen voices.

But at the moment the lady began, in a voice so sweet that no one could hush it, the somewhat rebel words:

"Farewell, for I must leave thee,
  My own, my native shore,
And, doomed in foreign lands to dwell,
  May never see thee more;
For laws, our tyrant laws, have said
  That seas must roll between
Old Erin and her faithful sons
  That love to wear the green.
Yet whatsoe'er our fate may be
  When oceans wash between,
Her truest sons will ever sing
  The wearing of the green.

"My father loved his country,
  And sleeps within her breast,
While I, that would have died for her,
  Must never so be blest.
Those tears my mother shed for me—
  Far fewer they had been
If I had proved a traitor
  To the wearing of the green.
Yet brighter days will surely come
  Than those that we have seen,
When Erin's sons may proudly sing
  'The Wearing of the Green.'"

The Orangeman had risen, and was listening with such a knit brow that some stormy passage seemed inevitable, till, just as the last note died away, the air was changed with pantomimic rapidity, and the loyal chords rang forth of "The Boyne Water."

Everyone laughed then. Anger at the charming mélange was impossible. Even the Tipperary blood seemed restrained from ebullition by the soothing potion which had been first drunk in, and presently all settled down in detachments to chess, cards, or music.

The next day was bright and bracing, and at ten o'clock our party mounted the long car which starts from the hotel at that hour for the Giant's Causeway.

I had a place beside Madge, and was content. She, on her part, looked bewitching in a gipsy hat crowned with wild flowers, and talked alternately to me and a companion on the left. The acquaintance of the latter gentleman she had made at the table d'hôte.

He was a Professor from the Belfast College, wore spectacles and a sort of astrologer's hat, and was sufficiently antiquated to stifle any pang of jealousy I might have felt, and give me a sensation of rejuvenescence and agility which was very gratifying.

I could bound off the car quicker than he on our arrival, offer Madge my hand, and carry her off, the first of the pedestrians, for the cliffs. The sea was wild and lovely. A north-westerly wind blew the waves in foaming cascades upon the rocks and strand, and the curious pipe-like pillars of the great organ facing seaward were burnished by a gleam of the most golden sunlight.

Presently I heard Mrs. Merrington's voice behind.

"Madge is it in your pink llama you are? That looks too glaring out of doors. You should only wear it in the evenings."

The young lady had just thrown off a grey cloak which had enveloped her on the drive, and stood forth brightly in the above apparel.

"But why, mamma?" she responded. "What harm, if it is pretty? Daylight should be as honoured as gaslight. I am not afraid of colour."

She certainly need not be so, while her fair faultless complexion eclipsed all in brilliancy, and threw every tint, even of rose, into the shade.

"We shall be hurried on our return, and have no time to dress," she confided to me roguishly, "and Harry will have arrived then."

"Oh! that accounts for all."

"All what?"

"Your gaiety and your garb."

"But when am I grave? Do you ever see me dull, Mr. Hartwell?"

"No, in truth; but there are degrees even of liveliness. Sunshine in the heart throws the strongest light of all. You know what you told me: 'When Harry comes I shall be quite happy.' Does not that imply a want, now?"

Madge could scarcely restrain her smiles at one specimen of the fraternity, who wore his red hair in a flame-like pyramid with a sort of crater in the middle.

"Ah! don't criticise me on my words, don't draw logical conclusions. I speak what I think at the moment. But there are many moments—many moods."

"The more the merrier in your case, I think." And saying this I gave her my hand to help her over a barrier of rock which was our first approach to the Causeway. The rest of the party were on a more circuitous path, and followed us leisurely.

Madge was agile enough to accept but little assistance, and she stepped lightly from stone to stone till we had gained the further projection of broken columns fitting curiously into one another, which our American would describe as "the Viaduct."

This rocky groundwork showed fragments of every fantastic shape, some regular, others irregular, round, triangular, octagon, and nonagon.

Above us were pillars of colossal height, inlaid, as it were, into the dark cliffs; while the ocean stretching out far before our gaze, dashed its noisy waters upon the basement of the pedestals, and fled in more foaming waves towards the mouth of the caves beyond.

"We must have a boat!" cried Madge. "See, there is a party in one at this moment. They are at the entrance of the large cavern. How they toss up and down in the surge! Harry thinks boating slow work; but there is nothing tame, I am sure, in a row about here."

Harry again! How I hated the name, and especially the soft blush that announced it! Looking at Madge, I saw that sparkle in her eye which betrayed her secret, and struck a blow equally at my own presumption.

The professor came up just then, and began some disquisition on geological researches. He brought out his knowledge in allusions to stratified and igneous rocks, to the classes of strata comprising palæozoic, post-tertiary, &c., and might have wandered on into still more puzzling terms, had not Madge shown something of impatience.

She gladly seconded my move for an adjournment to the heights above us, which were covered with a mossy undulating turf, and looked inviting for the picnic luncheon that was in prospect.

The repast having been spread and partaken of, Madge was the first to proclaim its conclusion, and dart in her usual impulsive way to the very verge of a cliff.

"Such a great seagull!" she cried. "He has just risen from the crag beneath us, and flies direct seaward. A good omen for the weather—is it not? Oh, I should love to take wing in that way! I feel really as if I could flit off quite securely; and alight on the head of one of those pedestrians below."

"You would be much more likely to alight on your own," said her father, pulling her back somewhat brusquely from her airy situation. "If you feel safe yourself, Madge, that is no reason for making your mother and every one else uncomfortable about you."

The young lady succumbed to this reproof and was tolerably amenable for the rest of the morning.

On our return to the hotel she became excited anew. At the same time she did not try to escape from my companionship, but, having put a question to the waiter, she turned to me with a smile, and announced that "Harry" was awaiting her in the inner saloon, and asked if I would not wish to be introduced. I acquiesced with the readiness which is allied to curiosity, and followed her promptly.

I could not but wonder to myself, as we traversed the coffee-room, at the gentleman's tardiness in hastening forth to meet her. He could scarcely fail to have seen the long car drive up to the door as it passed the windows of the drawing-room, and yet she was left to seek him out, instead of accepting the first greetings and attentions at his hands.

However, Madge seemed perfectly satisfied, and it was assuredly not my part to desire a more lover-like alacrity.

The door of the saloon was closed, and as Madge had her grasp on the handle she said to me in a whisper:

"Now what do you expect? Tell me beforehand."

"An Adonis, of course," was my reply. "But I am afraid not a very active one. He ought to have been earlier on the scene."

She laughed.

"You are a famous guesser. Indolence is just the one fault I have to find," and thereupon the door was thrown open and she went impulsively forwards.

At this hour the room was usually deserted, and a glance showed me that it contained but a single occupant.

I paused in perplexity, and a strange sensation sent a throbbing to my heart. Madge had her arms round someone's neck; her soft clinging embrace was given with a warmth and impulsiveness which would have been too much for me under other circumstances. As it was, I felt my colour rise, and, stepping closer, I uttered her name in quick accents.

"Madge, Madge, who is this?"

She was round in an instant, with her hazel eyes full of their merriest light.

"My friend Harrie. Won't you recognise her? Allow me to introduce you in full form. Mr. Hartwell, Miss Henrietta Delancey."

Never, I think, had I greeted a stranger with such impetuous delight before. I am almost afraid that my excessive eagerness must have been mistaken for familiarity; for Miss Henrietta, who was very handsome, gave me a scanning glance from her fine eyes, and drew back with the slightest degree of hauteur. Her expression was by no means so sweet as Madge's, though she had the advantage of her in height, and possibly in what is termed style.

Madge evidently admired her immensely, and clung about her in a delighted way which was very childlike and charming. I had still, I found, a rival in "Harrie"; for words and smiles were all given in this quarter now, and I was left pretty much to the task of reflection till we were out on the hill in the evening for our usual promenade. Miss Delancey had accepted then the escort of an old acquaintance, whom she had met unexpectedly at the table d'hôte, and Madge was content perforce to fall back on my companionship. She did it with so good a grace that I had to forgive her everything—her previous artifice, and her recent neglect. I could not but call her to some account, however, as we found ourselves side by side.

"Why did you tell me it was a gentleman friend I was to expect?" I questioned, with a full glance beneath her hat. She met the look with wide-open eyes.

"I never said so, never, indeed, Mr. Hartwell?"

"Well, you allowed me to assume it."

"Oh! the mistake was a too amusing one to be set right. You spoke so touchingly of 'Harry,' looked forward so longingly to his advent."

"I doubt about the latter part of that statement, Miss Madge. I should have been quite satisfied never to see the expected guest, if you had been of the same mind."

"And why, pray, if you pictured him so fascinating?"

"Possibly for that very reason. Have you ever heard of such a thing as jealousy?"

The flush deepened on Madge's cheek; but then she indulged so often in this bewildering loveliness I could not appropriate anything special from the token.

"Madge," I said as we went onwards, "I am in your hands now. Lead me to some charmed spot."

"Do you want to be enchanted?"

"Scarcely that. The magic chains are too fast already; but I would cast a spell over you. In this delicious dreamy air it might be possible."

"And not in daylight? You have given me fair warning. I refuse to be deluded."

"Illusion I spoke of; but if you prefer a reality——"

I stopped, her gaze was turned on me, and something in its questioning light forbade interrogation of mine.

"There is my nook!" she exclaimed the next instant. "Far down in the steepest part of the cliff, where no passer-by can penetrate. Seated there, looking straight seaward, I can forget the whole world."

"And you enjoy that?"

"When I am selfish."

"You give it a right term. Whenever you are thus hard upon others, be so upon yourself."

We were watching the last glimpse of sunset as we spoke. The globe of fire, which had floated, as it were, on the surface of the water, vanished with a strange suddenness from our eyes, and at the moment a soft vapoury atmosphere replaced the former radiancy.

Madge turned landwards with one of her swift motions.

"We must hasten now," she said; "my mother will be lamenting the loss of my cloud. I am to follow the sky, it seems, and when it wraps itself up I must do the same."

"Well, you like to look high, I remember that."

She only smiled, made no disclaimer. Yet the charge was for ever refuted when I grew aspiring on my part; and to a question put to her at last no denial rose, either, to her lips.

With this happiness my stay at the seaside ended. It was a farewell to the place, but not to what had passed in it. The memories of the visit and its summer lights were to live in a brightness which has had no sunset.

"Startling Stage Revelations" next week.

THE POWER OF HOPE.

BY JOHN HENRY PEAT.

We called him "Doctor"—not because he was a medical man, or had ever attempted to join the ranks of the profession, but because he was chiefly to be found in the company of young medicos, and largely interlarded his conversation with the terms he had learned from them.

When first I made his acquaintance he was, in appearance and manner, a gentleman, but a gentleman who bade fair to lose the instincts of his class. For two years he had been known to the circle in which I found him, but nobody could give any information as to his previous history.

His name was Alfred Barber. He was in receipt of an income sufficiently large to provide him with all the necessaries and some of the luxuries of life, and which also left him with a sufficient margin to enable him to join the Bohemian crew in convivial evenings at "The George," the house specially favoured by the embryo doctors. From what source his income was derived, or who and what his family were, no one knew.

The night my brother took me down to join the charmed circle at the "George," Alf, as he was called when the nickname was not substituted, was present, and I was introduced to him. I have always remembered the manner in which he acknowledged the introduction.

"Youngster," he said, he was considerably my senior, "I am glad to welcome you among us, provided you have a strong head and a firm will. If not, Tom has made a mistake in bringing you here."

There was a general protest against this.

"What do you mean, Barber?" interrogated one.

Ignoring this question he put another to me.

"Are you anxious to acquit yourself creditably and rise high in your profession?" he asked.

"Most certainly I am," I replied with all the enthusiasm of youth.

The "Doctor" turned to the crowd sitting round the table, all of whom were gazing half in wonder, half in amusement at Barber.

"Will any gentleman present who has realized his early ambitions kindly signify the fact by rising," he exclaimed.

Nobody rose.

"There, my friend, you observe the mute confession of at least partial failure, and this particular society, to which you are now introduced, has provided more instances of this kind than any other, and now having warned you as to the probable result of becoming a member, if you fail I am guiltless in the matter."

"Fancy Doctor Barber moralising," broke in a lively looking member of the company.

"Shut up, Jingle," retorted Barber. "You protest too much, considering you are one of the most lamentable instances of failure present."

"Oh, indeed!" remarked the worthy addressed.

"Yes, that you are, and I have no hesitation in venturing on a prophecy concerning you."

"Is Barber also among the prophets?" sarcastically inquired Jingle.

"At any rate I am prophetically inspired concerning you."

"Let us have the benefit of your prophecies, then."

"Very well. Your exam. is fast approaching. You will be 'ploughed,' and eventually find yourself on the dicky of a hansom."

"If I thought you were anything of a prophet, doctor, I should immediately cut this crowd," replied the one addressed as Jingle, dropping his bantering tone. "After pinching and saving as she has done to give me my chance, it would break the mater's heart were any such thing to come to pass as you so gloomily predict."

"I am surprised at you, Jingle. The idea of a medical student talking of a broken heart. Why, man, such an expression as that is in itself such a display of ignorance of the very rudiments of your profession as to effectually bar the way to your further advancement."

"Bravo, Doctor!" shouted the crowd.

"Gentlemen," broke in the member who occupied the chair at the head of the table, "you are talking shop, which is a breach of our rules, and you are allowing the requirements of a guest to go unattended to, which is a gross violation of the laws of hospitality. Jingle, you and Barber are the offenders in this matter, so I jointly fine you drinks round."

Thus was the manner of my introduction to the "Doctor."

Though I was not a very frequent visitor at the meetings of the "Jollyboys club," yet occasionally I dropped in to spend an evening with them, and from my observation I concluded that the most likely man to drive a hansom was the "Doctor" himself.

He was fast losing the smartness of appearance and manner which had characterised him, and the income which had been sufficient was now evidently far too small for the demand made upon it.

This was apparent in trifles. The various articles of jewellery which at one time had adorned his person were now conspicuous by their absence.

His rings went first, then the neat scarf-pin—a valuable one—vanished, and his watch was so long absent, ostensibly undergoing repairs, that we formed our own conclusions as to its abiding place.

About that time I was called home and temporarily lost sight of my acquaintances, and during this time the exam. had come and gone.

In one respect my friend "Doctor" had prophesied only too truly. Jingle—careless, lighthearted and sanguine Jingle—had been most ignominiously "ploughed," and the consequences had been still more disastrous. From the day the results were announced Jingle had become utterly reckless. Thoughtless and perhaps selfish he had been, but he most uncompromisingly refused to return home to his widowed mother with his failure. He could not bear, he said, to face her and say that her sacrifices and her care were all of no avail, and so he grieved her more by staying away and maintaining a dogged silence.

Night after night he went home helplessly drunk. When his cash had gone, he commenced pawning his possessions, until at last all that remained were the clothes in which he stood.

"Adventures of an Actress" next week

At this point, his maternal uncle came upon the scene, and after a while his persuasions, backed by those of Jingle's colleagues, resulted in his promising to return home; but when the time really came for his departure the thought of facing his mother with his failure was too much for him and he disappeared leaving no trace behind him.

All this was retailed to me on my return to town.

"But what about our prophetic friend?" I asked.

"Oh, that is another surprise in store for you," was the reply.

"Why, what has happened?"

"The unexpected, of course. You remember how he was gradually sinking. Well, suddenly he pulled up short, turned completely round, and started to climb again. Since then we have not seen much of him."

"And the reason of this—what is it?" I queried.

"That we have not yet learned, but I should guess there is a lady in the case."

"What! the 'Doctor' in love!"

"Well, why not?" queried my informant.

"Oh! I know of no reason against it, but I never thought of the 'Doctor' as a man likely to come under a woman's influence."

A few weeks elapsed before I ran against Barber, and when I saw him I could scarcely believe the evidence of my own eyes. There stood the redoubtable "Doctor" himself, smiling and fresh. He was immaculately attired, and looked more a gentleman—which he really was—than ever I had seen him before.

"Hello, youngster!" he exclaimed, "you seem surprised to see me."

"Well," I stammered, "I—I am rather surprised."

He looked at me in an amused kind of way.

"I say, youngster"—he always addressed me in that manner, by the way—"come on, now, confess, is it merely seeing me that has surprised you so perceptibly?"

"It is partly that and partly—well, never mind about the rest, I am glad to see you."

"All right, my boy," he replied, his eyes twinkling in enjoyment of my embarrassment, "I know. You are surprised to see me 'clothed and in my right mind'—is that it?"

I nodded assent. Then he continued.

"Have you any engagement this evening?" he inquired, "if not, you must be my guest, and I will promise you an interesting story."

"I'll come with pleasure," I replied, and with this we parted.

At the time appointed I arrived at my friend's abode, and we were soon deep in conversation.

"You know, youngster," he said, in his own congenial style. "I like you, and I am going to tell you something of my story. I shall not trouble you with details of my boyhood and youth, but proceed straight to the time when I became engaged to be married. For a long time the course of our love ran smoothly, in spite of the old adage that 'the course of true love never runs smooth,' until there came a time, when, owing to certain untoward circumstances I embarked on a course of deception. Now, in justice to myself I must say that this deception was not of a kind that would have injured anyone, but nevertheless it was deception, and as such, was, of course, reprehensible. There came a time when I was discovered. Then came a cruel, crushing blow. The young lady to whom I was engaged was the soul of honour and truth, and she had esteemed me likewise. When she learned that the man she had set up on a pedestal and almost worshipped, was merely an idol with feet of clay, she wrote me a curt—very curt—note, finally and forever terminating our engagement. It was then I commenced the life I was leading when first you met me. As you know, I was rapidly going down, when another turn of events put a stop to it."

Here he paused and looked reflectively in the fire, but it was evident his thoughts were not unpleasant ones, for he smiled as he gazed. For a moment or two we sat thus and then he again broke the silence. Raising his eyes from the fireplace to the mantel-piece he resumed his story.

"There, right in front of you, is the photograph of the lady who has brought about the change."

A question rose to my lips, but ere I could frame it into words he had answered it.

"That is the lady to whom I was engaged, and to whom I hope to be again engaged when I have proved my worthiness. While you were away we met, and as a result of that meeting a second interview was arranged in a quiet corner of the park, where we could converse undisturbed. The appointment was kept, and out of the fulness of my heart my mouth spoke. I told her that my love for her was true gold, purged of all its dross by the fires of suffering through which it had passed. I also told her that with some hope of regaining the love which had formerly been mine I could work, but without it my life would be a blank.

"Ultimately she gave me that hope and now you know the reason of the change in me. I am afraid I have wearied you with my story youngster."

"Not in the least," I hastily interposed.

"I am not great at moralising, my boy, but out of my own experiences let me give you just one word of advice. Don't ever—no matter what the circumstances—deceive your friends. One word more and I have done. Don't let that old club of ours blight your career as it has done that of others, notably poor old Jingle."

During the next six months I was studying hard. My friend and I occasionally spent an evening together and with each meeting I left him with increased respect. At last, the period of his probation came to an end. How well I remember that evening. He received me with quite a boyish delight.

During the time of his test he had avoided the subject that lay nearest his heart in his intercourse with Miss Harding, but to me he had spoken without reserve. If ever a man really and truly loved a woman, Alfred Barber loved, with the utmost strength and fervour, Miss Harding.

"Wish me joy, youngster," he said, "to-morrow the ban of silence is removed. To-morrow I shall receive my reward, and the bitter past will forever pass into oblivion. To-morrow I shall place this outward emblem on her finger and again call her mine," and he drew a magnificent half-hoop diamond ring from his pocket.

"You seem pretty confident that the answer will be favourable," I remarked.

"Of course I am. Did not Maud give me her promise, and have I not—egotistical though my words may appear—honestly complied with the terms of the agreement? Good heavens, youngster," he added more gravely, "were I to be disappointed now I should go utterly and irretrievably to the bad."

On the following evening I was sitting in my own room thinking of my friend, wondering what was happening, and picturing the happy scene attending the renewal of his engagement when I heard footsteps on the stairs, and a moment later there was an imperative knock at my door. I opened it hastily. There stood a messenger, panting breathless.

"What is it?" I asked, fearing the reply for a presentiment of disaster had seized me.

"Are you Mr. Boydell?" was the inquiry.

"I am," I replied. "What is it?"

"Will you come round to Mr. Barber's rooms?" was the answer.

"What has happened?"

"He is dangerously ill, sir. Will you kindly come at once?"

Quickly slipping into my overcoat, I seized my hat and accompanied the messenger downstairs. Hailing a passing cab I sprang in and directed the driver to go at top speed. As we dashed up to the door it was flung open hurriedly.

"Is that Mr. Boydell?" inquired my friend's landlord.

"Yes!"

"Will you go up to his room at once?"

"Tell me what has happened."

"I can't, sir. He went out this afternoon looking brighter than ever I remember to have seen him. He came back about two hours ago with the look of a man completely bowled over. I followed him up to his room, but he turned on me quite savagely and ordered me away. About half an hour ago I heard him fall and I immediately rushed up I found him insensible on the floor. At once I sent for a doctor and then seeing one of your cards on his dressing table I despatched a a messenger for you. That is all I can tell you, sir."

I proceeded to my friend's room.

He had recovered consciousness and as I entered, his eyes turned in my direction. I was inexpressibly shocked by his appearance.

As his landlord had said, he indeed looked completely bowled over! As I approached the bed on which he had been placed he extended his hand.

His first remark startled me.

"Hearts do break, youngster," he said, "mine is broken."

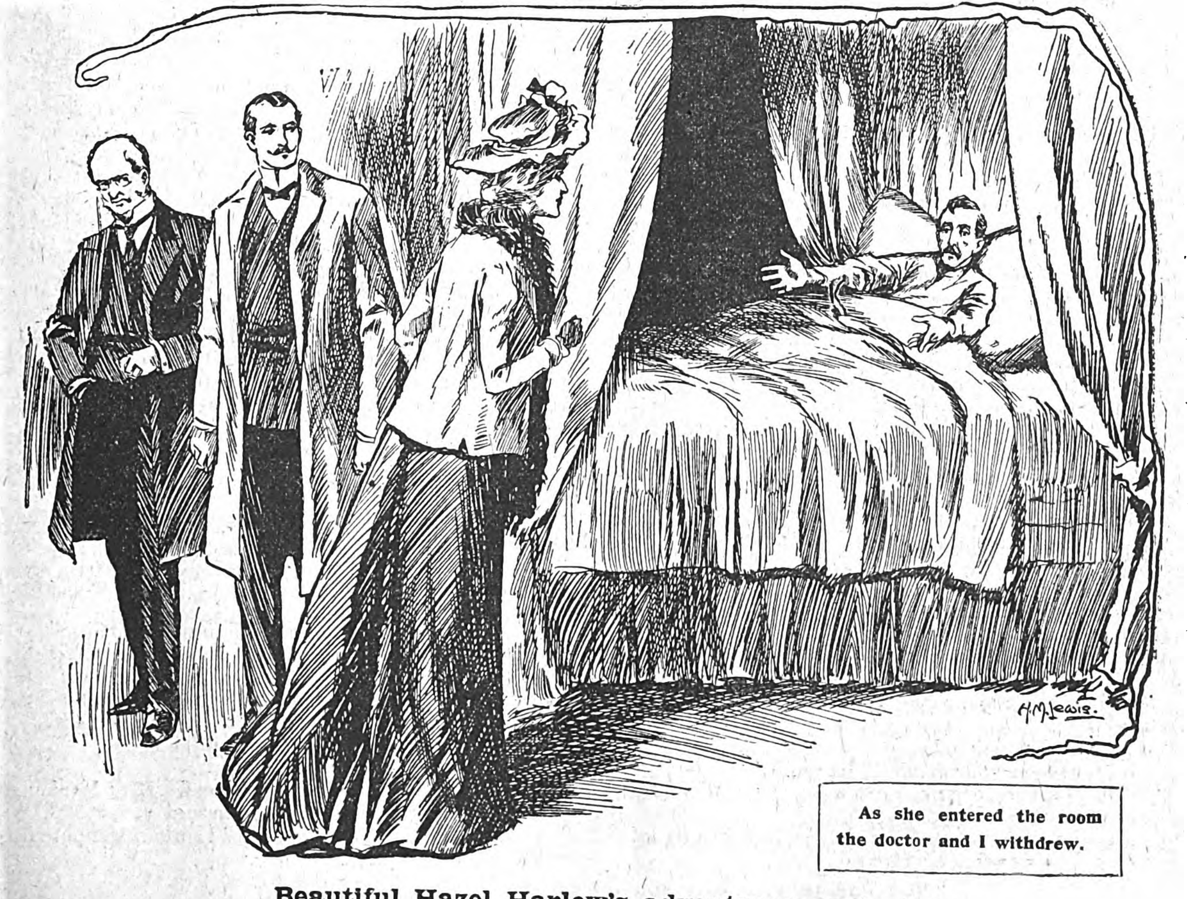
My mind immediately reverted to the occasion. When he had taken Jingle to task for the use of that expression, and with this thought came another. Where was Jingle now? My reverie was disturbed by my friend's voice.

"It's all over, youngster. I have been living in a fool's paradise."

I looked at him inquiringly.

"Doctor," he said to the medical man who had been summoned, "will you leave us together for a few minutes?"

The doctor bowed and withdrew.



As she entered the room the doctor and I withdrew.

Beautiful Hazel Harlow's adventures next week.

"Youngster," he began, "she has rejected me. Her love died when she discovered my deception. Now she has deceived me, and my guilt in that matter is expiated."

"Miss Harding has deceived you?" I queried.

"She has done more, youngster. She has broken my heart. Let me tell you."

"Some other time. You had better rest now," I answered.

"No, I must tell you now. I must talk, or I shall go mad."

"Well, if it will relieve you, go on."

The story he told me, put briefly, was this. On the occasion of that meeting, which had resulted in a change of life, he had told her that without her the burden of his life was becoming intolerable, but that with hope he could carry it cheerfully.

After much pleading Miss Harding gave him that hope on which he had lived for the last six months.

She argued with herself thus: If Alfred Barber pursued his course unchecked it was plain that there could only be one end. Could he but be induced to reform his habits, there was the possibility that strength of mind and purpose would also be established and remain. In plain words Miss Harding held out a hope which she had no intention of fulfilling. But if he were only lifted out of his morbid and depressed state and placed amid better surroundings, the improved conditions, and the new habits would be sufficient to sustain him. His protestations that he could not, would not live without her, she had treated as the outcome of a weak and somewhat disordered mind. Hence her action.

This was the story Alfred Barber had to tell and as I heard it I wondered what would be the result of it all. I turned to my friend.

"But surely you are not going to give way utterly. This has been a severe shock, I know, but you must pull yourself together."

"Youngster, it may be a confession of weakness but I cannot. I had one hope, one aim, one incentive. Now I have nothing."

I was silent, for in the presence of this hopelessness I could find no words. At this juncture the doctor re-entered the room and an idea seized me.

"Will you stay until I return?" I asked.

Having received his promise I approached my friend, and told him that I had an appointment which I must keep but that I would return shortly.

When I reached the door I found, to my surprise that the cabman whom I had dismissed was still there.

"How is Mr. Barber?" he asked, and stepped on to the footpath.

"He is very ill," I replied. "Do you know him?"

"Know him—I should rather think I do."

My first thought was that he had been employed at some time by my friend and had a grateful recollection of a liberal fare, but there was something in his tone that puzzled me.

I sprang on the front of the hansom, and as he leaned forward to take my instructions I looked into his face. It was Jingle. The prophecy of my sick friend had been fulfilled.

"Jingle!" I exclaimed.

"The same—at your service," he replied.

"Well, look here, Jingle, I can't stop to talk now, I have important work to do."

I gave him the address I desired to be taken to, and very quickly I was landed there.

I handed my card to the man who answered the bell and was shown in.

A few minutes elapsed and Miss Harding came to me.

As she entered the room I noticed that her eyes were red as though with recent weeping, but all my sympathies were with my friend.

Brusquely I plunged into my subject.

"Miss Harding," I began, "Mr. Barber is dangerously ill and you are the cause of it."

It was a brutal speech, but I felt savagely inclined, so I continued:

"I thought it only right you should know the effects of your action."

"Has he sent you to me?" she inquired.

"No," I replied, "he knows nothing of my visit."

She touched a small bell on the table and I wondered whether I was about to be shown out.

When the servant came, Miss Harding simply said, "Ask my father to come to me."

"Now what on earth does this mean?" thought I.

Mr. Harding promptly responded to his daughter's summons.

"Father," she said, when we had exchanged greetings. "Alfred is very ill and I am going to him. When I return I shall be wearing his engagement ring, that is if he will permit me."

Turning to me, she continued,

"Mr. Boydell I believe you know the story of my former engagement to your friend and also the subsequent events. When I first held out to Mr. Barber the hope of a renewal of our betrothal, I had no intention of fulfilling it. It was an experiment. During the probationary period my love for him revived, but I was persuaded by my parents that I should be unwise to renew the engagement. They acknowledged his ability. they admired his social qualities; but they were afraid that he was too weak to keep his resolutions and that when his object was achieved, there would come a relapse. Thus my answer was dictated by my head, not my heart. Now take me to him and let me repeat this in his hearing."

"Maud, you will not be so foolish," expostulated her father.

"Father," she replied, "my mind is made up," and she left the room, desiring me to wait.

On her return we were allowed to depart without further remonstrance. We did the journey in silence. On our arrival I left Miss Harding in the outer room, and proceeded to my friend's bedroom. The medical man shook his head as I entered.

"My medicines will do him no good," he said.

"So I thought," I replied, "so I have taken the liberty of calling in another doctor."

"That won't be much use I'm afraid," said he.

"I am inclined to differ with you. My doctor can heal a wounded heart."

"Ah! I understand you now. You may tell him."

I walked to the bedside and lightly touched my friend.

"I am glad you have come back, youngster," he said in a tone that touched me deeply. I decided to act promptly, on the presumption that joy never kills.

"Where is that ring?" I inquired.

"Why, what do you want it for?"

"You had better have it in readiness. Miss Harding is waiting for permission to come in and receive it."

"Youngster, you don't mean it," he almost shouted.

"Yes I do," I replied.

THE RIFLE SHOT:

A Madman's Confession.

It is midnight. The stealthy step of the restless maniac is no longer heard in the long, cheerless corridors; the ravings of the incurable cannot penetrate the deep walls of the cells in which their despair is immured; even the guardians of the establishment are asleep. Without, what silence! The branches of the immemorial trees hang pendulous and motionless; the last railway train, with its monster eyes of light, has thundered by. The neighbouring cry seems like one vast mausoleum, over which the silent stars are keeping watch and ward, and weeping silvery dew like angels' tears. Only crime and despair are sleepless.

To my task. They allow me a lamp. They are not afraid that the madman will fire his living tomb and perish in the ruins. Wise men of science! Cunning readers of the human heart, your decrees are infallible. am mad. But perhaps some eager individual whose eyes shall rest upon these pages will pronounce a different sentence; perhaps he may know how to distinguish crime from madness.

A vision of my youth comes over me—a happy boyhood—a tree-embowered home, babbling brooks, fertile lawns—a father's blessing—a mother's kiss that was both joy and blessing—a brother's brave and tender friendship—and first love, that dearest, sweetest, holiest charm of all. Oh, God! that those things were and are not! It is agony to recall them.

Pass, too, the brief Elysian period of wedded love. Julia sleeps well in her woodland grave. I was false to her memory.

If my boyhood was happy, my manhood was a melancholy one. A morbid temperament, fostered by indulgence, dropped poison even in the cup of bliss. I loved and I hated with intensity.

To my widowed home came, after the death of my wife, my fair cousin Amy, and my young brother Norman. Both were orphans like myself. Amy was a glorious young creature—my antithesis in every respect. She was light-hearted, I was melancholy; she was beautiful, I ill-favoured; she was young, I past the middle age of life, arrived at that period when philosophers falsely tell us that the pulses beat moderately, the blood flows temperately, and the heart is tranquil. Fools! the fierce passions of the soul belong not to the period of youth or early manhood. But let my story illustrate my position.

Amy filled my lonely home with mirth and music She rose with the lark, and carolled as wildly and gayly the livelong day, till, like a child tired of play, she sank from very exhaustion on her pure and peaceful couch. Norman was her playmate. In early manhood he retained the buoyant and elastic spirit of his youth. His was one of those natures which never grow old. Have you ever noticed one of those aged men, whose fresh cheeks and bright eyes, and ardent sympathy with all that is youthful and animated belie the chronicle of years. Such might have been the age of Norman, had not—but I am anticipating.

Between my cold and exhausted nature and Amy's warm, fresh heart, you might have supposed that there could have been no union. Yet she loved me warmly and well—loved me as a friend and father. I returned her pure and innocent affection with a fierce passion. I longed to possess her. The memory of her I had loved and lost was but as the breath on the surface of a steel mirror, which heat displaces and obliterates.

I was not long in perceiving the exact state of her feelings towards me, and with that knowledge came the instantaneous conviction of her fondness for my brother, so well calculated to inspire a young girl's love. I watched them with the keen and angry eyes of jealousy. I followed them in their walks; I played the eavesdropper, and caught up the words of their innocent conversation, endeavouring to turn them to their disadvantage. By degrees I came to hate Norman; and what equals in intensity a brother's hate? It surpasses the hate of woman.

In the insanity of my passion—then I was insane indeed—I sought to rival my brother in all those things in which he was my superior. He was fond of field sports, and a master of all athletic exercises; he was fond of bringing home the trophies of his manly skill and displaying them in the eyes of his mistress. He could bring down the hawk from the clouds, or arrest the career of the deer in full spring. I practised shooting, and failed miserably. His good-natured smile at my maladroitness I treasured up as a deadly wrong. While he rode fearlessly, I trembled at the thought of a leap. He danced gracefully and lightly; my awkward attempts at waltzing made both Amy and her lover smile.

But in mental accomplishments I was the superior of Norman; and in my capacity of teacher both to Amy and my brother, I had ample opportunity of displaying the powers of my mind.

Amy was gifted with quick intelligence; Norman was a dull scholar. What pleasure I took in humbling him in the eyes of his mistress! what asperity and scorn I threw into my pedantic rebukes! Norman was astonished and wounded at my manner. As he was in a good degree dependent on me, as he owed to me his nurture, sustenance, and training, I took full advantage of our relative position. With well-feigned earnestness and sorrow, I exaggerated my pecuniary embarrassments, and pointed out to him the necessity of his providing for himself, suggesting, with tears in my eyes, that he must adopt some servile trade or calling, as his melancholy deficiencies precluded the possibility of his success in any other line.

Norman had little care for money. Before the fatal advent of Amy, I had supplied him freely with the means of gratifying his tastes; but when I found that he expended his allowance in presents for his fair cousin, on the plea of hard necessity I restricted his supplies, and finally limited him to a pittance, which only a feeble regard for the memory of our indulgent mother forced me to grant.

One day—I remember it well—he came to me with joy depicted in his countenance, and displayed a recent purchase, the fruits of his forced economy. It was a fine rifle; and he urged me and Amy to come and see him make a trial of the weapon. I rebuked him for his extravagance with a sharpness which brought tears to his eyes—but I consented to witness the trial. His first shot centered the target. He loaded again, and handed the weapon to me. My bullet was nowhere to be found. Norman's second shot lapped his first. Mine was again wide of the mark.

Norman laughed thoughtlessly. Amy looked grave, for with a woman's quickness she had guessed at the truth of my feelings. I cut the scene short by summoning both to their studies. That morning Norman, whose thoughts were with his rifle, blundered sadly in his mathematics, and I rebuked him with more than my usual asperity.

Be it understood that my character stood high with the world. I was not undistinguished in public life, and had the rare good fortune to conciliate both parties. I was a working man in many charitable and philanthropic societies. I was a member of a church, and looked up to as a model of piety. As a husband and brother, I was held up as an example. I had so large a capital of character, I could deal in crime to an unlimited amount.

Some days after the occurrence just related, I was alone with my brother in the library.

"Come, Norman," said I, "leave those stupid books. Study is a poor business for a young, free heart like yours. Leave books for old age and the rheumatism."

Norman sprang up joyously. "With all my heart, brother; I'm with you for a gallop or a ramble."

"I'm but a poor horseman, and an indifferent walker," I answered. "What do you say to a little rifle practice? I should like to try to mend my luck."

Norman's rifle was in his hand in a moment, and whistling his favourite spaniel, he sallied forth with me into the bright, sunshiny, autumnal day. We hied to a hollow in the woods where he had set up a target. He made the first shot—a splendid one—and then reloaded the rifle.

"Take care," said he, "how you handle the trigger, you know the lock is an easy one—I am going to have it altered."

And he went forward to set the target firmer in the ground, as his shot had shaken it.

He was twenty paces off—his back turned toward me. I lifted the rifle, and covered him with both sights. It was the work of a moment. My hand touched the trigger. A sharp report followed—the puff of blue smoke swirled upward—and my brother fell headlong to the ground. The bullet had gone crushing through his skull. He never moved.

A revulsion of feeling instantly followed. All the love of former years—all the tender passages of our boyhood—rushed through my brain in an instant. I flew to him and raised him from the earth. At sight of his pale face, beautiful in death, of his long bright locks dabbled in warm blood, I shrieked in despair. A mother bewailing her firstborn could not have felt her loss more keenly, or mourned it more wildly. Two or three woodmen rushed to the spot. They saw, as they supposed, the story at a glance. One of those accidents so common to the careless use of firearms—and I was proverbially unacquainted with their use—had produced the catastrophe. We were borne home, for I had fainted, and was as cold and lifeless as my victim. What passed during a day or two I scarcely remember. Something of strange people in the house—of disconnected words of sympathy—of a coffin—a funeral—a pilgrimage to the woodland cemetery, where my parents and my wife slept—are all that memory records of those days.

Then I resumed the full possession of my senses. Amy's pale face and shadowy form were all that were left of her—my brother's seat at the table and the fireside was empty. But his clothes, his picture, his riding-cap and spurs, a thousand trifles scattered round, called up his dread image every day to the fratricide. His dog left the house every morning, and came not back till evening. One day he was found dead in the graveyard where his master had been laid.

Amy clung to me with despairing love. She would talk of the lost one. She would find every day in me some resemblance to him. Perhaps she would even have wedded in me the memory of the departed. But that thought was too horrible. I loved her no longer.

Friends came to condole with me. Every word of sympathy was a barbed arrow. I could bear it no longer. Conscience stung me, not to madness, but confession. I repelled sympathy—I solicited denunciation. I told them I was my brother's murderer. I forced my confession on everyone who would hear it. Then it became rumoured about that my "fine mind," so they phrased it, had given way beneath the weight of sorrow. I was regarded with fear. A physician of my acquaintance made me a friendly visit, and shook his head when he heard my story. One day this gentleman invited me to ride in his carriage. He left me here. Society believes me mad—that I am not, is to me a miracle.

Oh, ye wise ones of the earth—legislators of the land—would ye avenge the blood that has been spilt by violence on the ruthless murderer, would ye inflict punishment upon him, spare and slay him not. Take down the gallows, and in its place erect your prisons doubly strong, for there within their ever-enduring walls of granite, lies the hell of the villain who has robbed his brother of his life.

The Golden Dwarf

A Sensational Romance of To-Day.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "A Keeper of Secrets," "Hate, the Destroyer," "A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS OF "GOLDEN DWARF."

"It is the body of Sir Christopher Dering!"

The words are spoken by a pretty girl—fair-haired, blue-eyed. She stands, horrified, by a grass-grown ditch in a country lane, out of which a great mastiff is climbing. The ditch contains the corpse of a stalwart man—a handkerchief bound over his mouth and nostrils.

Close to there is a strange figure, graceful, well-dressed, even handsome, but with the stature of a boy and the face of an adult. He carries a heavy dog-whip, and stares, fixedly, at the dead body just discovered by his mastiff, Cerberus.

The girl is Esther Carew; the dwarf, Otto Hare, the richest landowner in Derbyshire, and the mystery of Wyresdale, a village in that county. For the first time in fifteen years he has set foot in a public thoroughfare, to attract the attention of Esther, whom he has watched from his park.

Sir Christopher Dering was alive at seven o'clock the preceding day. He and his nephew, Felix, had quarrelled over the latter's love for Esther. Sir Christopher wanted Felix to make a good marriage—the birth of his little cousin Brian has put him out of the succession to the baronetcy. Felix is faithful to the penniless Esther Carew.

Much turns on the whereabouts of Felix on the night before. It appears that he was in Duchester, some miles off, whither he went on business, and spent a night at the theatre. Could he have killed the squire?

Felix in vain protests his innocence.

But the cloud of suspicion gathers around him. Meantime, the child Brian has been kidnapped.

CHAPTER XVI.

"Felix, Darling, Don't Leave Me."

"Do not cry so, Barbara; you, who know him better than anyone else, have the best right to be certain of his innocence."

Esther Carew bent over a despondent yet dainty figure, which, clad in a neat print gown, lay, her face hidden, upon the end of the big lounge by the hearth of the Rosery drawing-room.

"I'm quite sure he—he didn't kill the squire, miss," was the broken answer, and Barbara Preston lifted a flushed countenance to that of her young ally; "but what wrings my heart is not having the ghost of a notion where he can be. I've not slept a wink for nights, miss—since he broke out of the cell at the station—but just sat and watched the garden-gate. I thought, perhaps, he might try to get a word with me by tossing up a pebble at my window. Ted was very romantic, Miss Esther, and would have me show him which it was."

"The course of true love never did run smooth," sighed Esther. "You mustn't despair, Barbara," she added; "a letter may come from him soon. Surely he will write to you when it is safe."

Barbara rose, brushing her chestnut hair out of her grey eyes. She was a pretty creature, trim and active, with all a town maid's grace, in addition to her own vigorous health.

"If Ted Spencer were alive and free, miss," she said, drying her tears, "he would have let me hear it before now. I may have been a bit wilful, but Ted could have been sworn I loved him better than life, miss. He wouldn't have made me suffer like this for want of a line or two, whatever risk he took. I'm afraid some—some harm's happened to him." And Barbara wept again.

Esther stepped closer and put a soft palm on the maid's shoulder.

"Bab," she murmured, "you can trust me. Have you no idea who it was that helped Ted to escape?"

Barbara Preston shook her head.

"No, miss," she answered; "but they did the poor fellow a bad turn, I'll be bound. Mr. Geddes at the chemist's in the High Street says there wasn't enough evidence against him to satisfy a judge, however it might have done a Wyresdale coroner's jury. He'd have left Duchester Assizes without a stain on his character."

She paused, and a look of indecision crossed her shrewd features.

"Miss Esther," she faltered, "it isn't many in Wyresdale believes my Ted guilty of Sir Christopher's murder. I've wondered if—if you oughtn't to hear what's being said about—about——"

"Yes, Barbara," responded Esther Carew proudly; "about whom?"

Barbara coloured and then sobbed.

"I—I can't repeat it, miss," gasped the maid; "you've been a real friend to me and I can't repeat it."

Esther paled.

"I understand, Barbara," she confessed; "you mean about Mr. Dering. He told me himself Sir Christopher and he disagreed over—over something. Felix—Mr. Dering, as a consequence, had to ride to Duchester and give some orders at his bank. He had arranged with his uncle to go abroad."

The speaker closed her lips tightly for a moment and then went on.

"He was detained and stayed in town for the night, so—so he could not have been responsible for Sir Christopher's murder."

"You believed in my Ted, miss," declared Barbara, "and I'll believe in Mr. Dering. But, Miss Ether, folks say nobody but him would have been able to do away with little Brian in such a strange fashion, and that now the squire and his heir are out of the road, Mr. Felix might be made Sir Felix and have the Dering lands by asking the law to consider little Brian dead."

She paused and leaned over the back of the settee.

"Besides," she whispered, "there are those as argue Mr. Dering could have come back that evening and not a soul be the wiser."

A long and shuddering respiration interrupted the sen-

Mrs. Carew, quick and cool, bore her to the couch, while the Golden Dwarf brought a carafe.

tence. Barbara flung down her duster and leapt forward, to receive the nerveless body of Esther Carew in her arms. The girl had fainted.

Alarmed at the result of her gossip, Barbara supported the delicate frame and drooping limbs to the settee, and would have hastened for water and help. But intelligence returned to Esther's brain, and with it a perception of the dangerous purport her swoon might convey to her attendant. She sprang up unsteadily.

"Don't fetch mamma," she begged; "I'm not ill, Barbara. Only you horrified me, you did, indeed."

"I am sorry, miss," said the maid, and placed a heap of cushions for the tremulous girl; "forgive my bothering you with the nonsense I pick up in the High Street. Don't you pay the least notice to it."

Esther clasped the other's fingers as they hovered around her.

"Barbara," she pleaded, "don't let mamma hear I went off. She—she doesn't like me to think so much of Mr. Dering. I should have such a lecture."

"Bless you, miss!" cried Barbara, "I understand all that. And Mr. Dering is a gentleman and no mistake. The police-officer as was with Inspector Brasher when Ted was arrested told us Mr. Dering couldn't have been kinder. He promised Ted should have every chance to clear himself, and said he didn't think him guilty."

She brought Esther's book to the side of the couch, drew the blind to moderate the heat of the sun, and finished her dusting. At length she halted to put a question.

"Miss Esther," ventured the maid, "who do you imagine did kill the squire? I know it wasn't Ted Spencer, and you know it wasn't Mr. Dering."

Esther Carew fluttered aimlessly the pages of her novel.

"I can't even think, Barbara," she confessed; "but, oh, I do wish they could find out."

There was a rattle of portière-rings at the door, and Mrs. Carew entered, a sheet of notepaper in her hand, her sallow, fretful visage an odd contrast to her smart gown of mauve foulard. Esther got up, staying herself by the settee.

"Ah, you are here, darling," exclaimed her mother, and turned to fix a cold gaze on the maid: Barbara had devoted a sudden and extreme attention to her work. "That will do, Barbara," observed Mrs. Carew sharply; "you may finish your dusting later."

Barbara made a wry mouth—unseen by her mistress. She detested Mrs. Carew no less than she feared her, a characteristic of all the Rosery servants. But she obeyed at once and Esther was left alone with her mother.

Startling stage revelations next week.

"I have been draughting the list of guests for Mr. Hare's garden party," said Mrs. Carew. "It is plain we must invite the Derings, though, of course, thanks to Sir Christopher's death, not to mention Brian's disappearance, none of them will be there."

Esther tottered rather than walked from her place to the French window.

"I don't care what you do, mamma," she rejoined wearily. "Mr. Hare intrusted the affair to you, he can hardly criticise your conduct of it."

"I must play my cards well, though," answered Mrs. Carew, reviewing the files of pencilled names; "it is a great thing for me to be, a whole day, hostess at Wyresdale Park. Really, yours was a most fortunate encounter with Mr. Hare. Gracious, child," she broke off, "how white you look. Are you indisposed?"

Her daughter glided out on to the verandah, the sunbeams dancing in her fair locks and sparkling in her blue, dilated orbs.

"No, mamma," she said; "it is hot and I am dizzy. I will get a breath of air, if there is one stirring, and come back again."

"Don't catch a chill then, pet," warned Mrs. Carew as she sank, with her list, into the luxurious lounge; "what should I say to Mr. Hare if you proved unable to grace a function that is practically given in your honour. I am glad the Derings will be away. Felix Dering's presence in the rôle of discarded lover would have been ridiculous, and by this time Mr. Hare's overtures are beyond a doubt."

Esther struggled hard for self-control.

"I have not discarded Mr. Dering, mamma," she objected, clinging to the painted frames of the tall casement, "and I wish I had never met Mr. Otto Hare. Tiny as he is, I dread and hate him. You could not persuade me to marry him, no, not to save my life."

And this concise statement delivered, Esther beat a retreat.

Mrs. Carew saw her graceful figure flit athwart the verandah, dart through the garden, and vanish in her favourite corner of the shrubbery. The keen, selfish gaze of her mother followed her flight.

"Esther has more will than I looked for," confessed Mrs. Carew; "she must not be hurried. Would to Heaven Felix Dering would leave Wyresdale; she will not be tractable while he is in reach."

"Mr. Otto Hare!" announced Barbara, acidly, from the door.

Mrs. Carew started up; a diminutive form, exquisitely groomed, superbly tailored, had just gained the apartment. The mistress of the Rosery advanced to greet her caller.

"Pardon this unseasonable visit," said the Golden Dwarf, and bowed low; "but I have just recollected, Mrs. Carew, that a recent proceeding of mine may seem, to you, not quite in correct taste. Miss Carew honoured me so far as to accept a little mare to which she took a fancy. I forgot myself sufficiently to send her down without seeking your permission. I offer you a thousand apologies."

Mrs. Carew smiled, yet a shrewd light illuminated her expression.

"You are most scrupulous, Mr. Hare," she assured him; "but so valuable a gift——"

"Should not be tendered or received without due consideration," said Otto Hare. "It is for that reason, Mrs. Carew, that, on reflection, I hastened here to repair my error."

He motioned his hostess to a seat and placed himself beside her.

"I am not fond of admitting my defects," he continued; "but I should be a vain fool if I did not recognise that, as a wooer, I am at some disadvantage. Yet it was as a wooer I first sought the Rosery; it is as a wooer I hope to seek it in the future."

The Golden Dwarf coughed and cleared his throat.

"Mrs. Carew," he said, "I love your daughter, Esther. Can you, will you, consent to regard me as a possible son?"

The mistress of the Rosery wrestled with a spasm of delirous joy. Fifty thousand a year and the finest estate in Derbyshire had been deposited, by that brief sentence, at her child's feet.

"Mr. Hare," she conceded, "your proposal flatters both Esther and me. I will not pretend that I have been blind to your liking for her, or that I have not regarded it with entire satisfaction; but, as you admit, you have merely put your suit on a correct basis. It would be indiscreet to approach Esther yet."

Otto Hare assented by a gesture. He was on the point of answering when a slender outline crossed the verandah and stepped in at the French window. Esther had returned.

"Ah, Esther, dear," said her mother, "I have a surprise for you. Mr. Hare has been good enough to pay us a morning call."

The girl faced about, the advent of the Golden Dwarf always disturbed her. Otto Hare proffered a small hand, muscular, though delicate as a child's. Esther touched it reluctantly, and then, mastered by the heat, Barbara's news, and her loathed contact with the Golden Dwarf, fainted once more.

Mrs. Carew, quick and cool, bore her to the couch, while Otto Hare brought a carafe. As the drops of water splashed on Esther's pallid skin she parted her lips to utter an appeal.

"Felix, darling," moaned the girl, "don't leave me!"

The glances of Mrs. Carew and the Golden Dwarf spoke volumes. Mrs. Carew seized and pressed her visitor's hand.

"Do not let her recover and see you," she whispered. "You may trust me; I am devoted to your interests."

Otto Hare kissed her withered fingers theatrically and strode from the room, not waiting for Barbara to escort him.

A few seconds the Golden Dwarf paused on the gravel kerb before the spider phaeton dashed up, Kraft driving, a groom in the rumble.

"You've been quick," he said; "I saw you from the corner of the High Street."

Hare climbed in.

"You can walk home," he told the groom bluntly, and the man descended. His master grasped the reins and whipped the cobs into a desperate trot. As they flew along the Golden Dwarf addressed himself to the elephantine frame that occupied the space by him, its enormous bulk tilting to the near side the finely-poised carriage.

"Kraft," he hissed, "we must get rid of him."

"Who?" queried the huge German.

"Felix Dering," snarled Hare; "who else, you sleepy Deutscher? Didn't you swear I should have the girl? There is no other way. Rack your fat brains for a plan, can't you?"

"I do not need to," said Kraft slowly, cutting a Havana, "while you went to flatter the lady's mamma, I thought—and not fruitlessly." The German felt for a battered match-box and lighted his cigar. "I go to London to-night, Otto," he added, "to lay a train, a trickle of unseen gunpowder a hundred and fifty miles long, between Wyresdale and—and Pimlico."

The Golden Dwarf surveyed his companion; a curious furrow had spread from cheek to cheek of Joseph Kraft. It suggested a kind of mirth—mischievous, intelligent, fantastic.

"Do you know, Kraft," said Otto Hare with a shudder, "there are moments when I could believe you to be the very deuce!"

CHAPTER XVII.

Mrs. Schwartz is Surprised.

"No more of that, Judith, I am deep enough in the mire already; but what's a taste of penal to the white cap and the noose."

As he spoke Neal Garland thrust his soiled fingers between his throat and his crumpled linen to ease off the pressure of his collar; it might have been bent on strangling him prematurely. He had grown pale and his mouth twitched.

Judith sneered.

"Calm yourself, my pusillanimous brother," she said, "I won't press the point. It's unusual for you to admit cowardice, yet you are too much of a bully not to be a dastard at heart. However, since you won't adopt the short way, what do you propose doing to rid us of this?"

She touched lightly with a small foot the prostrate figure of the slumbering Brian Dering.

Neal gazed at her; his pinched features betrayed a reluctant admiration.

"You're a tiger-cat, Judith," he muttered. "I fancied you'd something of the sort in you, but curse me if I thought you'd quite so much of it. Listen, I'm not scrupulous when a grim bit of work provides the sole chance of safety. Here violence is absurd; Mrs. Schwartz will teach the young dog to forget his name and drop his aristocratic manners. When it's prudent we'll slip him into the East-end, to a baby-farmer, and he can be worked off in quiet."

Judith shrugged her shoulders.

"A cur's trick," she commented, "but a clever cur at that. Well, employ your own methods; you know the sewers of society better than most. What about your awkward colleague, the one-armed sailor?"

"Keep him satisfied as best you can," retorted Neal. "Tell him he shall share the proceeds when we get Felix Dering fairly in our clutches. Persuade him he must be patient."

"And you really intend to let the brute blackmail you?" queried Judith, her lip curled by a sudden disdain.

Neal Garland frowned.

"Not I," he declared. "Perhaps Foley will meet with an accident, perhaps I shall be at the back of the said accident. Go slow, Judith, you women are a reckless lot."

Judith put down her veil and folded her cloak about her.

"I suppose I shall understand you ultimately," she confessed; "but you seem to me at present a strange mixture of daring and indecision."

Her brother grinned.

"It's my patent," he replied, "and it's kept me off the gallows so far. S-sh! the kid's awake."

Brian had, indeed, stirred and sat up. His glance fell on Judith and he sprang to his feet, dropping the kitten in his delight.

"It's Miss Garland!" he exclaimed; "dear, dear Miss Garland, take me away, please take me away!"

The woman evaded him, but the boy clung to her skirts. Angered, Judith Garland wrenched them out of the childish fists, and, bidding Neal adieu with a nod, hastened from the room.

The door that had closed behind her swung open, and the stout proportions of Mrs. Schwartz sailed into the apartment. Seeing her, Brian retreated precipitately to his hassock near the old-fashioned steel fender. Mrs. Schwartz sank into a chair and fanned herself with a newspaper which lay convenient to her grasp.

"Your sister's a credit to the Garlands, Neal, my man," she observed; "are there any more of you at home?"

"Dash it, Keturah," growled Neal, "you've been listening."

"Certainly," said Mrs. Schwartz, and poked her red coiffure into position; "no secrets between friends. Don't you imagine," she went on, "you've bitten off this time rather more than you will be able to chew? You've a sight too many partners for me. Why's Judith in it? She's fetching enough to marry some rich idiot if she wants cash, and not sufficient of a fool to help you from mere sisterly affection. What's her game? You told me precious little but the nipper's name the other night, and I hate half a tale."

Neal Garland scowled.

"Speak low, you forget the child," he muttered, and glanced at Brian, who had returned to his playmate the kitten.

"Let the brat hear," snarled Mrs. Schwartz; "I'll knock it out of his skull when I tackle his education in earnest."

Neal stooped to the ear of the inquisitor.

"If you must have the truth," he explained, lowering his voice, "Judith adores Felix Dering, this child's cousin. She wishes to bring him in to the title and estates and compel him to make her his wife."

Keturah Schwartz wrung her thick palms.

"Heavens!" she cried: "love next! Neal, you're an ass! You'll get me gaoled as sure as eggs are eggs. Work on the cross for money if you will, but don't meddle with the tender passion."

The other brimmed a glass from the bottle of sherry that stood on the table by the tray.

"I'd no choice," he argued; "Judith drew the covert and set the pace. She needed help to dispose of the kid so I joined, on shares. Besides, I am essential to her hold over Dering. We could get him swung, if we chose, on my evidence."

Mrs. Schwartz poured herself out a cup of cold tea, diluted by her favourite spirit, gin.

"Mark me, Neal," she said after a prolonged gulp of the blend, "Judy there will dupe you. She's smart and she's bold, while you hate risks. Also, she's in love, and love's a queer thing. Blest if I wouldn't back her to round on you any time for the sake of her dear Felix."

Neal muttered an oath.

"The day she does," he hissed, "she will sign her death-warrant. But you're wrong, Keturah; Judith can't fling me—I'm her trump card."

Mrs. Schwartz emptied her cup and prepared to toss her lace apron over her head. "Positive as ever, my lad," she yielded; "time will show, I'm sick for a nap. Go and scrape your stubbly chin and I'll stand you a shillingsworth of the Aquarium and an oyster-supper to follow."

The person invited to these gaieties winced and his jaw set rebelliously. Yet he lounged towards the exit and disappeared on to the rattle-trap landing. Keturah Schwartz composed herself beneath her apron; soon her regular, stertorous respirations announced that she slept.

The tiny baronet, thus ignored, gained the window, and pondered the squalid panorama of the mean street below. The yellow sunshine irradiated his tear-stained features and patched garments, the tortoiseshell kitten purred gravely against his bosom. In the thoroughfare outside children ran and shouted, lost in their boisterous sport. Brian watched them from a corner of a cracked pane.

As he stood there a gentle touch distracted his attention. He turned and saw the sympathetic countenace of Louisa, the slatternly servant that had given him the sweets. She held in her fingers a couple of sponge-cakes.

"Poor lamb," she murmured, "you didn't have much tea, I'll be bound. Could you eat these? I had to come up for the tray, and I allowed she'd be dozing."

"Thank you very much," faltered the little baronet. "You are kind, Louisa; but I wish I could go home. Why would not Miss Garland take me home with her?"

"Who is Miss Garland?" whispered Louisa, keeping a vigilant espionage on the figure of her snoring mistress.

Brian broke a piece of his cake for the tortoiseshell kitten.

"She is my mother's companion," he said. "She was here just now. Please," he broke off, "I should like a drink of milk."

The girl brought him the jug from the table and the child swallowed what was left of the fluid. Tears trembled on Louisa's lashes as she carried the vessel back again. For this purpose she had to approach Mrs. Schwartz. To her horror the lace had been twitched somewhat aside, and a human orb, large, bloodshot, malignant, was studying her. Louisa dropped the milk-jug and recoiled.

Mrs. Schwartz chuckled.

"Be off, you inquisitive, sentimental huzzy," was her advice, "and don't prowl, or I'll lose something and have you arrested."

A knock suspended Louisa's retort, a triple knock that echoed from the distant hall to the top of the stairs. The servant hastened to answer it.

A moment later a heavy step creaked down the passage, mounted the steep flight, and reached the parlour door. A massive bulk rolled in, straw-hatted, frock-coated, spectacled. It was Joseph Kraft.

The smile died out of Mrs. Schwartz's face, the quivering mirth from her loose limbs. She gasped, and passed her hand over her eyes.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE MESSAGE IN SCRATCHED LETTERS.

"AND so things are just being permitted to slide, Mr. Brasher. A fine state of affairs when a baronet, justice of the peace, and lord of the manor is murdered on the high road and nobody is punished for it."

Archibald Geddes twisted his big brown moustache and regarded provokingly the stalwart police-inspector. Mr. Brasher leaned against the glass-fronted counter of the chemist's shop and played with the scent sachets that formed a small pile on it.

"Your conclusions are not justified, Mr. Geddes," he said; "our best attention is still given to the events which preceded, and followed, the death of Sir Christopher. It is just eight days, almost to an hour, since the squire's body was discovered, and if our researches have not yet proved successful—to your knowledge, Mr. Geddes, to your knowledge!—we may claim a reasonable time in which to make them."

The assistant came round, lowered the awning, and remained in the public portion of the shop. He had a quill between his teeth and chewed it thoughtfully.

"Any word of Spencer?" he queried.

Michael Brasher coughed.

"Official reticence apart," said the Inspector, "I may confess that we have not got upon a valid clue as to his whereabouts. The secret is uncommonly well kept—for Wyresdale. I would sacrifice half a year's pay to recapture the fellow; he has put a black mark against me in the books of the force."

"No idea as to who helped him from outside?" demanded Geddes: "those bars were neatly taken out, Brasher."

Brasher shook his head.

"You're discreet, Mr. Geddes," he owned, "and I will admit that there, at least, we are dished, clean dished! I feel it; Michael Brasher's professional self-esteem is cut to the quick. Any suggestion, even the slightest, would be gladly received. You are a clever theorist, Mr. Geddes; does no probability occur to you?"

Geddes smiled and twisted his moustache till it threatened to curl from his cheeks and lip.

"I am taking an interest in the case," he admitted, "but I prefer to work alone."

Brasher rubbed a pair of great palms together.

"I could have you watched," he threatened.

The Scotchman tapped his forehead.

"I conduct private detective operations in here," he declared; "by ratiocination. You can't post a constable in my brain, Brasher. Go along with you, unless you wish to make yourself ridiculous by arresting me on suspicion."

Michael Brasher sighed and took his tall frame and large reflective face across Caleb Forester's business premises. In the High Street he met the chemist's daughter and bowed low. The rush of colour to his swarthy complexion showed that the Inspector's romance still weighed upon his heart.

Connie stopped and extended her little hand. Mr. Brasher accepted it as though it were some fragile flower.

"I called to see your father," he observed, "but he is out, they tell me, so I had a chat with Mr. Geddes. Will Mr. Forester be at the Wheatsheaf?"

Constance Forester blushed.

"I'm—I'm afraid he will," she stammered. "Mr. Brasher, you'll be sure not to let there be trouble if—if father should get arguing one day when he's had too much. He grows so excited, and a policeman might be rough or impatient. You'll protect him, won't you—for my sake, Mr. Brasher?" she added, bringing her natural coquetry to the support of her filial affection.

The Inspector retained the small fingers.

"Duty is duty, Miss Connie," he said, and breathed hard.

Connie snatched her hand away.

"I beg your pardon," she snapped; "I thought you were a friend of mine." And hurling this shot into the Inspector's magazine left him without more ado.

Michael Brasher walked on, a sorrowful, blue-coated form.

"It's hard," he muttered, "that I, who would give my life to win the little lass, should be driven to plot against her peace; and no Victoria Cross or glory for it, either."

He pushed on, grumbling in his stiff, dark beard, towards the open country at the foot of the quaint thoroughfare. The sound of a horse's hoofs aroused the Inspector from a distasteful reverie, and he glanced up to behold Felix Dering, mounted on his chestnut hunter. The young rider's seat was nerveless, his gazed abstracted.

Mr. Brasher stepped into the road to salute. Felix drew rein.

"I've some news for you, sir," said the Inspector, and fixed a keen survey on the gallant countenance above him. "We've been dragging the Black Pool, as you wished."

Felix gripped at the rein.

"Have you discovered any—anything?" he faltered.

Brasher nodded.

"I'm keeping it quiet for a while," stipulated the Inspector; "it's better so. But the fact is, sir, we hooked up a paper parcel. The contents were a water-worn stone and a little flannel night-gown, with a monogram on the collar, 'B.D.'"

"Great Heavens!" cried Felix; "the child must have been kidnapped and the garment discarded!"

"So I conclude, sir," said Brasher; "I had just that to report, sir. We are prosecuting our inquiries in every direction but without effect at present."

Felix bit his lip.

"Brasher," he murmured, "the rumour you mentioned to me—that I was responsible for the disappearance of my tiny cousin—would thrive on the discovery you have made."

"It would, sir," conceded the Inspector; "and unless you can track the boy and restore him you will not be able to choke the slander."

"I am glad, at all events," said the rider of the chestnut, sadly, "to hear you term it a slander, Brasher."

"Slander it is, sir," responded Michael Brasher, with dry point, "till it be proved."

He saluted again, and was about to continue his walk when he halted, struck by an idea.

"Excuse me, sir," he added, patting the chestnut lingeringly, "but I believe you are well-affected towards Caleb Forester, the chemist in the High Street. You gave him a lift bytimes, the gossips say."

"A mere trifle," answered Felix; "the poor beggar collapsed under the loss of his wife, took to drink, and couldn't meet a quarter's rent. I played the good fairy so far as his landlord was concerned. I fear no beneficent spirit will cure him of the passion for liquor he acquired in his efforts to drown his grief. Has he been falling into your clutches?"

"Hardly," said Brasher, "but he talks in his cups. A dangerous habit, don't you think so, sir?"

Felix stared.

"I shouldn't imagine Caleb had any secrets to blab or to preserve," he decided.

The Inspector mumbled an incoherent comment, gained the kerb, repeated his soldier-like farewell, and strode away.

Felix Dering gasped and roused the chestnut to a canter. Lost in meditation, he reached the avenue which led to Dering House, trotted up it to the stables, and stalked thence through the raftered hall to his own chamber. On the staircase a figure passed him, shrinking away with a painful convulsion. It was Lady Dering, pale, wide-orbed, distraught. Felix shuddered.

"I alone stand to profit by the blows that have stricken her," he sighed; "what wonder if she has come to shun me. Heaven knows how soon she will doubt me also."

In his pleasant chamber he flung himself into a wicker chair and trifled with the hunting-crop he had brought up from the stables. Its handle had been formed by a perfect length of Malacca, once magnificently polished.

"Now why," pondered Felix, "why did Brasher speak to me of Caleb Forester. 'He talks in his cups, a dangerous habit.' How can that interest me?"

He flipped at the dangling loop of the crop; the end of the cane struck him as unreasonably crushed and scratched. The shape of the scratches caught his attention; they resembled letters. Felix scanned them, revolving the Malacca slowly.

It was not his whip, he perceived suddenly, but one of Sir Christopher's much resembling his. The baronet had carried it on that mysterious last ride, and it had been found beside the squire's dead body, to be brought home along with its owner. What message had it borne unnoticed all these days?

LADY DUGDALE'S DIAMONDS.

By Mrs. J. H. RIDDELL.

Author of "George Geith of Fen Court," "The Senior Partner," etc.

"SHE was not My Lady then."

Thus Mr. Thomas Walters, the rotund, rubicund, good tempered landlord of that well-known village inn, "The Dugdale Arms," which hangs forth its sign, resplendent with all the colours of the rainbow and a dazzling amount of gold emblazoning, across the green, friend or stranger must pass by, if he wish to reach Oakhill, Lord Dugdale's ancestral seat.

She was not My Lady then, although we often called her my lady, for she had married in order to get as near having a right to be so addressed as an Honourable could bring her; and I name my story "Lady Dugdale's Diamonds" for that reason.

There were plenty of heirs between her husband and the title when we took up housekeeping at Johnesborough. but they are all dead and gone.

Mr. Will, my old master, is now Earl of Dugdale. I have known him hard up for a guinea, and this day he can hold his own with the wealthiest in the land.

He is just the same as ever, though—just the same careless, kindly gentleman we all loved so dearly.

There is much talk in these days about servants caring for nothing and no one, save their own interests and their own selves. For my part I say there always were and there always will be some masters and some mistresses no servant could like.

I never served anyone except Mr. Will, and I can honestly say I would have gone through fire and water for him.

The Honourable William Pattingham—that was his name and title. My father chanced to be one of the tenants on the Oakhill estate, where Mr. Will, an orphan, was brought up by his uncle, the seventh earl; and many a morning we two little lads whipped the trout stream, or surprised puss at an early toilette, or startled the partridges amongst the stubble.

When he grew up he was the most devil-me-care young gentleman I ever did see—always in debt, always falling in love—quite as often falling out of it—in one way the most reckless, restless, extravagant master a man could have had, and yet in another, thoughtful, and occasionally even sad.

"Why did my uncle bring me up to all this, Tom?" he would say sometimes, pointing to the useless and expensive articles he gathered about him. "Why did he not put me to some honest calling? If he had not a living to spare, why could not he have made a lawyer of me? I think, Tom, I might have been Chief Justice myself, issuing urgent invitations to various poor wretches to appear before her most gracious Majesty, instead of having to decline her most gracious Majesty's pressing invitations as best I can. It is enough to drive a fellow mad. I have the tastes, habits, extravagances of ten thousand a year, and I never had but a bare five hundred pounds per annum, which went to the Jews (would the race had never been permitted to leave Babylon) half a century ago, or thereabouts."

That was his style, and a man, no matter how stupid he might be, could not help brightening up under such an employer.

We are very much like horses, a slow one always tries to keep pace with a fast goer—I did. For instance, I did not understand what Mr. Will meant by an invitation to appear before Queen Victoria, till I had read the next writ which my master flung down on his dressing table with an oath, when that little blackguard Simeon—a true descendant of him who, with his brother Levi, is stigmatized in Holy Writ, as "having instruments of cruelty in their habitations"—touched him on the shoulder and asked him, rather pressingly, to spend the evening at Mr. Absalom's in Cursitor Street.

The wretch had contrived to reach even the innermost sanctuary by representing himself as a hairdresser and his man as an assistant.

"Good-bye, Tom," said Mr. Will after I had taken off his dress-coat and helped him on with another, holding out his hand just as if he had been my equal—and by that I knew he felt it dreadfully. "Good-bye, and keep up your spirits. I will disappoint these beastly Jews one of these days, if it be even at the expense of an ounce of lead."

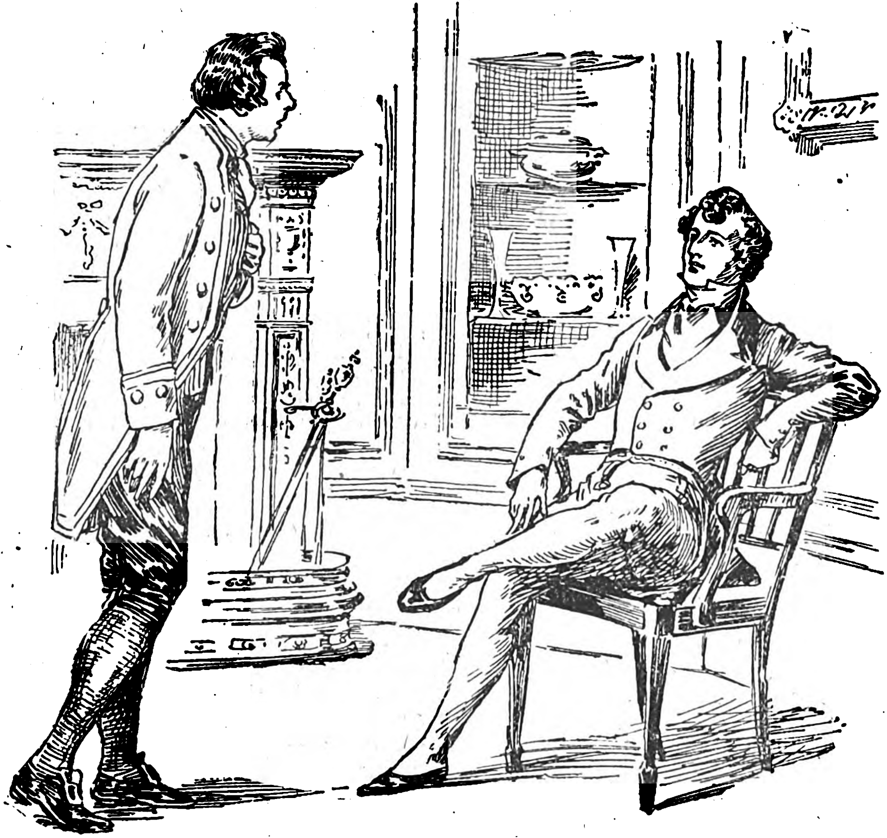
And then with a mocking bow, he turned to Simeon and said:

"It is not to your tribe I am alluding, my dear fellow. I fancy it has not been all milk and honey with your branch of the family, and that the rough part of the labour fell to your share."

And so he went—a gentleman, every inch of him—for the last time to Cursitor Street.

You may guess how I felt after he was gone. Every time these fellows had him in their clutches, it seemed harder and harder for him to get out of them again.



"I had no idea things were so bad as all this," he remarked.

All he owned had gone long and long before. His relatives would neither give or lend him a shilling. His friends were getting tired, and I could not wonder at it.

One gentleman may be willing to help another at a pinch, but it is not in Christian nature to like spending good money to fill a Jew's coffers.

I sat down in the dressing room he had just left, with his clothes littered about as he had thrown them off, and wondered where we could turn for help—wondered till I grew tired with casting about in my mind whether there was one left who would see him out of this trouble, and if so, where that one ought to be looked for.

My head was young then, but it grew giddy reckoning up, or rather trying to reckon up, what he owed, and how the tangle was ever to be unravelled, when who should walk in but a lawyer who had seen Mr. Will through with a few bad scrapes.

Though on the last occasion he had vowed he would never advance another sixpence, still my heart leaped into my mouth for joy at sight of him.

"Your master is gone to Berkeley Square, Walters, I suppose," he began. "I saw the countess was entertaining as I passed, but I thought I would take my chance of finding him dressing, and late, as usual. Will you tell him he had better keep out of the way for a little while? Marston is going to arrest, and two or three more will follow suit. Thought he would like to know. What an extravagant sinner it is," he added, looking at the array of articles on the toilette table; and he would have gone with that, but I shut the door and implored him to listen to me.

Perhaps I was wrong to talk so freely of things that I only knew in confidence; but I could not help it. I loved Mr. Will with all my heart, and those Jews, with their evil faces, and heavy gold chains sprawling over their gaudy waistcoats, and huge rings on their dirty fingers, had filled me with a disgust and hatred that I could not have expressed in words.

Although he happened to be a lawyer, Mr. Perrin was a gentleman. As a rule, I do not think much of lawyers and such like; but they say every rule has its exception, and Mr. Perrin was an exception to mine.

I think he must have been fond of Mr. Will, too. Lawyers, even the worst of them, I have noticed, entertain a sort of sneaking fondness for wild characters, for reckless, improvident chaps, such as Mr. Will used to be. It is the redeeming point about them. There may be a providence about it, too, as there is about a mother being fondest of her lame, or blind or imbecile child.

Anyhow, it was not for the money he got out of Mr. Will, his lawyer looked after his affairs then. He is making a good thing of the Earl of Dugdale's estates now; but Lord! which of us then ever dreamed he would some day reign at Oakhill?

I, for one, never could have served him as I did, with a perfectly single heart, had such a change seemed probable, or even possible. He was a poor master, and I a poor servant, and he made me his friend, and I loved him, for all he was the Honourable William Pattingham and I Tom Walters; and I think, for the same reason that I was fond of Mr. Will, Mr. Perrin liked him too.

With a very grave face he listened to what I had to say, and then he remarked:

"I had no idea things were so bad as all this comes to, Walters."

Then I made answer:

"Sir, they are worse; and you would think so, too, if only in a minute, so to speak, I was able to remember all about everything."

"You have remembered enough," he said, and sat for a minute quiet.

Then he got up to go, but stopped to observe:

"I wish your master would follow my advice."

"He would follow anything, sir, that meant ease of mind and a berth in the colonies," I was bold enough to reply.

"Following my advice would mean ease of mind and a comfortable life in England."

"Ah! sir, I don't think his pride would let him do that," I answered, for I thought Mr. Perrin wanted my master to pass through the Court, and I knew it would go sorely against the grain to have such a proposal even made to him.

It was not the fashion then, as it is now, for noblemen to shuffle off their debts in that way like any butcher or greengrocer; and it may be that very idea of its being supposed Mr. Will could so demean himself made me speak quick and sharp, but Mr. Perrin only laughed and said:

"His pride did not stand in the way of his getting into debt, and ought not to stand in the way of his getting out of it; it is not so much his pride though, as his prejudices."

I looked in a dictionary after he went away, to learn what he meant by the last word, but the dictionary explanation did not help me.

Next day he came again.

"Marston has been paid," he said, "and your master has left Cursitor Street, but I have advised him not to come back here until an arrangement can be effected with the tribes of Israel, so if you put up some of his clothes I will take them with me."

"Can't I go to him, sir?" I asked.

"No, you had better stay where you are and answer questions. All you know about Mr. Pattingham is that he was arrested last night and that you have not heard from him since. You need not mention my name in connection with his affairs."

"No, sir. Please give my duty to Mr. Will, and I hope he won't be long away."

"If he follows my advice he will never come back here," said Mr. Perrin.

But Mr. Will did come back. Months after that night when Simeon arrested him, he walked into his rooms as if he had only left them an hour before.

"Yes, Tom, I am free," he said, in answer to my awkward expression of delight at seeing him once more, "and yet I have lost my liberty—there's a paradox—at least I shall lose it at half past eleven to-morrow morning."

Still I was so stupid I did not see his meaning.

"Oh sir," I exclaimed, "I was in hopes all that was over."

"All what was over?" he repeated; then burst out laughing. "Oh, the Simeon and Levi business. So it is, Tom. No more arrests, unless I am a greater idiot than I take myself to be—no more royal invitations, unless they are dated from Windsor Castle—no more credit—everything is to be cash on delivery for the future with Will Pattingham—ironically styled The Honourable."

"Have you had any money left you, sir?" I asked; "or," I added, a light breaking in upon me, "is it——"

"Yes," said Mr. Will, "it is——"

My heart leaped into my mouth, and then fell back again like a leaden weight. I tried to wish him joy—I tried to look cheerful and pleasant, but it would not do. He saw the news had shocked me, and so he went on:

"All men must die, you know, and I suppose most men must marry, at any rate I must, therefore it behoves me to make the best of a—good bargain," he finished after a pause so slight, that many a one might not have noticed it. "The lady is wealthy, generous, kind; my people are delighted with the match, they make no objection on the score of family—why, indeed, should they? Her grandfather on the one side bore a name better known throughout England than that of Pattingham-Smith. Her grandfather on the other side came of an almost equally old race—he was a Jones. Her father thought the two names too good to be divorced, and so dubbed himself 'Smythe-Johnes,' after which he died, and bequeathed his cognomen and fortune to his only daughter Amelia Selina Annabella, whom I am to marry to-morrow."

"Are—are you going to take me with you, sir, on the wedding trip?" I asked.

"I am afraid not," he said, with one of his old queer smiles. "You like a pretty face, Tom, and it would not suit for you to be flirting with my wife's maid. The future Mrs. Pattingham has strict ideas, and might not approve of any indiscretion. There, I declare the fellow has tears in his eyes. Tom, do you think that my marriage is going to part us? Did you think me such a cold-blooded monster as to contemplate flinging over an old friend—for you are my friend?

"I have been considering into what good berth I can slip you in the new establishment, and have decided that you shall be butler. You must, therefore, go down to Johnesborough, and have everything ready for our return.

"We are not to reside much in London. I mean to become a model country gentleman. I shall interfere with the poor people, and see that the children learn their catechism.

"Do you know, my grandmother is so charmed with my prospects that she has sent me her diamonds to present to the bride. They came to her, not through the Pattinghams, but some of her own more august progenitors. They would have been a catch for the Jews in the good old times—eh, Tom?"

I answered him with what spirit and heart I could muster. The old times had often been bad enough; but it seemed to me the new times were promising to be worse still.

"You will let me know where you are going to be married, sir?" I asked after awhile. "I should like ——"

Beautiful Hazel Harlow's adventures next week.

"To be present when the bolt is drawn," he interrupted. "Well, I don't know that there need be any difficulty about the matter. The sacrifice is to take place at St. George's, of course; and—yes, you may come—only, Tom, my lad, if you feel surprised at anything in the ceremony, try not to look so, there's a good fellow, and keep a still tongue afterwards," and with that he held out his hand, and I—well, you can think what you please about it; but we had been boys together, and I loved him, and he seemed going away from me for ever.

So I kissed it, and then broke out crying like a woman —or a fool.

"Cheer up, Tom," he exclaimed, "when we come back you will know Mrs. Pattingham for the true, honest, amiable creature she is. She has been liberality itself to me, and I only hope I may be able to make her as good a husband as she deserves. I mean to try. Heaven knows I do," he added, and then he went off humming an opera air; and I thought I had seen the last of light-hearted, easy-going Mr. Will.

The next morning I thought so more than ever. As the bride came down the aisle, leaning on her husband's arm. I caught a glimpse of her face for the first time.

I knew then the part of the ceremony he imagined would surprise me, and I turned my face towards the wall that no one might see the amazement I knew was written on it.

She looked old enough to be his mother. She was ugly enough to have been burnt for a witch in the days when witches were burnt. She had no figure—she was no shape—she had no presence; and her tall, handsome, winning, gracious, well-born husband had sold himself for life to this woman to get out of the hands of those Jews.

Though I was in a church, I prefixed a word to Jews that I won't repeat here; and meeting Simeon in Piccadilly, on my way home, I had much ado to keep from knocking him down.

I wish I had now. The will to do it and the opportunity never dovetailed so neatly together afterwards.

But it is the story of the diamonds I was to tell, you remind me. Patience, I am coming to that. You have now the main threads of it in your hand. I served the Honourable William Pattingham, who, marrying Miss Smythe-Johnes, promoted me to be butler at Johnesborough.

To Mrs. Pattingham, Lady Dugdale—the Dowager I mean—presented her wonderful diamonds, which Mr. Will sent to Rundell and Bridge to be reset. His wife wanted to wear them on the occasion of her presentation at Court. Thus the diamonds were at the jewellers, I at Johnesborough, and Mr. Will and his wife on their wedding-tour.

It was very kind of Mr. Will, giving me the butler's place at Johnesborough; but I could not help wishing he had arranged that I should learn my duties before going there.

When a stern and stately housekeeper, who had been at Johnesborough in the times of Smythe-Johnes, addressed me, I wished my shoes were big enough to hide in. However, I took heart of grace, after awhile, and gave her my confidence—told her how I had been Mr. Will's own man—how of his goodness he had chosen me to fill the post of butler; how I knew little or nothing of what a butler was expected to do; and, to wind up all, how thankful I should be if she would give me a few hints.

Over her spectacles the old lady looked at me for a minute. Then she said, "Young man, you will do; you are modest and ingenious." (Somehow it seemed to me I was then always running up against people who used long words). "I will instruct you myself. Few persons, male or female, know more of the nature of a butler's duties than I."

Which was quite true. Mrs. Barrett deserved all the praise she was good enough to bestow on herself.

By the time Mr. Will returned, I had learned enough not to disgrace his recommendation. Indeed my Lady herself seemed surprised at my progress, for she said to me one day, "I had no notion, Walters, you had so correct an idea of the duties of your position. Even my dear father could have found no fault with the manner in which you discharge them."

This was high praise from her Ladyship. The doings of Johnes Johnesborough seemed, in those days, right in the sight of his daughter—as right as her own doings do now.

No one ever can tell how a marriage will turn out. I am sure, had any person told me, that day in St. George's church, I should some day consider my master had done a good thing for himself in taking Miss Johnes for better for worse, I must have laughed out in very scorn and bitterness; but the pair had not been long back at Johnesborough before I began to believe she was the very wife for Mr. Will.

If she was fussy and fidgety—and who could doubt her being both?—Mr. Will was too much the other way. She kept things together, she prevented his getting into debt again, she led him into paths of respectability so fenced in by ideas, and traditions, and responsibilities, and proprieties, that I think it would have been next to impossible for any man to break bounds, even had he wished to do so. But Mr. Will did not wish. For the first time he had a chance given him of doing well, and he was not above taking advantage of it. I know he felt his wife had given him all she had in her power to bestow, and that it behoved him to try to make her some return.

When he married her there was not a morsel of love on his side, but it grew. Day by day, month by month, year by year it went on putting out buds and shoots, and now I doubt if there is a man in the county fonder of his wife and the mother of his children than William, Earl of Dugdale.

And as for the Countess, I think she gets younger every week, and she is not half so plain as she was when she relieved Mr. William of his debts, and took it in hand to make a steady, respectable, and respected country gentleman of him.

But I am running ahead too fast. When she came home to Johnesborough I did not much care for her, and I liked her ways still less; fussing here, and fuming there; worrying herself about the merest trifles, and nothing to be put out of the regular course even for a moment.

If she had got hold of any gentleman less easy natured and sweet tempered than Mr. Will, she would have driven him, or he would have driven her, mad in three months.

Even Mrs. Barrett confessed that in some things Mrs. Pattingham was difficult to please.

I tried to please her for Mr. Will's sake, and was making way in her good graces, when one day there came a letter from some place very far away, where old Lady Pattingham, the Dowager, generally spent three parts of the year, saying she was dangerously ill, and summoning Mr. Will and my Lady to her side.

Mr. Will was her favourite of the whole family. She had done a great deal for him, to my knowledge—paid debts for him often, and given him money, together with a large quantity of good advice, and then, finding that nothing did him any permanent good, she tired, like the best of his friends, and returned the letters he sent her unopened.

Still her heart was with him, everybody knew; and her conduct in the matter of the diamonds proved that she was more than ready to forgive, when once she saw a hope of reformation.

I do not think it occurred to Mr. Will that she had any thought of making him her heir; not so, however, with my Lady. She was not mercenary exactly, and yet she was sufficiently worldly-wise to know it would be folly to throw away the chance of a legacy, and accordingly she would hear of no delay on this occasion, but was even more anxious than Mr. Will to start at once.

Anyhow, to make a long story short, they left Johnesborough the same day the news arrived. In a letter Mr. Will wrote to me from London he said neither his uncle nor the Countess was in London, that he would not wait for the Earl's company, but travel on without delay. The period of his return must be uncertain; but he would send instructions home from time to time.

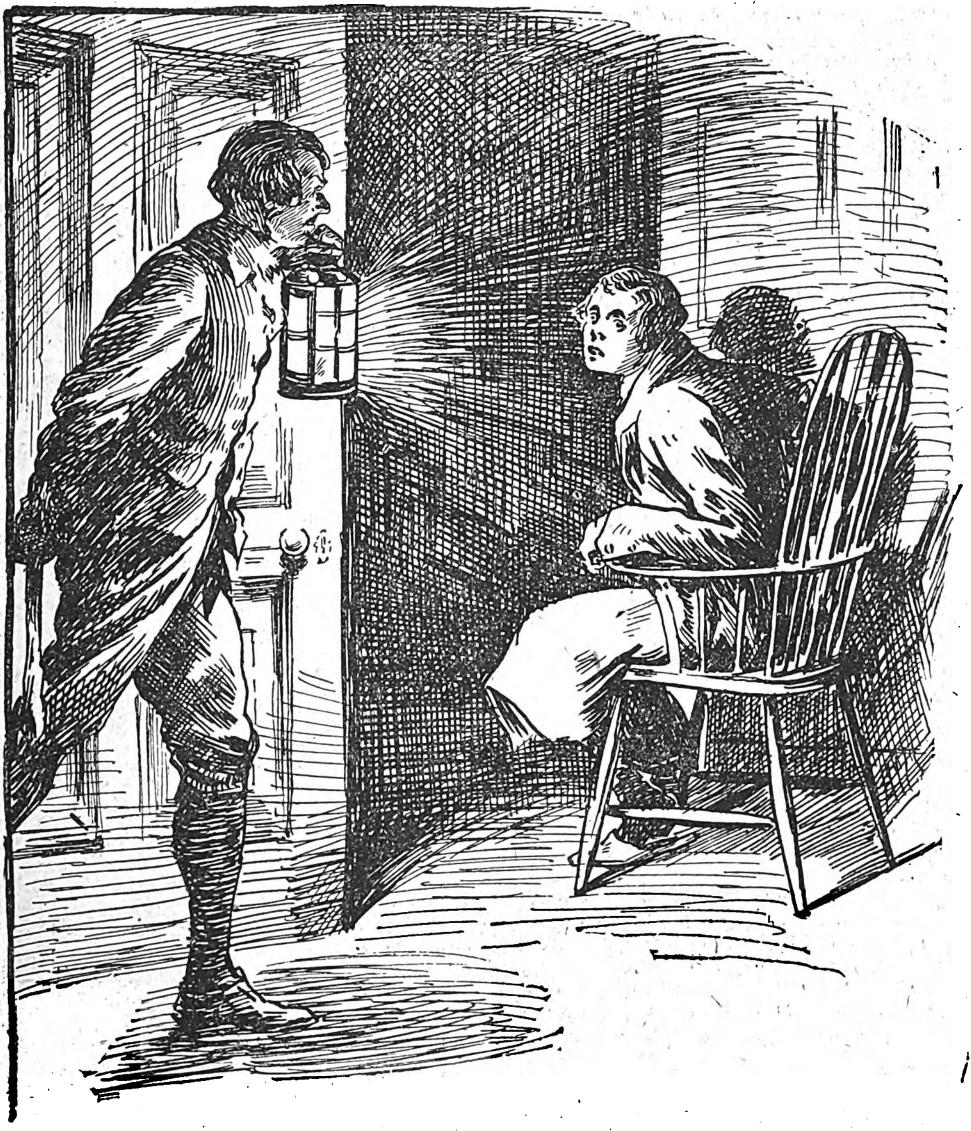
Thus, once again we were all quiet at Johnesborough; and mighty dull I found it, after London.

True, one day we were all flung into a state of excitement by a visit from the Earl. Coming up from the North, where he had been staying, he took Johnesborough in his way, and put the footman, who answered the door, into a state of bewilderment by asking to see me.

"Is Thomas Walters here?" inquired his lordship; "send him to me directly;" and without waiting to be asked, he walked into the library, the door of which chanced to be open.

I found the Earl in one of his tempers.

What was the meaning of Mr. Will being sent for, and he not?



The door opened, and my friend Mr. Sanders appeared, carrying a lantern cautiously.

"Adventures of an Actress" next week.

Was not the dying lady his mother, and who could be nearer to her than he? What had Mr. Will said? Did I know who had sent the letter? Had I heard anything of its contents?

Though I was but a servant still, I had known the Earl all my life, and he spoke to me just as freely and as angrily as Mr. Will might have done, if anything had chanced to put him in a passion.

Careless about his papers as about his other concerns my master had tossed the doctor's letter on his table, and left it there; and as I knew he had no secrets from anybody, I gave it to the Earl to read.

It was written in some foreign language, and his Lordship had trouble to make it out; but he managed to do so at last, and then, throwing it down, broke forth again. What was the meaning of their not sending to him?

"The letter may have gone astray, my lord," I ventured to suggest, and my words fell like oil on troubled waters.

It might—it had, here was the solution of the enigma. Of course his mother would send for him. Thus the Earl ran on, ending by saying I was an honest fellow and attached to the family.

The mercury of his temper fell as rapidly as it had risen. His voice resumed its usual tone, his brow cleared, he threw himself into an easy chair and allowed me to get him some refreshment. He praised the vintages loved by the departed Smyth-Johnes, talked to me about Mr. Will and my new mistress, spoke of his own sons, and, in a word, was as pleasant as any gentleman could be. There were some letters for his nephew and for his nephew's wife, and when I mentioned this fact, he "graciously," to quote Mrs. Barrett, offered to take charge of them. Indeed the whole establishment seemed oppressed by the weight of the honour done to it, and appeared satisfied that Miss Johnes had made an exceedingly good investment when she married Mr. Will.

I was treated with more deference after the Earl's visit, and my fellow servants asked me such lots of questions about the Dugdales and Pattinghams, about Oakhill, and my lord's house in town, and the Dowager's place in the country, that I grew sick and tired of the very name of my master's family.

"After all," I thought one morning, "if our old life was anxious, we had variety, at any rate. I do not believe I can stand this much longer."

An interruption was coming to the monotony for which I was little prepared; it came very soon indeed.

That same evening I was walking down the elm avenue which people came from far and near to see, when I met two well-dressed men, who proceeded quietly on without taking the least notice of me.

I could not tell what made me do it, but when they had traversed some twenty yards, I turned and followed.

By the time they reached the house I was close behind them. The hall door stood open, and on the threshold was Catteron, one of the footmen, lazily contemplating the landscape.

To him the strangers addressed themselves.

"Is Mr. Pattingham within?" asked the elder and stouter of the two.

"No, he is not at home."

"When do you expect him back?"

"Can't say; he's gone abroad. The Dowager Countess of Dugdale is ill, and sent for him."

Catteron added this piece of information not out of any civility towards the strangers, whom, indeed he had treated with scant courtesy, but because he never willingly missed an opportunity of speaking of the Dugdales or their titles.

There was a pause—the men, who did not look like gentlemen, though they were well-dressed, exchanged glances, then the elder one inquired:

"Is Mr. Pattington's servant, Walters, here, or has he gone abroad, too?"

"No, he is standing behind you," and thus indicated, I came forward.

"I would like a minute's private conversation with you, sir," said the spokesman, and seeing that Catteron would not go, and that the stranger would not speak before him, I opened the door of a small cloak-room and followed the visitor in.

Directly I had done so he closed the door, and said confidentially:

"This is a mighty disagreeable business, Walters. Had Mr, Pattingham been at home I feel no doubt the matter might have been settled in two minutes; but as it is, I must leave a man here—yes I must."

"You don't mean to say—" I gasped.

"Yes, I do," he interrupted. "Most of his debts were arranged, no doubt; but this one, at any rate, does not seem to have been settled. No doubt the man felt hurt at being left out in the cold. Anyway, he is very bitter and so I'm here; and being here, I must leave a man."

I certainly was no innocent in such matters. I had seen as many writs, and witnessed as many arrests as most men who were not sheriff's officers; and yet the simplest and most timid woman could not have felt more frightened than did I at sight of the writ he handed to me.

The horror of such a thing happening in that house as a man being left in possession, was more than I could bear. Mrs Barrett—the servants—what should I say to them—what explanation could I give?

We might leave the place and the country, Mr. Will and I, after such a disgrace had befallen us; that was what I thought as the stranger pushed me, trembling in every limb, into a seat.

"Let us talk it over, and see what can be done," he said not unkindly. "Mr. Haman told me to ask to see you if Mr. Pattingham chanced to be out. He knew your master would not mind standing a trifle to keep the matter quiet."

"You are from Haman, then," I murmured.

"Yes, and I'll make it straight with him, so as to give you time to get the debt paid. It would have a bad look to seize here; and your master so lately married, too. You had better represent that your master promised to find my man a berth—that he did Mr. Pattingham a service once."

I groaned aloud.

"Come, come, you were man enough in London; don't pull a long face now."

Well, the upshot of it was that he went away and his man stayed.

"Look here," said the latter, as if I was not looking at him; "I'll make things pleasant for you as far as I can. When Mr. Pattingham comes back, you can say a word in my favour, and I am sure, by what I have heard of him, he won't forget I tried to perform a disagreeable duty agreeably. Haman gave me a hint of how the land might lie, and I am not a fool."

That he certainly was not. Before three days were over, he was the life of the servants' hall. He won Mrs. Barrett's heart by giving her a specific for corns, and he made love indiscriminately to the housemaids and the cook. They were all expecting him to propose, and I, miserable I, knowing all, had to look on and laugh with the rest.

When I returned one day from the nearest village, Catteron said: "a young gentleman was waiting to see Mr. Walters."

"'Pears to me you have more visitors than Mr. Pattingham hisself," remarked Catteron with a sniff. How it happened I could not tell, but in precise proportion as Mr. Sanders grew in favour, I lost it.

I went into into the library where the young gentleman sat.

"Mr. Thomas Walters?" he said.

"At your service, sir," I answered.

"I have brought Mrs. Pattingham's diamonds, and as my instructions were, in her absence, to deliver them to no one but you, I have waited for your return."

"But," I expostulated, "how does it happen they are sent down here? I understood they were to remain at Messrs. Rundell and Bridge's."

"I know nothing about that," he answered. "My principals had an order to deliver them here, and I have brought them. Be kind enough to sign your name there," and he pushed a paper towards me.

I never told anyone, except Mrs. Barrett, those diamonds had come, they were a weight on my mind.

I slept with the diamonds, and I dreamt of them; what a trouble I had no one suspected; no one unless it might be Mrs. Barrett and Mr. Sanders.

"If I were in your place, Thomas," said the former to me, "I would take the plate and the diamonds over to the bank at Lantree to-morrow."

"I'll take the diamonds at any rate," I answered, groaning inwardly over Mrs. Barrett's want of comprehension.

"If she only knew there was a bailiff in the house it would be a comfort," I considered.

The whole affair was growing too much for me, however; I confessed as much to Mr. Charles Sanders, who was kind and sympathetic as usual.

"I should not sit up late, old fellow, if I were you, to-night; go to bed early, and you will find yourself another man to-morrow."

Which advice I followed.

After only one tumbler of punch, I locked myself in my pantry, where I had latterly slept, resolving that early the next morning I would take my Lady's diamonds to the bank at Lantree.

So great a relief was this resolve to my mind, that I fell into a dreamless sleep, from which I was awakened by a noise as of someone trying my door; then it—the door I had locked—opened, and my friend Mr. Sanders appeared, carrying a lantern cautiously.

"What, Walters, still awake?" he said; then, before I could answer, there came a crashing blow.

When I came to myself the sun was streaming across the pantry, and I could see the strong-room had been broken into and its contents ransacked.

With a groan, I dragged my body into the passage where, a few hours afterwards, Catteron found me.

For days and weeks I lay between life and death, and when I recovered it was to hear from Mr. Will that his grandmother had never been ill; that the whole matter was a preconcerted scheme; that all his debts had been arranged before his marriage; that Mr. Charles Sanders was no bailiff, only a remarkably clever thief, whom the law hoped eventually to catch and punish.

Anything more? Well, yes. Her Ladyship, Mrs. Pattingham, would not believe in my innocence; and, for the sake of peace, I must go.

"Of course, I will do all for you I can. This makes no difference to me, Tom?" my master said, but I turned my head away, sick at heart, wounded to the very quick.

"I might be wrong," so I stated in a note I left for Mr. Will, when I was strong enough to leave Johnesborough, "but I would never knowingly see him again till the diamonds were found."

It seemed a wild goose chase then, but I got on the track of them at last.

There is a story hanging to the finding of the diamonds, too long to tell now.

Suffice it to say, they were found, though not in time for my lady to appear in them at Court.

But she was a just woman, and acknowledged her mistake, and did right by me at last; and so I am fain to confess, gentleman that the Countess of Dugdale is a brave and stately lady, and that she has made Mr. Will a good wife, and that they both installed me landlord of the "Dugdale Arms."

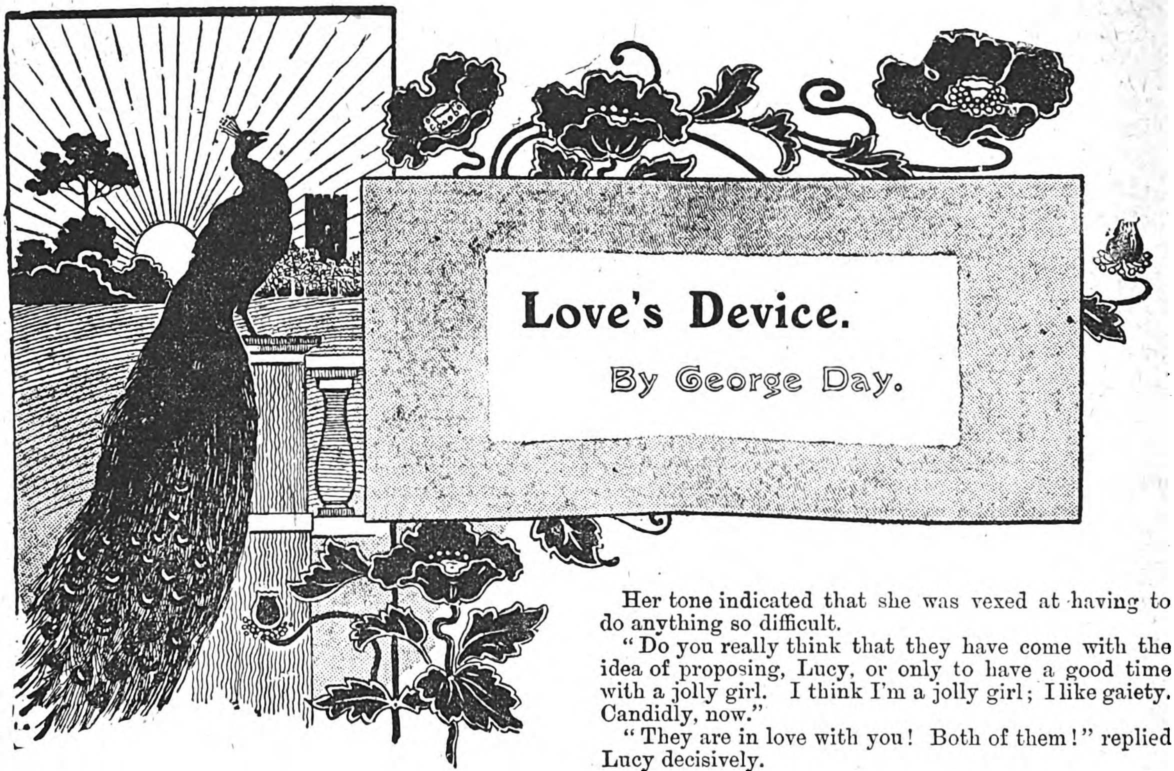
Beautiful Hazel Harlow's adventures next week.



Love's Device.

By George Day.

"I REALLY think I prefer Mr. Reeve. They are both nice and I suppose I must marry some day. I declare it's very horrid of people to talk in that way and say I've been flirting with two men for weeks and spoiling the chance of another girl, or two other girls. Yet that is what Kitty Malins told Julia only the day before yesterday, and it came round to me last night."

Anyone who knew Millie Vince as her cousin Lucy Warren did, would not have accused her of flirting.

She was good-hearted, but shallow and thoughtless; the two men had paid her marked attention for weeks and she had accepted those attentions, and had a most agreeable time, without in the least recognising the significance of the position.

It was her nature to take things lightly; fate had been fairly kind to her, she had an independent income and the opportunity to gratify all reasonable desires. Life was more like a pleasant holiday than a struggle for existence.

Lucy believed that there might be something under the surface, to be awakened by love or sorrow; but certainly there was no indication of it at present.

Millie sat quiet, gazing thoughtfully through the window.

Lucy interrupted the reverie.

"As you say that people are beginning to talk, it is time to come to some decision, Millie—either to stop their attentions or make a choice."

"Yes, I see," murmured Millie.

Her tone indicated that she was vexed at having to do anything so difficult.

"Do you really think that they have come with the idea of proposing, Lucy, or only to have a good time with a jolly girl. I think I'm a jolly girl; I like gaiety. Candidly, now."

"They are in love with you! Both of them!" replied Lucy decisively.

"Oh, dear, I must think it over alone."

This was a hint which Lucy accepted. Millie avoided the young men for nearly a week, and both became nearly distracted; but at the end of that time she had made up her mind that she could not dismiss Albert Reeve, and that if he asked her to be his wife, she would accept.

But her previous behaviour had made both of them uncertain and the proposal did not come, although she endeavoured to show Reeve that she preferred him. Two or three times he had been on the point of expressing his sentiments in the past, but she had always turned it off laughingly, believing he was about to make some jesting pretence. Then she had avoided him for several days.

He was head over heels in love with her, but he was doubtful about her feelings towards him, and concluded that he had better wait a little. Arthur Biron noticed, after a day or two, that Reeve seemed to be favoured and became correspondingly gloomy.

This was the curious situation which Lucy Warren observed and was soon to be called upon to set right.

Lucy occupied the unenviable position of the poor relation. She was Mrs. Vince's niece, the daughter of a sister who had had a hard struggle after her husband's death, and had been comforted on her deathbed by the knowledge that her child would be taken care of by her well-to-do and widowed sister. Mrs. Vince was very kind to her niece, and she was treated in every way as one of the family, but outsiders knew that one girl was rich and the other poor, and it affected their manner towards the girl probably without their being quite conscious of the fact.

She was quieter and more profound than Millie, and less stylish in appearance, it naturally followed that she was outshone by her voluble and vivacious cousin.

People fell into the habit of patronising her mildly. When you are poor and quiet, you are likely to suffer in that way by those who do not understand human nature and are higher in the social scale.

"What would do, my dear?" asked the perplexed Millie, throwing herself rather petulantly into an easy chair opposite her cousin. "That foolish Bertie—that's what I call him to myself now—won't take the thing seriously. Here have I been showing him as much as I dare that I—well, don't object to him, and that I object to Biron a great deal more, we'll put it that way, and he won't say anything! What would you advise? You always have good advice to give."

"That's complimentary!" laughed Lucy. "But I can only advise you to wait. Mr. Reeve is no doubt waiting till he is sure of his ground."

"Oh!" exclaimed Millie disappointedly. "Have you nothing better to suggest? I think you must be a little dull this morning, dear."

Lucy flushed, but laughed good-humouredly the next instant.

"Are you absolutely certain that you are in love with him?"

"Positive!" responded Millie, more gravely than was her wont, and Lucy felt that she was speaking with knowledge, from her heart.

"Then I would wait," she repeated firmly.

"Then I won't just wait till he comes to his senses!" asserted Millie, vigorously. "I won't wait his time! I'll make him come to me! A woman has no 'go' who waits and does nothing. I'm going to make him jealous and I want you to help me. I shall flirt—no, I mean I shall be more friendly to Arthur Biron and neglect Bertie, and you will manage to say something to Bertie in conversation that will—oh you know! You are just a wee bit dull this morning, aren't you, dear?"

This remark was characteristic, but it was cool in the circumstances.

Lucy looked grave.

"I would not make a fool of Mr. Biron for the purpose of accomplishing your end," she said earnestly. "Suppose he is—er—likes you; is it fair to make him——"

"You always see things in such a dreadful light!" said Millie, kissing her. "Now you are going to help me by saying something to Bertie while I am being nice to Biron. I'll give you the best evening cloak I can find."

Lucy's book lay open in her lap for a long time after Millie had left her, but the subject was quite forgotten.

"She thinks that a woman who loves a man—who thinks that she can make him happy and be happy with him—ought not to sit still and wait till he comes. She ought to do something to prevent the risk of his going away, to be less happy, perhaps. We women usually wait. We think it wrong to move, even though the inactivity may result in a broken heart. Is she right?"

Lucy found it difficult to answer her own question.

"At least, it is wrong if you make others suffer to accomplish your end," she murmured; "and that is what Millie will do."

The opportunities for meeting were fewer during the following fortnight, and the new tactics could not take effect so quickly as Millie desired, but by that time Reeve was aware that his rival was more in favour and Biron's hopes were rising.

There was a little party and a dance at Mrs. Vince's; the hostess' daughter was fairly impartial and Biron was in her favour, but everybody understood that Reeve was the most favoured, and the latter claimed and received more of her attention than the former.

Reeve stood watching Millie and his rival with a savage expression, and he in turn was watched by Lucy, on whose lips was just the trace of a queer smile.

"I think it is time I earned that evening cloak!" she said below her breath, as Reeve turned on his heel as though to make for the door. "This is a climax and may result in Millie saying 'Yes!' to a proposal from Biron. That must not be! She would marry him solely out of pique, and he——"

She intercepted Albert Reeve on his way to the door and spoke to him in a flippant style that was totally at variance with her usual manner and caused him some surprise.

"I declare, Mr. Reeve, you are quite rude! Here am I, a solitary individual, and you do not attempt to say something nice to me."

"I—er—really, Miss Warren, it is quite unintentional," he stammered confusedly. "Er—can I do anything—are you engaged for the next dance—is there another dance?"

"I think I should prefer a seat in a quiet corner," replied Lucy with a smile.

Reeve bowed and conducted her to a seat. He was confounding her under his breath, for, although she was an amiable girl and "all that sort of thing, you know," she was not his style and he was in no mood to entertain her at this juncture. Why had she come up so inopportunely. He wanted to get away from it all.

"Can I get you anything, Miss Warren?" he inquired rather lamely.

"No, thank you. Sit here, I should like to talk to you."

Still wondering at her altered manner, he did as he was requested. He was startled by her next words.

"Mr. Reeve, why don't you take your fortune at the flood and be carried to happiness. If you are in love with my cousin, why don't you propose to her?"

Reeve turned his eyes slowly to her face and started; it was plain speaking, beyond all doubt! The colour overspread his features, and he noticed that she, too, was colouring.

But she met his gaze without flinching and waited for him to speak.

"Take my fortune at the flood!" he repeated bitterly. "Does that indicate fortunate for me?"

He jerked his head in the direction in which they had last seen Millie and Biron.

"Adventures of an Actress" next week.

"You speak plainly, Miss Warren, so I will be open with you. I love your cousin, but she——"

"You men are so blind!" interrupted Lucy passionately. But, recovering her self-possession, she continued: "Take my advice and try!"

"I can't get a chance!" exclaimed Reeve, angrily. "Look how Biron haunts her."

He felt angry with everybody and everything, without being able to explain; that is a common sentiment with us all when we have not made the best of our chances and don't like to take the blame on ourselves.

"Suppose I get you the chance?" queried Lucy boldly.

"If you would!" said Reeve eagerly.

Yet, inwardly, he felt a little contempt for this girl. The thought flashed across him that she was a poor relation and—well, people do strange things for money or finery.

"I shall never forget the service, Miss Warren," he went on, meaningly, "and shall always be happy to repay it."

He was rich.

Lucy laughed constrainedly to hide her embarrassment; she understood the significance of his last words.

They separated a minute later. When Lucy found herself alone in her bedroom that night, she covered her burning cheeks with her hands and longed for tears to moisten the hot eyes, but they would not come. She had lowered herself in the eyes of this man, who had as good as offered to pay her. He had treated her as a mercenary, never dreaming of the real motive. Her scheme was more difficult to accomplish than she had supposed. Should she go on? What else might it not entail? Yes? she would go on; to make happy the man she loved, but who was all unsuspecting of that fact!

It had been arranged between Lucy and Reeve that he should call at eleven o'clock on the following morning, this was unusual, for it was a morning generally set apart by Millie for special purposes and, in addition, she never encouraged morning calls. Lucy was about to make the announcement to Millie that she must be "in" to a visitor this time, when her cousin surprised her by telling her that Biron intended to call.

"I suppose he is coming to learn his fate," remarked Millie, with what Lucy mentally described as callous indifference. "I could not put him off; he said he should call in the sort of voice that means 'so you must agree.' Bertie has lost his chance."

"But I hinted to Mr. Reeve," expostulated Lucy, hot and uncomfortable.

"Never mind, dear," said Millie easily. "He can't say anything to you, and you shall have the cloak all the same. I would rather—— But what matters? Biron will make tolerably good husband."

"I don't want the cloak!" flared Lucy.

"Oh, well, you needn't get out of temper!" returned her cousin. "I shall leave you till you get over it." And she swept out of the room.

What time would Biron call? Would he come before Reeve? What must she do? She must save him! She rapidly revolved a plan in her well-shaped head; there was no time to telegraph to Reeve to come earlier, for the simple reason that the morning was advancing and he would be on his way before the telegram or even a messenger could reach him.

It was a race by two men who did not know that they were racing! Which would win?

A few moments of deep thought, and Lucy had made her plans.

Five minutes to eleven and a ring of the bell! Probably Reeve, a little before his time; if so, the situation was clear. She went into the hall herself to welcome the arrival.

It was Biron!

"Good-morning, Mr. Biron, we are pleased to see you! We are not so fortunate, generally, as to be relieved from the ennui that follows the excitement of a dance!"

With a vivacity that was well assumed, Lucy welcomed him and led him to the reception room.

"I am sorry that my cousin is too busy with feminities to make her appearance yet."

Biron replied as cheerfully as his disappointment would permit.

Lucy had to do most of the talking, but she was a good conversationalist. She excused herself for a moment in order "to give an order to a servant." Biron would have been surprised had he heard the order. It was:

"When Mr. Reeve comes, show him into the dining-room and tell Miss Vince that a gentleman wishes to see her in that room. Don't say his name on any account, I wish to surprise her."

Lucy heard the ring that heralded the approach of Reeve, and she kept up a run of talk and laughter so that Biron should not hear the voice. Then she unconsciously allowed the conversation to flag; she was wondering how they were getting on.

Half an hour of misery for Lucy, and then Biron arose.

"I suppose that Miss Vince is too much occupied to see me," he observed, striving to hide his irritation. "I was—er—under the impression that it was a kind of—that is, an appointment." He stood irresolute, as if waiting for Lucy to make some move.

"I will see how matters are progressing," said Lucy, feeling that she must do something to make her attitude plausible.

She opened the door and passed out of the room, but before she could close it Biron heard Millie's voice.

"You artful thing! You sent me in there and I did not know it was Bertie. But it's all right, we've both made explanations and amends and all that, and he has gone away quite happy. What a mercy that Mr. Biron didn't come! I absolutely thought I heard him before—five or ten minutes before—the footman gave me the message, your message, I know. I was waiting for poor Biron. Oh, dear! You should have seen the happiness on Bertie's face when I accepted him! Fancy a woman having it in her power to make two men happy!"

Millie rattled on, illogically and gaily, quite careless who might be listening.

Lucy felt paralysed in the hand that held the door-knob and could not shut the door. Biron must have heard all; what would he think?

Millie bounded upstairs like a schoolgirl and Lucy re-entered the reception room.

She raised her eyes for just an instant to note his stern gaze and then dropped them. Her arms hung by her side, her cheeks were flaming.

Tell your friends of Hazel Harlow the Actress.

"It was a pretty piece of work, Miss Warren," he said, so sternly that for once she feared him. "It was a struggle between Reeve and myself as to whom should be made happy. I thought I had won, but I suppose he had a friend at Court who was not above trickery. One can often get such a friend by paying for assistance."

It was severe, but she recognised that it was justified from his point of view; he did not know all! Yet she could not endure that he should think her so mercenary. All three of them were regarding her in the same light.

"I was not bought!" she returned fiercely. "I did it for the best."

"Thank you!"

There was a little sarcasm in the tone.

"But you might have permitted your cousin to judge for herself. I must say that I cannot thank you for the implied suggestion that I am not likely to make a good husband. It wounds my vanity to learn that I am inferior to —— well, we need mention no names."

"I did not imply that!" cried Lucy, forgetting her caution. "You are ever so much better. I did it for your sake!" she went on, oblivious of everything except her own justification.

It stung her to the quick that he should think so ill of her.

"Would you have been happy with her? When you have become collected enough to think it over, you will see. If I played a trick, it was to save you!"

She stopped, panting, and looked defiantly at him. He scrutinised her steadily, then said slowly and very gravely:

"Why did you do it? Why for my sake?"

All the colour fled from Lucy's face; she appeared to be on the point of falling, but as he stepped forward to catch her, she fled blindly from the room. She had betrayed her own secret! He knew that she had saved him from the misery of a marriage with a giddy, utterly unsuitable woman, because—she loved him!

It was two months before Lucy and Arthur Biron met again; she had had an attack of brain fever, not a severe one, but her convalescence was slow. He had sent her flowers and had begged to be allowed to see her from the day she had left her bedroom, but she had steadily refused.

He had written to her, but her answer was that he should devote himself to those scientific studies which, she feared, he had neglected and for which he was so well equipped by Nature and Fate. She could not bear the shame of meeting him; her conduct must seem selfish, yet it was not much selfishness in her scheme. She meant to save him from unhappiness; she would have helped him to marry Millie if she had believed that it would have made him a happy man.

Her love was unselfish to that extent; yet, believing as she did and loving him, she had probably been influenced by Millie's words about a woman taking steps to bring a man to her side. Yes, she had been actuated just a little by that remark, and she would not see Arthur Biron.

But she yielded at last, in response to her easy-going, and not very observant aunt, who did not understand her reluctance.

"You were quite right," were his first words, "and I have longed for the opportunity to tell you so. I was infatuated, I should have been miserable, like many another man who has married in infatuation. You could see more deeply than I, and—I want a far-seeing and deep-thinking woman to help me in my studies."

It was a curious proposal, but it was sincere. Lucy shook her head.

"You may be infatuated with me!"

"I have had time to think," he replied earnestly, "and one mistake makes a man careful. You interested yourself in my happiness," he added more lightly, "and you must continue your good work."

"You must wait. You may change your mind. You must wait six months."

The last words hesitatingly.

"I was afraid you were going to say a year," he said with a smile. "And I believe you were, but you couldn't wait so long yourself! Now confess!"

And she did.

Sound Advice.

If you want to enjoy your Summer Holidays you would be wise to take with you the following sixpenny novels. You cannot have any idea how much pleasure you will derive from reading them, when you are sitting on the beach, or under a shady tree in the country:

THE PHANTOM ARMY,
By Max Pemberton.
A strange, stirring and romantic story.

MY JAPANESE WIFE,
By Clive Holland.
The only word for this book is "charming."

THE MASTER KEY,
By Florence Warden.
Amusing from first to last page.

THE SKIPPER'S WOOING.
By W. W. Jacobs.
An ideal book for the seaside. Very breezy.

Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a Stereoscope to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, August 5th. Postcards only, please. The first prize of One Guinea has been awarded this week to Miss M. Byers of 24 Farber Street, Crewe, whose contribution is denoted by a star thus.*

*A GENTLEMAN who was spending a month in the Highlands went to hire a carriage for the purpose of taking his family for a drive. He looked at a vehicle and inquired how many it would hold. The hostler scratched his head thoughtfully and replied: "It houds four generally, but six if they're weel acquaint!"

A LITTLE girl came down to dessert at a dinner party, and sat next to her mother. This lady was much occupied in talking to her neighbours, and omitted to give the child anything to eat. After much time the little girl, unable to bear it any longer, with sobs in her throat, held up her plate and said, "does anybody want a clean plate?"

HE: "I wonder what the meaning of that picture is? The youth and the maiden are in a tender attitude." She: "Oh, don't you see? He has just asked her to marry him, and she is accepting him. How sweet! What does the artist call the picture?" He (looking about): "Oh, I see. It's written on a card at the bottom, 'Sold!'"

LADY (to chemist): "I have a corn from which I suffer dreadfully; can you recommmend anything that will cure it?" Chemist: "Certainly, madam. See, here you have an excellent preparation which will make your corn disappear in a very short time. I have a customer who has used this lotion for the last fourteen years, and he never tries anything else."

A MAN with a gleaming eye entered the waterworks office. "I say," he cried addressing one of the clerks, "you can send up to my house and take your old gas-meter out at once." "This is not the gas office." "It isn't?" "No, sir, this is the waterworks office." "Oh, is it? Well, then, send a man up to my house at once and cut the water off. I'm not going to walk a mile and a half this hot weather for nothing!"

GENERAL SIR EVELYN WOOD is a comparatively short man, and, although he does not look the part when dressed in mufti, is one of the bravest men who ever served our country. He is extremely fond of telling the following story against himself: While waiting at Aldershot station recently in plain clothes, and unattended by his aide-de-camp, he noticed a young private pacing the platform without taking the slightest notice of him, and, of course, omitting the customary salute. The general called him, and asked why he did not salute. "Because I don't know who you are," replied the private stiffly. "I am Sir Evelyn Wood." "Get out," was the rejoinder, "if Sir Evelyn Wood heard you say that, he'd punch your head for you," and he continued his stroll.

"I WOULDN'T call the doctor a quack." "Why wouldn't you?" "It suggests a duck, and there are lots of birds with bigger bills than that."

THE following advertisement appeared in one of our daily papers: "Wanted—A gentleman to undertake the sale of a patent medicine. The advertiser guarantees it will be profitable to the undertaker."

"HAVE you anything to say before we eat you?" said the King of the Cannibal Isles to a missionary. "I have," was the reply. "I want to talk to you awhile of the advantages of a vegetable diet."

"DID you deliver that telegram?" a post-office clerk asked his messenger boy. "Oh, yes; but the man does not live in Abingdon Square, but in Charlton Street, and not on the ground floor, but up three flights of stairs, and not in the front room, but in the back one; besides, his name isn't Johnson, but Thomson, and he isn't a man, but a woman."

Two Irishmen got a job to clean some lofty windows. Having no ladder that would reach them, they were rather puzzled what to do. "Pat," said Mike, "I have it! Get a plank and put it through the widow. Oi'll sit on the plank outside, and you sit on the plank insoide." "All right," replied Pat. All went well until Mike, on the outside, cried out: "Oi've let the window-leather fall!" "All right," again replied Pat, "stop where you are, and Oi'll get it." Away went Pat downstairs; but, on getting into the street, he saw a huddled mass on the pavement: "Be jabbers, Mike," he cried, "you're here first! Which way did you come?"

A JOLLY old boy from the Midlands entered into one of the hotels at the seaside, and seeing on the slab on the right a crab dressed on the shell with legs, claws, and parsley ranged round, said to the landlord: "What d'ye call that?" "Crab," was the answer. "Looks good; I'll have 'un, and gie us a pint of ale." Bread-and-butter was added, and the diner left to his dinner. In about an hour the genial landlord entered the dining-saloon to see if his guest was getting on all right; he found him chawing up the last claw, the chawer red in the face, but beaming. "Like the crab, sir?" "Yes; he was capital. I never tasted one afore; but I think you baked 'un a little too long; the crust was hard. Let's have another pint." He had eaten the lot—shell, claws, and all complete.

THE sight of a row of forceps has closed the mouth of many sufferers, even after they had seated themselves in the dentist's chair. Dental surgeons intercept this, and the following amusing instance of how a boisterous Irishman was made to show his tooth may not be amiss. Pat came to the dentist's with his jaw very much swollen, from a tooth he desired to have pulled. But when the suffering son of Erin got into the dentist's chair and saw the gleaming pair of forceps approaching his face, he positively refused to open his mouth. The dentist quietly told his page boy to prick his patient with a pin, and when Pat opened his mouth to yell the dentist seized his tooth and out it came. "It did not hurt so much as you expected it would, did it?" the dentist asked smilingly. "Well no," said Pat, hesitatingly, as if doubting the truthfulness of his admission, "but," he added, placing his hand to the spot where the boy pricked him, "begorra, little did I think the roots would reach down like that."

Startling stage revelations next week.

SEA BATHING AND DEAF PEOPLE.

Should people affected with ear diseases bathe in the sea? The subject at this time of the year is not without interest, and useful hints may be given to many who are unaware of the influence that bathing exercises on the organ of the ear when it is diseased, or when a predisposition to disease exists.

In the first place, it should be remembered that cold water, and especially salt water, must never be allowed to pass into the ear; the neglect of proper precautions to prevent this occurring often causes catarrh or inflammation of the ear. It is therefore advisable for all who had sensitive ears to carefully plug the hole of the ear with cotton-wool before entering the water. A waterproof cap may also be used with advantage. According to the temperature of the water, bathing may be beneficial, or may prove otherwise. As a rule, when a catarrhal condition of the ear exists, it is wise to abstain entirely from river or sea bathing; but baths of warm or tepid salt water, once every two or three days, followed by a vigorous rubbing all over the body, will have favourable effects.

Sea or river bathing protects the system against catarrhal attacks, when there is merely a predisposition to the disease, but it is usually injurious when the catarrhal process has already set in.

As exceptions to the general rule, these baths have been found beneficial in chronic cases of dry catarrh, but as in other similar cases they have aggravated the deafness and increased the noises in the ear, the experiment can hardly be recommended.

Sea bathing is excellent for the scrofulous. When, however, they are suffering from an ear disease, baths are frequently very injurious, and have been found to produce an attack of inflammation in cases where the cure seemed almost complete. People whose ears discharge must totally refrain from bathing; if by any chance salt water, or even ordinary cold water, were to penetrate the ear when a perforation of the drum exists, the result would be most serious.

In short, sea bathing cannot be recommended to persons affected with ear diseases. In the very few cases where no injurious effects would result from it, the benefit derived, as far as deafness is concerned, can only be problematic.

A reason which would also show that the seaside is not quite suitable as a health resort for deaf people, unless due precautions be taken, is, that on account of the strong winds which are nearly always prevalent, the danger of contracting colds or getting into draughts is greater.

On the other hand, a change from town to country will always be beneficial. The impure air breathed in offices, shops, and workrooms favours the development of the affections of the throat, nasal passages, and middle ear. A residence of a few weeks in a part of the country where the atmosphere is pure, fresh, and dry is sure to be of benefit, hilly or upland country being especially recommended.

Dry and warm weather, having a beneficial effect on practically all forms of chronic deafness, summer is obviously the best time for successfully treating the disease. Many people are so ill-advised as not to avail themselves of this opportunity, simply because their infirmity at this time of the year is less troublesome than usual. But a few months will bring back the old condition, when treatment will be rendered all the more difficult for having to contend at once with the disease and the strong influence of cold and damp.

In the "Journal for the Deaf," the description is given of Drouet's system of treatment of chronic ear diseases, of which deafness is the consequence. It is enough to read the report of the cures which have been effected by this treatment to realise the fame which now attaches to the name of the Drouet Institute. For, not only have many cures been obtained in long standing cases after a very short treatment, but the system has also proved entirely successful in completely restoring the hearing of people who had been previously treated without avail, and who, in consequence, had given up the hope of ever being relieved.

Two instances of the curability of ear disease by the Drouet Method, after failure of the ordinary treatment used by aural specialists, are shown in the following cases, and many others will be found in the July number of the paper referred to above.

Mr. R. J. Harris, of Newquay, Cornwall, submitted his case on May 2, 1901, to the Drouet Institute. He had been suffering for about two years with deafness, could hear the tick of a watch only an inch from the left ear, and could not hear it at all with the right ear. He often had painful gatherings in the ears, which broke and discharged. There was a continuous noise in the ears, with nervousness and occasional attacks of dizziness. The nose and throat were affected by catarrhal discharges, and the voice was husky. Altogether a difficult and obstinate case to treat on account of the complications. He further stated that he had been under treatment by an aural specialist, but without receiving the slightest benefit.

On May 7th Mr. Harris began the Drouet treatment, prescribed for him by the consulting surgeon, and continued until June 16th, when he pronounced himself cured, in the following letter:

3 Acland-gardens, Tower-road, Newquay.
Cornwall, June 16, 1901.

I have much pleasure in informing you I can hear perfectly well, the discharges from the ear have stopped, the nose is quite clear, and the throat entirely well. I feel grateful for the relief your treatment has given me, and I will recommend to you anybody who suffers from the same complaint.—Thanking you for your kind attention, I am, yours truly,
R. J. HARRIS.

The second case is the following:

Miss J. P., Newcastle-on-Tyne, was afflicted for thirty years with a chronic inflammation of the middle ear which produced deafness and a continual discharge. Miss P. placed herself under the treatment of a leading ear specialist, who finally dismissed her case as incurable, attributing the failure to obtain relief to constitutional causes. In this condition of poor health and suffering great annoyance from noises in the head, deafness, and a constant discharge from the ears, she began the Drouet treatment, and after a few weeks reported, in the following letter to the Institute, a complete cure had been accomplished:

Newcastle-on-Tyne, June 1, 1901.

I deferred writing for a short time to see if my ears continued in a satisfactory condition. I am satisfied with them, so shall not require any more treatment.

I thank you for much kind attention during treatment, and especially appreciate the results, as my case was chronic, and had been under other treatment formerly without obtaining the benefit I now enjoy.—Yours truly,
J. P.

The full name and address of this person will be gladly given privately by the Drouet Institute to any applicant.

A special feature of the Drouet treatment is that patients who cannot come to London to be examined are enabled, however, to receive advice by filling up a pathological report form, which allows them to state explicitly their case. This form may be had, free of charge, with a copy of the "Journal for the Deaf," by writing to the Secretary, Drouet Institute, 72 Regent's Park-road, London, N.W. In fact, all the persons whose cures have just been reported were treated by means of the pathological form, and never saw the consulting surgeon who prescribed for them.

It is, however, always advisable, when possible, to be personally examined at the Drouet Institute, 72 Regent's Park Road, N.W., where consultations are held daily, except Sunday, from two to four in the afternoon. Special consultations may also be had at any time by previous arrangement. For all personal consultations a fee is charged. Any advice by correspondence is absolutely free, as are also the consultations given by means of the report form.

To place beyond all doubt the authenticity of the testimonial letters to which reference has been made, they have been placed in the autograph-room at the Drouet Institute, where they may be seen, amongst hundreds of others from former patients who have been successfully treated. This room is open to the public every day, except Sunday, from nine a.m. till five p.m.

THE EDITOR'S PAGE.

By a slip of the pen I last week said that our new series, would begin in this number. Obviously, as you will have noticed from the other announcements on the subject, it should have been next week's paper—the Bank Holiday number.

"The Adventures of an Actress,"

I hope you are doing me the kindness of mentioning this series to your friends. Most people are interested in matters connected with the theatre, and these new stories, stripping as they do all the false glamour from the stage, and showing it and its votaries in their true and varying colours, cannot fail to attract the widest attention. And even if you do not care for theatrical matters, you will enjoy the stories for the sweet romance they contain. Each week's story will be complete in itself, and yet once you begin the series you will not rest till you have read the complete set of stories.

Once again I would warn you that to delay ordering your copy may lead to disappointment, for the demand is sure to be immense. Therefore, your wisest course will be to fill in this form and hand it to your newsagent:

Please reserve for me a copy of Short Stories dated August 10th.

I am pleased to be able to announce that I have just concluded arrangements with a lady of great experience, who will in future advise on this page in matters connected with Love, Courtship and Marriage.

Here is the first batch of replies to letters which have reached me lately on these subjects:

No, "Annette," I do not think you will regret it, and I cordially support you in your decision. When you became engaged to him three years ago, you knew that he intended to go out to the West Indies as a missionary, and you became a hospital nurse so that you might acquire knowledge that would be useful among the natives. Now the time has arrived, your relatives are trying to persuade you to give him up and stay here. You love him, and are willing to share his lot. My advice under the circumstances is to go with him. I wish you every happiness in your far-away home, and shall be pleased to hear from you again.

It is very hard, "Emily," but he is not the man for you. He paid marked attention to you, and almost declared his affection; then your cousin comes upon the scene; he is captivated by outside show and leaves you for her. He has forsaken one who is homely, domesticated, and would have made him a thoroughly good wife, for a girl who thinks of little but dress and "cutting a dash" at balls and parties, and who is quite unfitted for his humble station. A man with so little discrimination and common-sense would never make a good husband for you; and, later on, you will be glad of the fact that is now causing you pain.

You ask me, "Despairing Jack," whether there are not occasions when suicide is not only justifiable but the right thing to do. Now, read the sad little tale you have told me, just as I repeat it, word for word, and then, having thought it all over and faced the situation like a man, see whether you will not feel with me that it was all for the best. You were engaged to a girl, and for six months saw her daily, and she seemed to love you as much as you loved her. Then one day a young sailor cousin of hers returned from a voyage, and you saw, only too plainly, that her heart and affections were given to him, and not to you. In vain you implored her not to change; one day she disappeared with her cousin, and you have never seen or heard of her again. Can't you see that you are well rid of her? Can't you understand that by her leaving you in that manner she proved herself to be unworthy of your love? Cheer up, and one day you will find the right sort of girl to make you a good wife. Your letter was no trouble. I hope you will get the post you are trying for.

I am so sorry for you in your trouble, "Lonely Lassie." But I do think that, in time, you will feel that he really was unworthy of the love of a nice-minded girl. Anyone who could stoop to such meanness as he has been guilty of would only prove more unsatisfactory as a husband than he has been as your lover. I should advise you to write to him and tell him plainly that, after having discovered him in the act of opening one of your letters, and setting his sister to spy out all your actions during the past two months, you feel that all your respect and love for him is dead, and that you wish to have nothing to do with him in the future. Return all his presents and letters, and cheer up! Happier days are in store for you, I feel sure.

TO CONTRIBUTORS.

HAIR RENEWER

Called by him "TATCHO"

(Romany: "Genuine," "Good," "True.")

And why, pray, is the successful poet, playwright, and journalist an eminent authority on hair restorer? Eager for an explanation a Daily Mail representative sought out Mr. Sims. . . .

Now Mr. G. R. Sims, as many people know, is one of the busiest men in the kingdom, but hastily affixing his signature to a letter, he looked up and extended a characteristically cordial welcome. Then he said, "I will explain. I found that I was rapidly going bald. Not seriously, you understand, but the thinning out was sufficiently marked to set me thinking out a remedy. I went to two specialists, both of whom cheerfully assured me that I should be absolutely bald in two years.

"Then I discovered the preparation which is now placed upon the market. I found that I had hit upon a remedy capable of working wonders. Look at my hair now, isn't that convincing evidence of the value of my preparation?

"Ladies confirm my good opinion of it as a dressing for daily use. Mrs. Brown-Potter, whose beautiful hair is the admiration of the entire lady world, writes that she uses nothing but 'Tatcho.' There is nothing to prevent every woman from making her hair silken in texture and bountiful in volume, for she can obtain a bottle of 'Tatcho' now in every town or even village."

In order that the public may be able to test the superlative value of Mr. George R. Sims' discovery, the Company is issuing large 4/6 size test bottles post free for 1/10, under plain cover, one of which may be had on application. STARTLING REVELATIONS OF THE STAGE

THE ADVENTURES OF AN ACTRESS.

Beautiful Hazel Harlow's Flight.

By DONOVAN MART.

CHAPTER I.

A MELLOW ribbon of light straggled out from the open window into the summer night. All round the panes the roses and honey-suckle clambered. A low rampart of shrubs screened the lower half of the casement.

Voices floated out from inside the room into the peaceful country air. Not a soul was about to hear the bitter words that were passing between the two occupants of the chamber, an elderly, red-faced man, and a young girl of almost unsurpassable beauty.

Not a soul! Ah yes, for beneath the shadow of the shrubs crouched the figure of a man, a silent, strenuous figure, who, with nerves a-quiver listened to every syllable of the conversation meant for no stranger's ear.

And this is what he heard. The man was speaking, his coarse voice coarser still from the effects of liquor, anger insistent in every tone of his unstudied speech.

"And I say you shall! What have I reared ye for? Merely to sit at your ease and eat of my bread, while I toil. No, my wench, no! I'm not to be played with! Hear me once and for all. Either you marry Horace Caldecott and live at The Hall, in riches, or——" a horrid expletive broke from his lips and finished his sentence far more eloquently than any words could have done.

The girl had risen and, with a wondrous unstudied grace, stood before the enraged farmer, the splendid outline of her figure and the clear-cut, noble purity of her profile silhouetted against the light of the lamp on the table at her side.

"And I tell you, father, I will not marry Horace Caldecott, not if he were a thousand times richer than he is. I will never sell my hand and heart to such a man. Sooner than that I will go out into the world and earn my own bread. You can beat me, starve me, do what you will to me, but you cannot make me sell my honour to pay your debts."

The farmer took a long draught from a beer-mug at his elbow. His eyes gleamed like a beast's. A laugh broke from his lips.

"Be careful, Hazel!" he said hoarsely, "or whip you I will. Earn your own bread! Can a heifer turn race-horse? No, my girl, you marry Squire Caldecott."

"Then listen!" All the pent-up scorn of years seemed in the girl's voice. "To-morrow I leave you for London. I have given you warning and perhaps a day will come when you will regret the moment you drove your motherless child out into the world. To-morrow we part, perhaps for ever."

With an oath the now thoroughly drunken man staggered to his feet. The eavesdropper outside the window half rose with a muttered exclamation. Neither father nor daughter had eyes for him, however, and he fell back into a crouching position.

Farmer Harlow's arm shot out, and his open hand caught the girl full upon the face. With a faint cry of fear she staggered backwards. Her involuntary movement proved Harlow's undoing. He fell forward at full length upon the stone-flagged floor of the farm kitchen.

When he dragged himself up again he was alone.

"The jade's gone!" he hiccupped with an oath. "Good riddance! She'll talk sense in the morning. And if she don't, well I'll call the squire."

He stumbled towards the open window, and the silent listener without, in sudden alarm sprang to his feet, and scurried away.

"What was that?" muttered the farmer, trying to collect his fuddled senses.

He peered out, blinking owl-wise into the darkness. All was still.

"Must have been a dog!" he murmured. "Hang the cur!"

With which charitable remark he stumbled off to bed.

CHAPTER II.

AT the best of times Farmer Harlow was a sound sleeper. Heavy with beer as he was when he shambled up to his bed-chamber on the night of the final altercation with his daughter, it is not to be wondered at that the sun was high in the heavens when he awoke.

He had a somewhat hazy recollection of the last night's dispute. But his resentment against his daughter ran high. He remembered that she had flouted his parental authority.

"I'll learn her!" he muttered resentfully, as he struggled into his clothes.

But a surprise was in store for him when he descended to the parlour, in which he usually had breakfast with his daughter. In place of Hazel's queen-like figure and beautiful face, he was confronted by old Martha, the factotum of Harlow Farm, on whose face was an expression of the blankest terror and consternation.

"Adventures of an Actress" begin to-day.

He glared resentfully in her wrinkled, careworn face.

"Hullo!" he growled. "What's amiss? Where's Hazel?"

For a moment or so the woman struggled with speech. Then she covered her face with her apron, and sinking down into a chair, burst into a passion of weeping.

To a man of the farmer's rough, uncouth mind—it was always a marvel to the village folk that he could have been the father of such a peerless girl as Hazel—tears in women were an especial abomination.

"Stop your snivelling!" he roared, "and speak like a sane woman!"

With an effort the old woman checked her sobs. "Hazel's gone!" she faltered out.

"Gone! What d'ye mean?" a livid flush overspread the farmer's bucolic face.

"Her room's empty! She's nowhere about the farm, and—she left this piece of paper on her pincushion."

Harlow snatched the note out of the woman's hand. It was unaddressed and ran as follows:

> I have gone. After what you said and did last night Harlow Farm is no home for me. Do not try to find me. Good-bye. I forgive you.—Hazel.

It was some few moments before the farmer could take in the full purport of the note.

Then enlightenment came to him.

"It's a trick!" he cried, "a — trick! I forgive you! Did ever man read the like. But I've not done with her yet. I'll find her. Squire Caldecott will help me!" And without pausing to put a hat on his head, or take bite or sup, he dashed out of the farm-house and down the dusty lane like a man possessed.

In the meanwhile what had become of Hazel? Sick at heart the girl had crept up to her bedroom, and locking the door had thrown herself down upon the bed, her whole being afire with the abuse to which she had been subjected.

If ever she had felt her lonely, motherless condition she felt it then. What could she do? How could she shake off the hated shackles that bound her to the farm and the hateful lover that her father would sell her to.

Her brain began to work quickly. What could she do? Then she remembered an incident long forgotten, how a girl, the daughter of a neighbouring farmer had gone to London and become an actress. What the girl had done or how she had got on she knew not.

But her mind, once set upon a certain train of thought, began to build upon that one foundation. What another had done she would do. She was beautiful—she could not help knowing that—young, strong, untainted by the world. She had had a good education, had always lived in a world of her own. London! Yes that was to be her goal. But where to go? Then she remembered that her father had a brother living in London, a man she had not seen since childhood, but whose address she knew. She would go to him and ask his help; would tell him her sad story, how her father had got into debt, how to retrieve his fortunes he had determined his daughter should marry a rich roué—Squire Caldecott. She had about twenty pounds of her own. That would surely be enough to maintain her for a while. There was a train to London at nine. Her father would sleep long after his potations. She would pack a hand-bag with her necessaries and be off.

In such hurried sequence did her thoughts bear her on, until at last her mind was made up, and she only longed for the morning when she could embark upon her new resolution.

She was up at six. Noiselessly she dressed and packed her hand-bag. Then she stole downstairs, safe in the assurance that her father was sound asleep, and that old Martha would not be down before seven.

A hurried breakfast in the larder, and nothing more remained but to be off.

Good-bye old farmstead! The tears gathered in the girl's blue eyes.

It was a glorious summer morning. The station was nearly three miles away, so that there was no need for hurry, yet Hazel almost ran down the little lane that led from the farm-house to the high road beyond.

The farm was nearly a mile away from the village of Honeycote.

No one was in sight as the girl turned into the road, and hurried on to where a path struck off from the highway across the fields, a short cut to the railway station.

It was almost eight o'clock when the station buildings became visible through the trees that fringed them. The girl sat down for a while to rest, for she had an hour before the train was due.

Half an hour passed away, and the girl rose to her feet. She was safe from pursuit and she felt that she might just as well wait the remaining time before the train started in the station.

The sound of wheels along the road caused her to pause where she was. She could see through the hedge, that fringed the meadow, that a trap was driving smartly along the highway and coming from the station.

"Squire Caldecott's dog-cart," she murmured to herself. "What does that mean? The groom's driving. The Squire's not in the trap."

A sudden fear caught at her heart. Supposing that the man she feared and hated most on earth was going to London by the nine o'clock train!

She lingered no longer, but hastened onwards to the station, determined to know the worst.

But her fears seemed groundless. No one was in the station save a sleepy porter who was taking the duties of ticket-clerk as well. He gave Hazel her ticket without comment. Evidently she was to be the only passenger.

The train steamed slowly into the wayside station and drew up with many protesting snorts. Hazel sprang into an empty third class compartment, and shrank back against the cushions with a beating heart.

The train puffed off again almost immediately. A great sigh of relief fell from the girl's lips; not one thought did she give to what lay before her, to all the unknown dangers and difficulties that might lie in her path in the metropolis. She had shaken off the shackles of her old life, of the father who had treated her so shamefully, of the unwelcome lover whose affection was only a sordid passion kindled into being by her beauty; and an unplumbed abyss of Fate stretched out before her mental vision.

It was a three hours' run to Paddington. Before the terminus the train filled up somewhat, and Hazel was not permitted to retain the compartment vacant for herself. Yet her thoughts were too varied to allow her to bestow more than a passing glance upon her fellow passengers. Yet the girl's beauty did not fail to impress itself upon her travelling-companions.

The rich colouring of her cheeks and lips, the ivory whiteness of her even teeth, the soft peach-like bloom that the country air had painted on her face, her blue eyes and wavy chestnut hair were some of the components that lent an added charm to the queen-like figure and indisputable beauty of Hazel Harlow.

At last the terminus was reached, and the second stage of the young girl's battle with the unknown was accomplished. The platform was crowded with porters and the usual crowd of expectant people, all intent in finding the particular travellers they had come to welcome to London.

Hazel stepped out of the carriage, and for a moment stood nerveless upon the crowded platform, overwhelmed by the din and bustle, such a contrast to the quiet peacefulness of Harlow Farm.

A porter recalled her to her senses. "Shall I get a cab, miss?" the fellow said.

"Oh, yes, please," answered the girl, "and will you ask him to drive to Mr. Joseph Harlow's, 46 Chester Street, Bayswater."

The man beckoned to a four-wheeler. Hazel was so intent upon making sure of the cab that was to carry her to her unknown relative that she did not notice that a tall stranger had drawn close to her side, a well-dressed man with a slouch hat drawn over his eyes, who had listened intently to the words that passed between her and the porter.

The cab drew up against the kerb, and the girl entered the vehicle. The stranger hurriedly slipped round in front of the horse, and muttered a few words to the jehu who hesitated for a moment, and then slipped off his box. Thrusting his head inside the cab window—Hazel having settled herself back against the cushions—he said:

"Just a minute, miss, I've got to give a message to a mate of mine."

The unsuspecting girl smiled sweetly into the man's face.

"All right, cabman," she said and then her eyes gazed listlessly out upon the stream of vehicles and people that thronged the station.

This then was London. How noisy it seemed. For a few seconds a great despondency crept over her. She felt her loneliness acutely.

Then her natural buoyancy, coupled with the self-confidence that all pure-minded women feel, came to her aid. She shook off the feeling of depression, and gave herself up to dreams about the future.

In the meanwhile the stranger and the cabman were engaged in an earnest confabulation.

Then the unknown slipped a piece of money into the other man's hand and smiled. The cabby nodded with a somewhat dubious expression, pocketed the coin, and turned away.

Immediately the stranger leapt into a neighbouring hansom, and rattled away at full speed.

Hazel's driver clambered ponderously on to the box of his "growler," cracked his whip and urged his somewhat jaded steed forward. In a few minutes the station was left behind and Hazel found herself amid all the roar of the London streets, a din that made her pulses quicken, and the young blood within her to dance.

"I wonder what my uncle is like," ran her thoughts as the cab rattled onwards. "Suppose that he refuses to see me! Or suppose that he has changed his address! I shall be absolutely friendless and alone then. How does one set about getting on the stage I wonder! Perhaps he will tell me all that. Anyhow I have said good-bye to father's cruelty and to the horrid fate of being Horace Caldecott's wife."

Poor girl! Well was it that a merciful Providence hid the future from her glorious blue eyes. Had she only had an inkling of the dangers and difficulties that beset her path, she would in all probability rather have sought the refuge of the noisy streets through which she was passing, than have pressed onwards to the unknown!

Suddenly the cab drew up before an imposing portico, There was no number visible on the street door. "'Ere's 46 Chester Street, miss," said the cabman alighting from his box and opening the carriage door. "Five shillings please miss."

Hazel paid the exorbitant fare from her little store without even a suspicion that she had been basely overcharged. Her heart was beating fiercely within her. She mounted the steps that led up to the entrance door as though in a dream, and rang the bell.

A youth in buttons answered the summons. "Does Mr. Harlow live here?" the girl asked in her sweet voice.

The boy seemed staggered, as well he might, by such a vision of loveliness.

"Yes, miss," he answered. "Please to step in."

Hazel gave vent to a great sigh of thankfulness. Her fears seemed quite allayed by the calm assurance.

She found herself in a spacious entrance-hall, leading to a broad flight of stairs that evidently led direct to the upper part of the mansion.

The page opened a door to the left of the vestibule.

"Will you step in here miss," he said; and walking through the chamber, a sort of ante room, he opened a door that led to yet another apartment beyond, evidently a study, to judge from the well-filled book-shelves and roll-top desk in the corner.

"Who shall I say, miss?" said the boy, and Hazel noticed that he spoke with evidently suppressed mirth.

"Miss Hazel Harlow, his niece from Harlow Farm," answered the girl eagerly.

The page retired, and she was left alone.

She had not seen her uncle since childhood, and her recollections of him were rather hazy. She knew that her father and he did not get on together, but the cause of their feud she had never known. She pictured him as a venerable, grey-haired gentleman, with ruddy visage and kindly blue eyes.

Five minutes went by. Then a hand was placed on the knob of the door that opened into the room, and by which she had just entered.

The next moment and the door swung open, and a man entered hastily.

Hazel sprang up from the chair in which she had seated herself, and a cry of horror left her lips.

The colour ebbed away from her face, and for a moment she could scarcely believe the evidence of her own eyes.

For in place of the venerable face she had pictured in her dreams, she found herself gazing into the face of the one man she had more reason to detest and fear than any other in the world—Squire Horace Caldecott!

Beautiful Hazel Harlow will interest you deeply.

With a smile that rendered his saturnine, dissipated face more repellent than it usually was to the girl's eyes, Caldecott advanced towards her.

"Welcome to London, my dear!" he said with cruel pleasantry.

Hazel uttered a cry, like a stricken animal. Then it was true! It was no vision! It was for this she had fled away so stealthily from Harlow Farm, to fall straight into a cunning, a diabolical trap!

"Squire Caldecott!" she murmured brokenly. "You here! What does it mean? Where is my uncle?"

Caldecott laughed, a devil's laugh.

"Listen, my beautiful one," he said, mockingly, "and I will tell you what love can do!"

The girl drew herself up to the full height of her queenly figure. All the latent force that lay behind her sweet maidenhood seemed to blaze out of her eyes.

"Love from your lips is only a base profanation of the word, Mr. Caldecott!" she said coldly.

Instinctively Caldecott quailed before her words and gesture.

"Yet you shall hear me!" he answered raspingly. Then he went on, in quick, hurried speech: "Last night I overheard the conversation between your father and you. I was beneath the open window. I heard you say that you would never marry me, that you would go out into the world and seek your own bread. I saw your father strike you. I knew that was the climax. You said decisively—your father was too deep in his cups to note your words—that you would leave 'on the morrow,' would go to London. I knew well you would go by the earliest train. I travelled by that train, too. You did not see me"—like a flash Hazel remembered the mysterious appearance of Caldecott's dog-cart—"you were too much wrapped up in your own thoughts. It was I who directed your cabman to drive here. There you have the whole story. And now I have you my wilful darling. For Love finds out the way, in spite of all you may say."

Suppressed passion gleamed out from the man's dark eyes. His whole frame quivered. Never had the girl upon whom his desires were centred seemed more beautiful, more alluring than at that moment, when helpless, alone, unfriended she stood before her hated lover, like a dove in the grip of a falcon.

With a despairing gesture, that must assuredly have turned the heart of a man less unprincipled than Horace Caldecott, the girl looked about her, in vain seeking for some escape from her persecutor.

The squire noted her actions. Again he smiled.

"No, no, sweetheart!" he said, "have no misapprehensions. You are here in my own house. All the servants here are in my employ. If you scream no one will hear you, and if they do"—he shrugged his shoulders meaningly—"Horace Caldecott is well known, rich, influential, respected. While you"—then his voice changed—"come, I do not wish to harm you. I love you too well for that. Only consent to be my wife, and we will return to Harlow Farm in an hour, and no one need know that you sought my protection, unattended, alone"—there was a horrid significance in his voice—"here in the heart of London."

"Valerie!" he muttered hoarsely. "What do you want here?"

His words stung the girl to hot resentment. All the purity of her unspotted womanhood leapt up in her voice, as she answered him:

"Vile I knew to be, Squire Caldecott, but now your villainy is absolutely unmasked. I see the trap into which you have led me. Well, do your worst. Sooner than marry you I would kill myself; and that I assuredly will do unless you release me immediately."

A half-veiled oath escaped from Caldecott's lips. He took a step forward. His voice was thick with passion and thwarted intent as he said:

"So that's your answer to my offer, is it. Very well then," his sentence was never finished, for at that moment the door of the room suddenly opened to admit a woman, a stylishly dressed figure, clad in all the extravagant finery of excessive female vanity.

Caldecott swung round as the new comer entered, with an exclamation of mingled rage and apprehension. His cheeks went pale as he saw who it was.

"Valerie!" he muttered, hoarsely, "what do you want here?"

The woman laughed aloud. Her eyes, filled with a sudden jealousy, fixed themselves on Hazel's queenly figure and lovely face.

"Who is this, Horace?" she said peremptorily. In a moment Hazel darted forward.

"Save me!" she cried imploringly, "save me if you are a woman with a woman's heart."

But Caldecott interposed, and thrust himself almost roughly between the two women.

"No melodrama here," he said savagely, "this lady"—indicating Hazel with a wave of the hand—"and I have business to transact. I will explain all to you, Valerie, in ten minutes."

He almost pushed the woman towards the door in his anxiety to spare himself a further scene.

"Business!" sneered Valerie, who showed no inclination to be thus cavalierly dismissed. "The lady seems wonderfully anxious to transact it! You did not expect to see me, Horace. You never said you were coming to town. What does it all mean?"

"It means," cried Hazel, "that this villain has trapped me here, that——"

But again Caldecott cut her short almost brutally.

"Come with me, Valerie," he said persuasively, "and I will explain everything. Surely you know me well enough by this time to believe what I say." He took hold of the woman's arm and led her towards the door.

The black eyes of the unknown woman gleamed resentfully at the young girl. Then they turned towards Caldecott's handsome face.

"I will come with you," she muttered, "and hear what you have to say. But if you play me false, look out for yourself. I am not a child to be played with, understand that!"

"Yes, yes," answered Caldecott, "I know. Come!"

He threw open the door of the room and the woman slipped out before him. Hazel darted forward with a cry. Too late! The door clashed to in her face, and she heard the sound of a key shooting back the wards of the lock into their socket, as Caldecott sprang out close on the heels of his comrade.

For a moment she stood motionless, as though turned to stone. What could she do? She was trapped indeed, and beyond help.

For a few seconds the idea came to her to scream for help. Then she remembered Caldecott's words, and realised that such a course of action would be futile. Her eager eyes darted round the room. Was there no way of escape.

She darted towards the window, her hand instinctively catching hold of the little hand-bag that contained her few belongings.

Then she made a discovery. The window proved to be the upper part of a door that opened out on to an iron verandah, with creeper-covered railings, from which a short flight of steps led into a small dreary London garden. At the far end of the garden, which consisted of a grass plot and a few stunted shrubs, was a low brick wall that formed the boundary between the enclosure and a similar piece of ground backing a house of corresponding dimensions to Caldecott's.

All this Hazel's quick, country-trained eyes grasped in a fraction of the time taken in the telling. She saw furthermore that the house opposite her line of vision had a corresponding iron verandah and steps, also leading to a glass-paned door.

In a moment a wild idea came to her. She tried the door. To her joy it was unlocked. Noiselessly she opened it and slipped out on to the verandah. The next moment she had bounded down the steps and was speeding, deer-footed, across the tiny grass plot.

CHAPTER III.

Concealing his chagrin at thus being interrupted in his fell scheme, Caldecott—somewhat uneasy as to the advisability of leaving Hazel alone in her prison, yet never dreaming that she would make any successful endeavour to escape—conducted Valerie to a room not far from the one in which Hazel had been locked.

"And now," said the woman, when they were alone, "for an explanation. Who is that girl?"

"My dear Valerie," said Caldecott in honeyed tones, "the story is soon told. She is the daughter of one of my tenants in the country, who has run away from home. I found her, and was in the act of trying to persuade her to return to her father when you interrupted me. Naturally she was annoyed and tried to kick up a fuss. There, my jealous little darling, you have the whole story," and drawing the woman to him he kissed her with apparent warmth upon the cheeks.

"Is that all Horace?" cried Valerie. "Will you swear to me that's all? You have not been enamoured of her girlish beauty?—for beautiful she is. You have not been endeavouring to find a substitute for Valerie Bellairs?"

"What a jealous little woman it is!" came the answer with seductive tenderness. "How can you, Valerie, the Queen of the London Stage, believe that Horace Caldecott can be torn from his allegiance by the airs and graces of a country bumpkin's daughter? Have you known me for so long to doubt my sincerity?" with wonderful cunning Caldecott hid the impatience that in reality consumed his being.

The actress flung her arms round the man's neck, and pressed her burning lips to his.

"Adventures of an Actress" begin to-day.

"You mean it, Horace?" she cried, passionately. "Your heart is still mine?"

"Yes, yes, you know it! And now, dearest, let me go and try and persuade this girl to return to her anxious father. Do you leave me now. I will come and see you to-morrow."

Slowly Valerie drew herself apart from the man, who, with all his villainy, she loved with an intentness worthy of a better cause.

"I will go," she said almost resentfully, "and I will trust you."

Caldecott breathed a sigh of heartfelt relief.

"There speaks my sensible little Valerie," he said fondly. "And now let me see you to the street-door. This unpalatable business before me must be settled. Then my mind will be easy and I shall be yours, heart and soul again."

He drew her to him, and kissed her with a great show of tenderness, the plaything of an idle hour, the woman he had tricked and cheated into a belief of his unalterable love.

And Valerie, like many another woman who had fixed her affections upon an idol, was blind to the fact that her idol had feet of clay. The hour of her awakening had not yet come.

She suffered the plausible villain to escort her to the door.

"Au revoir!" she murmured, with one last glance from her brilliant eyes. "Au revoir till to-morrow."

The next moment she had gone.

An evil smile played round the corners of the Squire's lips.

"And now for my caged bird," he muttered. "Curse Valerie and her meddlesomeness! There will be complications ahead! Bah, I'm sick to death of the woman! It's Hazel I want, Hazel with the damask cheek, the turquoise eye, the figure of a nymph. And she's in my power."

He hurried back to the room in which he had left his prisoner, and pausing outside the door, listened intently for a few moments before turning the key. Supposing that the girl, grown desperate, had determined on springing upon him as he entered. She was vigorous, strong and lithe as a panther. Instinctively his hand went to his hip-pocket to draw forth a tiny revolver, a wicked little weapon, the polished barrel of which glinted brightly in the half-light.

Not a sound could he hear from within the room. Softly he turned the key in the well-oiled wards. The next moment he had thrown open the door, and bounded into the room.

For a moment he could hardly believe the unimpeachable evidence of his eyes. The room was empty!

A cry escaped his lips! She must be hiding in some corner of the room. Yet there was no hiding place for such a queenly figure. Only a cat could have hidden behind the desk. His eyes went to the glass-door. It was ajar!

He dashed across the apartment and peered out into the tiny garden. Something caught his eye on the grass-plot, just beneath the boundary wall at the extreme end. In a momemt he was down the iron steps and across the grass. The "something" was a woman's glove! In a moment he realised how his victim had escaped.

For a few seconds he stood irresolute, murder in his heart. Should he leap the wall into the next garden and forcibly procure an entry into the house beyond. He placed a hand upon the low wall.

Then a new idea struck him. He dashed back the way he had come like the wind.

The girl had given him the slip—he realised that. But she had not seen the last of him yet. No, no, a thousand times no. He had not schemed so deeply for naught. All his plans should not fall to the ground like a house of cards. There was still time to retrieve the ground that had been so suddenly cut from beneath his feet by the unlucky advent of Valerie Bellairs.

CHAPTER IV.

In the meanwhile we must return to Hazel.

To a girl of her country training, with all her muscles rendered supple and strong by open air life she had hitherto led, the low four-foot wall before her presented but few obstacles.

Without casting a look behind her—and had she done so she would have seen the tell tale glove she had dropped in her haste—without pausing for one instant she swung herself up and over the wall, casting her hand-bag before her. Another moment and she was in the other garden.

Fear of the man she fled from leant her wings and gave her courage. Without slackening she swung the bag up again, and flew across the intervening space between the iron steps that led up to the unknown house.

She could not stop to wonder what lay behind that glass door. Her one idea was escape from Caldecott's toils. The next moment her hand was on the door knob.

The door was unlocked. With a sob of thankfulness she dashed inside the room and closed the door behind her.

Her unceremonious entry caused the only occupant of the room, a young man seated at a table reading, to spring from his chair with a cry of the blankest amazement.

The beautiful apparition that had so mysteriously broken in upon his privacy was assuredly ground enough for his consternation.

"Good heavens!" he cried, "who are you? And where do you come from?"

Hazel tottered forward with a blanched face. She had just time to take in the fact that the young man before her was tall and good-looking, and then her harassed brain, added to the fact that no food had passed her lips since the hurried meal of the morning, gave way.

An inarticulate cry came from her lips. The next moment she fell forward, in a dead faint, right into the arms of the dumfounded young man.

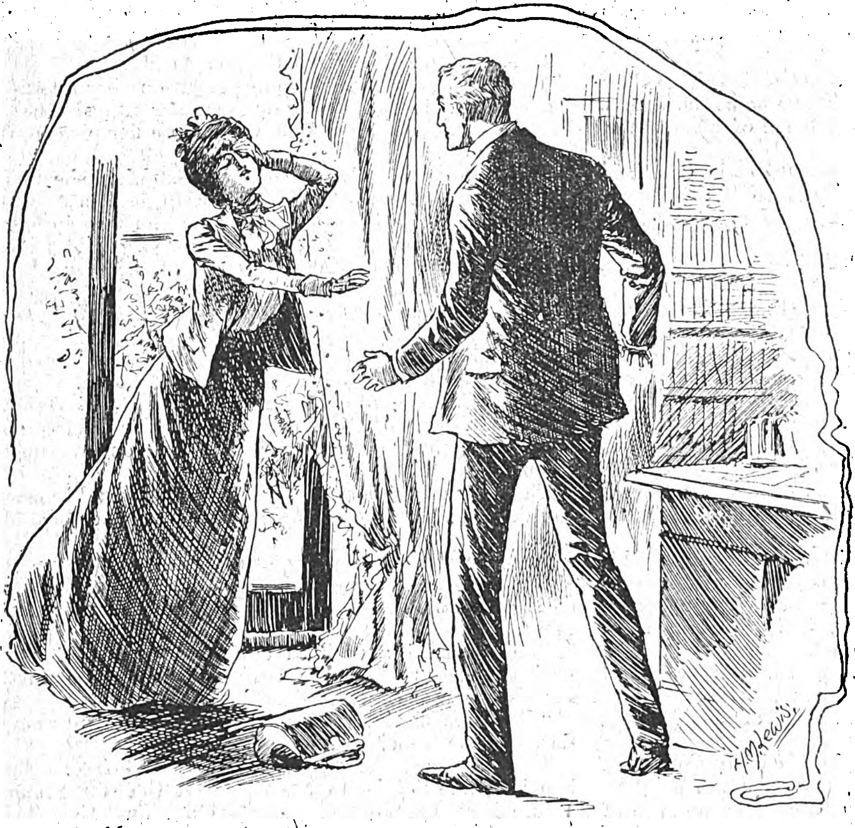
When she came to her senses again she was lying upon a sofa, and the unknown youth was bending over her with evident solicitude apparent in his open grey eyes. In his hand was a glass of water, with which apparently he had been vigorously besprinkling her face.

The colour ebbed back to the girl's face. She sat up and gazing piteously into her unknown protector's face at once began her story.

Without reserve she told him everything, how she had been treated at home, how she had determined to seek refuge in flight, how she had been tricked by Caldecott, how she had escaped from the villain's clutches.

"There, sir, is my story," she said in conclusion. "I can only ask of you forgiveness and indulgence. I am friendless, alone, in your hands. I only did what I have just done because my case was so desperate. And yet something in your face tells me that you are not the man to betray the confidence of an absolutely helpless girl."

The young man drew in a long breath. How beautiful the girl was! And what a sad, terrible story was hers! All the romance in his nature leapt up within him.



The next moment she fell forward in a dead faint.

"Miss——"

"Harlow," put in the girl.

"Miss Harlow, I don't know what to say I——" but here came a new interruption. The door opened and a young girl, clad in walking costume and a smart "picture" hat, entered the room.

The young man sprang to meet her.

"Alice!" he cried, with flaming cheeks. "Miss Harlow! My sister!"

The newcomer's astonishment can well be imagined. Her eyes went from her brother to the strange maiden and from her back to the young man again.

"Eric," she said, in a musical, cultured voice, "what is the meaning of this?"

The young man, with eager haste, blurted out the story he had just heard.

With ever-growing astonishment his sister listened. When he had finished she went over to Hazel's side and took her hand.

"We live here alone, my brother and I," she said, "Monteith is our name. You look tired and worn. Will you come and have lunch with us? Then we can talk."

Tears of gratitude and unexpected joy dimmed the lustre of Hazel's blue eyes.

"Oh, if you only knew all that your words mean to me, Miss Monteith," she said with heartfelt gratitude. "I am tired and hungry. A few moments ago I was without hope as well. But now——" words failed her, and Alice Monteith, taking her by the hand led her from the room.

Eric Monteith went to the glass door and gazed out at the house opposite.

"The cur!" he muttered. "I've a good mind to go round with a horsewhip! How beautiful she is! And what a tragic, wonderful story." He turned away, taking the precaution to lock the door leading to the garden. His one desire was to see once more the girl whom fate had so miraculously thrown in his path.

During lunch Alice and her brother drew fuller details of her history from Hazel's confiding lips.

"And you mean to go on the stage?" queried Alice.

"Yes, to earn my own living. I must, I will! I cannot be a drag to anyone, and I feel that if I am given a chance I can become a good actress." So answered Hazel.

"But this uncle of yours, will you not try to find him out?" queried Eric.

The girl hesitated.

"I do not want to throw myself on anyone's bounty," she answered. "And now I have found so kind and noble a pair of benefactors—I—well perhaps you will advise me instead what I had best do."

Silence followed this speech for a few moments. Then Eric, looking across at his sister's face and reading encouragement there, said:

"We are orphans, Miss Harlow, and possessed of private means. If we can help you——"

"Not with money," broke in Hazel with sudden pleading, "I have enough for my present wants. If only you can recommend me a good, cheap lodging, and show me how I am to set about going on the stage, that is all I want."

"But you have no experience, Miss Harlow!" cried Eric. "How can you hope for any encouragement from a manager."

"I can begin at the bottom of the ladder," answered Hazel bravely. "I have youth and strength in my favour. I am not afraid of work."

Eric was silent. He could not tell this pure minded, innocent girl what was in his heart, of all the terrible trials and dangers that lay before her even were she to begin at "the bottom of the ladder."

He knew, as did his sister, all the sordid pettinesses and tribulations that must lie in the path of such a débutante as Hazel.

To think of this lovely girl tempting fortune upon the thorny road that led to theatrical pre-eminence almost made him give voice to the tumult of apprehension that surged up in his brain.

Yet a glance at the strong, pure face told him how futile would any argument of his against her plans be.

In the fancied security of that spacious London dining-room — and to look at Hazel was to believe that she must somehow, notwithstanding her early environment, have been born for higher things than the obscurity of Harlow Farm—she seemed to have already forgotten Horace Caldecott. Little did she know, poor girl, of the depth of that villain's resources.

"I cannot trespass on your hospitality for long," she said at last. "If only you will add to the debt of gratitude I already owe you, and put me in the way of finding a reliable lodging, and how then to set about embarking in theatrical life, well—I can't say all that my heart would have of thankfulness."

"If your mind is made up, Miss Harlow," answered Eric impetuously, "and nothing that we can say will dissuade you from your purpose, we shall be only too proud to help you. We will this afternoon take you to reliable and cheap lodgings. To-morrow I will, if you will allow me, wait upon you and escort you to one of the best known of the theatrical agents, Mark Danvers. He will enter your name on his books, for a fee, and will let you know whether he hears of a rôle for you. But I warn you, your inexperience will be a great hindrance to you. And at the best you will have to content yourself with a subordinate position in a travelling company." He hesitated, unwilling to betray more of the repugnance he felt in thus giving her advice.

But Hazel's face was radiant.

"Oh, thank you! thank you!" she cried, and the look she gave the young man, only fired his impressionable heart the more. As for Alice her heart grew sad within her. It was impossible to gaze upon the lovely countenance of the girl, and not say: "Oh, the pity of it, the pity of it!"

After lunch the would-be actress was all impatience to be gone. So unsophisticated, so artless was she that her one idea now was to show these two young Samaritans her gratitude by ridding them of the fancied encumbrance—herself.

At last Eric realised that further procrastination was rendered impossible.

With something like a sigh he rose from his seat.

"Shall we accompany Miss Harlow to Mrs. Bryant's?" he said to his sister.

Alice nodded.

"But first," Eric said warningly, "let me see if the coast is clear. Describe this man, Caldecott, to me, Miss Harlow, please," he asked

A shadow crossed Hazel's face, and something like a shudder ran through her frame. In short, succinct terms she painted her hated lover's picture.

Eric went across to the door. "Stay here," he urged, "and I will go and look in the street to see whether the coast be clear."

He turned and as he did so he realised that the girl who had flown to his house for refuge from the villain who had entrapped her, had stolen his heart.

If ever there was a case of "love at first sight," it was his. And instead of being able to tell her his love, he must let her go from him without a word, out into the cruel world to face heaven alone knew what terrible dangers and ordeals.

Could he do that? No never. It could never be that she had flashed meteor-like in all her radiant beauty across his path, merely to disappear into the unknown. No, that should never be, while strength and money were his.

So thinking he opened the street door and gazed down and up the practically deserted street, only a few people were about; no one to answer the description of Horace Caldecott, only an unkempt tramp limping along the pavement, a ragged unkempt mortal who gazed furtively up into the young man's face with hungry eyes.

Eric went back.

"The coast is clear!" he said somewhat gloomily, "Let us go."

And so the three set out to seek a haven with Mrs. Bryant, a motherly soul, and at one time a servant to the Monteiths.

Neither of the trio cast another glance at the unkempt tramp that Eric's careless eyes had lighted upon a few moments before.

They didn't see the wolfish gleam that came from his black eyes, or notice the fact that he shambled along some twenty or thirty paces in their wake.

Thus ends Hazel Harlow's first adventure in her desire for emancipation from her cruel home ties. She is now about to embark on the first stage of becoming an actress. A thrilling adventure was to be hers in this first plunge into the unknown. What this was will be related in next week's Short Stories, under the name of: "A Devil's Lure."

The Disappearance of Mr. Mortimer Howard.

THE little town of Lidford was shaken by the news.

It created a profound sensation there. The war, the election of a Board of Guardian for the district, and every other topic, local and general, was thrust into the background for the time being.

Nothing else was talked about but the disappearance of Mr. Mortimer Howard, a prominent figure in those parts, and a man who was at the head and tail of everything that went on in the place.

The local journals were full of this all-absorbing affair, and in the next few days brief reports of the case found their way into the London papers.

From the meagre details published I learned that Mr. Howard and two companions had gone out duck-shooting on the fatal afternoon.

Lidford is situated near the mouth of a tidal river, and the party had crossed in a small boat to the marshy flats on the opposite shore, where wild fowl of all sorts are plentiful.

In coming back, late in the evening, the boat was upset in some unaccountable manner and the whole three thrown into the water.

Mr. Howard's two companions managed to save themselves by clinging on to the little craft, as it floated bottom upwards, but nothing more was seen of the unfortunate gentleman himself.

That was all I knew of the case so far; and it was taken for granted, of course, that Mr. Mortimer Howard, not having succeeded in getting a hold on the boat, had gone under while his companions were still struggling for their lives.

I was destined, however, to hear more of the affair very soon, and to put this theory to test.

Some few weeks later a friend of mine named Hallowes, who was connected with one of the big insurance companies in the city, called upon me late in the evening.

He was an uncommonly smart fellow in his own particular line, and though rather young for the post his directors had recently made him an inspector. I found that he had some very interesting things to tell me.

"You've heard of this boating accident up north?" he said, as he sat down.

"Which one was that?" I asked.

"Why the one in which Mr. Mortimer Howard was supposed to have lost his life."

"Supposed?" I questioned. "I thought there was no doubt about it, one way or the other."

"Ah, but there is, and a very considerable doubt too," he answered. "That is precisely what has brought me here."

"Your people are interested in this matter, then?"

"They are; to the tune of three thousands or so."

"His life was insured for that amount?"

"With us—yes."

"Recently."

"Within the past twelve months."

This was getting interesting. On the face of it, it looked a bit fishy that a man who had effected a heavy insurance upon his life should meet with a fatal accident so soon afterwards.

"We are not the only office likely to suffer," Hallowes went on. "Between ourselves, several of the smaller companies have been rather hard hit, for it turns out that Mr. Mortimer Howard had taken out policies—accident and otherwise—in every direction. Most of the other offices have paid up already and tried to look pleasant over it, but our directors are inclined to kick."

"On what grounds?"

"Well, we have been looking into matters a bit, and making careful inquiries on our own account. This Mr. Howard, you must understand, had the reputation of being wealthy, which, at first sight, seems to be borne out by actual facts. But there are ugly rumours afloat as to money-lender's claims, gambling debts, and goodness knows what. It is said that he was given to dabbling in stocks and shares, and with outside brokers too. You know what leeches they are. When once a man gets into their hands, you may be sure they will drain him pretty dry before they are done with him."

"You think, then——?" I began.

"I think nothing," Hallowes hastened to interpose. "I have no facts to go upon yet. The whole circumstances of the case, however, justify our people in holding back payment for the present, until the matter is thoroughly sifted."

"There were two others with Mr. Howard at the time, I understand. Do you know who they were?"

"One was a relative of his, a certain Mr. Henshaw, who had been staying with him for some time past. This Henshaw is an American, or at least he has spent a good many years out there, quite long enough to pick up all the Yankee ways. It was from him we got an account of the accident. He states that they were making for a point some distance below Lidford, for the tide was running out like a mill-race at the time, and they found that they could make little headway against it. Just as they were within a stone's-throw of the shore, the other man, a young fellow called Goddard, jumped up to take a shot at something overhead. In doing so he lost his balance and upset the boat. Henshaw and Goddard, as you may have heard, saved themselves by clinging on to the keel. When they succeeded in righting the boat, which they did with very great difficulty, Howard had disappeared. The only trace they could find of him was his hat, which was drifting down with the tide."

"Adventures of an Actress" begin to-day.

"And this man Goddard?" I asked.

"Ah, that's exactly where the rub comes in," replied Hallowes. "If there is any trickery in this business, I could well understand that Howard and Henshaw were acting in collusion. But with Goddard the case is entirely different. It seems that he was quite a casual acquaintance of theirs. He came to Lidford a few weeks before as a total stranger, and put up at one of the smaller hotels. Being fond of sport, he spent most of his time prowling about the flats with his gun. It was there the other two first ran across him. They got into conversation with him and took him in tow for the rest of the day. It was arranged that he should accompany them on the afternoon in question, and he confirms Henshaw's story as to what happened on the way back in every particular. Altogether, I foresee that Goddard is the rock upon which our case will spit."

"And what steps do you propose to take?"

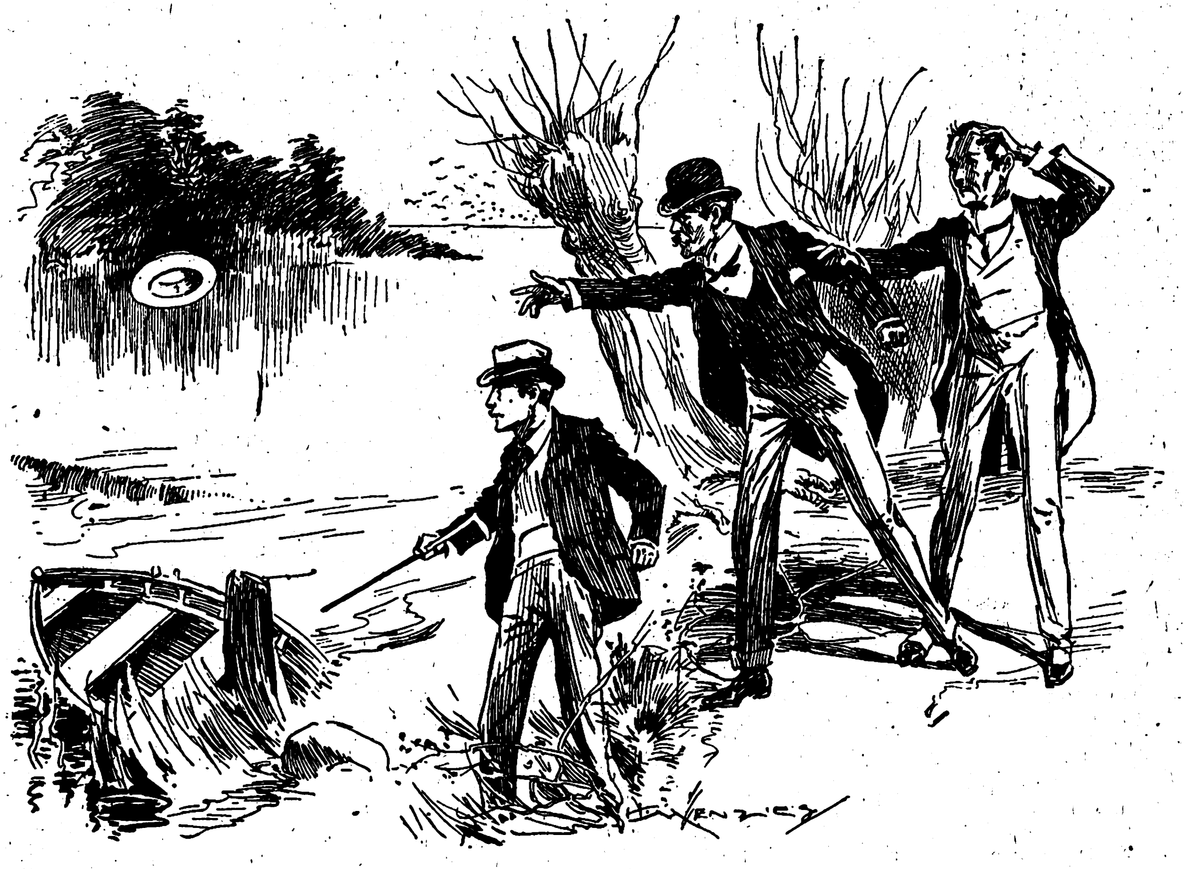
"The directors have put the whole thing into my hands. I am to go down and look into the matter carefully on the spot. Now, as I have never tackled an investigation of this kind before, I feel I might possibly miss some little vital point, which anyone with more experience would see the importance of and pounce upon at once. That's what brought me to you. If you could accompany me——"

"I'm your man," I said, cutting him short, for a nice little problem of this kind didn't often come my way.

"You see," he continued, "it's a rare chance for me, and I want to make the most of it. Our people wouldn't mind stumping up in the least if all was plain and straight sailing. It's the thought of being possibly swindled that sticks in them. And if it should really prove to be a case of fraud, and I prevent them from being fleeced of these few thousands, they'd think more of it than if I saved them three times the amount in any other way."

Early next morning we set out for Lidford together, and arrived there late in the afternoon.

Our first step was to seek an interview with Henshaw, who, it appears, was one of Mr. Howard's executors, and



I stepped forward quickly, plucked the hat from his head, and sent it skimming out into the water.

Tell your best friends about our new series.

as such had been entrusted with the winding-up of the estate.

We found him an uncommonly hard nut to crack.

A shrewd, wide-awake Yankee, he was not at all the kind of man to make a slip or to give himself away. He seemed to take it quite as a matter of course that the insurance company should wish to satisfy themselves on all points, but evidently regarded it as a foregone conclusion that they would have to pay out in the end.

Though ready enough to answer any questions put to him, he stopped short at that. He did not appear to consider that he was called upon to volunteer any information of his own accord. It was for us to find out all the particulars we wished to know; his part was merely to reply to our inquiries. That was the attitude he took.

At Hallowes' request he accompanied us down the Strand, and pointed out the exact spot where the accident had occurred. The tide was on the ebb at the time. In near the shore the water was very deep and sluggish, but a little further out I could see that the current was exceptionally powerful. It raced past us with the speed of a galloping horse.

"A strong tide, that," remarked Hallowes, as we stood looking out over the broad river.

"You might well say so," Henshaw returned, in his dry way, "if you were pitched head-foremost into it."

"You had not reached the slack water, then, when the accident happened?" I put in.

"Not quite," he replied. "Almost, but not quite."

"And you saw nothing of Mr. Howard after the boat was upset?"

"Not a trace."

"The body was never recovered, I believe?"

"It was not," he admitted.

"But you had the river dragged, hadn't you?" I asked.

"For days," he answered.

"With no success?"

"None."

I was silent for a moment; and then tackled him again on the same point.

"How do you account for that?" I asked.

For answer he simply raised his hand and pointed with his fore-finger towards the rushing, foaming current.

"If you were dropped in there, my friend," he said, turning to me in rather a grim manner, "with such a tide as that running at the time, the best place to look for you next morning would be a dozen miles or so out to sea."

This seemed reasonable, although I did not at all like his way of putting it. Still, there was one other point.

"And the hat?" I asked.

"The hat," he replied, selecting a cigar from his case and coolly nipping off the end with his teeth, "was tossed out of the current a little lower down."

"Would you mind pointing out the exact point?"

He looked as if he thought he had had quite enough of this cross-examination; but still he complied.

We strolled along until we came to a big round boulder close to the water's edge, on reaching which Henshaw paused and proceeded to light his cigar in a very leisurely manner.

"There," he said, as he jerked the stump of the match into the water, "we found the hat floating down there, not twenty yards from where we're standing at the moment."

I had my eyes on him at the time, and, slight as it was, I saw him give a palpable start. A very odd look came into his face for a moment; he took the cigar from his mouth, whisked right round, and glanced up at the sky.

"I guess," he said, "it looks like rain, gentleman. If you've no more questions to ask, I think I'll be getting back."

"Yes, it certainly does seem as if we were in for a smart shower," replied Hallowes, cocking his eye towards the sky, and utterly thrown off the scent by the cuteness of the Yankee.

But, clever as he was, our friend Henshaw hadn't taken me in quite so easily.

"Oh, no, my fine sir," I said to myself, "it isn't the thought of rain that troubles you. That's not what made you start just now. You're playing a deep game; but like many another in your place you've made some little mistake and suddenly become aware of it in the last minute or so."

Though now thoroughly convinced that there was trickery at the bottom of Mr. Mortimer Howard's disappearance, I didn't want Henshaw to see that I suspected anything of the kind, and so turned away from the spot with the most careless and most indifferent air I could assume.

But my mind was hard at work as we strolled back along the beach. I felt that I was on the brink of some startling and amazing discovery.

It was with the greatest reluctance that I moved away. Something seemed to be dragging me back to that boulder.

What had made Henshaw start as we stood there together? What had been revealed to him, which was as yet hidden from us?

My two companions were now chatting in the most friendly manner, and Henshaw seemed to have lost all apprehensions regarding the rain. As for me, I was chafing inwardly, fuming with impatience to return to that spot alone. At last I could stand it no longer; and trumping up some excuse about having to write an important letter, I told Hallowes that I would hurry on ahead.

"Oh, hold hard!" he cried out, as he saw me start off. "There's no great hurry. You'll have plenty of time when we get back."

The blind dolt! I could have punched his head. But I took no notice of his bawling and hurried away, until I got round a corner out of sight. The moment I did so I scrambled up the bank to the high ground above, and bending low down so that the two others should not catch a glimpse of me, doubled back for all I was worth.

When I reached the boulder, I sat down on the beach close to it, took my head in my hands, and did some hard thinking. I went over the whole ground again, weighed every point, tried to put myself in Henshaw's place and to imagine what had caused him to start in that manner. That it had something to do with the hat I felt convinced. But what?

Beautiful Hazel Harlow will interest you deeply.

For the best part of an hour I suppose I sat there racking my brains. But nothing came of it. I was baffled!

Very sore at finding myself foiled in this manner, I felt the necessity of relieving my feelings in some way. Stretching out my hand I picked up a splinter of wood which was lying beside me.

"Dash it!" I muttered, with pure vexation, and I hurled the splinter into the water as if I had a personal grudge against the river and all belonging to it.

My eyes followed the piece of wood as it fell upon the surface, and drifted slowly away.

And then—and then—well, the next second I had bounded to my feet with a regular whoop of triumph. I had made a most singular, a most interesting discovery. Oh, yes, I saw it all now! I knew why Henshaw had started when he chucked the stump of his match into the water!

I hurried back to our hotel, where I found Hallowes hunting high and low for me.

"Where on earth have you been?" he asked as I entered.

"Never mind now," I answered. "We've got something else to think of. You must contrive to cajole our friend Henshaw into accompanying us to the same spot to-morrow afternoon."

"Do you think we are likely to get anything more out of him?"

"I shouldn't be surprised."

When Hallowes approached him next day, however, Henshaw's mood had quite changed. He had turned uncommonly rusty since we last saw him.

He was inclined to bluster a bit, said that he had no time to waste in fooling around in this way; but as he couldn't very well get out of it, he came along with us in the end.

On reaching the boulder I let Hallowes smooth him down a bit by putting a few trivial and unimportant questions, and then quietly chipped in myself.

"By the way, Mr. Henshaw," I said, "I understood you to say it was just here you picked up the hat?"

"Yes, right here," he returned.

"And it was floating down with the tide, wasn't it?"

He shot a keen, searching glance at me, but I bore it well.

"Yes," he answered, boldly.

I stepped forward quickly, plucked the hat from his head, and sent it skimming out into the water.

"Look!" I cried, pointing to it as it settled on the surface and began to drift away—not down the stream but up.

He did look; and his jaw dropped. One glance was enough to show him that the game was up. With a fierce oath he turned upon me and his hand went like a flash towards his hip pocket. But I was too quick for him, and let him have my fist between the eyes before he could draw his six-shooter. As he went down I sprang upon him and soon had him unarmed.

All this time Hallowes stood stock still, gazing stupidly at the hat as if he could scarcely believe his eyes.

"What—what does it mean?" he gasped, when I had finished with Henshaw.

"Why," I said, "the explanation of it is simple enough. Just here, as is often the case in tidal rivers, there is a strong counter current close to the shore, so that things drift in the opposite directions to which the tide is running at the time. Our friend here became aware of this interesting fact when he threw the stump of a match into the water yesterday. A little later on I discovered it by pure accident in much the same way."

* * * * *

Well, as I had suspected from the moment I laid eyes on Henshaw, the whole thing turned out to be a very clever attempt at fraud. Mr. Mortimer Howard was no more dead than Henshaw himself or any of the rest of us.

It came out afterwards that he was miles away at the time the boat was supposed to be upset.

It appears that, finding himself heavily involved, and knowing that a crash was bound to come sooner or later, he made known the state of the case to the wily Henshaw.

The latter immediately suggested that he should disappear in some manner which would afford strong presumptive evidence of his having met with a fatal accident.

Then, when the insurance money had been raked in, he could start afresh in some other part of the world. Between them they hit upon the idea of a bogus boating accident. But there was one little drawback. They wanted an independent witness, and didn't know exactly where to find one.

Chance very soon threw the very man in their way. One day, when they were out shooting together, they ran across Goddard.

This young gentleman was a sporting character, who had lost pretty heavily on the turf, and got himself into a bit of a pickle in consequence. Henshaw had known him in former years, and had some sort of hold over him.

But apart from that, Goddard was quite ready to assist them in their plans if he could fill his pockets by doing so.

Fifty pounds down, with the promise of a few hundred when the insurance money was all paid, squared him quickly enough.

When they rowed across the river that afternoon, on pretence of going duck-shooting, the missing man was landed on the opposite shore. It was arranged that he should make his way to the nearest seaport in disguise, embark for America, and lie low there until Henshaw joined him with the insurance money.

The two others waited about till the evening and then rowed back, with Howard's hat lying in the bottom of the boat. The rest was easy enough to manage.

Henshaw, even though he had given himself away when he tried to draw upon me, did his best to brazen the thing out afterwards. When he was arrested, he was full of bluff and bluster, and kept up the farce right to the end.

Goddard, however, who was laid by the heels in a different part of the country, proved to be a very poor-spirited sort of individual, and caved in at once. He wasn't an hour in custody before he had disclosed the whole plot!

Detectives were sent out to the States, and Mr. Mortimer Howard was eventually landed once more in his native land. The whole three subsequently met with their deserts at the hands of a judge and jury.

IN SOUTH AFRICA.

A True Story of the War.

THERE was a pit-a-pat of footsteps outside the ramshackle farmhouse. A child flung himself through the open door, sank into a chair, and began to beat his little fists upon the clothless table in an ecstasy of fear.

"The yellow men, granny, the yellow men," he wailed. "I have looked through the long glass, and I have seen them all coming, thousands and thousands of them, and they will kill us all, and burn the house. Jan's farm by the river is all burning; and the yellow men have crossed the water. Oh, granny what shall we do?"

And the boy's voice died away in a falsetto shriek.

It was a square, bare room, rather large, but very low ceilinged. The tattered blinds were drawn down, to keep out the fierce glare of the South African sun, and the atmosphere in the room was very heavy and hard to breathe.

On a hard, shiny surfaced sofa, of the sort common in poor houses in London, lay another child, half covered with a rug. Her cheeks were wofully drawn, and she was obviously in a state of high fever. An old woman with a hungry face sat motionless by the side of the little girl and stared across the room at the wailing boy. In her hand was a Bible, kept open by a bony finger between the leaves, and the book was open at the story of the rout of the Philistines by Joshua.

For a month, save for a visit of the mercenaries, the old woman in the tumble-down farm had been quite cut off from the outside world. All the men had long since gone from the district, and the rumours of the oncoming English, whom report credited with killing all they found, had sent those women and children who stayed behind flying to the east.

But the old woman had nowhere to fly to. Her only son was fighting; she had no friends or relations, and there was nothing to do but to wait on with the children and trust blindly to Providence.

In the morning there had been loud firing not far from the house, and dull firing that seemed to come from miles away. Then, about midday, the nearer firing had ceased, and presently a great rust-bitten gun, its snout jerking spasmodically heavenwards as it lumbered behind a team of oxen, had been dragged past.

All through the afternoon unkempt, haggard men had hurried past on stumbling ponies, and hour after hour the old woman had watched the flying army, praising Heaven, as band after band disappeared over the edge of the hill, that they did not stop to take the few morsels of biscuit that were left for the children.

For the last hour or two there had been no more fugitives, and the old woman had gone back to sit with her bible by the dying child.

She was not quite sure of what was likely to happen till the boy had run in with the news of the yellow men's approach, but she felt quite certain that somewhere in the region of the firing had been her son.

It never crossed her mind that he might have been in this particular fight. All that she knew of war she had got from her bible, and as in those days one nation had always gone up against another, so now she imagined that the present fighting was being conducted on the same lines.

So she was racked with doubt as the ragged army of burghers trailed past the farm. Would not her son, if he had been flying among them, have stopped and sought shelter with her?

There was the cellar dug out beneath the living room, and he knew of that, for had he not dug it out himself? Or would he have been compelled to rush on with the others to fight again somewhere else?

The old woman could not conceive that that was possible, for her bible knowledge of fighting told her that when one side was made to fly all was over with that side, and it was best to hide, for the conquerors had set themselves to the killing of the conquered. It must be, then, that he was wounded or perhaps dead somewhere, where the cannons had been firing all day. She decided that presently she would go out and look for him. She would take with her the little bottle of gin that had been saved after the party given to the field cornet.

The little boy at the table wailed on, and the hungry old woman felt the burning fingers of the fever-stricken little girl on her wrists. She could not bring herself to feel much sympathy for the children, for her heart was all with her son, who was fighting, and after all, she had given them the biscuits and gone hungry herself.

There was no noise outside now, save the industrious hum of the bees. She held her hand to ear, hoping against hope that she would not hear the oncoming of the victorious army. At last she made out the sound of a horse's hoofs—one horse only it seemed. They came nearer quickly, and then the figure of a mounted man rushed into the view that the open door commanded.

She saw the man scramble from his steaming horse and strike it heavily with the butt of his rifle, so that it flung up its head and galloped away. Then he staggered in through the door, wiping the dust from his eyes with his ragged sleeve.

"My son my son!" screamed the old woman tottering to her feet. "Oh, I was sure you would come; I was sure of it."

The man stopped her speech with a gesture.

"Quick, the crowbar," he whispered hoarsely. "I must get down into the cellar; they're close after me, mother, very close."

He snatched the heavy bar that she had brought laboriously from a corner, and began to prise the thin end into a broad crevice at the side of the hearthstone.

"Keep the children quiet," he muttered, elbowing away the excited little boy at his coat tails; "if they catch me, mother, it's certain death—certain death."

When the stone had been raised a few inches it turned back easily on hinges, and he scrambled down a ladder.

"Remember, mother, it's death if I'm found; push the table over the trap, sit by it, and keep the children's mouths closed."

Then he disappeared.

The table was only just pushed into place in time. The old woman sat down by it and took up her Bible again. She stared vacantly at the troopers in dirty khaki who stalked into the room.

"The yellow men, the yellow men!" screamed the little boy, running behind the shelter of the table.

The manner of the sergeant was sharp and harsh.

"Now, then, old woman, you've got a man hiding here; it's no use lying; we saw him come in. Out with him."

He spoke in excellent Dutch; he was, in fact, a Volunteer from the Cape, and owned a grandfather who hailed from Amsterdam.

"There is no one here, sir," she answered quietly; "no one here but myself and the children, and one of them, you see, is very ill; and you would not wish to make her worse, surely?"

The man's voice softened a little.

"Of course not, my good woman; but you've a man hiding here who fired under a white flag, and we've got to have him. Search the house, men, as quietly as you can."

The sergeant sat down nursing an arm that was roughly strapped to him with a piece sacking. As his eye roved round the room he noticed the boy, and stared at him curiously, as if trying to recall some memory.

The search did not last long. The men were colonials who knew the ways of the country, and the fissure at the side of the hearthstone was soon noted.

"He's down there, sergeant," said a young man pointing with the but of his Lee-Enfield beneath the table: "we'll have to be careful, though; he'll be armed."

There was a parley of ten minutes, while the nozzles of half a dozen rifles were poked into the aperture beneath the slightly raised hearthstone.

At last an unseen hand thrust out a Mauser, and in another moment the Boer stood before them.

"Why, it's you, Williams, is it?" he said in hesitating English, staring at the sergeant. "If I'd known I wouldn't have fired."

"Why, who are you?" The sergeant's eyes were puzzled, and he faltered.

Then the little boy ran from behind the table and gripped his father's knee.

"You won't kill my father, I know," he said, pleadingly, and at the voice the sergeant turned pale. "Nelly's voice and Nelly's eyes!" he murmured.

"Yes, and Nelly's boy," said the Boer. "I'm your brother-in-law, Williams, and I wouldn't have fired on you if I'd known, as I say. Your sister's dead, you know."

Then the sergeant's men displayed a tact that was hardly to be expected from mere troopers. They made hurriedly for the door, and in a moment the sergeant was alone with his relations.

* * * * *

"I hope that you will agree with me that I did right, boys," said the sergeant fastening the Mauser that he had taken from his brother-in-law across the saddle bow. "After all, 'twas me that he hit, and the kiddies are my own sister's kiddies. Besides I don't believe that he quite knew what he was doing. I've given 'em that tin of bully beef I had. They were nigh starving; d'you mind that?"

As an answer the troopers swung into their saddles, and in five minutes the little band had disappeared over the crest of the hill.

THE DIAMOND SERPENT.

THE ordeal was over.

He had proposed, and she had said "yes," and now she nestled against his heart folded in his strong arms, looking into his eyes with a face radiant with happiness.

"You think you will never regret this day, Hortense?" he asked softly, "you know that I am credited with possessing a brute of a temper, dearie; I know myself that it is short, that I am stern determined and unrelenting, though it is so, believe me, only when wrong has been done me or mine."

She said she never should regret that day, and catching his face between her small hands looked right into his eyes.

"Your temper, my Louis, shall never be aroused by me," she went on. "I believe it is strong; an outburst would scare me almost to death."

"Poor little girl," he said, "I am afraid of it myself sometimes. But I will keep a strong hand on it, for your sake."

They kissed again, and then she kissed with joy and many times the diamond band he had just placed on her finger.

"You love diamonds," he remarked, watching her.

"Not more than I love you, Louis," colouring deeply. "It is not because they are diamonds that I hug them to me, but because you gave me this ring, because it means so much to us. I suppose every woman likes diamonds, all jewels in fact, more or less, and after all, diamonds are so beautiful it would seem strange if they did not. And they make woman look still more beautiful herself, don't you think so, Louis?"

He did; and she sighed.

"Now, look at Mrs. Gordon West," she continued, "I don't think she would be half so fascinating stripped of her diamonds—and particularly of her diamond serpent—that lovely brooch! I almost envy her for that alone."

"I did not know she was at all fascinating either with or without her jewels," Louis said.

"You never thought so, once? Why, do you know, people said, and maybe are saying now, they were certain you were in love with her. They have told me so and I——"

He held her more tightly in his arms.

"People say many silly things," he answered; "I should no more dream of marrying Mrs. Gordon West, than flying to the moon. She is rich, she may be good-looking, from the world's point of view it might have been a splendid match for me. I have been told so; but then, I am not absolutely poverty-stricken, and beyond, well, I just simply loved you."

Hortense sighed contentedly, as only a woman sighs when she is perfectly happy. She felt a great pity in her heart for Mrs. Gordon West, who had even confided to her her admiration for the rising young Doctor Louis Kellner, together with all her hopes and aspirations.

* * * * *

The news of the engagement between Louis Kellner and Hortense Maydew travelled quickly, and Mrs. Gordon West was among the first to learn it. How she deported herself in the privacy of her boudoir is a secret well-guarded from the world at large. Certainly no effects were apparent when she appeared in her box at the Opera in the evening. Youthful and radiantly happy as ever she looked, and the extra brilliancy of her eyes almost counterbalanced the absence of the famous serpent brooch from her breast.

"I hope she will be happy," she confided to her dear friend, Mrs. Ethel Graveson. "She ought to be, it's a brilliant match for her. They are very poor, you know, the Maydews and she had nothing but a lengthy lineage to recommend her."

"Some think her beautiful," Mrs. Graveson remarked.

"Yes," the other drawled. "Personally I, too, am with them, and I can only suppose it is for that Mr. Kellner is marrying her."

"Yet he has told me that he looks beyond the skin for qualities in a woman."

"Few men look so far when they fall in love," said Mrs. Gordon West. "But I am afraid she won't be all so happy as I would wish every married couple to be," she continued, "he is young, clever, handsome, by no means poor, but——"

"You would say he has a temper?"

"Just so. At least, I have heard so, how the report originated though I don't know. Still, looking at his face in repose he is hard and cruel, and determined. In his wrath he must be terrible to encounter."

"And yet I heard you were—well not impartial to him."

Mrs. Gordon West laughed lightly.

"It is strange how these reports gain ground," she remarked.

* * * * *

"A diamond serpent brooch?" said the shopman. "Certainly, we can make it and to any price you like. Something like this £250, or this £5. I need not explain thereon, or difference in value."

Louis Kellner chose the £250 article.

"It will take some time to make," the man explained.

"Ah, that is sold?"

"Well, it belongs to Mrs. Gordon West, she sent it to have a facsimile made in paste. This is the facsimile."

The doctor took them and examined the pair curiously.

"Well, one could hardly tell the real from the unreal," he remarked, handing them back. "By the bye, the tail here turns down from the head; in mine you will make it turn up."

Wentworth House was a blaze of light and life. All fashionable London was there, for not to be in town and not recorded in the newspaper chatter as being amongst the guests of Mrs. Gordon West's functions was to be indeed counted out of society.

This was one of the balls of the season and naturally amongst those invited were Hortense Maydew and Dr. Kellner.

Beautiful Hazel Harlow will interest you deeply.

The Doctor was to have called for his fiancée and take her on to the dance, but as the time passed and he came not, Hortense set out alone with her Aunt.

"I suppose," she said with a sigh of regret; "some unexpected professional call has detained him."

She was however, mistaken in her surmise. Louis Kellner had failed to keep the appointment for quite a different reason.

This was the day for which the diamond brooch had been faithfully promised. It had not however, been delivered in the afternoon; and the Doctor's servant calling at the jewellers to learn the cause of the delay was informed that the diamond setter especially engaged on this piece of work, had at the eleventh hour, been taken suddenly ill. But another workman was now busy on the brooch, and it would certainly be ready in the evening.

The Doctor was annoyed. He had particularly set his heart upon presenting the brooch to Hortense to wear at the ball that night, and as the time sped by beyond the hour for which it was promised and approached the moment when he should set out to call for Hortense, he grew the more impatient.

And it was not till well past the moment that the messenger arrived with it, to incur in the final few seconds the righteous wrath of the doctor, which was however, delivered at the firm and not the individual.

Consequently he arrived late at Wentworth House—a full half hour after the dancing had begun, and it was not until they were sitting out the sixth dance that he had an opportunity of explaining to Hortense the reason of the delay and pinning the diamond serpent in the neck of her dress.

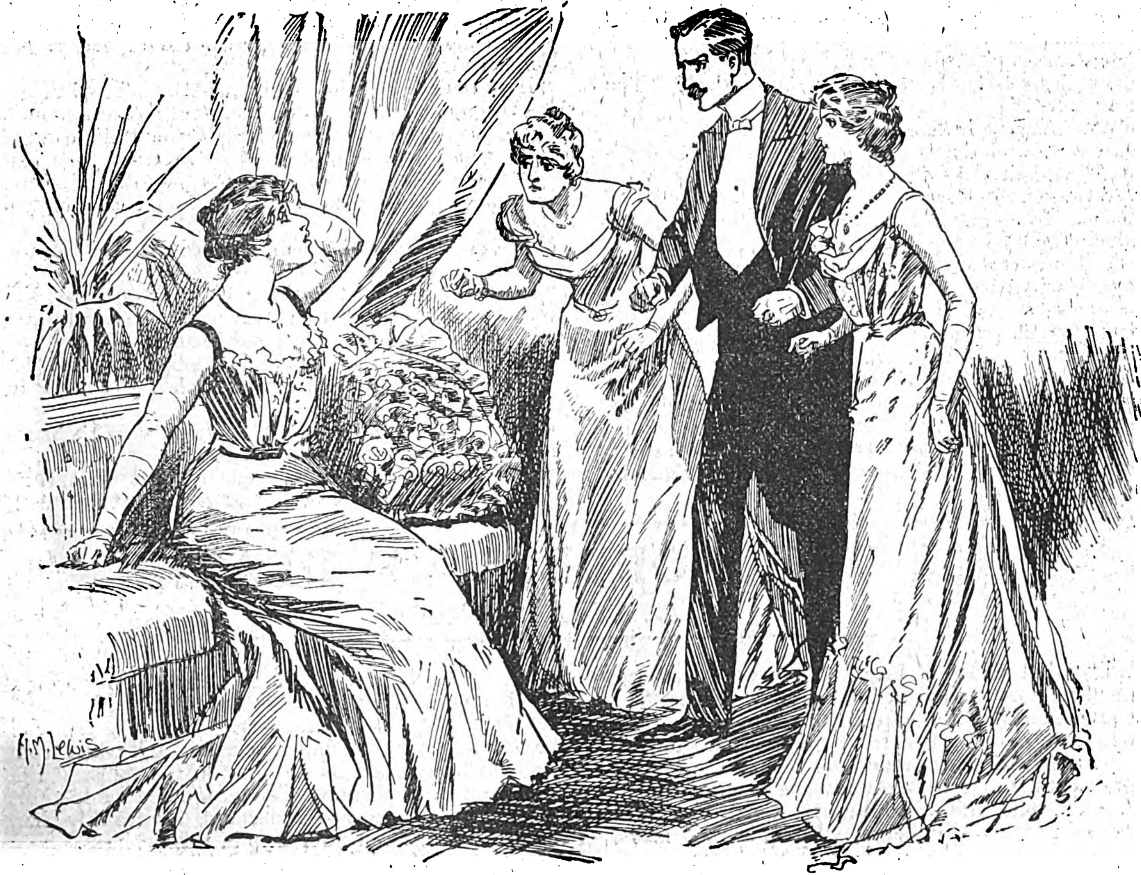
They were in the conservatory at the time, and the plashing of the fountain mingled with the sweet softness of the music from the ball-room, combined to increase the delight and happiness of Hortense engendered by the unexpected gift of so beautiful a present.

She thanked her lover with a kiss, and he drew her head on to his shoulder.

As he did so his eye caught sight of the glitter of something in the dark coils of her coiffure, but he concluded that it came from a deftly hidden comb and therefore remarked not thereon.

It was just as they had risen to return to the ball-room that Mrs. Graveson approached them. She was agitated and flushed with excitement.

"What do you think has happened?" she asked breathlessly. "Mrs. Gordon West has lost her diamond



With a cry of mingled rage and pain she sank on the seat.

brooch—the famous serpent you know. She forgot to pin it in when she came down and left it on the table in her boudoir. She tells me she saw it there when you went up to her Miss Maydew, and since you came down together it has disappeared. Her maid declares that no one has since entered the room."

Hortense clutched at the brooch at her throat and went deadly pale.

"This," she said, "is a present from Louis, from Dr. Kellner," she exclaimed; "he has just given it to me," for Mrs. Graveson was regarding the brooch with suspicion.

"Has Mrs. West told anyone but you of her loss?" the Doctor asked coolly, speaking to Mrs. Graveson.

"Yes, she is very much upset. You know how impetuous she is. Of course, all her guests are alert and suspicious, but she has communicated with the police."

"Ask her quietly to come to me," the Doctor said, "if you will be so kind."

Mrs. Graveson went in search of her hostess, and the Doctor turned to his fiancée.

"Tell me why you went to Mrs. West's boudoir," he said.

"It was her wish. She did not come down until many of the guests had arrived. She had a headache and wished particularly for my salts—the ones you make me up, you know. And——"

"While you were sitting there, she said your hair was slightly disarranged, and rose to restore it?" Doctor Kellner continued.

The girl was agitated.

'Good heavens! How do you know that? You were not here!"

"Just bend your head a moment, dear."

She did so and the Doctor put his fingers into the coils of her hair. As she raised her eyes Mrs. West entered the conservatory.

She was full of her loss, and in a temper. She examined the brooch the Doctor had just given Hortense and in her first breath declared it was hers, but when he pointed out that the serpent's tail twisted up from the head she was satisfied.

"But how did you know the tail of my brooch turned the other way?" she inquired.

"I have observed it very closely," the Doctor answered, "on occasions when it has bedecked your throat. I am sincerely sorry at your loss," he went on, "I understand you have communicated with the police. What do you propose to do? Is there anyone amongst your guests whom you suspect?"

Mrs. Gordon West refused to say.

"But no doubt everyone would rather you did," he asserted.

"They would all be willing to be searched." There was a ring of sarcasm in his voice.

"That is impossible," Mrs. Gorden West exclaimed. "I could not ask them."

"If you will permit me I will suggest it," he continued, "that is, if you think it necessary."

Mrs Gordon West trembled and hesitated.

"Still," he pursued, "I do not think it will be necessary. Miss Maydew was the last person with you in your boudoir she informs me, and you can I suppose rely upon the word of your maid that since you left no one has entered?"

"Implicitly."

"Then it remains only for Miss Maydew to be searched," his lips were tightly pressed and his eyes blazed.

"It shall be done in that ball room if you prefer, or here. Still, ere we submit her to this degradation let me ask you to search first and make sure you have lost your brooch; let me suggest that you search first in your coiffure there," and he touched her hair with his hand.

Her hand flew to her head. The pin or diamond brooch scratched her fingers, and with a cry of mingled rage and pain she sank on the seat, with the brooch in her hand, her face deathly white.

"If you had lost it, it would not have mattered much, since the gems are but paste. You were not sure enough even of so foolish and so dastardly a trick coming out as you would have desired it, to trust your real gems for a few moments in my fiancée's coiffure. They might have been lost, eh?" and he laughed bitterly.

Hortense clung to his arm and stared at Mrs. Gordon West in amazement.

"Into the motive of this thing it is unnecessary to go here," he said, "only you in your heart know why you would have publicly degraded my affianced wife."

Mrs. Gordon West gasped and clutched his hand.

"You will not?" she breathed with a great fear in her eyes.

He shook off her hold, wiped his hand with his handkerchief and passed into the ball-room.

And the guests were relieved to learn that their hostess had found her brooch, had never lost it in fact.

KALI, THE GODDESS OF DEATH.

By TRISTAM K. MONKE.

The little hill village of Begra, as everyone is aware, is a small military station midway between Naince Tol, in the Oude, and Khatmandoo in the Nepaul.

It was there I met Cyril Vere, a captain in the Punjaub Infantry, and with him, undertook one of the rashest expeditions it has ever been my fortune to enter upon.

Tall, handsome almost to beauty, Cyril Vere was counted a lucky man in Begra, where his good looks, wealth, the possession of a simple iron cross "for valour" and his rich baritone voice, carried the day with the European ladies.

"Tristam," he exclaimed one evening, as he and I sat together in his bungalow, "I have decided to go on a somewhat peculiar expedition—care to come?"

"Tigers?" I queried tentatively.

"No!" he replied laughing, selecting a Havana from a box which lay open beside him, on the table. "I'm sick to death of the brutes. The mess dared me to-night to do what I am about to undertake, and frankly Tris, I should be obliged for your help in this business."

"And what is it?"

"Didn't you hear what Chrichton said. Oh, of course, you were not at mess to-night! With the Stavens for tea weren't you, this afternoon? Lucky dog, no wonder you missed our feed. Wish I had the chance," he cried gaily. "Well the fact of the matter is, that I am going to Thum, Mungr, my bahadur is going to guide—"

"Thum?" I echoed. "What the deuce do you want to climb higher up these fiendish Himalayas for."

"Well, you see," he replied merrily, "I've staked five hundred pounds that I shall pay a visit to the Goddess Kali."

"Are you crazy, Cy?" I cried starting from my chair. "Are you aware what your fate will be, if those cursed fanatics catch you in their fane?"

"Kill me as a peace offering to their deity," he replied, cutting the end off his cigar, then he added thoughtfully. "But you see they won't get hold of me."

I paced the room nervously. Knowing Indian affairs better than Cyril did, I was able to appreciate the risk he was about to incur to a nicety.

"I suppose you'll come old man," he remarked tentatively, looking up, "or is the adventure too spicy a one to tempt you?"

"Oh I'm not afraid, if that is what you mean," I replied shortly. "But mind, Cyril, you are an ass to attempt it."

"Thanks awfully! Are you ready?" he queried rising.

"Ready," I echoed, "for what?"

"To see the Divinity!"

"To-night," I gasped. "Are you going to-night?"

"Your perception is excellent," he replied gaily. "Thum is only two thousand feet above the plains, and from here it is only a couple of hours walk. It's nine now, so we ought to get there by midnight—I expect Mungr every moment."

The words had barely left his lips, before the being in question entered and with a low salaam inquired:

"Are the Sahibs ready?"

"Perfectly," replied Cyril, as going to an escritoire he took a revolver from a drawer and examined its charges. "Are you ready?" I nodded surlily; the expedition did not appear very seductive to me.

"Is the Sahib armed?" inquired the Nepaulese servant, addressing me.

"I am," I replied. "You anticipate the necessity of using weapons?"

"I am the Sahib's servant," he replied evasively. "I obey and know nothing."

"Have you a rope?" queried Cyril.

"Yes, Sahib, one of sixty fathoms, and a torch."

"Good," replied my chum; then turning up his collar and striding on to the verandah, was lost in the gloom of the night.

We followed, I soon imitating his example, in turning up my collar.

If Begra was hot in the day, it was, like most hill stations, chilly in the evenings.

For two hours we walked on in silence, till Mungr stopped in front of a large stone temple, almost concealed from view by weeds and low-growing bushes, and, placing his finger to his lips, conjured us not to utter a sound.

"Be as silent as if death had set a seal upon your lips, Sahibs," he whispered impressively. "For ere many minutes have elapsed you will be in the presence of Kali, the destroyer of men!"

He shuddered, bowing low, almost to the ground, as though to propitiate the deity he feared, then cautiously pushing his way with furtive tread through the overhanging shrubs, he reached the portal of the fane.

He paused a second ere attempting to push open the rotting teakwood door, then he flung it from him, the rusty hinges screeching weirdly as the massive portal swung inwards.

We remained stationary in fear, straining our ears to catch any sound which would prove that the hinges had given the alarm of our proximity to the villagers of Thum.

Silence, broken only by the strident cry of a distant night bird, reassuring us on that score, we entered.

Mungr whispered prayers to Buddah between his chattering teeth, as he lighted his torch. Cyril remained grimly silent, whilst I, despite all my endeavours to the contrary, shivered like an aspen.

A mouldy odour, as of an opened tomb, greeted my nostrils as I walked along the gloomy fane, hordes of rats, startled by our advent, scurried across the flagged floor to their holes; then, a silence, awful in its intensity, reigned supreme.

By dint of alternate blowing and coaxing Mungr induced his torch to blaze merrily, my courage returning somewhat when the Nepaulese's brand illumined our surroundings with its lurid glow, dispelling the shadows, and displaying the whitewashed walls of a temple, carved out of a mountain's side for the most part.

"Come, Sahibs," cried the Nepaulese, "follow me, and now may Buddah preserve us!"

We followed him for some distance along the temple, our steps echoing weirdly through the myriad arches of the fane, till our guide stopped in front of a gigantic stone, having a ring on its upper surface, then fixing his spluttering torch in a crack between two flags, cried hoarsely:

"Your help, Sahibs. The stone is heavy."

We lent him a hand, and, raising the flag, saw a yawning aperture before us, impenetrable darkness veiling its profundity.

"This is the hole you told me about, eh, Mungr?—the one leading to the lower temple," exclaimed Cyril, peering into the depths. "There are no steps, you say?"

"No, Sahib, this rope must answer their purpose."

"Go down hand over hand? How jolly. How deep down is it?" Cyril queried, "thirty feet?"

"A hundred and sixty, Sahib. Do not fear, the rope is sixty fathoms; therefore we have twenty feet to the good. Will you descend first to the home of Kali?" queried the Nepaulese, securing one end of the rope to an adjacent pillar.

"Yes," replied Cyril shortly.

Mungr approached him, and tying the rope beneath his armpits, announced that he was ready to lower him into the depths beneath.

Cyril let himself over the edge, and, catching hold of one of the sides of the aperture, cried gaily:

"Say, Tris, old man, wouldn't it be lively for me if I dropped into the arms of an expectant priest, eh? Slack away, Mungr."

Yard by yard the sturdy Nepaulese paid out the rope till the strain on his arm relaxed; then hauling up the rope, he let me down, carrying the torch.

"I will keep guard, Sahib," he whispered, as I dropped over the edge. "Be quick and return ere dawns the day."

I closed my eyes during the descent, till Cyril's cheery voice announced at the same time as did the slackening rope that I was at the end of my journey.

Raising the torch I held high above my head, I was able to note my surroundings.

We were in a natural cavern, the walls of which were hewn out roughly in the shape of pillars. The rocky ceiling was lost to view in the impenetrable gloom, as was the furtherest end of the cave.

Before us rose a rude rock-hewn altar, from behind which loomed the outline of a gigantic idol, some sixty feet in height.

It was the roughly carved figure of a seated woman, naked to the waist. Its face, revolting in its hideousness, was rendered more repulsive by its protruding fangs being dyed a deep crimson, the brow and cheeks being liberally smeared with red and yellow ochre, as were its abnormally long arms which rested on its knees. A string of small bones and dried lizards depended from its neck, reaching to the breasts of this terrible idol, the nipples of which were represented by sharp steel spikes.

Such was Kali, the Goddess of Death, as seen only by the priests and the victims doomed to be immolated in her honour.

"She is not beautiful," exclaimed Cyril, after surveying the idol for some short while.

"It is a stupendous piece of sculpture," I replied. "But come, let us go back now we've seen it; any moment we may be discovered, and I am not anxious to have Thum about my ears like a hornet's nest."

"Neither do I, my dear boy, only none of the fellows at Begra would believe I'd been in the temple unless I carried off some trophy," he cried gaily; "therefore I mean to sneak a bone or two off her necklace."

"Don't act the fool, Cyril," I retorted irritably; "there is not a man of 'Ours' who would doubt your word, and every moment is precious."

"All right," he replied laughingly; "it's only a thirty-foot climb, and then we'll trot. I shan't be five minutes."

Before I could answer he had approached the gigantic idol and commenced to clamber up. It was a comparatively easy task, the creases in the idol's skirt affording facile footholds; therefore, ere many moments had passed, he stood flushed and excited on one of the hands of the Goddess of Death.

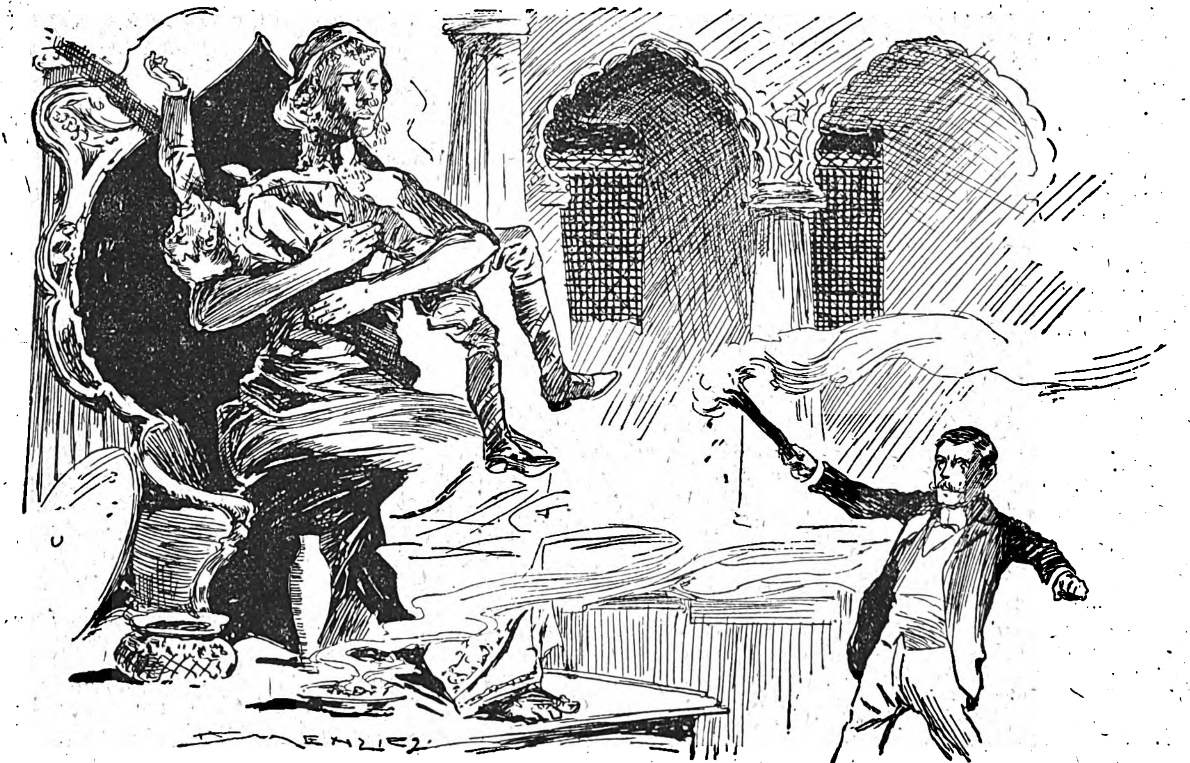
"Rather hot work, that climb!" he cried, mopping his brow with his handkerchief. "But the worst is yet to come; but——"

The sentence for ever remained unfinished. A wild cry of terror, which reverberated throughout the temple, replaced the last word; then the loud rumble of machinery awoke the echoes of the fane.

I glanced upwards in fright to see Cyril in the grip of the idol's hands. Foot by foot he was lifted upwards, struggling frantically to release himself from the figure's retentive grasp.

As a flash of light his fate dawned on me. It must have been the same with him, for a wild, piercing shriek of anguish burst from his lips—a shriek which died away in a palsied moan of bitterest agony as the idol's arms pressed him to its breast, the iron nipple transfixing the wretched man from chest to back.

For a moment it stayed thus; then, the mighty arms relaxing, allowed the mangled form they held to fall with a dull thud to the pavement.



Foot by foot he was lifted upwards, struggling frantically.

Beautiful Hazel Harlow will interest you deeply.

Horror-struck by the grim tragedy which had just been enacted, I approached the mutilated form of Cyril to see if he were quite dead. One look at the staring eyeballs, betraying the intensity of his death agony sufficed; then, losing nerve, I let my blazing, resinous torch fall on the body, and fled from the corpse towards the rope I dimly saw in the distance.

A lurid glare lit up the fane, causing me to turn even as I had my hand on the rope.

The brand had set the clothes of Cyril on fire.

I was about to return and extinguish it, when the glare enabled me to discern the outlines of some white-robed priests enter the cavern. A wild yell showed that they had perceived me.

"Pull up, for Heaven's sake, Mungr!" I yelled, emptying the barrels of my revolver amid the oncoming priests.

To my horror the rope remained slack; the running priests were only forty feet away.

Holding my revolver between my teeth, I commenced to climb wildly upwards. Luckily I was a good slack-rope climber, and fear made me shin up the rope quicker than I had ever deemed it possible.

I had fourteen feet start when the first priest reached the rope; with a cry of anger he commenced to climb after me.

Merciful Heaven, shall I ever forget the agony of that hundred and sixty feet climb; my muscles seemed bursting, yet I stuck gamely to it and so did the priest.

In the first sixty feet I gained twenty on the priest; at a hundred he had gained twenty on me. I remember I felt a savage joy possess me as for a single moment I noted that the white vestments of a priest in passing the flaming corpse of Cyril catch fire and blaze merrily. That glance downwards nearly cost me my life; a giddiness seized hold of me, and ere I recovered my self-possession the priest had gained four feet on me.

But eight now separated me from my pursuer.

Nerved by despair I climbed frenziedly upwards; but thirty feet separated me from the top, when I heard the welcome voice ofMungr.

"Climb, Sahib, climb! He gains on you!"

Once more I spurted upwards, my arms almost refusing to bear me.

Ten feet more to safety, and I could hear the hard breathing of the pursuing priest beneath me—could feel his hand touch my heel. What thews and muscles of iron he had.

"Now for it, Sahib!" cried Mungr; "I daren't fire, the report would bring the Thum on us."

Blindly I obeyed him, till I felt his muscular hand seize my collar. "Let go!" he cried commandingly, raising his sabre above his head.

I obeyed him, and as I relaxed my hold, the weapon came down with a ringing thud on the stone, severing the rope in its passage.

A loud shriek burst from the lips of the priest as, clutching the empty air, he fell with a sickening thud on the pavement beneath.

"I was on guard at the door," Mungr said apologetically, as he lifted me into safety; "and only heard the report of firearms. Where is Vere Sahib?"

"Dead," I replied shortly.

"Dead?" he echoed. "Then let us guard the living. Sahib, we must run now for our lives!"

I needed no urging, and together we tore out of the temple through the shrubs, and out on to the mountain road, not a moment too soon either, for Thum had received the alarm, and turned out en masse to avenge their desecrated temple.

A shout of triumph greeted our appearance, but having some five hundred yards start, we pegged it like path racers.

They had waited for us at the further door of the temple, leaving the one choked up by the bushes totally unguarded. Had it not been for this omission, I should not have been here to-day to tell the tale.

Loading my revolver as I ran, I managed to keep some distance between the pursuing villagers and ourselves, though the pace was killing, as was plainly manifested by Mungr's laboured breathing.

For three quarters of an hour we continued thus, till the roofs of Begra coming into sight in the dim light of dawn, I fired three barrels of my revolver in the air, not daring to lose ground by aiming at the pursuing hordes of infuriated villagers.

The noise of the shooting brought out the little garrison of Begra.

Like madmen Mungr and I tore through the amazed soldiers, I shouting as I ran:

"Fire on that rabble."

In an instant my men fell into line, and received the oncoming villagers with a brisk ,well-directed fire, which, cooling their ardour, sent them howling up the mountain towards Thum. Then I fainted away.

The affair nearly provoked a religious revolt, which luckily was suppressed before it came to a head by the ringleaders being hanged.

The British Government censured me for my part in the affair, and not deeming my life safe in India after the little episode, intimated that I had better exchange into a home-coming regiment—which I did.

The GOLDEN DWARF

A Sensational Romance of To-Day.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "A Keeper of Secrets," "Hate, the Destroyer," "A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS OF "GOLDEN DWARF."

"It is the body of Sir Christopher Dering!"

The words are spoken by a pretty girl—fair-haired, blue-eyed. She stands, horrified, by a grass-grown ditch in a country lane, out of which a great mastiff is climbing. The ditch contains the corpse of a stalwart man—a handkerchief bound over his mouth and nostrils.

Close to there is a strange figure, graceful, well-dressed, even handsome, but with the stature of a boy and the face of an adult. He carries a heavy dog-whip, and stares, fixedly, at the dead body just discovered by his mastiff, Cerberus.

The girl is Esther Carew; the dwarf, Otto Hare, the richest landowner in Derbyshire, and the mystery of Wyresdale, a village in that county. For the first time in fifteen years he has set foot in a public thoroughfare, to attract the attention of Esther, whom he has watched from his park.

Sir Christopher Dering was alive at seven o'clock the preceding day. He and his nephew, Felix, had quarrelled over the latter's love for Esther. Sir Christopher wanted Felix to make a good marriage—the birth of his little cousin Brian has put him out of the succession to the baronetcy. Felix is faithful to the penniless Esther Carew.

Much turns on the whereabouts of Felix on the night before. It appears that he was in Duchester, some miles off, whither he went on business, and spent a night at the theatre. Could he have killed the squire?

Felix in vain protests his innocence.

But the cloud of suspicion gathers around him. Meantime, the child Brian has been kidnapped, and Felix is suspected of this too. He discovers a riding whip with some peculiar marks upon it.

CHAPTER XVIII. (continued).

Amid a mass of jumbled bruises and adherent sand—for the whip had evidently been trodden on and scraped against the gravel—he deciphered some scattered yet electrical words. They ran:

"Expect Get Out of . . . Alive . . . If Not Death is Due to . . ."

There was more, but the astounded reader paused over the fatal hieroglyphic that had checked him. It was battered and dirty, the symbols which followed it indistinguishable. Felix wetted a finger-tip and wiped the surface of the cane. The character must be—yes, it must be 'F.' Horror! he himself was suspected, and his christian name began with that initial. Who else at Wyresdale boasted the fatal letter?

Forester! The Inspector had mentioned Caleb Forester in a grim and suggestive fashion. Felix reeled from the idea—the gentle old man who was Connie's father! It was absurd.

While he wrestled with his thoughts, amazed by the problem set him so suddenly, a servant tapped at the door. Felix acknowledged the summons.

"Please, sir," he was told, "a man would be glad if he might see you a moment—a person of the name of Foley."

Felix Dering gazed at the whip in his hand. "Death is due to F." spelled its scratched characters. F—Foley; was it a coincidence?

CHAPTER XIX.

"The Child's Face Seems Familiar."

"Ach, my good Keturah, you do not look pleased to see me. And yet I have come a long distance for the purpose of meeting once more the lady who, less than a fortnight ago, had me tracked from London to Derbyshire—by Mr. Neal Garland. So anxious was I not to be disappointed, I would not even let your excellent domestic announce me."

With these words, uttered in a tone as smooth as it was malicious, Dr. Joseph Kraft crossed the threshold of Mrs. Schwartz's parlour and stepped towards its astounded tenant. A yard or so off, he paused and deposited his powerful frame upon a chair opposite the bewildered Keturah's.

Mrs. Schwartz gasped, drew a deep breath and rallied her native courage.

"Drop the sarcastic dodge, Doctor," she advised him and folded her plump arms; "I don't like it and I won't stand it. You had your thumb on poor Carl, but I'm not the mean-spirited foreigner my husband was. I'll own you bluffed Neal the other day, yet we've not spoken our last on that subject. What's brought you here now?"

Joseph Kraft relinquished his limp straw hat and rubbed his soft palms together. Behind his delicate spectacles the German's yellow orbs gazed keenly at the moist red countenance of the lodging-house keeper.

"I will answer the question, Keturah," he said, "if you will imform me why you chose this Garland to be your bloodhound. You are not Mrs. Garland, I presume?"

Keturah Schwartz grinned.

"Perhaps I might be if I wished," she retorted, "but my business is my business. Anyhow, Neal Garland's precious smart and I happened to have him handy when I spotted you at Victoria last week. So I put him on your trail and he ran you to earth fast enough. Old fox that you are, you stalled him off, and as the lad had spent all his cash on the fare, he was obliged to sleep out and nearly had to tramp back to town. He owes you a nice grudge for that, Doctor, does Neal, and he isn't the sort to forget it."

Kraft dismounted his spectacles and polished the lenses—his odd saffron-tinted pupils had the veiled scorn of a cat's.

"Adventures of an Actress" begin to-day.

"Mr. Garland," said the German, "is not quite a fool, Keturah, but he bullies—he tried to bully me. I allowed him five minutes to get out or be arrested. He got out. Nevertheless, I bear Mr. Garland no ill-will; I desire, on the contrary, to do him a service. Can you direct me to his—his residence?"

Keturah Schwartz scrutinized the sleek visage of the inquirer.

"You're clever, Joseph Kraft," she replied, "but you can't persuade me you've turned philanthropist. What do you want with Neal?"

Kraft bowed.

"I must reserve that, Keturah," he objected; "for Mr. Garland's ear."

Mrs. Schwartz abandoned her seat—her gross proportions stiffened into decision.

"Then," declared the irate lodging-house keeper, "you can discover his address for yourself—you won't learn it from me."

The German pondered a few seconds and concluded by lifting his loose shoulders.

"Make an appointment with Garland," was his suggestion, "and you shall witness our interview."

Keturah Schwartz moved to the battered bell-pull by the fire-place.

"Glad to see that you can be sensible, occasionally," she said; "on those conditions, Doctor, I will produce him, which isn't difficult, since he digs in my top front suite and owes me a month's rent of it. He's somewhere round I know."

She delivered a husky order to the maid, gained her padded chair and subsided upon its cushions, almost suffocated with the August heat and the burden of her superfluous avoirdupois.

Meanwhile her caller was observing, by a series of quick, shrewd glances, the apartment and its furniture. Nothing escaped his swift perceptions, from the gin-bottle at Mrs. Schwartz's elbow to the grey dust of the cigarette-ash upon the faded carpet.

Suddenly Joseph Kraft's interest was enchained by a little figure that, crouched on the worn hearth-rug beside a tortoiseshell kitten, had intimated its presence with an abrupt outburst of childish tears.

"I want to go home," it wept; "I want to go home to mother!"

The German wrinkled his brows.

"I was not aware we had a witness—of however tender age, to our conversation, Keturah," he said.

Mrs. Schwartz frowned.

"I hate brats," she declared; "but I've had him left on my hands, worse luck!" She flushed athwart the room a gaze of fierce malevolence.

"Jack," she cried; "you remember what I promised you if you were disobedient!"

The boy winced and choked down his sobs.

Kraft smiled—a smile that laid his white teeth bare to the gums.

"Tell me," he said and leant over, his elbows on his knees, "about this famous punishment. Would Mrs. Schwartz do something very terrible to you?"

The child's lip trembled and a tear overflowed the fair lashes.

"She will whip me," came the clear yet terrified response, "till I bleed."

Keturah Schwartz laughed harshly.

"He's right," assented the lodging-housekeeper; "it's the best road with kids; hardens them and warns them to do as they're bid."

Joseph Kraft put his large fingers on the small head and touched the tiny chest and limbs.

"Four years or so," he muttered; "and well-bred—wonderfully well-bred for Pimlico. Strange, the child's face seems familiar."

He sat apparently absorbed by reflection. The creak of the china knob on the door in the rear roused him and he sprang up to twist on his heel and encounter the astonished stare of Neal Garland.

"You are surprised at this visit, Mr. Garland," began the German. "You recollect, no doubt, the nature of our previous, and, hitherto, our only meeting. Tut, people must grow to appreciate one another. You tried to harass me on the strength of a cock-and-bull story told you by the widow of my dead friend, Carl Schwartz. I taught you to respect me; let us consider the incident as closed."

"Curse your long tongue," growled Neal, emboldened by a telegraphic wink from Mrs. Schwartz; "I don't suppose you've hunted me out for nothing. Let's have it plain; I hate soft sawder."

Joseph Kraft adjusted his glasses; the trick delayed his response. "You were at Wyresdale on the evening of Wednesday, July the twenty-third," he said. "I assume Mr. Garland, that, as you went from Wyresdale Park after seeing me, you chanced to observe a certain person, whom, in a moment, I will describe minutely."

Neal Garland settled his lean body on the round table beside Mrs. Schwartz's chair. Neither of them perceived the child, who, still with the kitten clasped to his bosom, had left the hearth-rug and was listening to the German's slow speech.

"I cannot disguise," continued Kraft, in his perfect English, "the importance to certain plans of mine of this person having been noticed by you. It is not a matter for publicity, but an affair of private negotiations. I would, however, rather lose a hundred pounds than hear you say you were not fortunate enough to see the gentleman in question on the evening of the twenty-third of July."

"Go on," urged Neal. "I take you, my noble diplomatist; and the beggar I may have twigged. What was he like?"

"Young," said the German; "tall, grey eyes, brown hair and moustache, dressed in a tweed suit and cap, with tan riding boots. He was mounted on a chestnut horse, and you should have seen him near the cross-roads outside the village of Wyresdale, the night of Sir Christopher Dering's murder."

There was a slight noise—the tortoiseshell kitten had fallen from the relaxed embrace of the child. It arched its back and stretched itself. Mrs. Schwartz, attracted by the event, looked at the boy she had called "Jack." His face was drawn and startled and the baby lips quivered.

With unexpected agility the landlady leapt to her feet, caught up the child and bore him out of the room. On the narrow landing she released him.

"Open your mouth to cry or make a sound of any sort," she whispered; "and I'll burn you all over with a red-hot poker. Stay where you are and don't dare to budge."

She clenched her huge fist, shook it menacingly, and hastened back to the apartment, reluctant to lose a syllable of the conversation between Kraft and Neal. Mrs. Schwartz found herself just in time to behold the transfer of a crisp piece of paper from the German to her lodger.

"I'm on," Neal was remarking; "and this'll do to bind the bargain. But, understand me, Doctor Joseph Kraft, if it theatens to be a police case, I'm off, for reasons of my own."

"For reasons of my own," said the German; "I will not permit it to become any such thing, Mr. Garland. I am obliged to you: your visit to Wyresdale has proved useful, after all." Joseph Kraft reached his hat, clapped it on his straight locks, and bowed to Mrs. Schwartz. "Au revoir, Keturah!" he added; "do not trouble to show me downstairs."

Tell your best friends about our new series.

He strode to the door, opened it, saluted again, and closed it. Mrs. Schwartz stole to the keyhole on tip-toe and peered through. The German had paused on the mat beyond and was studying, by the half light, the vague figure of the child. A second he stood thus, then passed down the rickety flight.

Keturah Schwartz spun about; Neal had fallen into her chair and was shaking with merriment. His spare limbs swayed under the extravagance of his laughter, his legs were thrust out helplessly.

"Stop, you idiot," cried the stout woman, as she planted her hands on her hips; "stop, or I'll throttle you."

Her lodger struggled for utterance. "The Dutchman thinks—" was Neal's stifled confession, "he—he's bribed me to swear privately that I saw Felix Dering in Wyresdale on the night of his uncle's murder. And all the while I had seen him—oh, isn't it funny? Did you watch how I nodded and smirked and pretended to be acting on his hints like the perjurer he believes me."

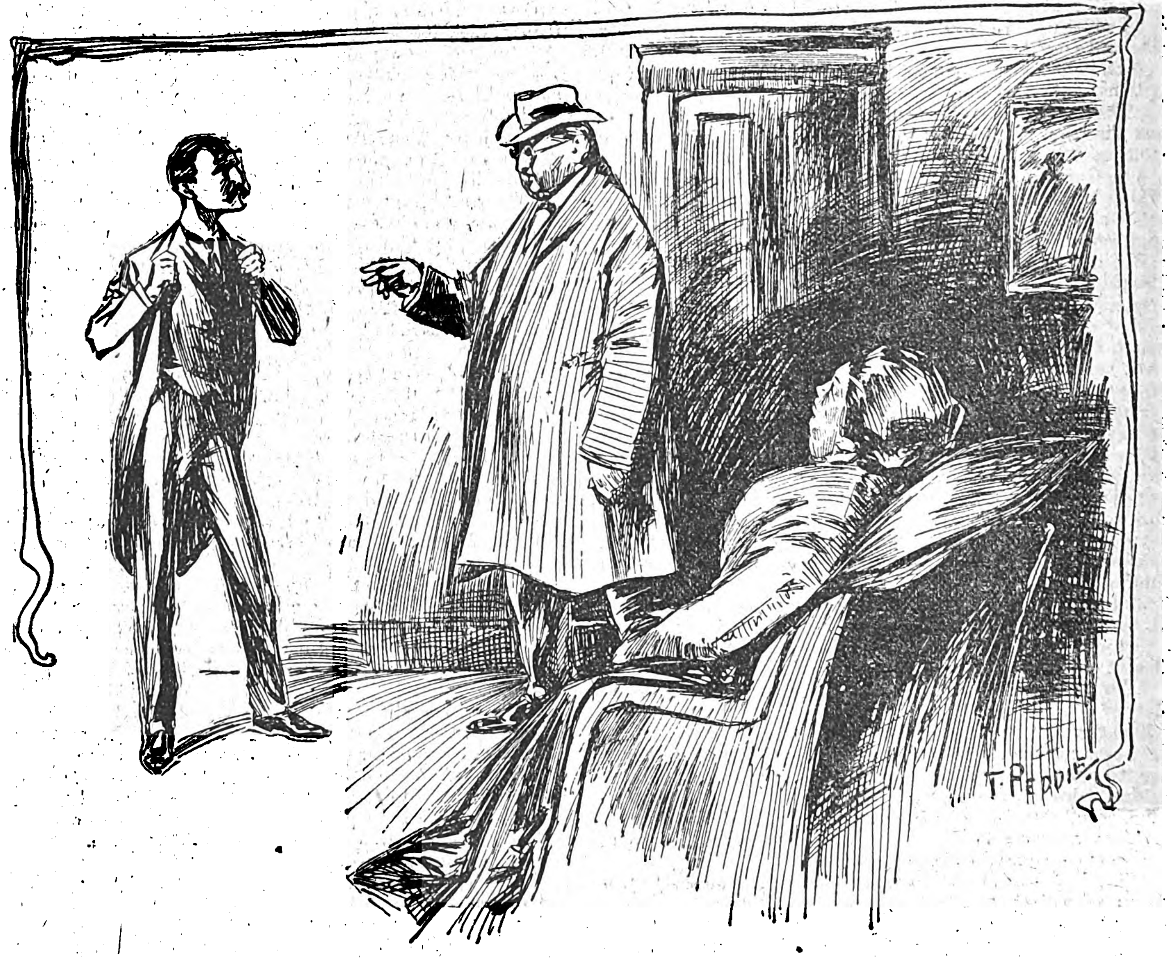
Keturah Schwartz smote the table, anger distorting her crimson features.

"Triple ass!" she cried; "Joseph Kraft's wits would fill a dozen skulls like yours. He came to track the child. Couldn't you see the brat's face when he mentioned its father. He knows it for what it is—Brian Dering."

CHAPTER XX.

Mr. Geddes Is Inquisitive.

"Another crumpet, Mr. Geddes? And do let me give you some fresh tea."



T. REDDIE

"I cannot disguise the importance of this person having been seen by you."

Archibald Geddes passed his cup to the end of the small table, casting as he did so, a vigilant glance through the particoloured glass of the casement which overlooked the shop. The chemist's assistant sat upon a springless sofa, upholstered with glazed American cloth. To the young Scotchman that gaunt couch was a luxurious divan; it brought him opposite Connie Forester and her tray.

In the further corner of the dark sitting-room behind Caleb Forester's neat pharmacy, a cramped window commanded a strip of cloudless blue. The village of Wyresdale —a picturesque corner of Britain—slept under a glorious afternoon. But Archibald Geddes would not have exchanged the gloomy apartment where he lounged at his four o'clock meal for all the scenery in Europe.

Connie had donned a new blouse, pink silk and little frills of lace. Her waist was clasped by a band of lizard-skin boasting silver buckles. A ray of sunshine from the shop twinkled on them as she reached a hot muffineer to her companion.

The Scotchman heaved a profound sigh.

"I'm glad you like your belt, Miss Connie," he said, accepting the proffered delicacy, "I'm no judge of such ornaments myself and a gift one doesn't care for is a dismal affair. It's cost me hours wondering what to get you for your birthday."

"I'm sorry for that, Mr. Geddes," intimated Constance Forester crisply, and set the replenished cup by the assistant's plate.

"You needn't be," declared Archibald Geddes, "it was a pleasant occupation—I'm afraid I'll miss it."

Connie smiled, the smile became her brown orbs and mischievous mouth. The Scotchman comtemplated in silence their charming owner.

"I suspect, Miss Connie," he said at length, "you'd be offended if you knew how often I think of you—not that I mean to take a liberty."

"I don't mind, I'm sure," retorted Connie; "it doesn't hurt me."

She rubbed the gleaming buckles at her waist as she spoke, as if to enhance the brightness of the silver.

Archibald Geddes leaned across the table. "I wouldn't have it hurt you," he murmured; "but maybe it's hurt me already, past cure."

Connie picked at the crumbs on the white cloth; the assistant imprisoned her soft fingers.

"I've had a sweet ache in my heart," faltered Geddes, "for many a month now. I'm a fool to run the risk of vexing you, but it seems as if I couldn't hold my tongue. Connie, you're twenty to-day and a woman—a woman any man should be proud to woo whether he won her or not. Connie, I——"

What more Mr. Geddes desired to say must remain a matter of conjecture, since at this precise juncture the door of the sitting-room swung ajar, and a thin voice announced timidly:

"Please, Inspector Brasher would be glad if he might have a word with Miss Forester."

Archibald Geddes started to his feet, muttering a fierce anathema upon the inspector and his desires. But Connie turned a deaf ear to the Scotchman's wrath.

"Ask Mr. Brasher to step in," she ordered the messenger, a shambling, knock-kneed lad, who carried the pharmacy parcels and swept the pharmacy floor. Then she shot a pleading glance towards Geddes.

"I must see him," she whispered; "I—I as good as begged him to keep father out of trouble, if he could, in any of dad's foolish fits. He told me duty was duty, and I snapped him up and left him. But I was certain he'd not hold out long."

Geddes rubbed his chin and coughed. "I suppose," he grumbled, "if Brasher could guarantee to protect Mr. Forester from the legitimate consequences of his confirmed drunkenness, you'd marry him at once?"

Connie stared and then tossed her head. "Well, Mr. Geddes," she cried, "you are polite, both to me and dad. Please understand that you've not the least right to interfere. I wish I hadn't explained now."

The Scotchman would have spoken in his own defence, but Michael Brasher had mounted the steps from the shop and was shaking hands with the indignant Connie. Archibald Geddes nodded to the Inspector and descended grimly to his place at the counter.

Mr. Brasher drummed on the top of his stiff cap and twisted its oil-cloth strap round his wrist.

"I—I beg your pardon, Miss Forester," he stammered, "if I have called at an inconvenient time, but I wanted to drop you a—a hint about your father."

Connie's face grew pale, and she laid a palm on her throbbing bosom.

"I'm going against my own interests," confessed Michael Brasher, "when I recommend you to keep him away from the Wheatsheaf Hotel. He drinks a lot, Miss Forester, and talks of a great service he's done Mr. Felix Dering, and of the trouble his being able to hold his tongue, save the mark, has kept off Mr. Dering."

Constance Forester started and looked down to hide her dismay from the Inspector's shrewd gaze.

"It's wrong of me to mention this, Miss Forester," owned Mr. Brasher; "it's a breach of duty, but even a police-officer has his weaknesses, and you're mine. You weren't over pleased the other morning. Perhaps you'll forgive me now."

The girl shivered to hear the strong passion that vibrated in Michael Brasher's tones. "Thank you very, very much," she said embarrassed. "I don't deserve you to be so kind, Mr. Brasher, and I am ashamed to feel I have made you do wrong."

The Inspector squeezed the delicate fingers held out to him. "It's not worth regretting," he said; "if the worst came to the worst I couldn't help him or you. But in the meanwhile, don't let him challenge our attention—that's all. Good-day, Miss Forester, good-day, I'm your friend—to the best of my power."

And after regarding her tenderly for the space of some seconds, Mr. Brasher departed. He favoured Archibald Geddes with a dignified salute as he strode through the shop and vanished into the High Street.

Hardly had he crossed the threshold than a massive form shadowed the entrance, and, still huge, pink, and amiable, Joseph Kraft appeared.

"A fine afternoon, Mr. Geddes," said the German, blandly.

Mr. Geddes grunted, as though to retort that happiness was not to be estimated by the barometer. Kraft dived into his breast pocket, produced a flat case and touched the hasp. The lid gaped to show a glass barrel, nickel-mounted and possessing a nickel piston. It was the principal portion of a hypodermic syringe.

"I have broken the needle of this little toy," explained Joseph Kraft; "can you replace it or must I send it to town?"

The Scotchman considered the appliance. "It is quite the ordinary type," he said; "I believe so." And he brought a couple of new syringes to experiment on.

As he fitted a needle to the German's instrument, Geddes recollected the enormous purchase of cocaine made by Joseph Kraft some fortnight earlier and recorded in the poison-book at his side. Was it, then, Kraft who consumed the drug by subcutaneous administrations? The Scotchman was seized with desperate curiosity.

Joseph Kraft leant upon the counter, his chin propped, was surveying the completion of his scientific tool. His shirt-cuffs fitted too tightly to permit Geddes that casual but prying glance which might otherwise have revealed on his customer's left fore-arm the tell-tale scars of the needle-point, where it is invariably inserted by the male user.

An idea came to the Scotchman. He allowed his hand, occupied with twisting the screw of the syringe, to slip and hit sharply the starched cuff of the Professor. It shot the linen clear of the wrist and Geddes saw the plump flesh almost to the elbow. The skin was whole and healthful; the German's hypodermic syringe was not for his own behoof. For whose, then?—Kraft had gained, to the persistent brain of the Scotchman, an additional element of mystery.

Geddes apologised, fitted the fresh needle, and received payment. His customer bade him a beaming adieu and strolled out of the shop. In the High Street the German's features underwent a sudden change.

"Deuce take the fellow," he snarled, "that was done on purpose. Mr. Geddes is inquisitive. Henceforth I do not patronise the Wyresdale Pharmacy, I am not sure I was wise ever to patronise it."

Walking at a smart, but awkward pace, Kraft cleared the principal thoroughfare of Wyresdale and soon was in the neighbourhood of the white villa near the cross-roads.

"Otto said five o'clock," muttered the German and glanced at his watch, "I have just timed myself beautifully, there are fifteen minutes for my diplomatic performance, provided the fair maiden is at home. At five o'clock the iron must be hot for the Golden Dwarf to strike. Donnerwetter, his latest caprice has caused me sufficient trouble."

Joseph Kraft, thus soliloquising, marched up the Rosery path and rang at the bell in the porch. Barbara, the pretty parlour-maid, answered the summons. The German presented his card.

"My visit is to Miss Carew," he murmured, slipping a florin into Barbara's palm. The maid rejected the gift.

"I will take your card to Miss Carew," said Barbara, curtly, "will you step into the sitting-room, sir." She piloted him to the cool, flower-scented apartment and went away. Kraft pulled at a large red ear.

"Singular," commented the German, "an independent domestic. Doubtless of the faithful servant variety and dangerous."

He beguiled his wait by a tour of the chamber and its surroundings.

"Artistic, but cheap," he decided, "Otto will be a great catch for Mamma Carew. It is Esther we must bend. And," he added, pausing in his stride, "I think I have found the way."

Another inspection of his fine "hunter" interrupted this monologue.

"Miss Esther is tardy," fretted the German. "I should have postponed my call on that impudent Scotch chemist; Otto will be here before the iron is heated."

A slight sound checked his communings, and he advanced to greet Esther herself. She had entered with hesitation, her blue eyes troubled, her colour heightened.

"Dr. Kraft," she faltered; "I—I am afraid I do not remember you."

The German bowed low.

"You see in me a sincere well-wisher, Miss Carew," he said; "yet I own we have not met before. But will you not be seated—I must discharge my errand quickly or it will be too late."

Esther sank upon a lounge, startled and anxious.

"In a few moments," pursued Kraft, standing by her, his huge bulk hugher than ever, "an acquaintance of mine, Mr. Otto Hare, will arrive to seek from you a definite response to his overtures. Pardon my freedom, Miss Carew." He broke off, for the girl had risen proudly. "When I say that I speak for Mr. Felix Dering's advantage I know you will hear me out."

Horrified, Esther Carew fell back in the wide settee.

"Mr. Dering," added Joseph Kraft, "is menaced with a frightful danger. Mr. Hare has secretly obtained proof that on the night of Sir Christopher's murder, his nephew—despite all statements to the contrary—was in Wyresdale. If you were to harden yourself against Mr. Hare's suit I would not take a bad half-crown for Mr. Dering's life."

Esther gazed at the author of this estimate, pallid and tremulous. Kraft glanced from the long French windows of the apartment.

"Heavens!" he cried, theatrically; "Mr. Hare's carriage has stopped at the gate. He must not see me or he will guess that I have been trying to serve his rival. I can escape on to the lawn. Remember, Miss Carew, Felix Dering's fate is in your charge."

The German slipped out of the room by a curtained window as Otto Hare, piloted by Barbara, gained the door. Helpless and unnerved, Esther beheld approach her the tiny form of the Golden Dwarf. Diminutive as it was, she noticed anew its masculine strength and elegance. Otto Hare's black pupils were regarding her with a kind of merciless admiration.

CHAPTER XXI.

A Fresh Card is Played.

"You don't know me, Mr. Dering, and yet I calculate we ought to be better acquainted."

Nicholas Foley lolled in one of the antique chairs that helped to furnish the great library at Dering House. His slouch hat was deposited on the polished floor, his feet were stretched out in their thick boots, his single hand beat a tattoo against his thigh.

Felix Dering had descended from his private room to encounter this remarkable caller, and was gazing with a certain amazement at the uncouth form of the speaker.

"I thought," continued Nicholas, as he groped in a vest-pocket to produce a clay pipe and fill it deftly, "as I've heard such a lot about you, I'd have a look at the cut of your jib. Yours aren't the lines I'd have expected in a buccaneering craft. Blowed if I can fancy the black flag at your fore."

Felix leaned on the tall mantel which bore the Dering escutcheon in carved oak relief. "My good fellow," he said cheerfully; "I like the nautical flavour of your talk, but I'm afraid I don't quite follow its purport."

Foley lit his pipe and waved it.

"Don't you try and weather-bow me, my hearty," was his advice; "I'm a better seamen than you any day of the week, and I've got you logged right enough for a darned piratical son of a gun, and if I don't put the King's ships on you—otherwise the police—it's for reasons of my own."

Felix rang the bell.

"You are insolent, Mr. Foley," he said, "and if you have the slightest cause to communicate with the authorities respecting me or my conduct, Inspector Brasher is a shrewd and intelligent officer, and you will find him at the station in Wyresdale High Street. At all events, leave Dering House forthwith."

The sailor rose and moved towards his rebuker. "Serve you right," he hissed, "if I went to this Brasher and told him you was in Wyresdale the evening of the Squire's death. Ay, and offered to prove it, too. But I won't, I'll act fair by my pals, our game's to stand off and on till you come into the shiners, and then we'll have a word to say."

The blood surged up in Felix Dering's veins, and he seized Nicholas's ragged collar.

"You low bully," he cried, "where were you that night? My uncle was killed by a man whose name begins with 'F.,' as yours does. Can you prove your innocence?"

Nicholas Foley recoiled and drew his tanned fingers over his brow; a dazed expression had crossed his face—he might have been seeking to recollect something long forgotten. At this crisis the door opened—a servant had entered the apartment.

Foley stepped mechanically to the exit. Once he turned and glanced at Felix Dering. But his braggadocio had deserted him—he walked like a beaten hound. Felix made no attempt to check his visitor's departure, and Nicholas Foley slank out into the corridor.

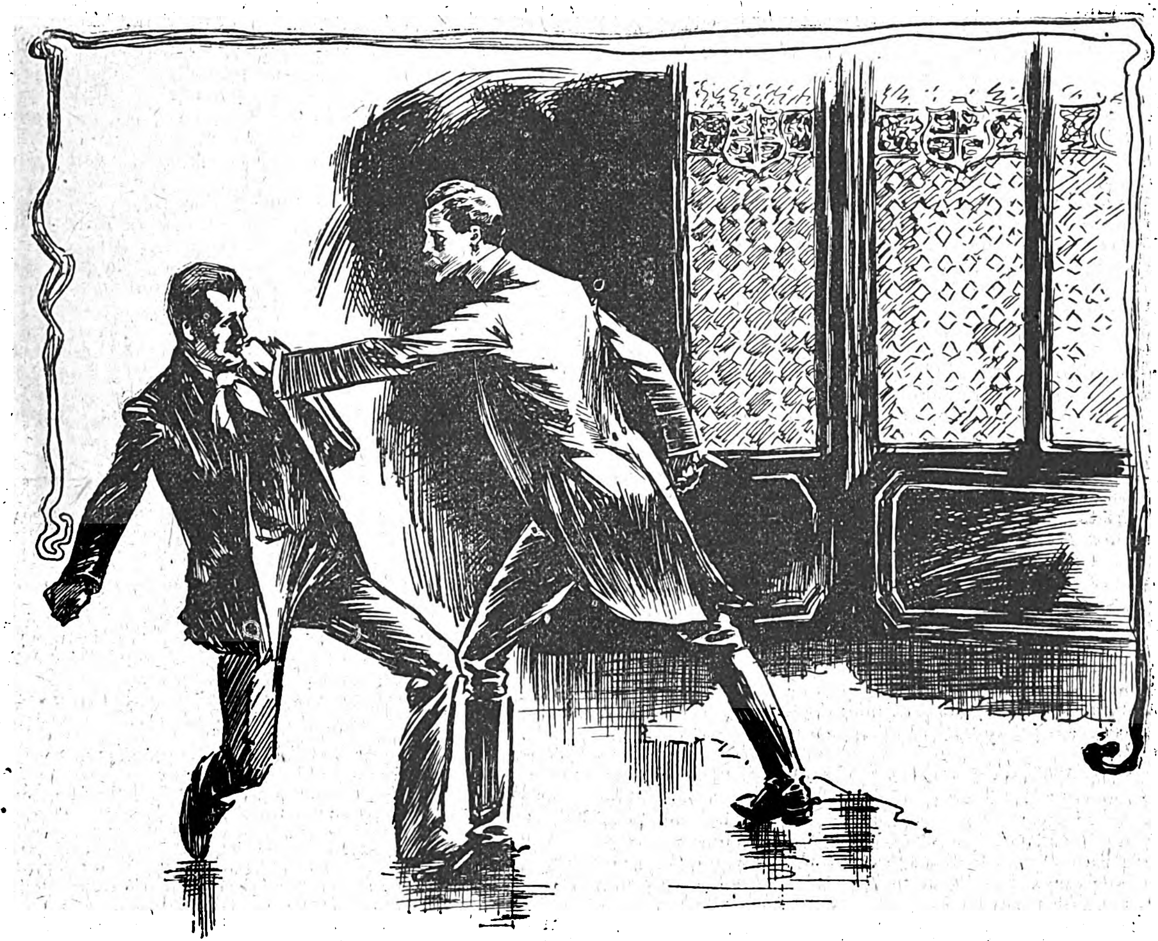
Dazed by the unconventional interview that had just taken place, Felix went back to his room, his mind filled with momentous, yet incoherent, thoughts. He had seen the change his extraordinary visitor's demeanour had suffered under the reference to that person's whereabouts on the fatal evening which had been full of fatal issues.



"You low bully, where were you that night? Can you prove your innocence?"

In his own chamber Felix took from a cabinet the scratched hunting-crop. He had laid it in security when he was summoned downstairs to his strange caller. Again he pored upon the imperfect lettering, which betrayed so much and yet so little. Slowly he deciphered a few more words. The shattered sentence now read:

"... N't expect get out of . . . alive if not . . . death is due to F . . . . hangs back but . . . . . . oath or death I will nev . . . . be so vile."

The enigma seemed to deepen on all sides. The sailor had mentioned his pals—could it be they who had offered the "oath or death" of which the scratched inscription spoke? Who was it that had "hung back"—perhaps in pity; what could it be from which the dead Sir Christopher had shrunk with the protest, "I will never be so vile"?

Felix Dering's brain reeled before the problem presented to it. He locked the strip of Malacca away, took his hat and went out, bent upon seeing Inspector Brasher. It might be wise, he reflected, to take that astute person into his confidence. At least he could be advised to place a watch on Foley.

As he crossed the terrace, bright with its trailing blooms and August sun, Felix became aware of a dark figure, which clad in the pathetic garments of a new-made widow, sat despondently on the stone bench, where, a few days earlier, she had played with her little son.

Seeing Felix, she recoiled; the unconscious gesture wounded deeply her young kinsman. Driven to speech, he sank into a seat by her.

"Aunt," he said—the formal address was the only one he could use—"will you not let me talk to you sometimes. Dering House is desolate to both of us. You—you do not believe the slanderous gossip of the village? Must I swear to you also my innocence of my uncle's death and Brian's disappearance ? "

Lady Dering bowed her head. "I believe nothing," she faltered; "my heart is broken. Yet my wretchedness is your profit, I cannot forget that."

Her nephew clasped a white weak hand in his brown palm. "Make no mistake," he said, "until the fate of Brian and the real story of Sir Christopher's murder are cleared up and my honour vindicated, I will not accept a sovereign out of the estate, not even my salary as steward. I will never ask for Brian's death to be presumed, nor will I ever use the title unless I can prove myself free from any responsibility for his abduction. Would I sacrifice my ends thus if I had planned to bring myself into the succession by violence ? Be just to me—I do not wish for mercy."

Lady Dering groaned.

"I can't understand," she murmured; "who else could have done it? You are either the most ill-starred of men, Felix, or you are—what people say you are."

She rose and glided along the terrace; soon, a bend in it screened her from observation.

Felix hid his face—the blow inflicted on him by her sorrowful utterance had been bitter. He was indeed ill-starred, for he knew himself guiltless.

Perplexed and miserable, he left the terrace and hurried down the avenue that led to the lodge-gates. He had resolved, without delay, to seek Inspector Brasher's counsel and assistance. But as he strode out between the tall iron leaves he encountered the grey locks, velvet coat, and unsteady progression of Caleb Forrester.

The old chemist started from his reverie to intercept the rapid course of Felix Dering.

"A moment, sir," he said. Felix noticed the thickness of his voice, and the spirituous odour of his breath. "One moment, I was about to pre—to presume so far as to wait upon you personally."

Felix sighed.

"What can I do for you, Mr. Forrester," he asked, and wondered if, after all, there was a basis for Brasher's grim allusion to the old man's folly in permitting his lips to be unlocked by liquor—Caleb's anxious, hunted aspect did suggest the bearer of a mental load.

The chemist gripped at the speaker's wrist.

Caleb quivered from crown to toe and his tongue boggled over it's syllables; he was intoxicated to some little extent.

"You did me a good turn once, Mr. Dering," he stammered, "and I want to say you can trust me—when I'm moderately sober. But hadn't you better get away while there's time. Brasher's dogged me around for days and I may—I may have dropped a hint in my cups. I am a curse to myself and Connie, Mr. Dering, but I wouldn't like to think I betrayed you. Why did you ever do it, sir; why did you?"

Felix shook off the nerveless grip. "You are delirious, Forrester," he said; "I have no secrets for you to keep."

Caleb nodded pertinaciously.

"Yes, you have, sir," retorted the chemist; "I saw you at the cross roads that night—when I was coming from the Wheatsheaf—late. But you can trust me not to blab, sir, on purpose, I mean."

The listener staggered. How many others, then, knew the dangerous fact he had endeavoured to suppress? Twice in an hour, it had been stated to him and by mouths he dared not hope could preserve it from repetition.

"Do as you choose, Forrester," he said sternly; "yet do not imagine I admit the ridiculous imputation you have directed against me. I regret, however, you should entertain such an idea of an innocent man."

The chemist blew his nose with a large red bandanna. "Innocent or guilty, sir," he muttered, "you were kind to me and I'll not split if I can but stay half sober. But get out of England while you can, Mr. Dering; it's madness to remain. Others may have seen you that night; put the sea between Wyresdale and you, sir, while you may."

He stepped aside.

The patter of ponies' hoofs neared them down the lane.

Felix looked up—it was Judith Garland, in Lady Dering's basket-phæton.

The parcels on the front seat showed that she had been to the High Street.

Opposite Felix she halted and motioned him to enter. He did so, automatically, it seemed to him, as if he alone had no control over his will or his destiny. The ponies pattered on towards the avenue, leaving Caleb Forrester on the earthen kerb.

Judith studied the handsome features of her companion. Then she said:

"You know that I have just returned from town."

Felix assented.

"While there," pursued Judith, lowering her tone, "I was audacious enough to make some inquiries as to the possible fate of little Brian. To my horror, Mr. Dering, I discovered, in a roundabout manner, a terrible fact. You recollect the cheque you gave me—for—for my brother? the one made out to bearer for twenty pounds?"

"Yes," answered Felix, drily.

Judith whispered the rest of her information, her full red lips almost touching his cheeks and her black eyes lit by an odd excitement.

"The person who took away Brian," she said, "carried that cheque with him."

POWERFUL NEW STORY IN PEARSON'S WEEKLY
"MAKE ME YOUR WIFE BEFORE I DIE"
"FETTERED LIVES"

This Story has just began.

You should get a copy of P. W. to-day.

Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a Stereoscope to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, August 12th. Postcards only, please. The first prize of One Guinea has been awarded this week to Mr. J. G. Bennett, 8 Sidney Street, Grantham, whose contribution is denoted by a star thus.*

THE mother of a little three-year-old girl had been away from home over night, and on her return asked: "And how did my little girl get to sleep last night without mamma?" "Oh," she replied, "papa twied to sing to me like 'ou does, an' I des went to sleep weal twick, so I touldn't hear him."

*THE best puns are unintentional. Thus, the well-known Californian tomato-grower, Mr. Perry, was walking about his garden in company with his brother from the city. "You raise an enormous lot of tomatoes, John," said the city dweller. "What in the world do you do with them?" "Well," said Mr. Perry, "we eat what we can, and we can what we can't."

A FEW years ago in Parliament a London member sat down, after his maiden speech, on a new silk hat which he had provided in honour of the auspicious occasion, and as he was ruefully surveying his battered head-gear, to the amusement of the unfeeling spectators, an Irish representative rose, and gravely said: "Mr. Speaker, permit me to congratulate the honourable member on the happy circumstance that when he sat on his hat his head was not in it." The call of "Order! order!" from the Speaker was drowned in roars of laughter.

A MAN who worked in a mill near Burnley went out of his mind, and was removed to the asylum. A fellow-worker, on passing the asylum one day, saw Jimmy sitting in the grounds, smoking his pipe. "Hallo, Jimmy," he called out, "how are you goin' on?" "Oh! Aw'm going on first rate, thank yo'," answered Jimmy. "Ah'm varry glad to hear it, lad. Yo'll happen be cumming back to wark soon, eh?" "Wot!" exclaimed Jimmy, in great surprise, "leave a big house and a grand garden like this, and cum back to wark! Do yo' think Aw'm wrang in my head?"

AN old couple living in Gloucester
Had a beautiful girl, but they loucester;
She fell from a yacht,
And never the spacht
Could be found where the cold waves had toucester.

An old lady living in Worcester
Had a gift of a handsome young rorcester,
But the way that it crough,
As 'twould never get through,
Was more than the lady was uorcester.

At the bar in the old inn at Leicester,
Was a beautiful barmaid named Heicester,
She gave to each guest
Only what was the buest
And they all, with one accord, bleicester.

"WHAT is the meaning of the word 'luke-warm'?" asked the teacher. "Johnny Cumso, you may answer." "Water is luke-warm when it looks warm and isn't."

"GAZE upon the pure, beautiful evening star, and swear to be true while its light shall shine! Swear, my love! Swear by Venus!" exclaimed a youth in impassioned accents. "How stupid you are!" answered the Girton girl. "That is not Venus. The right ascension of Venus this month is 15hrs. 9 mins.; her declination is 17 deg. 25 mins. south, and her diameter is 10.2."

FIRST DETECTIVE: "I've got the two men who committed the murder. Their names are Muggs and Juggs." Second detective: "You don't say so! How did you discover them?" "I ran across Muggs one day and boldly charged him with the crime." "How did he take it?" "He changed colour—a sure sign that he is guilty." "True, and the other?" "I saw Juggs soon after and boldly charged him with the crime." "Good! How did he act?" "He did not change colour at all—a sure sign that he is a hardened criminal."

A STORY is told concerning a wee girl of five years who had so large a number of dolls that she became a fair judge of the necessary requisites of a good doll. One day a baby came to the house. When it was put into her arms, this real live baby, the five-year-old surveyed it with a critical eye. "Isn't that a nice baby?" cried the nurse, with the joyous pride with which a nurse always regards a new baby, in which she feels that she has a proprietary interest. "Yes," replied the little girl hesitatingly, "it's nice, but its head's loose."

DURING a lesson in a medical college the other day one of the students, who was by no means a dullard, was asked by the professor: "How much is a dose of ——?" (giving the technical name of a strong poison). "A teaspoonful," was the ready reply. The professor made no comment, but the student, a quarter of an hour later realised that he had made a mistake, and straightway said: "Professor, I want to change my answer to that question." "It's too late, sir," responded the professor, curtly, looking at his watch, "your patient has been dead fourteen minutes."

IN a sham fight which was held in connection with a a volunteer camp lately, the invading force was led by an officer whose hand was better suited to the plough than to the sword. They were marching down a road, and, on turning a sharp corner, they came across the enemy, lying but a short distance from them, "Charge!" commanded the officer. Away went his men at full speed, and when they had covered about half the distance to the enemy they heard their officer shout—"Come back, come back, the hale pack o' ye; come back to where ye started from, and start owre again. I've forgotten to order ye to fix bayonets."

A WELL-KNOWN sportsman was lately entertaining some friends previous to a drive, when he happened to mention the wonderful equanimity of a certain servant of his whom nothing could confuse or upset. "I bet you a fiver I do," said a wag who was present. "Done!" returned the host, "I expect him in every minute." Just then the door opened, and the individual in question entered the room; addressing his master he announced solemnly: "The carriage waits without, sir." "Without?" queried the wag, thinking he might as well win his bet right away, "without what?" "Without horses, sir!" was the solemn rejoinder, "it's a motor!" The wag didn't try again.

Mr. GEO. R. SIMS' HAIR RENEWER.

Called by him "TATCHO."

Romany: "Genuine," "Good," "True.")

And why, pray, is the successful poet, playwright, and journalist an eminent authority on hair restorer? Eager for an explanation, a Daily Mail representative sought out Mr. Sims. . . .

Now Mr. G. R. Sims, as many people know, is one of the busiest men in the kingdom, but hastily affixing his signature to a letter, he looked up and extended a characteristically cordial welcome. Then he said: "I will explain. I found that I was rapidly going bald. Not seriously, you understand, but the thinning out was sufficiently marked to set me thinking out a remedy. I went to two specialists, both of whom cheerfully assured me that I should be absolutely bald in two years.

"Then I discovered the preparation which is now placed upon the market. I found that I had hit upon a remedy capable of working wonders. Look at my hair now, isn't that convincing evidence of the value of my preparation.

"Ladies confirm my good opinion of it as a dressing for daily use. Mrs. Brown-Potter, whose beautiful hair is the admiration of the entire lady world, writes that she uses nothing but 'Tatcho.' There is nothing to prevent every woman from making her hair silken in texture and bountiful in volume, for she can obtain a bottle of 'Tatcho' now in every town or even village."

In order that the public may be able to test the superlative value of Mr. Geo. R. Sims' discovery, the Company is issuing large 4/6 size test bottles post free for 1/10, under plain cover, one of which may be had on application. Please cut off the corner of this advertisement where marked, and send with name and address, legibly written, to the—

THE EDITOR'S PAGE.

Beautiful Hazel Harlow's adventures begin this week. You must on no account miss reading them. Under the general title of "Adventures of an Actress," all Hazel Harlow's trials and temptations will be recounted. A novel element in these stories will be the fact that the theatrical company which Miss Harlow joins will tour through the principal towns in the kingdom. Sheffield, Newcastle, Scarborough, and Rugby are among some of the first places she will visit. Readers living in these and other places will therefore be peculiarly interested. You should acquaint your friends with these particulars.

Love, Courtship and Marriage.

(Replies to Correspondents.)

"Town Mouse" was engaged to a man for three months, when one night, at a theatre, in removing her hat, she accidentally lifted off her toupée as well. He immediately got up and left her, and since that night she has only seen him once, and then he would not look at or speak to her. She is very unhappy, and asks what she can do to get him back.

Take my advice, "Town Mouse," and do nothing. He could not really be fond of you, or his love would have stood firm under such an ordeal. The wearing of false hair is a thing most men dislike, and, really, girls look far prettier with their own nicely curled.

"Sister Emmie" writes a sad letter. She has been nursing for ten years, and one day, in the fret and worry of hospital life, she rashly married one of the students on her afternoon off. Now they never see each other, as she has been moved to another block in the building, and she dares not go out with him on her day off, as it is against the rules. He has nothing in the world but what he is given by his married sister. She asks me whether I advise her to go and tell the matron all about it, or leave the hospital.

I am very sorry for you, "Sister," but should not advise you to do anything in a hurry. Why not go and see the matron, and ask her to get you a post in another hospital; give any excuse you think best, short of telling her how matters really stand. Write and tell your husband when all is settled, and you will at least be able to see him occasionally. It would be unwise to give up your hospital connection, as you will have to work until he sets up a practice and can offer you a good home.

Yes, "Jeanne," I am really pleased to have the opportunity of giving you the benefit of experience and of advising you. I know that it is a great comfort for a motherless girl to have a friend in whom she can confide. You say that you have been engaged to a worthy young man for five years, during the whole of which time you have waited for him to get into a better position, and he has worked hard to do so, because you think that his earnings are too small for matrimonial purposes. You believe he will make an excellent husband, and that in time he will rise to a much better position; but he thinks that you are spoiling your chances by waiting, and is willing to release you for your own sake. You are willing to wait for him, but wish to know whether it is wise, and maidenly, to go on.

Yes, "Jeanne," it is. A man of such qualities—a man who will work as hard as he is doing to raise himself in the social scale—is one among many; you will do well to wait, and your love will help him in his struggle. He is bound to succeed, and you are still young. I prophecy that I shall hear from you again soon, with quite a different tale. Show him this, and he will know that I bid you both "cheer up."

"Crazy Jane" has loved a sailor for a long time; he loves her, too, and has asked her to marry him, but she does not feel that she ought to become engaged to anyone, as she had an aunt who died mad. He has now asked her for the last time to be his wife, and she writes to know whether I think she would be doing wrong in accepting him.

Certainly not, "Jane," I think you are worrying yourself needlessly; many and many a happy married couple have some relation or other who has died insane. You say you love him dearly, so there can be no reason against your taking him "for better, for worse."

"Mollie" met a man last year at the seaside. He told her he was rich, and asked her to write to him. She did so, and they have kept up a correspondence until a month ago, when, instead of his weekly letter, she received a sheet of paper with a coffin, skull, and cross-bones upon it, and underneath the words written R.I.P. She thinks someone must be playing her a practical joke, and asks my advice as to what she is to do. She is doubly anxious, because she gave him her gold watch and chain to wear, and has lent him sums of money from time to time.

I should say that you have been taken in, "Mollie," and are very well quit of a rogue. It is a very dangerous practice for girls to scrape up friendship with casual seaside acquaintances.

STARTLING REVELATIONS OF THE STAGE.

THE ADVENTURES OF AN ACTRESS.

II.—A Devil's Lure.

By DONOVAN MART.

It was evening-time. Alone in the study of his palatial London house sat Horace Caldecott, his brows knit with thought, his black eyes gleaming with some hidden rage.

"So that's how the wind blows," he muttered. "Hazel Hadlow gives me the slip and rushes into the arms of Mr. Eric Monteith and his sister. She tells them her story, doubtless. And they befriend her, and escort her to a boarding-house, where she may be safe. But they little thought that the seedy tramp who dogged their footsteps this afternoon was Horace Caldecott. And now what's to be done? I've found out a good deal. Master Eric is to fetch her at eleven o'clock and escort her to Mark Danvers, the theatrical agent. He's to be her knight, is he? We'll see. Curse the girl! And yet I want her all the more now. How beautiful she is! Beside her Valerie Bellairs is positively ugly. Well, she's not seen the end of me yet. No, no! She's innocent, trusting, easy to dupe. I must think out a plan somehow. Anyhow she's safe where she is for the present. To-morrow, well—it will be Eric Monteith against Horace Caldecott, with the odds upon the latter gentleman. For, by Heaven, I'll move heaven or hell to get her in my power again! She shall be mine! She's nullified the hold I had on her through her father, but that's not the only trump in the pack! But there's a good deal to be done. I can't work the job through single-handed."

He pulled out his watch. It was nearly eight o'clock.

"H'm," he continued musingly, I'll have dinner first and then I'll go and pay an evening call upon Ben Quirk. He's the man for my money. I think with his help I'll be able to nab Miss Hazel for the second time. And she shan't give me the slip so easily again, or my name's not Horace Caldecott."

An hour later and a muffled figure might have been seen leaving Squire Caldecott's abode. It was the Squire himself. With hurried steps he made his way along the darkening streets, looking neither to the right nor to the left, pressing onward with the air of a man who had a fixed destination ahead of him.

Twenty minutes quick walking and he had reached a neighbourhood that was in direct contrast to the stately streets he had left behind him, a squalid network of alleys, one of those plague spots that infect London and all great cities, the abode of a low and ruffianly type.

He dived down a particularly unsavoury court, and stopping before a door, rapped in a peculiar fashion. In a few minutes he heard footsteps on the other side of the portal. Then the door opened furtively. "The squire?" queried a low voice.

"Yes," muttered Caldecott. "Let me in."

The door opened with a dismal creak. Caldecott slipped inside the house. It was very dark. There came a sound as of a match being struck. "This way," said the strange man.

Caldecott followed his guide into a somewhat dingy little room, the window of which was shuttered. The lessee of the apartment lit a candle. He was a small, rather wizened figure, with a humorous, clean-shaven face, and bright little eyes that twinkled cunningly from deep sockets. "To what am I indebted for this visit, squire?" he asked in a curiously well-bred voice, quite out of keeping with his surroundings.

"Business, Ben, business! And if you help me, I'll pay you well."

Ben Quirk smiled.

"Out with it then," he said.

Caldecott hesitated for a few minutes. He was evidently ill at ease. At last he found his voice.

"I came to you, Ben," he said, "because you're the only man in London who can help me. I want a man who has the appearance of a gentleman, who is well-educated and a good actor. How does that suit you for a start?"

Quirk shrugged his shoulders.

"You didn't come here only to pay compliments, Squire," he answered quietly.

Caldecott laughed. "You're right," he said, "and I'll be frank with you." He sat down on a chair. "Listen attentively," he continued, and then with quick, incisive sentences, he unfolded his base scheme.

The other heard him out attentively.

"It's a ticklish bit of business," he said, when Caldecott had finished, "and I suppose you're willing to pay for it. Ben Quirk's hands have been soiled a good many times since—well since the days when I used to sport it in Pall Mall with the best of them. How much will you stand in for the job?"

"Fifty pounds!"

Quirk's eyes glittered. "Fifty pounds let it be!" he said tersely.

Another splendid Hazel Harlow story next week.

CHAPTER II.

"Here I am, really in London town, saved from the clutches of Horace Caldecott, free from the degradation of Harlow Farm. And to-day Mr. Monteith is coming for me. And he is going to take me to the agent's. I'm going to try to earn my living on the stage. I can hardly believe it's really all true."

So mused Hazel Harlow, safe beneath the roof of motherly Mrs. Bryant's lodging-house, careless of the future now that to her inexperienced, unsullied eyes, the future seemed to hold out so many golden opportunities.

How could she be otherwise than sanguine? All her short life had been spent hitherto amidst the quiet of the country, a quiet that had only held one disturbing element, the advent of Horace Caldecott into her narrow world. The universe was a sealed book to her. She knew scarcely anything of evil, did not realise the dangerous potentialities that lay in her wondrous virgin beauty, even the terrors of the day before, when she had so providentially escaped from Caldecott's clutches, had almost faded from her memory.

Her high-souled nature revolted instinctively from anything that was base or sordid. And as her standard was so high it is surely no matter for surprise that her temperament was so sunny, so confiding.

She had found friends in Eric Monteith and his sister. What could she fear from Caldecott now. The depth of a villain's cunning resources were yet to be plumbed. It was a case of hawk and pigeon.

Hazel was not so unsophisticated, however, that she did not realise that difficulties lay in the path that led to her hopes of becoming a great actress. Yet her innocence, her fresh country instincts made her view those difficulties from quite another point of view to Monteith's and his sister's.

They knew the trials and dangers that must be in the path of an unprotected girl like Hazel Harlow, a girl, moreover, who had such beauty. Long and earnestly they had discussed Hazel together on the evening of the day that had witnessed their strange meeting.

And now Hazel sat in the little sitting-room that Mrs. Bryant, her landlady, had apportioned her, weaving golden visions about the future.

It was nine o'clock. She had still two hours to wait before Eric Monteith would come to fetch her, to escort her to Mark Danvers, the theatrical agent.

Eric Monteith! The name rang pleasantly as she murmured it to herself. And Eric's handsome, open face rose up before her mental vision. She could not admit to herself that she had fallen in love with him. As yet she was not ripe for love. The future seemed too dazzlingly alluring to allow her girlish thoughts to be distracted by a man's attractions.

A knock at the door dispersed her thoughts. "Come in," she said.

The door opened to admit the pleasant face and somewhat portly figure of her landlady, Mrs. Bryant.

"Here's a note for you, miss," said the woman. "There's a man waiting for an answer."

Hazel's astonishment can be well imagined. "Who could be writing to her in London?" She opened the envelope and drew forth a letter, written in pencil in a scholarly, neat handwriting, that ran as follows:

"Dear Miss Harlow,—It is with the utmost regret that I write to you a few hurried words to ask you to be so kind as to come with the bearer of this note at once. The fact is that my sister has met with an accident. I dare not leave her as she is, and she has asked for you repeatedly. Please come with all haste. You need not say anything to Mrs. Bryant, as urgency is of the utmost importance. The messenger I have sent is thoroughly to be trusted. Yours very sincerely, Eric Monteith."

Hazel read the short note with the utmost care, and after she had mastered it, she felt that there was only one thing to be done. Her benefactress of the day before was in danger, perhaps seriously ill. It was habitual to Hazel's trusting, sympathetic nature, to show her gratitude by every means in her power; of course she would go. She hurriedly put on her hat and hastened down the stairs.

In the hall a man was standing—a small, dapper figure, who smiled encouragingly at Hazel as she approached him.

"I am very much at your service," said the girl, "from the note I have just read I am to come with you at once."

The man touched his forehead with his forefinger. "Right you are, Miss," he answered. "I've a cab outside."

He opened the door, and Hazel, following his directions, sprang into a hansom drawn up against the kerb. The little man leapt in beside her, and they were off.

"Please tell me what is the matter with Miss Monteith?" asked Hazel eagerly.

"Well, you see, Miss," answered the man with alacrity, "it's this way; Miss Monteith, than whom a better young lady never existed, is a district visitor. She set off as usual this morning after breakfast to visit some poor people not very far from her house. These people live in a very poor street as you will see for yourself. Mr. Eric, he got a message not an hour ago, to say that Miss Alice had been hurt by a falling piece of masonry. He hurried off, to find her so badly injured that she couldn't be moved yet awhile. He had promised to meet you at eleven, but of course he can't now. And Miss Monteith asked for you. She asked me to take the note."

Hazel's eyes filled with tears. Poor Miss Monteith! What a terrible accident to have befallen her! As if a visit to a theatrical agent couldn't be postponed for such a cause. Her tender heart went out towards the sorrowing brother. How poignant must his anxiety be.

The cab suddenly pulled up. "We must get out here, Miss," said the little man, "the rest of our journey—it's not far—must be done on foot. We're going into a rather unpleasant place, but you will be quite safe. No one would think of harming such a beautiful young lady as you, Miss."

So saying, the man helped Hazel to alight. Dismissing the cab, he led the way down a narrow court, which debouched, near where they had alighted, from the street. In a few moments Hazel found herself in a maze of squalid alleys, the like of which she had never in all her life seen or imagined could exist.

It was a warm morning. There were but few people about in the sordid slum with which her comrade seemed so familiar. Hazel could scarcely repress a shudder. What a horrible place. The few people she saw only added to her repugnance.

The little man at her side murmured encouraging words into her ears. "Mr. Monteith and his sister are in an upper room of this house," he said, pausing before a door, which he opened, to disclose a rather dark and grimy passage, leading to a ricketty flight of wooden stairs.

With a beating heart, yet anxious above everything to reach and be possibly of assistance to the girl who had befriended her, Hazel began to mount the stairs, the man following.

"Top of the stairs, first door on the left," the latter said in a low voice. "I'll not come in. They won't want me."

Hazel turned the door handle and entered the room, words of pitying welcome ready on her lips. In a moment it shut to behind her, being slammed back by a man standing almost against the door jamb inside the room. Not a soul save he was in the apartment!

With a cry Hazel wheeled round. The blood fled from her face! For the second time she had been trapped. She was alone once more with Horace Caldecott, whose black heart had worked out so diabolical a plot to disarm her confiding innocence.

"Once more we meet, Hazel!" the villain muttered hoarsely. "And there's no garden across which to escape here!"

Hazel stared at him for a moment as though spellbound. Speech and action seemed frozen out of her. But it was only for a moment.

Then she sprang towards the door, and her villainous captor. "Help! help!" she screamed with all the power her lungs could give. "For pity's sake, help! help!" and her words were backed up by a scream that echoed again and again within the narrow compass of the squalid room.

Horace Caldecott uttered a cry that sounded like the snarl of a tiger. "Curse it!" he said, "keep quiet!" and his hands shot out so as to grapple the slender white throat of the hapless maiden.

CHAPTER III.

Punctually at eleven o'clock Eric Monteith presented himself at the Bryant's and inquired for Hazel.

"Miss Harlow's gone out," answered the landlady; "she have been gone about an hour."

"Gone! Where?"

"I don't know, sir. A gentleman came with a note. She drove off with a man in a cab in a great hurry!"

Eric's face blanched. His blood seemed suddenly to turn to water. "Good heavens!" he murmured. "What can it mean? Did she leave no message for me, Mrs. Bryant?"

"No, sir. But wait, I'll go up to her room. Perhaps she may have written a note and forgot to give it me."

Mrs. Bryant hurried away. She was only gone a minute or so, but to Eric it seemed hours. His heart was beset with a hundred sickening doubts and fears.

When the landlady returned, she had a piece of paper in her hand. There was a puzzled expression on her motherly face. "Read this, sir!" she said.

Eric almost snatched the note out of her hands. This is what he read, the note Hazel had received and left behind her in her haste:

"Dear Miss Harlow,

"It is with the utmost regret that I write to you a few hurried words, and ask you to be so kind as to come with the bearer of this note at once. The fact is, my sister has met with an accident. I dare not leave her as she is, and she has asked for you repeatedly. Please come with all haste. You need not say anything to Mrs. Bryant, as urgency is of the utmost importance. The messenger I have sent is thoroughly to be trusted.—Yours very sincerely, Eric Monteith."

Only one reading of this, and Eric realised the truth. Hazel had been the victim of a forgery, and there was but one man who could have perpetrated the dastardly deception, that man Horace Caldecott.

In a moment he had thrust the note into his pocket, dashed out of the house, to Mrs. Bryant's heightened astonishment, and leapt into a passing hansom. "Colbourne Terrace!" he said to the cabman, "and don't spare your horse."

The jehu, scenting a double fare, whipped up his steed, and in a few seconds Eric was dashing away towards Caldecott's house.

As the horse was urged onward his mind was working at lightning speed. Caldecott must somehow have tracked Hazel to his—Monteith's—house. He must have dogged her footsteps, how, Eric could not conceive—the ragged tramp he had noted so carelessly did not come into his mind as being connected with Caldecott—must have overheard the conversation between himself and Hazel, learnt that the girl was going to the theatrical agent's, and forestalled Eric by an hour. And now the girl was in her hated lover's power again!

Eric's blood boiled within him. He gnashed his teeth together with impotent fury. For he realised to the full now that he loved Hazel Harlow with all his heart and soul. Caldecott should pay for this black deed so sure as there was a sun in the heavens.

The cab pulled up with a jerk. "Colbourne Terrace, sir!" said the cabman through the butterfly. Eric leapt out, and thrust a heap of loose silver into the man's waiting hand.

He looked around him. Caldecott's house was a few doors beyond where the vehicle had pulled up.

And now what was to be done? Eric had no doubt in his mind, but that Hazel was within the house, and the villain Caldecott as well. Should he forcibly seek an entrance, and leave the issue of the adventure to Fate?

The young man's heart ceased beating, for a moment it seemed to him, as Caldecott's front door suddenly opened and a woman stepped out—a woman fashionably dressed.

For a moment Eric thought it was Hazel herself. In another he realised the vanity of his hope. The woman was stylish and handsome in a dark, somewhat pronounced style, but was as nothing, when compared with Hazel's glorious beauty.

The woman hesitated at the head of the steps, and looked half expectantly up and down the street. Then she caught sight of Eric, and her eyes were attracted to the young man's wild, somewhat disordered appearance.

Then Monteith sprang forward. "Pardon me, madame!" he said, raising his hat, "but is Mr. Caldecott in the house?"

The woman's face flushed.

"No," she said, "why do you ask?"

Eric hesitated. Was the woman lying? Then, almost before he realised what he had said, he blurted out, "Because he is a scoundrelly abductor, and find him I must!"

The woman uttered a slight scream, and came down the steps rapidly.

"What are you saying?" she hissed. "Horace Caldecott an abductor! Of whom?"

Eric drew himself together with an effort. "My name is Monteith," he said stiffly, "Miss"—"Bellairs," put in the woman—"Bellairs, and I have unimpeachable authority for what I say. This morning"—but at that moment a fresh interruption ensued as a cab dashed up to the door, in which were two men, the one helpless, with a white bandage stained with blood bound across his forehead, the other a small, wizened man with a clean shaven pale face.

At sight of the wounded man, Valerie Bellairs (Caldecott's lover and his dupe—see the story that appeared in last week's Short Stories) gave vent to a scream of womanish terror. "Horace!" she cried, "and wounded—perhaps dead."

"Caldecott!" muttered Eric, with a groan. "Where then is Miss Harlow?" He pressed forward to the side of the cab.

The little man, who was indeed Ben Quirk, looked up and down the street apprehensively.

"Best get him inside the house!" he muttered.

In a moment Eric sprang forward. "You catch hold of him under the arms," he said, "I'll take his legs."

Ben Quirk shrugged his shoulders and looked somewhat hopelessly at Valerie. But she was too much concerned with Caldecott's lifeless appearance to pay any attention to Quirk's gestures. "Get him up to his own room," she said, and running up the steps of the house pealed vigorously at the bell.

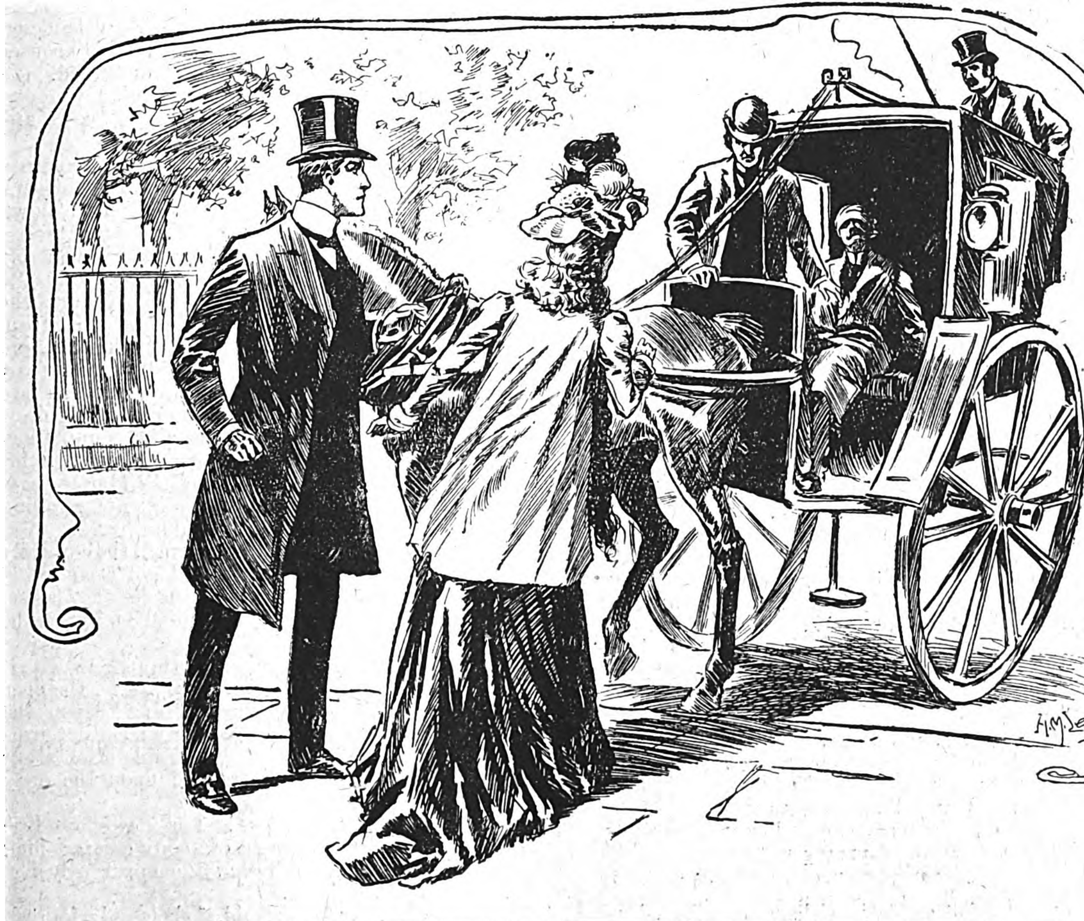
The peremptory summons brought a servant to the door almost instantaneously. Caldecott, still apparently lifeless, was borne up the steps slowly by his two bearers. Eric, with suppressed loathing and a fierce desire to learn what had become of Hazel; Quirk, impassive, yet pale, each man measuring the other, as it were, with their eyes.

Caldecott was carried to his room and laid on the bed. This done, Quirk did not hesitate. Muttering something incoherent he darted from the room and away down the stairs with surprising agility.

The little scoundrel did not dare to face the music any longer.

Valerie Bellairs was bending over Caldecott, her slender white fingers seeking to ease the bandage that bound his injured head. On the other side of the bed stood Eric, gnawing his upper lip, with an expression of impotent rage upon his face. For he felt instinctively that in some way or another Caldecott's present plight and Hazel's mysterious disappearance, were bound up together.

Suddenly Caldecott moved uneasily on his couch.



"Horace!" she cried. "And wounded—perhaps dead!"

Another splendid Hazel Harlow story next week.

His lips began to move, a ghastly smile played about the corners of his mouth.

"He is delirious!" muttered Valerie, "send for a doctor in mercy's name!"

"Ha! ha!" laughed the sick man. "I've got you now, Hazel! I've got you now! You won't give me the slip again! Falcon Court's not Colbourne Terrace. There's no back garden to help you here!" His ravings suddenly changed to a higher key, as with a white face Eric leant forward to catch every word that the fever-stricken wretch uttered. "Keep still, curse you! Ah, they're here! they're here! Help! help! help!" and a scream broke from the man's unconscious lips.

Valerie turned hysterically to Eric. "How can you stand like that, man?" she cried fiercely. "He's delirious! Raving! He doesn't know what he's talking about! Run for a doctor. Run, I say."

Eric drew himself up. He looked unmeaningly at the woman's white, haggard face.

"'Falcon Court,' he said!" muttered the young man. "Good God! what can it mean?" The next moment he had dashed like a man possessed out of the room, and down the broad stairs that led to the entrance-hall thronged now with startled servants.

The next moment he was in the street. Not twenty yards away was a policeman. To him Eric turned.

"Policeman!" he gasped breathlessly, "do you know Falcon Court?"

"Falcon Court," answered the man, musingly; "why, yes, that's the name of a vile slum not more than three-quarters of a mile from here."

"Then for heaven's sake come there with me at once. There's been foul play—murder, for all I know, in Falcon Court. I'll give you ten, twenty, fifty pounds if you'll come! Hie, cabby, cabby!" he called frenziedly, as a hansom trotted briskly past, to pull up abruptly at the insistent hail.

Eric almost hustled the constable inside the cab. The officer broke out into expostulation.

"Falcon Court, or as near as you can get there!" cried Monteith to the cabman. He thrust a sovereign into the policeman's hand.

"There's an earnest of my bona fides," he said imploringly. "A life may hang in the balance at this very moment. Or"—his young voice trembled—"we may even now be too late."

The policeman pocketed the coin and gazed wonderingly into the handsome face of his comrade. "Well, this beats anything," he muttered. Then he said aloud, "Are you armed, sir? Falcon Court isn't a place where the police are very much loved."

"We must find another constable nearer our destination," answered Eric decisively. "They can't kill the three of us, and"—with a touch of unconscious pride—"I was champion light-weight at Oxford last year."

The policeman looked admiringly at the slim, well-knit figure. "Well, what's the game, sir?" he said.

"I have reason to believe," came the rapid answer, "that a young lady was abducted this morning by a scoundrel, and lured away to Falcon Court. The man has since returned wounded and alone. Now do you see my reason for haste."

The constable let fall an oath with ready expressiveness. "A pretty game!" he muttered. "Poor girl! I hope we come in time. We'd best get out here, sir."

Eric needed no second bidding. A second policeman was standing on the kerb near at hand. Monteith beckoned to the man, and following the first constable, he plunged down a narrow court, just waiting to see that the other officer had taken his hint.

Accustomed as he was to the various phases of London life, Eric could scarcely repress a shudder as he followed the policeman down the sordid alleys that led to Falcon Court. To think of Hazel amid such surroundings seemed too terrible. And supposing that she was not there! Supposing that Caldecott had hidden her away somewhere! What could they do then?

Suddenly, just as Falcon Court—the name of the alley spoken mutteringly by the policeman who had been Eric's first guide—was reached, Monteith caught sight of a man that sent the blood racing through his veins. It was Ben Quirk, the little man who had brought Caldecott home. The man had dashed into a house. The court seemed deserted. Yet who knew what fiends in human guise lurked behind the closed doors that opened into the fœtid alley.

Eric noted the house into which Quirk had dashed. "Try here," he muttered, pausing before the closed door of the dwelling.

The policeman battered at the door with a vehemence that seemed to suddenly create a stir such as is aroused in a bee-hive when the inmates are disturbed. A suppressed hum of voices seem to break out; windows were cautiously opened; heads appeared, oaths and muttered invectives were heard.

But the door against which the trio battered, remained closed. The constables exchanged notes in whispers. Eric drew himself back preparatory to battering down the woodwork of the portal by main force. For somehow, instinct told him that behind that very door lay the solution to the enigma he had sworn to solve.

Then, as is often the case in this world of ours, the unexpected happened. The door was flung open from the inside, and a stream of men issued forth, like fluid escaping from a hole in a barrel. Cursing and swearing, the rabble nearly overwhelmed Eric and his two upholders as they swept out. The two constables drew their truncheons, and kept a way clear all round them by ample use of the same. Eric made play with his fists, standing back against the wall of the house, warding off many a blow and a kick, though not escaping sundry of the assaults made against him.

But at last, and by a miracle, as it seemed, the cowardly crew, warned doubtless by Quirk, had got clear away. The door lay open. Eric dashed inside the house, followed by the policemen, who shouted at him to be on his guard.

Regardless of their cries, he flew, as though on wings, up the ricketty staircase, and to a room above, the door of which was open. A cry escaped him. Upon the floor lay the body of a woman, upon her face, her arms stretched out in front of her, with a tangle of chestnut hair rippling down her shoulders and upon the dirty boards of the apartment.

It was Hazel! Hazel Harlow! For a moment Eric thought she was dead. A groan of agony escaped him. Then one of the policemen raised the apparently lifeless body in his strong arms.

"Don't take on, sir!" he said, "she's only fainted. My word, ain't she beautiful!"

"Only fainted," echoed Eric. "Then we were in time. Thank God! Thank God!"

Hazel Harlow's adventures will enthrall you.

CHAPTER IV.

While all these stirring events had been happening, Alice Monteith, the unsuspecting catspaw of Caldecott's scheme, had remained quietly at home, awaiting the return of her brother after the projected visit to the theatrical agent with Hazel Harlow.

Judge of her surprise, therefore, when at about half-past two o'clock a cab drew up at the door to disgorge Eric and Hazel, the latter looking strangely white and ill.

In a moment Alice realised that something had happened. But the story that she heard a little later from Hazel's own lips far exceeded anything that she had expected to hear.

Hazel described how she had received the note purporting to come from Eric—a palpable forgery, and yet written by some educated man, not Caldecott, for, of course, Hazel would have recognised her detested lover's writing—how she had not for a moment suspected foul play; how she had been lured away, only to find herself entrapped once more by Caldecott. The rest of her story can be told in her own words:

"On seeing the man I have more reason to hate and fear than all others—the man who ruined my father; my first feelings were those of almost abject fear. Hardly knowing what I did, I screamed out with all the force of my lungs, again and again.

"My action enraged Caldecott. He seized me by the throat, to still my cries, when suddenly the door flew open, and a stream of uncouth men rushed into the room.

"In a moment Caldecott was overpowered, in spite of his struggles, and, I believe, hurt"—we have seen how he was brought home by Quirk.

"But if I had hoped that my rescuers were honourable men, my expectations were to be cruelly cast down. Never have I seen such a repulsive crew of human beings as the men who confronted me then. I uttered a silent prayer to Heaven to protect me from such awful fiends in human shape as these men appeared to be.

"Then they began asking me questions. Who was I? How had I come there? Why had I screamed, and the like. I answered them as fully as I thought fit, imploring them at the same time to let me go.

"'How much money have you got?' asked one of the men. I told him, only a few pence with me, as was true. . . .

"He swore fearfully, and then he and the other men drew apart in the corner near the door, muttering together, though I could not hear what they said. At last the ringleader came to my side:

"'Look here,' he said roughly, 'you've got no money, and you don't appear to be anybody in particular, but you've got a fine face and figure of your own'—he leered at me in a horrible manner, and I felt myself growing cold all over. I seemed to be in some terrible nightmare—'and we're going to draw lots for you!'"

Hazel paused in her narrative, and a simultaneous cry of horror broke from her two listener's lips. Eric pictured the terrible scene vividly; Hazel beautiful, pale, helpless, around her the foul scum of as foul a neighbourhood as perhaps even London could with shame own to.

"For a few moments," the girl went on, repressing a shudder with difficulty, "I could hardly realise what the man meant. Then the full purport of his words came to me.

"I was to be made the means of affording these ruffians sport. In a few moments perhaps I should find myself alone with one or another of these fearful creatures. What could I do, alone, not even knowing where I was?

"Suddenly the men withdrew. But they carefully locked the door behind them, and all hope I had of making my escape faded away. I could not have got out of the tiny window, and even if I could have done, the act would have availed me nothing.

"The minutes dragged slowly on, and I was the prey to the most sickening fears. From sounds of laughter and conversation below me, I could judge pretty accurately where my captors were. What they were doing I could only conjecture—perhaps drawing lots at that moment for me.

"At last, after, as it seemed, hours had passed away, I heard a shuffling footstep outside the door. The next moment the lock shot back and a man entered the room, a dirty, blear-eyed man, who waved a piece of grimy paper in his hand.

"'I've won!' he cried, and to my horror I saw he was drunk. 'You're mine, my beauty!'

"The room seemed to go round. I could endure no more. The next moment all was darkness. I remembered nothing further until I came to my senses to find Mr. Monteith and a couple of policemen bending over me. How you found me, Mr. Monteith, you have already made clear."

Eric drew a long breath. "That scoundrel, Caldecott," he cried, "he shall not be allowed to get off scot free. I shall go round and see him this afternoon again. He must be all right again now."

"Oh, leave him alone, Mr. Monteith," cried Hazel imploringly; "he will kill you."

"It is only defenceless girls he dare try to injure," broke in Eric impetuously. "No, I must have it out with him."

"And now, dear Miss Harlow," broke in Alice Monteith, "let me beg of you to abandon this project of going on the stage; let——"

But Hazel interposed. "Miss Monteith," she said proudly, "I can't thank you enough for all you and your brother have done for me, but, believe me, I am more resolved than ever now to earn my own bread. I am sure that I have the makings of an actress, and I am not daunted by what Squire Caldecott has done. It has been a rude awakening for a country girl—this advent to London—but it has taught me a lesson. I shall not be caught again like that."

The girl spoke eagerly, almost defiantly. Alice Monteith sighed. As for Eric he could not trust himself to speak. The love that had arisen in his heart for Hazel seemed to grow stronger every moment. And yet how powerless he was. He could not even give voice to his love. And he knew, in spite of Hazel's brave words, that the dangers in the path of the girl, so beautiful, and withal so innocent and confiding, were manifold. He knew, moreover, that there were trials and tribulations that not even his strong young arm and passionate love would be able to avert.

"To-morrow, Mr. Monteith," Hazel pursued gently, "if your forbearance has not already been too severely tried, I will still ask you to accompany me to the agent's. And to-morrow I will not move from Mrs. Bryant's until you yourself come for me."

You will mention "Short Stories" to your friends, won't you?

“Then we cannot persuade you to stay with us?” asked Alice.

Hazel coloured. “I owe you so much already,” she said quietly, “that I could not dream of trespassing so much upon your goodness.”

There was something in the girl's voice that convinced her listeners that she did not speak thus out of mere coquetry. The speech was no honeyed politeness, such as convenance so often demands. Coquetry and Hazel Harlow were strangers.

Eric without further words slipped out of the room. He did not say whither he was bound. He merely asked Hazel to wait until he came back in an hour or so, when he would once more escort her to Mrs. Bryant's.

But his destination lay not far away. It was to Caldecott's house that he turned his steps. He rang the bell peremptorily. A page in buttons opened the door.

“I wish to see Mr. Horace Caldecott,” said Eric haughtily.

“Mr. Caldecott is not at home, sir,” said the boy.

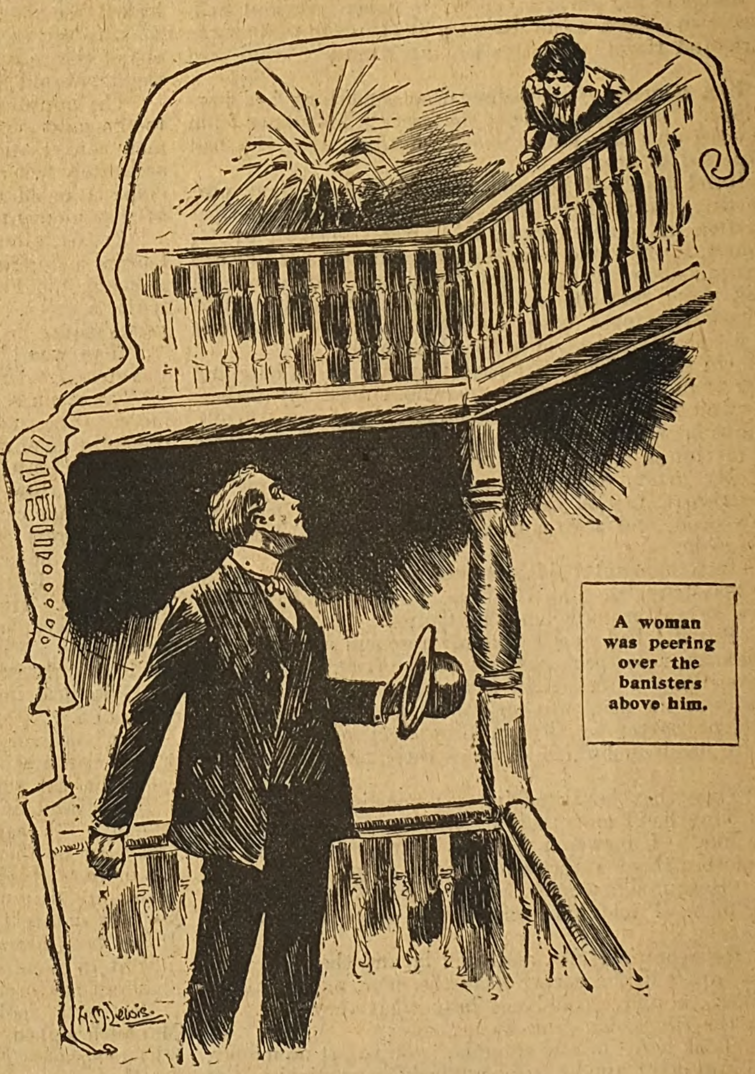
“I don't believe it,” answered Eric coolly.

The page-boy was too astonished at the unexpected answer to make any retort himself.

Eric, taking advantage of the boy's amazement, slipped inside the house. “I'm going up to Mr. Caldecott's room,” he said calmly.

He put his foot upon the bottom-most step of the broad flight of stairs leading up to the room where he had helped to carry Caldecott a few hours before. With a few quick strides he reached the first landing of the stairs. Here he paused, for a woman was peering over the banisters above him, the same woman with whom he had conversed when Caldecott had been brought home—Valerie Bellairs.

“What are you doing here?” the woman said, in a whisper almost, though every word was heard by the man below. “Have you come back to gloat over Horace Caldecott?” She beckoned to Eric. “Come,” she said imperiously. “Come and see the room where you helped to lay him. You needn't fear his delirium now.”



A woman was peering over the banisters above him.

There was something strangely insistent about Valerie's manner. Impelled by sudden curiosity Eric followed her directions. She threw open the door of the room in which Caldecott had been placed by Monteith and Quirk.

The chamber itself was empty. Eric's astonishment was visible in every line of his countenance.

A mocking laugh fell from Valerie's lips.

“So you thought to find him here, did you?” she said in a curiously restrained tone. “Well, you see your mistake. Horace Caldecott is not here. He has been taken to a place of safety by my orders. And now listen to me very carefully, Mr. Eric Monteith—you see I know you. This girl that calls herself Hazel Harlow, who has been responsible for all this, for Horace's sudden lapse of allegiance to myself—this country wench— thinks of going on the stage.

“Well, let her go. But remember, she has Valerie Bellairs to reckon with. Perhaps you'll think of that in a few days. Anyhow, I warned you. Don't forget that.”

Eric drew back a few paces. His frank eyes blazed with rage.

“And so you are in league with the hound Caldecott,” he said, “you, who call yourself a member of the gentler sex, are bound with a villain to endeavour to wreck the life of a girl who is as pure as she is beautiful, whose only fault is her stainless beauty. Well, as you say, forewarned is forearmed. This is not the first case on record where criminal jealousy and hopeless lust have been ranged on the same side against purity. As for Horace Caldecott, tell him that I will not rest until I have given him the horse-whipping he deserves."

Valerie's coal-black eyes contracted. Her limbs trembled with suppressed rage.

"Say another syllable," she hissed, "and I will call the servants of the house to have you 'chucked out.' I will give Horace Caldecott your message. And remember he is not friendless, neither is he poor. You will find that threat to give a horsewhipping cost you somewhat dear, Mr. Eric Monteith!"

Eric realised that he could gain no more good by prolonging the interview with Valerie Bellairs. He realised that Caldecott, if he were in the house, which was unlikely, would not be found by talking to this woman. He turned on his heel and left the room.

He met with no opposition as he descended the stairs and walked across the broad entrance-hall and out into the street.

Yet one thing he realised poignantly. He had, by his somewhat ill-advised visit, stirred up a veritable hornets' nest of vindictiveness against himself. For that he cared but little. What could Caldecott and Company do to injure him.

And if his visit had been ill-advised it had at least taught him one thing, and that was that in Valerie Bellairs, Hazel had now a most implacable and unscrupulous enemy.

Eric ground his teeth together in impotent despair. Would nothing suffice to divert Hazel from her fixed resolve to seek fame and fortune upon the stage? Would not even the portrayal of the scene between himself and Valerie Bellairs serve to convince the girl of the hopelessness of her aspirations? In his heart of hearts Eric knew that it would not.

Yet he determined to leave no stone unturned in his endeavour to dissuade Hazel from her purpose. If only she would marry him, slight though their acquaintance had been! He could then snap his fingers in Caldecott's face. And the most beautiful, the most adorable maiden he had ever seen would be his, while there would be no obstacle in the way of her taking her proper place in the world as the wife of a young and wealthy gentleman.

Hazel and Alice were still discussing the events that had just transpired when Eric returned.

To his sister the young man had made the somewhat strange request that she would allow him five minutes private conversation with Hazel.

To this demand Alice made no demur. As soon as Hazel and he were alone, Eric came to the point.

"Miss Harlow," he said breathlessly, "will you marry me?"

For a moment Hazel was too astonished to find an answer. When she did there was no mistaking her words.

"I cannot, Mr. Monteith," she said. "I do not love you in the way I think a girl ought to care for the man who is to be her husband. And besides, you have known me for such a short time."

"Yes," answered Eric moodily, "and yet I love you with all my heart and soul. I had hoped that you might have cared for me enough to have promised to think of becoming my wife. And, besides——"

"You wanted to find a pretext for dissuading me from a theatrical life," broke in Hazel, with something suspiciously like a smile playing about her lips.

Eric coloured. "Yes," he answered, somewhat constrainedly, "that is so, though it doesn't make any difference to my love. Believe me," he continued, with increased earnestness, "I am convinced that a hundred dangers and difficulties lie in the road that leads to your becoming a great actress. Will nothing make you swerve from your fixed determination? Put all that I have just said about myself on one side. Think of the terrible experience that you have just gone through——"

"And which your bravery alone has rescued me from, and worse." Hazel's eyes filled with tears. "You must think me most horribly ungrateful," she said piteously, "and yet something within me urges me to go on, to persevere in spite of all. Whether you consent to help me or not, I must go on now." And Hazel held out her hand with an imploring gesture.

Eric seized the little hand and pressed his lips to it.

"Come what may," he said fervently, "hate me, or love me—I had rather the latter—I will serve you to the best of my abilities. If you feel that the only course before you is that of endeavouring to go upon the stage I will help you all I can. And I can say the same for my sister. We are alone in the world. So forget what I have just said—for the present. I can't help loving you, Miss Harlow. I'm afraid I shall do so all my life. But I won't worry you with my attentions."

And thus did Eric Monteith promise to aid Hazel Harlow in her efforts to woo the histrionic muse. He had rescued her from death, or from worse than death, and yet the way before him seemed black and fraught with danger. What those dangers were time alone could show.

Hazel Harlow is now about to embark upon the sea of stage life. How her first efforts are rewarded will be told in a thrilling tale in next week's Short Stories.

HIS NECKLACE.

"But the idea is absurd!"

"Is it? Well, the evidence is against him."

"Uncle!"

"Great-uncle," corrected the old gentleman, interrupting her shortly.

"You surely cannot mean to say that you actually believe Robert, my husband, to be guilty of stealing those paltry gems—stealing that paltry necklace while enjoying your hospitality!" protested the young wife indignantly and yet almost tearfully, like one who knows that what she is endeavouring to scout is the firm belief, nevertheless, of the person to whom she is talking.

She had used the word "paltry" to express her opinion that it was not likely that Robert would stoop to theft, not in reference to the value of the necklace, but old James Bull, who was suffering from an attack of gout and was an irascible individual at the best of times, interpreted the term as a depreciation of the ornament.

"Paltry!" he echoed. "It cost—never mind—and it belonged to one whom I—er—liked very much."

A softer expression passed over his face, and Lucy Marks took advantage of a momentary weakness.

"Uncle," she said tenderly, "Robert likes me very much."

"He'd be an idiot if he didn't," was the discouraging reply.

"And I like him very much indeed," continued poor Lucy, hoping to bring her great uncle to a more tractable frame of mind."

"And I don't—and never did!" screamed Bull.

He had not intended to shout it out in that way, but a twinge of his enemy made him lose control of himself.

"It's no use talking any more about it," continued Bull an instant later, when he was more at ease. "I don't want a crying woman in my room; the gout is quite enough to put up with at one time—it claims all my attention and more patience than I possess. You may talk about the absurdity of it, and about the awkward and undignified position of a man who is virtually a prisoner in his own room, and all that, but I wouldn't lose that necklace for a lot of money. The evidence is against him, and I never had any opinion of him. A weak-minded fellow like that——"

"I will not stay to hear my husband vilified," cried Lucy proudly. Her eyes were still wet with tears, but they flashed indignation and defiance at her relative. "You will be sorry one day for your injustice to him—and me!" And she left her uncle to his own reflections and the gout.

"I like the girl's spirit," muttered the master of the house when Lucy had passed through the doorway. "I can't help believing the fellow guilty and yet I'm sorry for her sake. Shall I let the matter go? I really feel inclined to do so on her account, but I don't believe she would consent to have it hushed up. That's the contrary nature of women. I suppose I must declare that I think him to be perfectly innocent and let them both go about freely while the affair is being investigated. That would give him a chance of disposing of the things and clearing himself. And I don't think him innocent!"

It certainly was a peculiar situation. Lucy had been left an orphan at an early age, and her grandfather had taken charge of her; he had died within a year and Lucy was handed over to the tender mercies of her grandfather's bachelor brother, who was some years younger.

James Bull had behaved handsomely towards the girl, and had brought her up in a style befitting a young woman who was to inherit a considerable sum, for he intended to leave all his money to her. He was very fond of her in his autocratic way.

He settled a yearly sum upon her when she was nineteen, and expected that she would make a good marriage; but, to his dismay and anger, she set her affections on a man whom Bull regarded as ineligible from the first moment, and married him in spite of the old gentleman's protests.

"I do not wish to appear ungrateful, and I am ready to renounce the money you have settled on me," Lucy told him. "I love Robert and I shall be happy with him. You have often said that your only desire is for my happiness, uncle."

So the marriage took place, and James Bull increased the amount of the settlement, but his dislike to Robert Marks remained.

The chief reason for the antipathy was the weakness of Marks' character, an almost unpardonable sin in the eyes of a man of such indomitable will as James Bull. This weakness had caused Marks to sow various wild oats in the past and to waste his patrimony.

Lucy had settled some heavy debts before her marriage. Robert had not—so much must be said to his credit—courted her for her money, but had asked her to wait until he had gained a position which he could ask her to share.

You will mention "Short Stories" to your friends, won't you?

He was an artist—or "thought he was," as Bull put it—and hoped to do great things; but Lucy, with just a touch of her uncle's will, had insisted on using her own money. What did it matter if they loved one another and were soon to have all things in common? she argued. But that did not improve Bull's opinion of Robert Marks.

Marks worked at his profession, but the results were not satisfactory. After a while he was led into various excesses, which Lucy always screened from the eyes of others, and of which Robert always repented for a time. Lucy's love in no way diminished, and this caused her to see his faults in a less glaring light than other people.

When their little son was old enough to toddle about and to talk in baby fashion, old Bull's heart warmed towards the child, and the result was that the little family spent most of their time with James Bull at his house in the country.

It was during one of these extended visits that the untoward incident occurred that gave rise to the conversation just recorded. The old gentleman, in a confidential mood, had shown to his relatives an old-fashioned diamond necklace, which he seemed to prize very much. He had merely explained that it had come into his possession many years previously from a friend, and that it was worth a great deal. When they had finished admiring it he had said that he "must put it back into his room," and had left them with that object.

However, on reaching his room, he suddenly remembered that he had omitted to instruct his man, who was about to make a special journey to the market town to bring back something which he wanted particularly, so he left the case on his table and hurried out.

He forgot the case till the next morning, when he found it open and the necklace gone. Then he remembered that, as he was hobbling back to his bedroom after breakfast, he had met Robert on the threshold and evidently coming out of the room. The artist became confused, and the old man had passed him without a word, much annoyed at the presumption of the artist in entering a private apartment secretly.

Two hours later, when he thought of the necklace and found it gone, this incident naturally aroused his suspicions. He summoned Robert and Lucy to his room—his gout was now giving him great pain—told them of the loss, and bluntly asked the artist what he had been doing in the room.

Robert admitted that he had noticed the case through the open door and had taken another look at the ornament. Bull, now in acute pain, furious at the loss and bitterly prejudiced against Robert, accused him of taking the necklace.

Of course, there was a great to-do—angry and unfounded remarks from Bull, hot protests from Robert, and tearful entreaties from Lucy that her uncle would be more feeling and reasonable. But the old man, in the agony of gout, persisted in his angry denunciations, and ordered Robert to keep to his room and not leave till the mysterious affair had been sifted.

Bull summoned the local police superintendent in order that a thorough search of the house might be made, and it was while he was waiting for the arrival of this functionary that Lucy made her last attempt to relieve her husband from his undignified position, as we have narrated.

"What does he say?" asked Robert Marks anxiously as his wife entered.

"He will not relent, dear," half sobbed Lucy. "He says that nobody except us two knew of the existence of that necklace, and that the case is exactly like another which he sometimes has on his table and which contains a curious pipe, so that no one else would be attracted by the case as they would think it contained that pipe. He says he did it on purpose. I thought it was a peculiar case for such a thing, and it was certainly much newer than the necklace," she added with a touch of feminity.

"But it's preposterous!" cried Robert. "I'll not submit to it!"

"The matter must be cleared up or the stigma will cling to us for ever—even if he goes no farther than keeping you in your room for the present, Robert dear."

"But he would never dare to hand me over to the police if he does not find it!" gasped the artist.

"He will find it. It must be cleared up," said Lucy. And then she allowed her tears to have full sway.

"I was a fool to go into his room to look at it without asking his permission," groaned Robert, "but it occurred to me that it would suit for a picture I'm thinking of painting, and I wanted another glimpse to make sure, and I thought, as I saw the thing on the table, that I could just glance at it without worrying him. He's such a queer man and seems to have a grudge against me."

He pondered for a while and then started to his feet as a light dawned upon him.

"Yes, I've been a bad lot. I'm a weak fool, led away by any pleasant companion, and I've wronged you, Lucy. I can see it now. My career hasn't been creditable, though I've never done anything really wrong, and the old man despises me and is ready to believe anything. But he is a wicked old man to think I could do that!"

Husband and wife were so full of their trouble that they did not notice the presence of their four-year-old son, who had entered while his father had been speaking. Little Dick stood amazed, glancing from one to another, not knowing whether to cry or not. After a few seconds his hesitation vanished, and he stole away to confer with his friend and playmate, James Bull.

That worthy had just been interviewed by the police superintendent, to whom he had related his loss, but without mentioning the object of his suspicions, and to whom he had given orders to make a search of the apartments, including all private ones.

"I must have that necklace," he concluded, "and if you can recover it, in the house or out of it, I'll give you something that will make you happy."

So the officer had commenced his search. It was rather irregular, perhaps, but James Bull was a notability in the district, and he was rich. And the old man sat in suspense, expecting, yet dreading, to hear the footsteps of the child he had grown so fond of during the past two years. Ah, he was coming.

"Mummie's crying and daddie's——"

The youngster blurted out this intelligence as he pushed open the door, then he stopped and appeared to be on the point of crying himself.

"Come here, Dick," said old Bull. His voice was husky and his face wore a worried expression that might have been due to gout twinges.

The child approached him and waited to hear more, but as Bull did not speak, the child continued:

Another splendid Hazel Harlow story next week.

"Daddie says he's a wicked ole man. An' he is if he makes mammie cry." The boy began to whimper, "Who is wicked, grandads?"

"H'm!" coughed Bull. It was a delicate question, but the child unconsciously relieved him from the necessity of answering by placing his hand rather heavily, so it seemed, on the gouty member, and causing Bull to cry out more in anticipation than in actual pain.

"You mustn't touch that tootie, Dick; it hurts."

It would have amused the old man's former business friends to hear him talking baby language.

"But w'y does she cry?" persisted the child. "An' who is wicked?"

Bull felt that he must say something, for the child's eyes were fixed on him with innocent confidence. "Grandads" always helped him and told him things.

"I've lost something, Dick," he began awkwardly, scarcely knowing what he was saying; "something out of that box."

Then he stopped, hoping that this would satisfy the child. He could not tell him that he was the wicked old man or anything more connected with the affair.

The child's eyes followed the direction of the finger, then he ran from the room as quick as his little legs would carry him. He returned in three minutes, out of breath and holding something in both hands, something that made James Bull stare and turn red and pale in quick succession.

"I fo'got it, grandads. I'se very sorry, 'cos I didn't ask," said the child contritely.

"Did you take it out of that case?" demanded Bull hoarsely.

"Yes," replied Dick, frightened at the hoarse tone and beginning to cry.

"It's all right, Dick; don't cry, but tell me all about it," remarked the old man with assumed cheerfulness.

Reassured, the child told him all in response to questions artfully put. He had walked into his "grandfather's" bedroom, as he often did, and had opened the case which his father had not shut properly. Old Bull recognised that this was a natural action, for he had humoured the child in many ways. Attracted by the brilliancy of the ewels, he had taken them away to play with, as he hadj been allowed to do with any other unimportant effects belonging to Bull, but he had placed the necklace with his toys and had forgotten it.

No man ever felt in a worse fix than James Bull did at that moment but his iron will acted against himself just as promptly as in any other situation it would have done for or against anybody or anything else. In an instant he had summoned a man servant and bade him fetch Robert and Lucy.

"And tell that superintendent that he needn't look any farther and I'll see him to-morrow," adding under his breath with charming inconsistency: "I suppose the noodle has poked his nose into everybody's business by this time.

"I'm a fool and I've been unjust," was his remark as Lucy entered, followed by Robert.

After that confession he was able to explain more easily. Robert and Lucy frankly accorded the forgiveness asked for by James Bull, and as for Dick's share—well, they could not find it in their hearts to blame the child.

"It was a rough experience," observed Robert, "but it has done some good. We shall know ourselves and one another better after this."

A LITTLE MISUNDERSTANDING.

"PLEASE, sir, there's 'er lady wants to see you."

It was our office boy, who had broken in on my labours with his customary affability, not to say impudence, and even in my preoccupation I could not fail to discern that something or other about my unexpected visitor had stimulated his somewhat vulgar notions of humour.

"A lady, George! What sort of lady? I am busy. Tell her to leave her message. It is only a manuscript, I expect."

"I don't think so, sir," retorted the lad. "She said it was a very important personal matter, and she must see you."

"What does she look like?" I queried irritably, for really the interruption was annoying.

George sniggered mirthfully.

"Rather as if she had been on the tiles all night, sir, 'aw, 'aw! Prodmore said she'd want to tap you for a bob."

Prodmore was rather a low-class little brute of a clerk, and as I began to discern something of what had been going on in the office concerning the matter, I got more irritated than ever.

"Prodmore should be an excellent judge of that condition, certainly," said I, with crushing dignity. "Tell him, with my compliments, to pay more attention to his work, and less to matters which do not concern him, and put the visitor in the waiting-room!"

George retired whistling, with an easy unconcern, and afar off down the passage I heard a ribald chuckle escape him. Finishing the bit of work that was immediately engaging my attention, I allowed the sportive imp to follow my directions, and then I changed my coat for one a trifle more respectable and went down to interview the caller, whose appearance was so abnormal as to enlist the interest of a clerk in an office where callers pass in and out in a steady stream the whole day long.

My word! I didn't wonder at the mirth of George, nor the critical interest displayed by the unseemly Prodmore, though the thing was a long way from being amusing to me. Seedy journalists and penniless authors in varying stages of decay had passed through that waiting room, but never, it is safe to say, had it been graced or disgraced by such a disreputable, rakish old woman as I found waiting for me in a state of nervous excitement. A shabby old green velveteen dress hoisted on anyhow terminated in a pair of decent though broad-toed and evidently masculine boots, and was surmounted by a frowsy, moth-eaten fur, and a bonnet in the last stages of decay. A black-dotted veil hid the face from view; but it did not require an expert physiognomist to judge the lumpish, evil, dissipated features that its removal would discover.

My first idea was to beat a strategic retreat and be providentially out "for the rest of the day"; but ere I could put my purpose into action the door was flung open; and my visitor was pulling me into the room in a hysterical burst of welcome and explanation.

"Oh, Bob, I'm jolly glad to see you! What a deuce of a time you've been."

"Madam," said I, coldly unresponsive, "really I——!"

"Don't be a fool, Bob," interrupted the lady frantically. "I'm Murphy—you know, Cousin Murphy—and I'm in a deuce of a hole."

"You're what?" I stammered, and then, as my respectable fool of a relative hauled up her veil, the idiotic nature of the situation struck me and I subsided into a chair in a wild abandon of mirth.

"I don't see anything to laugh at, myself," protested Murphy, with chilling dignity; "but perhaps when you have done enjoying your evidently humorous appreciation of my unfortunate situation you will not mind lending me some little assistance."

"You—you look such an ass," said I, by way of explanation, between my bursts of laughter.

"Thanks," said he, more gruffly than ever. "Sort of reflection, I suppose—holding mirror up to nature and all that sort of thing. Hang it, I wish I was back home in Essex. Your confounded city seems to be populated by thieves and fools in about fair proportions."

"Don't get shirty, old man," said I soothingly. "What's wrong, anyhow, and why to mix in such doubtful society has the estimable Murphy wandered from his rural residence in the garb of a—er—lady? Fancy-dress ball gone wrong, was it, or just fleeing from your creditors disguised in drink and other things?"

"Drink! I haven't so much as seen an egg-cup of water nor a biscuit since yesterday," observed Murphy, forgetting his indignation in the new train of reflection called forth by my chance allusion. "You haven't a drop of whisky handy, have you?"

I hadn't; but there are means of satisfying such legitimate cravings at hand, even in newspaper offices, and while it was being procured Murphy waded in and gave me a concise and fairly lucid account of all that had befallen him since, in a misguided moment, he left his native village to come up and transact some business in the great metropolis.

It began the previous afternoon, and in the Post Office station of the Twopenny Tube, of all places. Murphy landed in London at twelve, and, after lunching at the "Woolpack," in Cheapside, he transacted his business and then went on to Holborn to make a few purchases of a domestic nature. Coming back his eye caught the station of the new line, and as the fame of the Tube had travelled even as far down as Wickford where he lives, he immediately conceived the idea of a short trip on it for the sake of the experience.

At the bottom of the lift he threaded his way through the tiled passages, filled with wonder and appreciation, and was about to enter the train when a foxy-looking gentleman rushed up to him, looked at him irresolutely, and then putting a weighty black bag of the Gladstone order into his hands, whispered: "Tottenham Court Road, and look fly—Splits is on to us. Bill will meet you there," and was gone again before Murphy could quite take in what had happened.

Murphy's chief feeling was one of resentment. Who was Bill, and why particularly should he "look fly" (whatever that might be), and what were "splits," and why, above all, should he be expected to act as light porter for casual strangers without a word of apology or explanation? His first idea was to put the bag, which was securely locked, and very heavy, under the seat and abandon it to its fate; and it would have been well for Murphy had he done so. But on reflection he felt that a mistake had been made, and since the bag might contain valuables, such a course might be productive of great loss and inconvenience, and so dutifully he went on to Tottenham Court Road, and struggled along to the lift and, perspiring freely in the effort, managed to drag his burden into the street.

Barely did he get there, when a gentleman of somewhat coarse exterior, and rough in manner, passed him, and, after furtively scrutinising Murphy first and then the bag, turned back.

"Come on," he whispered. "It's all right so far, but things are looking dicky."

"Are you Bill?" demanded Murphy, with a sudden inspiration.

"Right, cully! Come on," and the summary stranger turned and dived through the traffic with Murphy, his few wits scattered to the winds by the rapidity of the odd adventure, struggling after him.

Happily, for the bag was heavy (as Murphy forcibly insisted on my recognising) he had not far to go, and in a dingy side street, before a dingy house, his guide drew up, let himself in with a latch-key, and beckoned Murphy to come in without any undue delay. This Murphy did, and to his consternation and uneasiness the man paused to bolt and bar the front door, and when this was done to his satisfaction, he led my cousin downstairs into a sort of underground kitchen which was sparsely furnished with a deal table and a few plain chairs and some odd domestic utensils of the commonest order.

"Half a mo, and let's see what they've sent?" observed the man. "It was a close shave, but I think they must have got it all away by now."

Murphy's uneasiness, which had been steadily growing, culminated as the guide unlocked the bag and turned out on the table—just ordinary common building bricks.

"What the deuce?" began the astounded man, and then he paused and gazed at the contents of the bag first, and then at Murphy.

Brickbats evidently was not what he had been expecting to receive.

"I—I—I—," began Murphy with a stammer, and then he stopped dead, for, with a smothered ejaculation the other jumped to his feet and had Murphy covered with a suggestive looking revolver. "I mean," he continued, screwing up all the courage he could muster in a desperate endeavour to straighten the affair out before it assumed dangerous proportions, "I think there is some mistake."

"I hope not," responded the other with an unpleasant emphasis. "Who are you, and how did you get here?"

"You brought me," protested Murphy with some assertion. "I'm sure I didn't wish to come. Somebody, a friend of yours, possibly, pushed that bag into my hands at the Post Office station and told me to bring it to someone named Bill at Tottenham Court Road."

"The blundering fool," muttered the gentleman behind the revolver. "Well, look here, mister, you ain't a 'split' unless you are a darned sight more artful than you look; but you may be a 'nark' so mind what you are up to. There has been some little mistake here. You ain't unlike a gentleman we expected to meet, and my pal, being in a hurry, may have took a liberty. If so it's unfortunate for you, because I'm going to take another—lots of 'em maybe—and as I am a bit impatient look out that you don't worry me in case this happens to go off and hurt you."

Murphy said he'd be very, very careful. He said it feelingly, as though he really meant it, and I have no doubt he did, because even a brave man might object to be turned into a target for casual revolver practice in a dingy cellar without any compensating balance, and Murphy is far from being a brave man. What he chiefly wanted was to get out and go straight back home; but to this modest request, when he put it, his captor laughed frankly if somewhat cynically. His fitful mirth speedily gave place to ferocity again, for at that juncture an emphatic knocking at the front door above made itself heard.

"That's the police, or I'm a Dutchman," observed the fellow, more to himself than to Murphy. "Now look alive and hustle yourself into those, and—mark me!—if you say a word or give a sign, I'll shoot you dead." As he spoke he flung some articles of feminine attire at Murphy's feet, and my cousin, too dazed even to think for himself, abjectly donned them, while the other repacked the bricks, and fastened up the bag. "Now, then, hurry along. Put on the bonnet and veil, and, remember, not a word. I'll do all the talking necessary. Coming, you silly fellow; don't be in such a hurry."

This last was to the impatient caller, who was making the knocker play stentorian demands for admittance in his impatience at the delay.

The man left the room, and returned shortly afterwards closely followed by a police inspector.

"William Simon?" he queried brusquely.

"That's me, sir, and this is my missus," said the man, with leering insolence, all his ferocity having seemingly given place to the most humane and benevolent kindliness of heart and innocence of purpose. "We was just going out, and as we have a train to catch, perhaps you wouldn't mind hurrying up your business. Sorry to——"

"That will do," retorted the other. "Where's the man who called here half-an-hour ago."

"Man—who—called—here," repeated Mr. Simon thoughtfully. "I don't——"

Another splendid Hazel Harlow story next week.

"Yes, you do," said the inspector. "He brought a bag from the Tottenham Court Road Station——. Ah! got you."

The inspector's sharp eyes had alighted on the bag, and in a moment he had opened it, oblivious of the protests and entreaties of the custodian. When he saw the contents his jaw fell, and Mr. Simon grew aggressive and resentful in proportion.

"Them bricks are made by a new patent what me and a friend have discovered," he observed darkly. "And maybe you won't hear a bit more about this, Mr. Inspector. My missus here is a witness, and though I won't say there is any harm done yet the principle of violating a man's secrets in this way is against the law. What did you expect to find, dynamite or snyde coin?"

The inspector chewed his lips, and looked so thoroughly the fool he must have been feeling, that Murphy, despite his misery and precarious position, was constrained to snigger.

"You make the bloomin' missus laugh at you, and I don't wonder," observed Mr. Simon casually. "Now then, hurry up, because we wants to be off. You can have a look round if you like," he added generously. "Undo the oven door, Sal, and let the gentleman have a look there; or maybe he'd like to turn out the copper, or look in the coal-'ole."

The "gentleman" wouldn't, and with a mumbled apology or explanation he turned and left the room, followed by the tenant, who bantered him all the way to the front-door, and fired a Parthian shot at him from the doorstep. Then, returning, Murphy's captor made a few hurried preparations, and hustled my dumbly protesting and oddly reluctant relative out of the house.

"Best take my arm, Sal," said he with a grin. "It'll look affectionate and more natural like, and besides, it'll be handier in case—— "

He broke off abruptly; but the significant manner in which he tapped the pocket in which Murphy knew the revolver reposed was enough in itself to exact servile unquestioning obedience.

It must have looked lovely! I told Murphy I'd have sprung a pound to see it, but he only scowled, so I was constrained to chuckle in isolated glee over the mental picture I immediately conjured up of Murphy in that absurd guise perambulating the Tottenham Court Road, arm in arm with a disreputable gentleman who was evidently well known to the police. Murphy couldn't trust in his disguise as implicitly as he might well have done, and at first it was a matter of real surprise to him that he attracted not the slightest notice from the people they encountered during the walk. Not being particularly well acquainted with London, he had no idea where his guide led him. He noticed Wardour Street placarded on a big stone building at the corner of a street they passed, and from that and the time occupied, I judged that it must have been somewhere round Soho that Murphy was taken.

It was a dingy old house up a court, and for the first time since he had walked so complacently into this odd series of misadventures, Murphy jibbed. The place, he explained to me, looked "cut-throaty," and he had a preference for dying on the doorstep if he had got to die at all. A vicious dig in the ribs soon brought him to his senses, however, and under the refreshing influence of this he allowed himself to be propelled through the door, which opened mysteriously without sound or signal being given, and closed as mysteriously after they were inside, to find himself in a mixed and mysterious company of men.

A witty gentleman in a velveteen coat and a choker sang "Never Introduce Your Donah to a Pal," and complimented Murphy in somewhat broad terms on his personal charms. Another member of the company, with an eye to business, manifested a keen anxiety over his personal possessions, and seeing that he wore a twenty-guinea lever, to say nothing of a fair supply of spare cash, Murphy was not unmindful of his obligation when his companion promptly and effectively interfered.

"None of that, Saunders," said he tersely. "The gent is fair dealing, and don't mean us no harm. He has come along here to oblige me, and we don't need to give him any personal reason for wanting to come back later and pay us another visit with company which, maybe, we'd not care overmuch about meeting. Seen anything of Tom?"

They hadn't, and there as far as Murphy was concerned the mystery ended. Precisely why he should have been saddled with a bag of bricks first, and then dragged in ridiculous garb from one house to another in the way he had been, was quite beyond his comprehension. Nor did he have any further chance of investigating the affair, for shortly afterwards he was hustled into a dusty old lumber-room, and securely locked up there until far into the next morning. Faint from want of food and cowed and thoroughly demoralised, Murphy was then released by the gentleman who had been addressed as "Saunders," and, gowned and bonnetted as he was, was led forth for another perambulating trip round London. He had lost interest in everything by this time. The traffic and people in the streets seemed misty and intangible, like a dream, and he walked on in this dazed condition until he suddenly realised that his companion had discreetly vanished and left him to his own devices. Despite the taboo extended to his property, sundry other things had vanished as well, including all his money, though his watch, perhaps because it was deemed too risky, had been spared to him. Wandering along aimlessly, Murphy found himself at length in Holborn, and then pulling himself together a bit he remembered me in his time of need, with the result that I have already set down.

Fed and rested, and once more restored to his normal unintelligent frame of mind, Murphy, assisted by myself, made up a parcel of his disreputable raiment, and together we cabbed it down to Scotland Yard, and had an interview with the officials there. The result was not particularly gratifying, though it served to provide us with a reasonable theory in explanation of the comedy, and Murphy came in handy for helping to identify "Tom" (who had been captured on leaving the station with a bag of nefarious implements, including a supply of spurious coin) with the gentleman who had so casually enlisted his services the day before.

The bag found in the prisoner's possession coincided in every respect with that which had been intrusted to Murphy, and we could only surmise that in a hasty moving job, prompted by fear of a police-raid, "Tom" had got the two bags pretty badly mixed, with disastrous consequences to himself. It seemed reasonable to conclude that in the haste and apprehension the prisoner had not only mistaken Murphy for the accredited messenger, but had given him the wrong bag, the idea being to get the damaging evidence safely away to another place by one agent whilst the police were led off on a false trail, after a bag of common or garden bricks by another. Happily, or unhappily, according to the way you are viewing it, the best laid and most innocently artful schemes of mice and men, etc., and so it came to pass that one man got three years' hard labour, and Murphy got a brief experience of the crooked side of London life that will afford him all that he needs in that way for the rest of his existence.

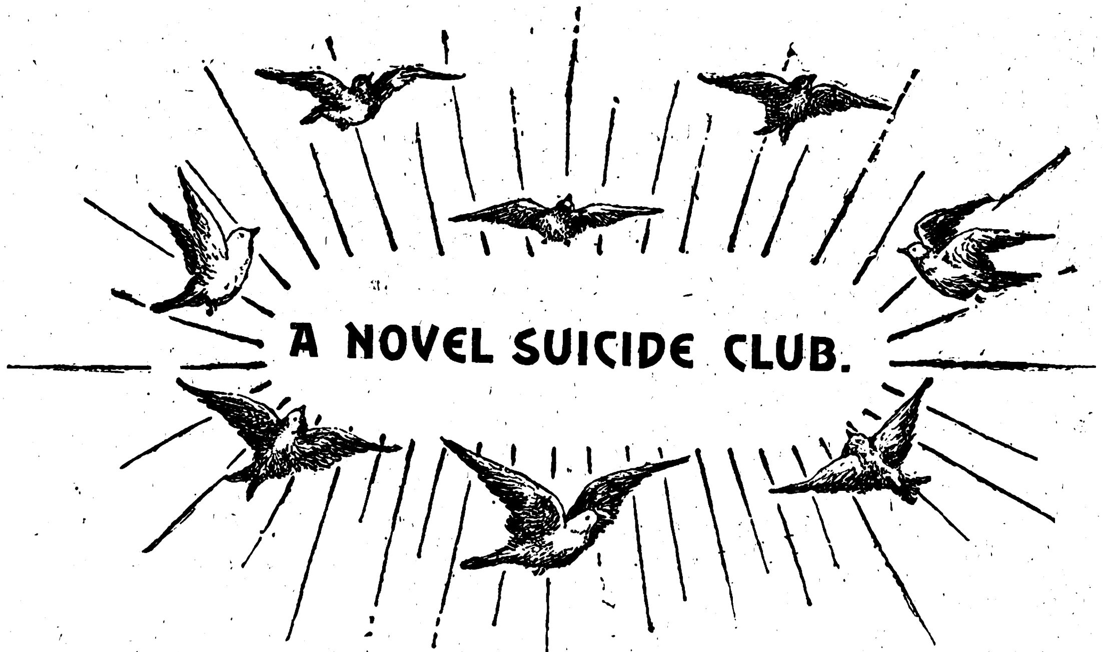
A NOVEL SUICIDE CLUB.



THE following extraordinary advertisement appeared in a London paper one day last summer. It was in an obscure corner, and hardly likely to attract widespread notice, yet its weird invitation to suicide did not escape the eagle eye of my chief at Scotland Yard, at which famous establishment I was then employed :—

> WHO WILL DIE WITH ME TO-NIGHT ?
> I am tired of a solitary life and can bear it no longer. I have neither family nor friends, and I seek others similarly situated who will join me in a plan to end our lives together in comfort. Meet me in the South Kensington Museum at six o'clock, and wear a badge of crape upon your arms. I will wear a similar badge.
> X. Y. Z.

I was ordered to investigate, and, if possible, to prevent the formation of such a Suicide Club as seemed to be projected, the methods of which were to be so sweeping and so sudden.

Although armed with a warrant for the arrest of " John Doe, others implicated, etc.," I was especially warned not to make any arrests until I was fully satisfied as to which of those who wore the badge of death, if more than one should appear, was the author of the advertisement and the founder of the new Suicide Club. I was further instructed not to act until I was sure that the crucial time had arrived, and that the strange body of cranks were about to execute their compact to die together.

It was with mingled feelings of amusement and awe that I examined my revolver before starting out on my strange adventure. I was totally unaware of the number of desperate mortals I might be called upon to encounter ; but when I reflected upon the folly of attempting to make them desist from their deadly purpose at the point of my pistol, the absurdity of the situation made me smile. There was a suggestion of ghastly humour in the idea of covering a man with a revolver and bidding him, in the name of the law, desist from committing the crime of self-slaughter.

South Kensington Museum is by no means a well-defined trysting place, and as I wandered through its many spacious galleries I feared lest I should fail altogether to encounter the bloodthirsty X.Y.Z., who had not only determined that he himself should die that night, but who sought to obtain travelling companions to that bourne whence no traveller returns.

I felt much oppressed with the weight of responsibility placed upon me. I was to save the life of one, perhaps of more than one fellow-creature ; to rescue more than one soul from eternal damnation ; and incidentally to arrest possibly a crowd of cranks who cared so little for human life that they were prepared to take even their own at practically a moment's notice. I endured an almost unbearable tension of fear and apprehension lest by some sudden impulse or by some pre-arranged signal one or more of my fellow creatures should hurl themselves into eternity before my eyes, through my delaying action, the fraction of a moment too long.

I had strolled into the Mummy Room, fancifully imagining that it might be an appropriate place for such a meeting as I had come to witness, and I was leaning against a case containing the shrivelled remains of what was once an Egyptian king, with all the hopes, passions and ambitions of a powerful and lusty ruler, when a bright-eyed, handsome, athletic young fellow sauntered past. I scarcely heeded the eager glance with which he scanned me, for at the moment I did not in the least associate that muscular and healthy specimen of humanity with the presumedly morbid creature who had signed himself "X.Y.Z."

My attention, indeed, was wholly absorbed by a young and extremely pretty girl, who at the same moment was approaching from the other end of the gallery. She bore an unmistakable business air, which, however, did not conceal certain restless symptoms of timidity.

As the handsome young couple passed each other, they started violently, and exchanged an obvious glance of recognition, though they neither spoke nor stopped. It was that which caused me to watch them more closely.

The man wore a somewhat threadbare, though well-fitting, suit of clothes, and a feeling of horror mingled with a sense of professional satisfaction as I saw upon his left sleeve a broad band of black crape. The girl was quietly and tastefully clad in a gown of some dark material, and as she passed me I saw upon the right sleeve of that fair bud of womanhood a similar band of black.

The young girl had evidently noticed the badge of death upon the man's arm, for after walking a few steps beyond me in a hesitating manner, she stopped, and, with her pretty face crimson with blushes, she turned and looked back at him. He also had turned, and stood with his hand at his chin in an attitude of indecision. In this position each looked long and curiously at the other, whom they reciprocally supposed had given them invitation to join in a double suicide.

Pity mingled with admiration seemed to beam from the eyes of the man as he looked at the splendid young creature to whom life, apparently, had so soon become unbearable. Presently, raising his hat with great courtesy, he approached the damsel, who stood expectantly with downcast eyes in evident embarrassment within a few yards of me.

"I am surprised to see you here, Miss Fligh," he began, with some embarrassment.

"I don't see why, Jack," she replied, with a little lingering emphasis on the name.

He flushed with pleasure, and said eagerly, taking her hand:

"Then it's all forgiven, Nelly?"

"Of course, you foolish boy," she answered. "Why were you so stupid?"

He was about to clear up this point, doubtless, when suddenly his face fell, and he said gloomily, touching the band of crape on her arm, "This means business, I suppose?"

Her expression instantly reflected his, and she said, sadly:

"You, too. I had hoped to be alone in this."

He laughed bitterly, and, turning with one accord, this sane and healthy pair, who, according to the terms of the advertisement, were soon to die together, walked slowly down the gallery side by side.

It was clear that neither of them was X.Y.Z. That they were previously acquainted was equally clear. The unmistakable glance of recognition which they had exchanged when they first met had prepared me for the intimate character of the conversation which I had overheard, and which gave an ample clue to the situation. It was evident enough to me. Two lovers, separated by some inexorable reason, probably money or the lack of it, had independently resolved upon making a life which could not be happy as brief as possible. All this I thought out as I strolled down the gallery after them.

As I came nearer to them their talk was again audible to me. Not another word of the unpleasant object of their meeting was spoken by either, however. By a sort of tacit understanding each appeared to avoid the subject of the advertisement, and their conversation consisted exclusively of the usual allusions to the weather. Once when the man thoughtlessly remarked that it would probably be warmer on the morrow, the girl seemed to shrink from him and shiver slightly. And then the pair who had been brought together under such extraordinary circumstances uttered a laugh that had more of pain than pleasure in it, and, lapsing into silence, strolled out into the gallery.

As they approached the restaurant at the entrance of the Museum, the young man said to his beautiful companion, who was soon to be his partner in death:

"Shall we not take a little refreshment—first?"

The word "first" seemed to stick in his throat.

With a smile of reviving happiness the little maid cried, as it seemed to me, joyfully:

"Oh, yes! I would much rather take a little refreshment"—and she, too, had to gulp down something as she added the word, "first."

They took a little table just inside the entrance, and I secured a seat sufficiently near to overhear some of their conversation. They ordered brandy and sodas. So did I. They evidently felt that they needed bracing for the work before them. So did I. Presently they ordered more stimulants, and I began to wonder if the curse of drink was the cause of their being tired of life.

It would have been a merry feast if the skeleton of that horrible advertisement had not sat in the vacant chair and chilled that bright young couple to their very marrow. I flattered myself that I was a close student of character, and though I caught but few of their whispered words, I did not fail to read the feelings of that pair rightly.

In spite of the skeleton, it was quite clear that the young man was very much in love with the strangely pretty creature who was to woo death with him, while the dainty little damsel was entirely unable to disguise the fact that this man who was seeking to die in her company was dearer to her than life. As I watched their ardent glances, and noted their complete absorption in one another, a hope sprang up in me. They had had a little quarrel, I remembered, since there had been a talk of forgiveness. Might not their present ghastly purpose have been the result of this misunderstanding, and might not this misunderstanding be removed in time—before the arrival of the fateful X.Y.Z.?

Inwardly I rejoiced that my mission promised to have such a pleasant termination; but my satisfaction and self-congratulation was premature and misplaced.

At the moment when I felt that their eyes were speaking the preliminaries to an appeal to live and love, as their lips were tremulously framing the words, "Live for me, and I will live for you," a tall, gaunt stranger stopped suddenly just outside the restaurant, and gazed long and earnestly at the badges of crape upon the arms of each of the young people. I immediately noticed that he, too, wore the fatal badge of the new Suicide Club, and recognised him at once as the arch-conspirator, X.Y.Z.

Hazel Harlow's adventures will enthrall you.

If any doubt existed, it would have been at once dispelled by the man crying out in a loud voice:

"Are you the young folks who answered my advertisement? I'm X.Y.Z. Glad to meet you. I've been looking all over the place, but little expected to find my friends of the black band in the restaurant. Never mind. A nip of brandy will put you in good shape for what is to come. Everything is ready and waiting. My carriage is outside. Let's jump in and get along."

All this before the startled pair could speak a word.

This was surely the recklessness of insanity. No one but a madman would have spoken of such a hideous project as he had in hand, in the hearing of people so loudly and so freely. I realised that I had yet a difficult and possibly dangerous task in hand.

Still, I was almost sure that I could count upon the co-operation of the young man who had found a new motive for life in his love for the romantic girl, the current of whose morbid folly he had stemmed.

What was my dismay, then, to see the young people instantly change, and show the greatest eagerness to fulfil to the limit of their appointment with X.Y.Z. It seemed as if the stern old man had suddenly obtained hypnotic influence over that athletic young fellow and that fair frail girl. Before his arrival they had seemed all gentleness and tenderness. Now each seemed as if on stern business bent. They announced their readiness to accompany X.Y.Z. to his home, and at least listen to the details of his scheme.

I knew that the proper moment to make my arrests had not yet arrived; but above all I wanted to see the home of the founder of the Suicide Club, and to learn the means by which he proposed that these two young people should die with him. It was therefore necessary for me to accompany them in the carriage. I had provided for such an emergency as this, and unobserved I slipped a band of crape around my arm. Then I announced myself as anxious to be of the party.

The young people started suspiciously, but X.Y.Z. greeted me cordially. He laughed loud and boisterously, shouting: "Bravo! The more the merrier!"

At this the young girl shuddered slightly, and seemed about to falter. For a moment her courage appeared about to leave her, and she clung to the arm of the younger man for support. Her pretty cheek flushed, and then became very pale, but she bit her lip and rallied with a determined effort. We passed out of the Museum.

That the founder of the new Suicide Club was no mean personage was proved by the splendour of the brougham and liveried coachman which awaited us outside. We were driven rapidly to a pretentious house in one of the best streets in South Kensington.

On that strange journey not one word was spoken except by the voluble old man, who laughed and chuckled fiendishly. And time after time congratulated himself upon having gathered together, as he expressed it, "such a nice little family party."

Arrived within the luxuriously furnished room on the ground floor of X.Y.Z.'s house, I was astonished to see that a banquet had been prepared, and we were cordially invited to sit down and partake.

Not one word of our supposed approaching death was spoken by our host, who seemed to be in the best of spirits; but the three of us naturally thought of nothing else, and the dinner was naturally dull. For my own part, I sent everything away from me untasted, partly from the fear that the old fiend's scheme might be to poison us unawares, and partly because I had no inclination to eat with such a distasteful and probably so dangerous a task before me.

It was a relief when the table was cleared and I still saw no symptoms of convulsions or collapse in my companions. Then it was that the old man arose and deliberately said:

"Now I will make a proposition by which I and my friends may mutually end our lives together in comfort, according to the promise contained in my advertisement."

I fumbled in my pockets, and held a pair of handcuffs ready to snap them on the wrists of the maniac.

"I regret that I am only able to extend this offer to two of you," continued X.Y.Z.; "for you, sir,"—he was addressing me—"have not fully complied with the terms. You have sat at my table, but you have not eaten with me."

A wave of happiness and thankfulness surged through me at that moment. I felt that my caution had saved my life. But the others! They had eaten, and I felt that there was no time to be lost. Arrests must be made, and physicians must be summoned. Stomach pumps might yet save the lives of those two sturdy young people.

"My scheme is simply this," began the old man, and I decided to wait at least long enough to hear the vile story from the madman's lips.

"You will make a pretty a pair as ever were wed," continued the old fellow; "and I want you to keep house for me. You shall have the deeds and my fortune when I die."

I was mystified. I gasped for breath.

"All I ask," said X.Y.Z., taking the young people kindly by the hand, "is that you let a lonely old fellow without a friend in the world since he put the badge of a widower on his sleeve have a lodging in the house. Above all, let him never dine alone again as long as he lives."

There was a moment's silence. Then simultaneously three newspaper clippings were produced, and three voices asked in consternation—

"Are you not the man who advertised for someone to die with him?"

"To DIE with me!" shouted X.Y.Z. in accents of horror, at the same time snatching the advertisement from my hand.

"Hang it!" he ejaculated. "The confounded printers have dropped the letter 'N' from its place. I wrote, WHO WILL DINE WITH ME?"

* * * * *

Two smart City editors of up-to-date newspapers the next day failed to print the sensational story of a new Suicide Club, which they had scheduled. For Jack Brevier and Miss Nelly Fligh, each clever reporters, reported it to be a "fake." Shortly afterwards, those enterprising reporters sent in their resignations and X.Y.Z. welcomed into his household an adopted son and daughter.

As for me—I left Scotland Yard, and took to—well that is immaterial, anyway.

J. Brewster Fisher

"BOSS."

"D'ye 'ear?"

"Yes, I 'ears yer."

"Well, do as I tells yer, then! Wot am I 'ere for?—wot are you 'ere for?—eh! you grey-headed old tar-brush, you!"

"Look a' ere, Joe Bracket! You may be skipper of this y'ere rotten old sailin' box, but you ain't Admiral of the Fleet—yet! So don't you go for to sling yer dirty insinivations at my grey 'airs. I've a' buried six o' your sort; so don't you forgit it, as I ain't a 'green,' 'and as 'll stand your cusses with impunerty."

"Captain" Bracket evidently concluded that he had had the worst of the argument; and, well knowing old Jim's peculiarities, and fo'castle reputation as a "ship's lawyer," prudently dived below, in retreat to his own den.

Old Jim did not seem to care much either way. He just turned his "quid," followed with one eye the disappearing form of his superior, and resumed his work (a splicing job) as composedly as if nothing had occurred to interrupt it.

It was a moot point with three for'ard hands as to who it was that really "ran" the craft—Old Jim (otherwise "Spouty,") or "Captain" Joe. There was a periodical inclination towards the "cook" (such being Jim's rating on board); but an exceptional "bluster," or a more than usually vigorous "tear-round" on the skipper's part at once put the latter in front again, an easy first.

He was, in fact, a "terror," on the whole, to every man on board the Sarah Ann, save and except Old Jim.

It was not that he drank to excess, thereby aggravating any natural predisposition to play the tyrant—his worst enemy could not justly accuse him of that. Truth was, he was a born "Jack-in-Office." To be master, absolutely, and without appeal, was his devouring ambition. Certainly, any success he may have had in that direction was due in large measure to an abnormal cultivation of two attributes than which none better serve the purpose of the average would-be despot—obstinacy, and self-esteem.

Then he was a big man, and bore down weaker wills by sheer force of physical superiority.

The mate, a little man, one Abel Dove, was a notable example, and an especial and a frequent victim. Each trip Abel vowed should be the last, and it was only because he and the Sarah Ann had been friends, without a break, for over twenty years, that he could not bring himself to give effect to his resolution.

Old Jim and the "mate" were the best of "pals," owing, it may be, more to the existence of a common grievance than to any moral likeness between them, or a similarity of disposition.

The cook was, of course, an "ex-officio," a member of the fo'castle set, its spokesman (on occasion), and its adviser at all times; but the mate, occupying a sort of "Mohammed's Coffin" position, between skipper and crew, the butt and scapegoat of the one, and the distrusted natural enemy of the other, was virtually acknowledged by neither.

The Sarah Ann, this trip, was in "light ballast," and bound back for Rochester, to which place she belonged.

Everybody on board was having a lazy time of it. The weather was fine, and the sun, during the major part of the day, hot to blazing point.

Now and again, "Captain" Joe would arouse him from a Napoleonic nap (like the great Corsican, he could sleep at will), and scatter the "idlers" in all directions. He had earned his patronymic "Boss," not so much by a righteous insistence upon the strict performance of legitimate duty, but for his aggravating assumption, and "bullying way" in connection with trivial and altogether unnecessary details. "The Boss," in the ordinary sense of the designation he was not, but "Boss," a riverine despot, an autocratic irritant, whose every act and word was as a "storm signal" for his unfortunate subordinates.

His passage-at-arms with Old Jim, already chronicled, had reference to a somewhat sore subject, perennial almost in its habit of continually "cropping up" as between the two.

It seemed that "Boss" had at some time or other in the remote past wooed and won a certain Kentish beauty, dwelling in the neighbourhood of Rainham, on the Medway.

Another splendid Hazel Harlow story next week.

The wedding-day was fixed, the guests invited, and a gorgeous spread supplied by a Rochester confectioner.

At the last moment, however, almost, it may be said, at the Altar's foot, the "bridegroom designate" elected to repudiate his obligations—incontinently changed his mind.

When bride and guests assembled in eager anticipation of an especially "happy day," gastronomically and otherwise, "Captain" Joe was well on his way, with a fair wind and a flowing sheet, towards London.

It cannot be contended that the lady's disappointment was either keen or lasting, as, before three months had elapsed, she had consoled herself with the runaway's "best man."

This convenient arrangement ought, in the nature of things, to have ended the matter, and would have done, no doubt, had there not been something more behind.

The sting of the whole affair—the sting left, that is,—was the unsettled-for marriage feast.

In the not-as-yet faded glow of love and expectant happiness, it had been ordered by "Captain" Joe himself, and when the day of settlement arrived, the friends of his sometime intended, deeming the recreant swain alone responsible, declined paying on any consideration.

Now it so happened that Old Jim, then Young Jim, was at that time a working hand in his elder brother's "cook and confectionery" business in High Street Rochester—the particular establishment favoured by "Captain" Joe.

A single man himself in those days, and therefore without any of life's ordinary cares and anxieties, Old Jim had adopted this "bad debt" as a peculiar personal grievance.

His brother had long ceased to trouble about it, seeing the utter hopelessness of ever getting his money; but Old Jim had his own opinion, and backed it to the full extent of his ability. Ever with the one purpose in view the bringing "Boss" to book—he first schemed, and successfully, to get employed on board the Sarah Ann; and then, in season and out of season, to maintain a patiently persistent "nudging," as it were, of the "defaulting" skipper's memory.

No one opportunity did he lose to "say a few words;" and when his victim, goaded almost to madness, commanded the doing of something "not in the order book," Jim only smilingly shrugged his shoulders and "piled up" for next time.

In this, his latest attempt to "dun" the skipper, he had been aided materially by some news which had reached him while the boat was lying for a few hours off Erith.

"Captain" Joe's old flame had, it appeared, recently lost her husband, a prosperous Rochester tradesman, and the widow, though past middle life, was not disinclined to the idea of taking another mate. Being fairly well-to-do, this would be no very difficult matter—Jim's informant more than half hinting that "Boss" could have the "situation" for the asking.

This latter detail Jim had, for obvious reasons, kept to himself; but the fact of the "Captain's" erewhile rival's decease had been used by him in a masterly manner as an illustrious means to the one great end.

That it affected Mr. Bracket not a little we have seen, and when he sat down to dinner with the mate, the latter saw unmistakably that something more than ordinarily important or unpleasant was on the board.

Still, nothing occurred of any moment or worth mentioning, beyond the usual "snap" and "snarl", which was too common and every-day an experience to be taken serious notice of.

Rochester reached, "Captain" Joe "tidied" himself with exceptional care, and, leaving strict injunctions with his deputy that no one was to go ashore until he returned, went his way up from the river into the town.

Two hours afterwards he came aboard again, and sent immediately for the "cook."

Old Jim slouched aft, and deliberately made his way down through the "hatch" to where the skipper awaited him.

"I want," he said, rattling a handful of coins in his trousers pocket, "I want to pay that bill."

"Well," said Old Jim, a trifle puzzled, but not showing it, "pay it! You've bin long enough time thinkin' about it! It's time yer did."

"But who've I got to pay it to?" asked the skipper, impatiently a bit, but still keeping his temper wonderfully for him.

"D'ye want ter know?" queried Old Jim, with a curious little laugh.

"If I didn't I shouldn't ask yer!" retorted the other.

"Oh, yer wouldn't, wouldn't yer? I ain't so sure about that; but since yer don't know, and want ter know, why, I'll tell yer."

"Out with it, then. Who is it I've got to pay the money to?"

"ME!"

"You! You miserable old scallywag! You! What have you got to do with it?"

"Jist this. Brother's dead; bin dead for years. I'm 'is 'exekiter,' an' sole legatee. That's wot I've got ter do with it!"

"Well, I ain't disposed to argue the point with you. Here's the money, and your discharge. Now you can clear out as soon as you like. Go ashore and stay there."

"I will—it'll just suit me. I wants a master, not a 'Boss.' But look a 'ere, 'Captain' Joe," and Old Jim held out his right hand, and turned over slowly the money in it with his left, "if I may be so bold as to ask, Wot's yer little game? Why's yer so sudden pertikler in payin' up?"

"If you don't pack up and get ashore, I'll 'ave you put over the side!"

"No you won't. Not, at least, without paying me my wages."

"Captain" Joe saw that he had made a mistake, and hastened to rectify it.

In half an hour Old Jim, bundle in hand, his wages in one pocket, his "breakfast" money in the other, left the Sarah Ann without much regret.

In the bar of the "Rodney Arms" he ran against the mate, Abel Dove. To him Old Jim repeated his query anent the probable motives of "Captain" Joe; but the mate was in all respects as ignorant as himself.

When, however, in the course of a week or so, Old Jim heard of his late skipper's union with the widow Dyson, the riddle was solved, and—he thought things.

He made just one remark on the subject, which, inasmuch as it explains much which otherwise would remain an inexplicable mystery, is worthy of record.

"'Boss' he may be on the deck of the Sairy Ann; but if 'e'll be 'boss' on 'er 'earthrug, then I'm a thunderin' old idiot."

Which he certainly was not.

The Golden Dwarf

A Sensational Romance of To-Day.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "A Keeper of Secrets," "Hate, the Destroyer," "A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS OF "GOLDEN DWARF."

"It is the body of Sir Christopher Dering!"

The words are spoken by a pretty girl—fair-haired, blue-eyed. She stands, horrified, by a grass-grown ditch in a country lane, out of which a great mastiff is climbing. The ditch contains the corpse of a stalwart man—a handkerchief bound over his mouth and nostrils.

Close to there is a strange figure, graceful, well-dressed, even handsome, but with the stature of a boy and the face of an adult. He carries a heavy dog-whip, and stares, fixedly, at the dead body just discovered by his mastiff, Cerberus.

The girl is Esther Carew; the dwarf, Otto Hare, the richest landowner in Derbyshire, and the mystery of Wyresdale, a village in that county. For the first time in fifteen years he has set foot in a public thoroughfare, to attract the attention of Esther, whom he has watched from his park.

Sir Christopher Dering was alive at seven o'clock the preceding day. He and his nephew, Felix, had quarrelled over the latter's love for Esther. Sir Christopher wanted Felix to make a good marriage—the birth of his little cousin Brian has put him out of the succession to the baronetcy. Felix is faithful to the penniless Esther Carew.

Much turns on the whereabouts of Felix on the night before. It appears that he was in Duchester, some miles off, whither he went on business, and spent a night at the theatre. Could he have killed the squire?

Felix in vain protests his innocence.

But the cloud of suspicion gathers around him. Meantime, the child Brian has been kidnapped, and Felix is suspected of this too. He discovers a riding whip with some peculiar marks upon it.

CHAPTER XXII.

"A Very Pretty Clue."

"I am fortunate in finding you alone, Miss Carew; I particularly desired the privilege of a brief private conversation with you."

Otto Hare paused near the large "chesterfield," from which Esther had just risen. He removed his driving-gloves to extend a small, brown palm.

Esther Carew permitted him to clasp her fingers; the Golden Dwarf felt that they were of an almost deathly coldness.

"The last time I had the honour to touch your hand, Miss Carew," observed Otto Hare, "you fainted; owing, no doubt, to the closeness of the afternoon. May I express my pain at your indisposition and a hope that it was merely transient."

"Quite, thank you, Mr. Hare," murmured Esther.

Her voice trembled—she had reason to dread an interview with the diminutive personage who now stood before her. This particular colloquy she had especial cause to fear; Dr. Kraft's warning was precise; upon her conduct for the next few moments hung the fate of the man she loved best in the world.

The Golden Dwarf flung down his hat and gloves and leaned on the end of the couch; fascinated yet terrified, Esther resumed her seat. The dark eyes of Otto Hare studied her—a sombre passion glowed in their unfathomable depths.

"Miss Carew," he said, "tell me, would you rather have me for a friend or an enemy?"

The demand fell on Esther's ears like a veiled threat.

"I—I don't wish to have any enemies," she stammered.

Her persecutor frowned.

"Some people must be either one or the other," he objected. "I am a person of that sort, Miss Carew. If I were to become your foe, for instance, I should hate those you cherished and cherish those you hated. Man, woman, child, or beast, I should rejoice in destroying all that was dear to you, in aiding all that was hostile to you. Were I in love and had a rival—a favoured rival, Miss Carew—I would ruin him; by fair means or foul, I would ruin him."

Esther struggled for breath, a grasp of iron seemed laid upon her heart—Kraft's caution came back to her: "Mr. Hare has secretly obtained proof that on the night of Sir Christopher's death his nephew was in Wyresdale." Whether or not she was intended to comprehend the full meaning of the Golden Dwarf's deliberate phrases, they were an unmistakable menace.

"You—you could not be so dishonourable, Mr. Hare," she faltered, her bosom heaving.

Otto Hare sneered. "Honour and dishonour are but words, Miss Carew," was his answer; "when I set my mind on a thing, every expedient is good which brings me to my goal. If you knew me better you would admit that I do not boast in saying so. However, I will not pursue the subject, since it displeases you."

He relinquished his lounging attitude and stepped up to sit by her. A shudder ran over Esther, yet she did not dare to shrink from him. "Harden yourself against Mr. Hare's suit," the wily German had told her, "and I would not give a bad half-crown for Mr. Dering's life."

"You are aware," proceeded Otto Hare, "of my plan to give a garden party in Wyresdale Park and of your mother's kind promise to act as hostess?"

Esther Carew assented; the Golden Dwarf, by a skilful change of position, diminished the space between them.

"Miss Carew," said Otto Hare, "you will naturally be present at that event, and your presence, under the circumstances, will set the gossips chattering. You are young and beautiful, I am rich and a bachelor—you are the only woman in Wyresdale to whom I have paid, during fifteen years, the least regard."

He looked into her pallid face with cool self-possession.

Esther gazed at him, her nerves strained, her brain whirling. Would he ask her to marry him—him whom she had met a bare fortnight earlier, yet had never seen except to fear and to loathe? She could not, she could not say "yes." But if she answered "no" what might not happen to Felix?

"Such gossip," continued the Golden Dwarf, "flattering though it would be to me, might offend you, Miss Carew. I have even been assured that without Mr. Felix Dering, whose mourning for Sir Christopher must keep him away, my party would be but dull to Miss Esther Carew."

Esther blushed, as much with terror as embarrassment. The keen pupils of Otto Hare seemed to devour her expression.

"Not that I credit these foolish rumours," said the Golden Dwarf; "yet I confess, Miss Carew, had I believed this, I should have been compelled to protect you from this black-sheep of the Derings. I have a sly sympathy for the criminal, and while I could, if I chose, put Mr. D.'s neck in danger of the noose, it is no business of mine to do the work of the police. But if he were to cross my—or shall I say our paths, Miss Carew, it would be different. I should have to hit hard."

The listener moaned. Dr. Kraft had not, then, deceived her. Vaguely, diabolically, Otto Hare was threatening Felix Dering. The Golden Dwarf smiled—a cruel, satisfied smile.

"Of course," added Otto Hare, "I realise the ridiculous nature of the report that you are attracted by Mr. Dering, and he is safe from me so long as he does not insult you with his attentions. Were he to presume that far, I will own, Miss Carew, I should be malicious enough to do him a very ill turn, a very ill turn."

The Golden Dwarf bent towards the drooping form of Esther.

"I have pointed out to you," he said, "the construction which will be placed on your presence at my party. You might be tempted to develop a headache, or some nominal indisposition as an excuse for your absence. I should resent that bitterly, Miss Carew, and I want you to promise you will not fail me."

He put out a tiny palm and laid it on hers. It stung her like the contact of some venomous claw. But she murmured to herself the name of Felix; for his sake she would endure, she would warn him to fly, she would gain time for him to make his escape. Glancing with piteous eyes at Otto Hare, she replied weakly, "I—I will certainly be there, Mr. Hare, since you wish it."

A kiss, lightly imprinted upon Esther's hand, was the Golden Dwarf's acknowledgment of the undertaking she had entered into. Unimportant as it seemed, it served to show that Esther had understood his threat against Felix Dering, and that, moreover, to protect her lover, she was prepared to tolerate at least the rumour of an engagement between herself and Otto Hare. Thus, the unscrupulous device of Dr. Kraft had been crowned by a measure of success.

A couple of figures—a thin and a stout—were stealing towards him.

The Golden Dwarf was no mean diplomatist.

Content with his achievement, he bade his quivering victim farewell and bowed himself out, leaving Esther to weep and chafe unavailingly.

Mounting into his "spider" phaeton, Otto Hare took the reins from the groom and roused the cobs; the animals dashed off at their usual swift trot. They reached the cross-roads and turned down, under their master's control, the narrow lane which led to the lodge-gates of Dering House.

Their way took them past the dilapidated cottage of Nicholas Foley. The Golden Dwarf, who glanced this side and that as the roans dashed along, noticed the one-armed sailor. Nicholas, grasping a tall lime-wash brush, was at work on the weather-beaten walls of his residence.

Otto Hare drew rein in so sudden a fashion as to drag the most spirited of the cobs upon its haunches.

Foley heard the scuffle of hoofs and looked round. The Golden Dwarf motioned with his whip, and Nicholas, reluctantly enough, deposited the brush in an angle of the door and came to the kerb.

The sailor's tanned countenance was a trifle anxious, but he stared up boldly at the remarkable being who had summoned him.

"I've seen you before, my man, haven't I," said Otto Hare, his delicate features distorted to a grim smile.

Nicholas Foley stepped clear of the phaeton wheels, the cobs were swinging fretfully back and forward, impatient of the stoppage.

"I'm none so positive of that, sir," he observed. "Where might you fancy you'd sighted me?"

The Golden Dwarf knitted his brows. "No evasions," was his answer; "you know where I saw you—in Wyresdale Park, the other day. Come, I forgive you taking care of yourself; you shall hear no more of the accident to—to my dog." He got out a sovereign-purse, slipped a coin from it, and tossed the piece of money to the sailor. "What were you there for," he demanded; "poaching or curiosity? You shan't regret frankness."

Nicholas grinned. "Well, your honour," he said, "a fine fat rabbit gives a bit of a taste to bread and ale, and I'm but a dismasted hulk. It's hard to live at the best."

Otto Hare studied the speaker a second. "I don't grudge an old seaman a rabbit or two," rejoined the Golden Dwarf; "but you must be careful of the dogs. And you'd better tell the keeper you have permission to set a few snares. But no powder and shot, mind. What's your name?"

Nicholas pulled his forelock, astonished. "Foley," he said; "Nicholas Foley, and thank your honour."

Otto Hare had not waited for the expression of his protégé's gratitude; the phaeton was already a score of yards down the road.

The sailor scratched his cranium. "Nick, my lad," he muttered; "here's where you'll heave the lead, if you're wise. Is the little beggar bony-fidey, or is he not? And why the dickens should he forgive me knifing his bow-wow; it isn't natural."

He went up the narrow garden-walk, regained his brush, and proceeded with the whitening of the cottage.

"Blowed," was his reflection, "if I don't toddle off to-night and take afresh the bearings of that ruin place in the Park. With a pal and a length of good rope I'd have had it overhauled from truck to keelson; I've neither line nor messmate, worse luck."

His task occupied him till dusk. When he had eaten his evening meal and smoked a pipe, the moon was up and the lanes of Wyresdale cool and dark in the scented gloom.

Locking his door, Nicholas set out in the direction of the brick wall that skirted the Golden Dwarf's demesnes. The low-growing boughs on the main-road once more gave him access to the park and he stole through the plantation to the green slope and the round-topped tower.

On the edge of the plantation he paused. A couple of figures—a thin and a stout—were stealing towards him. An indistinct load was borne by the latter, an implement of some sort by the former. Foley climbed a tree with singular skill and stretched himself upon its biggest branch.

At a short distance the shadowy shapes had halted. By the moonbeams the sailor was able to perceive that one was apparently engaged in the act of digging. Anxious to observe them at less disadvantage, Nicholas crawled further along his branch. The procedure was disastrous, the strained fibres bent and swung.

The noise of the rent wood arrested the dim figures, they moved towards the origin of the mimic explosion. From several quarters there arose also the sudden clamour of the ferocious mastiffs which ran loose in the park. Foley dropped to the ground, doubled on his tracks, and fled.

As he surmounted the wall and slid to the kerb a heavy hand descended upon his shoulder. It was that of Inspector Brasher.

Nicholas threw off the grasp.

"Belay there," he said, "I've not been trespassing nor yet poaching. I've merely been to set a few snares for rabbits—Mr. Hare himself gave me permission. My name is Foley, retired seaman, and brother-in-law to Mr. Forester, chemist, of the High Street. This course is the nearest, so I steer it, though I might go round by the avenue."

Michael Brasher stroked his beard. "Brother-in-law to Mr. Forester," he repeated. "How long have you been in Wyresdale?"

"Less than a fortnight and more than a week," said Nicholas, dodging alertly by the Inspector. "I've lost a spar, as you see, and come back to my old wharf. Ta-ta! You ask Mr. Hare about me; he'll tell you I'm right about the snares. Bong-swore!" And the sailor sprang off into the darkness and vanished so abruptly that Mr. Brasher could not have guessed which way to follow him.

The Inspector, however, was not thinking of pursuit.

"Less than a fortnight and more than a week," repeated Michael Brasher, "and it is but eleven days since Sir Christopher Dering was found dead in the ditch at the cross roads."

Mr. Brasher whistled softly. "By Jupiter!" burst forth the Inspector. "And he said he was Forester's brother-in-law. Michael, you have picked up a very pretty clue."

CHAPTER XXIII.

Mrs. Schwartz Takes a Cab.

"Whew, Keturah, but you do beat all for sizing up the situation. Not but what I think you're wrong this time, though it's as well to take an account of the possibility that you're right."

Keturah Schwartz sniffed. "I tell you," she retorted; "Joseph Kraft kept his eye on the lad the whole while he was here, and when he went he stopped to look at the brat as though he were making an inventory of it."

Neal Garland lighted a cigarette. "You are too imaginary, Keturah," he observed; "however, we'll be on the safe side. Brian Dering shan't stop in Pimlico another hour. Yet, as I brought him into London and I may—I say I may—have been tracked, you had better do the next move with him."

"Don't expect me to mix myself up with your dirty work," objected the landlady, folding her plump arms; "I did more than was wise when I sheltered the kid."

Her lodger bit his lip. "Come, Keturah," he growled;

"it's too late in the day for you to shirk trifles. Besides, if you've decided to spoil my last chance of picking up a bit I shall cut and run to France. I'm sick of this low British starvation. In Paris I can have a merry life, whether or not it proves to be a short one."

Mrs. Schwartz sighed. "I'm a bit of a fool over you, Neal," she confessed, "and you know how to work on my feelings. But there, I'm a woman, and women have a weakness for your sort of rogue. What do you want me to do?"

Neal slipped an arm about the speaker's fat waist. "In the first place, my dear soul," was his answer, "we must give the boy a disguise that'll last long enough to let us cover up his trail. And in the second place we must put him with some thoroughly discreet person, who, for a consideration, will relieve us of him altogether. I will provide the disguise if you will recommend the guardian."

Keturah Schwartz pondered. "I'll manage my share," she said at length; "but how do you propose to hide the identity of a child like that?"

"You will see," responded Neal, tipping the ash from his cigarette, and going towards the door; "I shall be back in a moment." He waved a hasty adieu and left the room.

Mrs. Schwartz followed her lodger out to the stairs which ascended in a series of steep flights from the basement of the house. Brian still sat where she had deposited him, on a step carpeted with worn Brussels. Keturah took the young baronet by the hand and led him into the parlour.

"Let me be sure you understand the lesson I taught you," she bade the child; "tell me your name."

Brian coloured and hesitated. Mrs. Schwartz gained the hearth-rug, stooped, gasping, secured the poker, and stalked across to her charge.

"Tell me your name," she said again; "and speak up, you limb."

Brian Dering faltered over the single syllable required. "Jack," he murmured; "but please mother will cry if I tell lies."

Mrs. Schwartz feinted at him with the steel bar. "And I," said the landlady "will make you cry if you don't. You ever dare to admit you're called anything but Jack and I will heat this poker till it is red-hot and bore ten thousand little holes in you with it. No matter where you are I will hear you and fly to you on a broomstick with my poker."

Keturah Schwartz resumed her chair, poured herself out some gin from the flask at her elbow and sipped it in a succession of laps resembling those of a cat.

Brian sank down on the floor and began to weep, terrified by the landlady's threat. The tortoise-shell kitten, recognising a playmate, walked to him and purred invitingly.

The little baronet gathered it up, sobbing, yet soothed by the contact of the soft and furry creature.

Mrs. Schwartz fanned herself with her newspaper, yawned and dozed. The arrival of Neal Garland awakened her.

Her lodger carried a palm-leaf fan and a paper parcel, which he tore open to reveal a large squat bottle.

"Bring me some warm water," he ordered, "in a wide basin; also some soap and a towel."

"Gracious!" ejaculated the landlady, "the imp's too clean as it is, to pass for a gutter brat."

Neal motioned impatiently.

"Don't argue, Keturah," was his retort, "but do as I wish."

Mrs. Schwartz descended, and, after a short absence, appeared laden with materials for the toilet.

"Fetch the kid to the table," desired her lodger, "he seems to fear you sufficiently to be quiet while you wash his head. Rinse and dry it thoroughly."

Keturah Schwartz obeyed.

Too horrified by her ingenious threats to resist, Brian endured her powerful operations.

The first stage completed, Neal displaced her, and, with a small brush, worked into Brian's fair curls some strongly-smelling fluid.

This done, he deputed Mrs. Schwartz to fan them dry again, a long and tedious process.

When they had been freed from moisture, the silken tresses of the tiny baronet showed no less picturesque than usual, but their yellow gloss had changed to a ruddy chestnut. So had her fair brows and lashes.

Once more Neal picked up his brush, plied it, and then had recourse to Mrs. Schwartz and her fan. The perspiration rolled down the stout woman's glowing face as she fluttered the crisp palm-leaf.

"I never knew before, Neal, my man," she owned, "that there was so much labour in a dyeing job. Another coat, Neal, and his hair will favour mine wonderfully. Does it wear off?"

"Of course," snarled Neal, "it's not the real article, like your ginger mop. Steady with the fan, I'll give him a last touch with the brush. Hang those blue eyes of his, if it hadn't been for them I'd have made his wig brown, and given his skin a dash of walnut-juice, but, thanks to his azure orbs, I'll have to leave his complexion as it is.

The speaker's lean fingers travelled quickly over Brian Dering's head, using the brush deftly to equalise the colour. No trace of the child's fair curls remained, and the more recent warm tint had deepened to a dark chestnut. Neal himself fanned his concluded handiwork dry.

"Now," he said, "I deliver the boy to you, and recollect it is penal for both of us if the child blabs in dangerous ears."

Keturah Schwartz lifted Brian Dering into her arms. So much manipulation had rendered him sleepy, he drooped upon her shoulder.

"I'll guarantee that," she promised; "since I am to be responsible for the job, I'll see it's done properly."

Her lodger lit a fresh cigarette and reached his hat.

"Ta ta, Keturah," he remarked; "you're a trump, and I'll not forget it."

With this vague pledge, Neal Garland strode off downstairs, the softness of his footfalls suggesting that his boot-soles were in need of repair.

Mrs. Schwartz bore the unconscious Brian to another chamber, and laid him on a bed, while she pinned a rusty black bonnet above her coiffure and donned a soiled cloth dolman. Equipped for her journey, she took up the child, went to the hall below, and requested her maid to procure a hansom.

The slatternly damsel blew a huge whistle, and a cab trotted to the kerb. Mrs. Schwartz, weighted with the slumbering child, entered it.

"Houndsditch," she instructed the driver, and the vehicle clattered away.

But Keturah Schwartz did not notice the amazed countenance of her servant, who, from the steps of the dismal boarding-house, watched the departure of the hansom.

"My goodness!" cried the girl, "what have they done to his poor dear hair?"

If Mrs. Schwartz could have heard the query she might not have driven eastward with such content. As it could not gain her attention, she rolled on unwittingly, past Westminster, up the Strand, through the City, and towards that distant haunt of vice and crime, Whitechapel.

At the bottom of the oddly titled but famous street to which she had directed the cabman, Mrs. Schwartz dismissed the vehicle and struck into the Whitechapel Road, the central artery of the huge low-class suburb that boasts the same sobriquet."

Her goal was a mean terrace on the fringe of a district that swarmed with foreign Jews.

You will mention "Short Stories" to your friends, won't you?

Keturah Schwartz paused and scanned a group of miserable shops, which, illuminated by smoky oil-lamps, threw a slight additional radiance across the gloom left by the few gas-standards on the side-walks. After a brief survey of these establishments, Mrs. Schwartz slipped into one—a squalid sweet and grocery store.

Behind the counter sat an old hag—a hideous being, with chin-tuft, bristling moustache, dirt-engrained cheeks, and eye-lids bleared to rawness by filth.

The new-comer, still folding Brian in her arms, leaned on the grimy board—where was displayed a few boxes of confectionery, a shank of boiled ham, some canned meats and pickle-jars—and began to whisper.

As she muttered, the palsied head of the listener nodded, and nodded, and nodded again. Then Keturah Schwartz pulled up her dress-skirt, opened a linen pocket, got out a purse and produced a handful of coins. The beldame snatched at them, fearful of losing the precious pieces.

The colloquy over, Mrs. Schwartz glided to the shadow at the rear of the place, and relinquished, into the unsteady clasp of the old crone, the form of Brian Dering. A moment later Keturah had darted forth into the night.

Grinning covetously, the hag put away her bribe, reeled with her burden down a cramped passage which gave upon the shop, turned a latch, and entered a fireless kitchen. On the damp hearth a child was crawling, with deep, pitiful coughs, another toddled about the flagged floor, yet another kicked helplessly by the mouldered skirting-board, on a ragged cushion that had once done duty in a trap.

His custodian laid Brian on an evil-smelling pallet which furnished a corner of the apartment. Unheeding the desolate childhood around her, she regained the exit, passed out, and fastened the latch.

Brian Dering was in the merciless clutches of an East-end baby-farmer.

CHAPTER XXIV.

"I Have No Brother."

"Then you have at least been able to track the child," murmured Felix Dering; "thank Heaven for that. But the cheque, Miss Garland, have you realised how it may be construed? If I had only filled it in to you, the fact would have sufficed to prove the theft. As it is, made out to bearer, it cannot but suggest a plot between myself and the abductor."

He hesitated and glanced suspiciously at Judith—she wielded the reins like a born whip, the ponies moved at a free, quick trot, the neat basket carriage swaying on its springs.

"For an amateur detective," added Felix, "you have worked with singular skill, Miss Garland. The problem you claim to have solved has so far baffled the keenest professional minds. What else have you learned? Who is the scoundrel? We must take immediate action."

"S-s-s-t!" said Judith Garland, under her breath; "speak low, you forget the groom behind us. This is not the moment for a full explanation. But abandon all thoughts of desperate remedies. You are at the mercy of a dangerous man; he it was who discovered the blood-stained links of your chain and interpreted their significance, he it was who abducted Brian, he it is who now assures me that the child can never be regained alive."

The listener gasped.

"But his—his motive?" stammered Felix, bewildered by this new development of the mystery.

"I—I dare but conjecture it," whispered Judith, and her voice broke in a clever assumption of dread; "yet I have wondered if he had any grudge against Sir Christopher, if he has been pursuing a terrible scheme of revenge, if—he was the—the one who——"

"Good Heavens!" ejaculated Felix; "the one who murdered my uncle! Miss Garland, you are the possessor of ghastly secrets. Then those blood-stained links you represented to me as the evidence of my crime came possibly from the actual murderer himself. But why should he give you them?"

"I will come to that in a moment," said Judith Garland. "Mr. Dering," and, under cover of the driving-apron, she laid her hand on her companion's, "I told Lady Dering I had to go to London this week on family business. I spoke the truth; the unhappy wretch of whom I have been speaking is—is my brother."

Felix felt himself the prey of some frightful nightmare.

"Your—your brother!" he repeated. "The brother for whom I advanced you, by means of that cheque, the twenty pounds of salary you could not ask Lady Dering for?"

"The same," assented Judith. "He appeared unexpectedly at Wyresdale, in a piteous state, and implored me to aid him. I asked him why he needed the money, and he would not answer. When I took him your cheque he found, by chance, in my presence, those links of your chain. I recognised them impulsively, and so placed you in his power; for you had denied being at Wyresdale the night of your uncle's death, and he himself had seen you by the Cross that evening. And now, Mr. Dering, I don't know which is guilty, you or my miserable brother."

She stirred the soft palm which had slipped upon his. "But," she said, "since I gathered, the other day, that you had come back for a dear, romantic reason—to be near a certain person who cares for you as much as you can do for her—I have liked to believe you innocent."

Felix shuddered. How could he attempt to convince Judith Garland of the mistake into which she had fallen, it seemed, so naturally? How confess to her it was not her window he had returned to gaze at the night of Sir Christopher's death; but Esther Carew's?

"We—we must consider what can be done," whispered Judith, as she guided the ponies between the double row of firs that yielded access to Dering House; "but remember, Neal—my brother—can ruin you in two ways; he can prove you were in Wyresdale House, though you chivalrously denied the suggestion rather than direct attention to a lady. And also he is able to allege, by producing the cheque, that you paid him to kidnap Brian."

A sense of paralysis seized on Felix. Fatality had dogged him with a perfect completion. He had but to extend a limb to find it bound.

"How—how was Brian taken?" he murmured.

Judith sighed. "I—I was his reluctant accomplice," she said; and added, with a master-stroke of falsehood, "he threatened to betray you if I refused to help him. He—he guessed that I was not indifferent to you—I had borrowed the links to satisfy you of your danger, for then I believed you guilty. He was obliged to force them from me again. In any case he had but to enter the witness-box and swear to your presence in Wyresdale on a certain evening."

Judith halted the ponies at the embayed central door of Dering House. "Good-bye, for the present," she whispered, "I have some purchases to deliver Lady Dering—we can talk more at ease another time."

She threw the reins to the groom and passed, a dark, handsome, yet sinister figure, into the hall.

Felix pursued her across the threshold. "Miss Garland," he began determinedly, "you shall not escape me thus. You have said too much and too little."

Judith paused and glanced over her shoulder—a flush of curious passion warming her features. Supple, erect, with her Spanish cast of countenance, ample tresses and red lips, she was a seductive whole.

"Too little, my poor Felix," she answered, the strange

ardour she felt for him throbbing in her voice and lending a singular resonance to her wilful misapprehension of his meaning," what more can I say than that I love you; is it possible that you can doubt it?"

And evading him, she hurried on into the hall. Stepping out of the late sunshine to the cool shadows of the lofty apartments, Judith Garland lost for an instant all power of vision. When she recovered it she perceived before her a tall and bulky form, clad in a loose frock-coat and carrying a brown straw hat of a Continental shape. His bright spectacles veiled yellow pupils and imparted to them a singular glitter. It was Professor Kraft, and he stood within the entrance to the hall of Dering House.

Judith regarded him questioningly. The German bowed. "I am Dr. Kraft, Mr. Otto Hare's private medical attendant," he said in his thick, deliberate foreign accent. "you may have heard me mentioned. You, I see, are Miss Garland. Pardon this call without introduction, but I know so few people at Wyresdale. The servants told me you were expected each moment, and I ventured to wait—my errand being a business one. How is your brother?"

The quiet gaze of Judith Garland met the yellow pupils. Dr. Kraft smiled. "You can trust me," he said. "I guess Master Neal is not a desirable kinsman for a young lady earning a moderate competence in a genteel household. But I urgently need some particulars about him, though you need not fear my publishing them in any fashion detrimental to yourself."

Judith contemplated the German scornfully. "I have no brother, Dr. Kraft," she said, "and therefore am unable to be a sister of your evidently disreputable acquaintance."

Joseph Kraft rubbed his great palms together. "In face, hair, complexion, and stature," he declared, "you resemble my 'disreputable acquaintance' as one pea resembles another. Yet it may well be that I am wrong. In which case, Miss Garland, I beg your pardon. Forgive my being ungallant enough to remark, time will show if the apology is deserved."

He bowed again and sallied out to the terrace before Dering House, passing Felix as he did so. Kraft gazed thoughtfully at the stalwart frame of Esther Carew's lover.

"'What more can I say,'" repeated Kraft to himself, "than that I love you; is it possible that you can doubt it?' So I have not visited Miss Judith Garland in vain, be she Master Neal's sister or not. Felix Dering is coquetting with the brunette as well as the blonde. We have here a distinctly useful weapon against the amorous Felix."

THE IVORY BELLS.

By James Buckham.

MY name is Imogen Diller, and I am twenty-five years old. The reader will, perhaps, understand more readily from this statement the confession I am about to make. Being a woman, I am naturally a believer in dreams. I think I never knew a woman who was entirely free from this mild form of superstition. And being comparatively young—as life is estimated nowadays—I am romantic.

I was twenty-two when my heart first began to hunger for sympathy, for appreciation, for affection. How natural, how inevitable is this period in a girl's life-history. It is a condition as normal as the unfolding of a bud. And equally natural, I think, are the little innocent, instinctive girlish devices for rendering herself beautiful in dress and manner, her love for going into company, there to meet the rank and file of those from whom must be recruited her possible prince. She shines in looks, in thoughts and words, in actions, with the glow of that hardly-acknowledged desire within her breast—the desire for the true, manly love which she feels that she can so opulently repay.

If the world only knew! It laughs at girls who are dying for unattained love. It would weep could it see into their hearts. So terrible is it to feel youth slipping away, and with it that hope for which, by the decree of God, most women live.

It was one day, soon after I had passed my twenty-third birthday, that a terrible thought came to me—the thought that I should be over the hill of youth in a little while, and going down to the other side; that the hope I had silently cherished, which I had never as yet considered impossible, might soon be a lessening one. I cannot tell what a flood of depression overwhelmed me! All that day, and far into the night, my soul cried out to God for the precious gift, without which my life would mean nothing.

Among my dreams that night when at last I slept there was one that visited me twice and seemed to be in a vague way an answer to my passionate prayer. I saw myself standing on a bare hillside, whose slope was black with shadow. In the midst of the gloom I raised my hands and something white came floating down out of the clouds. It looked like a wreath of snowy flowers; but as it drifted slowly down and settled in my outstretched hands I saw that it was a necklace of little white bells. I put the bells about my neck, and instantly a glorious burst of sunlight illumined the hill and I awoke. Twice I say this dream came to me—once in the middle of the night and once just before waking in the morning. As I opened my eyes in the real sunlight the dream seemed so actual and so vivid that I clutched my bosom, thinking to catch the bells before they melted away.

As I considered the vision, I said to myself, "There is a hint in this dream worth heeding. Hitherto I have neglected personal adornment, thinking that love must indeed be blind, if he cannot see beyond the surface glitter of that which is foreign even to the physical person. But it may be that love is not blind, only wandering of sight. Does, perhaps, something crude, glittering, conspicuous, catch his eye, and draw it whither it may discover the better thing that lies behind? I will see!"

Every girl knows perfectly well the kind and amount of her own personal attraction. I knew what people called me—what I was: "Not exactly pretty, but stately, impressive; a matronly girl, of the Dutch Madonna type." Such a type is not generally winsome. It is too quiet. Men will jostle a Madonna who stands between them and a coryphée. Yet if the Madonna could only fascinate and attract them at first sight as the coryphée does, how much more they would admire and love her! It is all a question of initial fascination.

With some such idea eddying through my mind, I went to a famous firm of manufacturing jewellers, and gave them a novel commission—to make me a necklace of ivory bells. I bade them spare no expense; no material to be used but the finest, most transparent ivory; the bells to be perfect and complete in every detail, even to the tiny, vibrant tongues; and all united by a chain of polished ivory links. "Even if the dream prove in no sense prophetic," I thought, "it has given me the idea of an absolutely unique ornament. I shall not be unnoticed when I wear it."

Four hundred pounds was the cost of my necklace. I am not wealthy, but I am not poor. I could pay the money, and I did.

Immediately a new experience came into my life. I became a centre of admiration! Hitherto, with other quiet, inconspicuous girls I had been comparatively unnoticed in company. But from the first occasion when I appeared wearing my necklace of ivory bells I was ringed about with admirers. And the most intoxicating part of it was that I really could not determine whether the ivory bells were the sole attraction or whether they had called out and emphasized some actual personal charm that made me admirable. I do not remember that a word was ever said to me in society about the ornament: society is too conventionally polite for that. But I wondered, especially when the men thronged about me, whether they were looking at the exquisite workmanship of the bells or at the girl who wore them.

It was during this brief season of social triumph that a revelation came to me which accounted in large part for my disquietude of a year past. The prince had come! Indeed, he had been near me for a long time and I had not known that I loved him.

He was a silent man, a poet—some called him a dreamer. He went into society, not for pleasure's sake, but that he might study human nature, for the same reason that he went into the lumber camps of the North and the slums of the great cities.

The first time he came to me, at the dull tinkle of the ivory bells, I felt an almost overpowering desire to stretch out my strong young arms and sweep from before me all the simpering circle on whose outskirts he stood. Then for an instant—and the only time I can remember until the strange thing happened—he looked into my eyes, and I became as a child before him. Afterwards, as often as he came near me, such a rapturous thrill ran through my being that I could scarcely keep from crying out.

Yet he alone of all the hovering circle seemed most interested, not in me, but in the ivory bells. I continually caught him studying them, and the thought maddened me that he whose love meant all the world to me admired only the ornament on my neck.

One summer evening there was a grand ball given at an out-of-town villa. He and I were there with a great company of the gayest of the gay.

As usual, I wore my ivory bell, and, as usual, those who admired them or me—I could not tell which—gathered around me.

As the stifling night wore on and dance followed dance I grew faint and weary and felt as if I must have a breath of Heaven's pure air.

As I moved towards the wide-open French windows from which one could step upon the veranda, the poet crossed my path.

He stopped, and I saw that his eyes were fixed upon the ivory bells. Much as I loved him, I could almost have smitten him then.

He spoke:

"Are you going out for a breath of fresh air, Mademoiselle Diller? So was I. May I have the honour of accompanying you?"

The honour! My soul surged within me. I was about to return some stereotyped refusal when the thought came to me:

"Is not this the hour of fate? Yes! I will prove myself this night that it is the ivory bells alone he cares for."

So I put my hand upon his arm and together we went into the night! Could a thousand years blot out its memory? The stars twinkling so purely in the blue-black sky; the restful sighing of the trees; the patter of a fountain near by; the music floating out across the shrubbery.

"Let us go down by the lake," my companion said; "there we may rest and enjoy the coolness."

Down the terraces we went arm-in-arm. There was a trembling between us. I could not tell whether my hand wavered upon his arm or his arm shook under my hand. But when we reached the little artificial lake I sank upon a bench and he, standing a little aside, stood before me. Some gaudy lanterns not far away cast a faint glow over us.

The silence grew oppressive. Suddenly my spirit rose to the level of its purpose. I started up, withdrawing a little, and snatched the glistening circlet from my neck. The next instant it was flashing in the crystal water of the lake, sinking so slowly that it seemed to hang suspended in the tide like the golden goblet that the poet saw from the bridge at midnight.

Then I looked at my poet, and all of life trembled upon that instant. O gracious heavens! His eyes were fixed not upon the sinking bauble, but upon my face. Love had passed the crucial test. At that supreme moment something like the rushing darkness came over me—something with roaring wings as of a great bird. I fainted from the awful stress; but even as I sank I felt my lover's arms encircle me.

I have confessed. For me the world is made new and all things in it.

My poet smiles as I read him what I have written about the ivory bells. He declares that he never saw them in his life until they flashed from my hand that night into the lake.

If he seemed to look upon them, he swears it was because he dared not lift his eyes to the soul that burned in mine. The light had slain him, except it had been of love.

Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a Stereoscope to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, August 12th. Postcards only, please. The prize of £1 1s. has been awarded this week to Mr. G. Daniels, of 20 Princess Street, Accrington, whose contribution is denoted by a star thus.*

JESS: "My chaperon has been dismissed, and an older one engaged." Bess: "You didn't have a difference of opinion, did you?" Jess: "Never; we always fell in love with the same man."

"I SAY, milkman, you give your cows too much salt." "Why, how do you know how much salt I give them?" "I judge from the appearance of the milk you have brought us lately. Salt makes the cows dry, and then they drink too much water—that makes their milk thin, you know."

"CLARA, dear, we've been careful so far, and I don't think they suspect we are just married. You must scold me a little now as we get off the train." (Sharply and in a high-pitched voice): "George, darling, when we get to the hotel you must certainly take off that absurd lavender necktie!"

"YOU should make allowances for Tomlinson. Any man is liable, you know, to act foolishly for a few days after he has become the father of a bouncing boy." "But great Scott, man, this is Barker's ninth!" "Oh, well, then there's all the more reason for making allowances. It's a wonder that he is able to control himself at all."

MRS. WYLES: "Did your husband give you anything for a birthday present?" Mrs. Styles: "Indeed he did." "Did it have your name on it?" "Yes, and my husband's name, too." "That's just like selfish man. He must share the gift with you." "But he didn't." "What was his name doing on it, then?" "It wouldn't have been any good without it. It was a cheque."

CAPTAIN CRUISER: "So your son is a little dissipated, eh?" Anxious Mother: "Oh, very, captain, very! What can I do with him?" Captain Cruiser: "Leave him to me. We sail from Liverpool for San Francisco next week, and won't touch port for some weeks!" Anxious Mother: "Yes; but it's whisky I'm afraid of."

*HE was a kind and a loving fellow, was Mr. Smiler, the cotton manufacturer of Accrington. He always allowed his employées full pay when off work through sickness, in consequence of which several of the men profited thereby in a sense, being members of a sick club which allowed 12s. per week during sickness. One morning, a little boy, who had overheard his parents talking at home, presented himself at Mr. Smiler's office, and said: "Please, Mr. Smiler, feyther's t' ill t' come t' wark. He's stopping off a fortnight ill, 'cos mother's going to mek rent straight."

GOOPH: "I tell you Mutt knows what he is talking about." Wooph: "Yes, but he talks about it constantly."

TEACHER: "How do you define the word 'gloaming' Dickey?" Dick Hicks (after reflection): "Something spoony that people go out and sit in."

MOTHER: "Well, my dear, I see you are engaged to Mr. Bashful at last." Daughter: "No, he hasn't proposed yet." "What? Not engaged? I saw you hugging and kissing him last night." "Y-e-s, I was trying to encourage him a little."

"BRIDGET! Bridget! why don't you bring up the lemonade?" said Mrs. O'Brien, on the first of July, from the top of the kitchen stairs. "Why, marm," said Bridget, wiping the sweat from her red face with her check apron, "you see the ice I put in the lemonade is so hard that it hasn't melted yet, although it's stirring it over the fire I've been for the last fifteen minutes or more."

IN a certain town in England stands a public-house with a well-known sign over the door, "When shall we three meet again?" and on the board the figures of two asses are painted. An Irishman could not reckon it up, only being two asses, and the sign saying three. He stood gazing at it a long time, and at last the landlord popped his head out of the window above. Pat's face lit up with a smile as he said: "I wondered where the other chap had gone to!"

LAST Christmas a couple of fellows were sleeping in camp in Canada, and towards morning one of them awoke shivering with cold, and found the fire low, and his comrade fast asleep. He didn't like getting up to stir the fire, so he gave his bed-fellow a kick, and pretended to be asleep, thinking his companion would awaken, feel cold, and get up to stir the fire. There was no response, so he gave him another; then the supposed sleeper burst out laughing, and said: "I tried that on you a few minutes ago. That's why you woke up."

A YOUNG man who wished to be appointed a county police-constable put in an appearance one morning accompanied by his mother, and was taken in hand for examination by the inspector. This progressed satisfactorily, until the inspector observed: "Of course, you are aware you'll have a lot of night-work to do? You are not afraid of being out late, I suppose?" Before the candidate could reply, his mother electrified the official with the statement: "That'll be all right, sir, never fear; his grandmother's going round with him the first two or three nights until he gets used to it."

AN English curate, while visiting a friend who was a magistrate, was shown by the latter the county gaol. The curate was much interested in the working of the treadmill, declaring to his friend that he wished he had one at home to give him the gentle exercise he needed, but was too lazy to take except under compulsion. The magistrate smiled and shook his head. To remove the former's scepticism, the curate asked to be allowed a turn. Round went the wheel, the curate declaring the movement delightful; but after three minutes he had had enough, and called to the warder to stop the treadmill. To his dismay, the warder answered, "Truly sorry, sir, I can't. It's timed to go fifteen minutes, and it won't stop before!"

I will think the suggestion over. Meantime, what do other readers think?

From the Royal Mail Steamship Kildonan Castle "F. J. W." tells me that he is on his way from South Africa to England, and wants to know where he could spend a nice, quiet, rural holiday not too far from London.

I conclude that my correspondent wants an inland place, and if this is so, he cannot do better than go to some Surrey, Kent, or Sussex village. The neighbourhood of Sevenoaks, in Kent, is charming and beautiful enough for anybody. And withal it is only twenty-two miles from London on the South Eastern Railway. Dorking, in Surrey, is another charming spot. I hope my correspondent will enjoy his holiday, wherever he goes.

LOVE, COURTSHIP AND MARRIAGE.

(Replies to Correspondents.)

"R. W. S." has been "keeping company" with a girl for several months. Seven times she has broken it off for no particular reason. "I love her still very dearly, and she wants to make it up again. Am I to trust her for an eighth time?"

Well, if I were you, "R. W. S.," I should have a very straight talk with her. Be gentle, but firm. Tell her that her continual "breakings-off" are occasioning you a lot of unhappiness, and she must make up her mind what she wants to do. Don't get angry with her, and don't bully her, but let her know plainly that you want a proper understanding.

Your ideas concerning the treatment of wives in Turkey are not quite correct, "Jack." Of course, there are exceptions; but the law looks after them more than you think. A Turkish woman may leave her husband, if she has cause, and the law will uphold her action and protect her. She cannot be compelled to work for her husband's maintenance; but he is bound to support her, and if he insults or ill-treats her he is liable to imprisonment. The customs in Turkey are different from ours, and, therefore, appear strange to us; but you must remember that our ways are just as strange to them.

You say, "Charlie's Own," that you are very much attached to a young man, three years your junior, but your parents will not allow you to go out with him, or be engaged to him. They know nothing against him except he is of a very jealous disposition, and are afraid he would not make you happy, and you ask my advice as to what is the best thing for you to do.

I should go to your parents, and ask them plainly to state whether they have any real reason for their dislike of the young man, and if they have no good reason to give you, tell them that, being of age, you have settled to become engaged to him, as he is the only man you really love. I never believe in girls setting themselves up to know better than their parents, but there are times when it is right and just that a sensible girl should be allowed to judge for herself, and, from what you tell me, I think this is one of them. Be quite sure he is an honest, straightforward, manly man, and if there is any good reason why you should not be engaged to him, face it bravely, and do your best to forget all about him.

"Zelia" belongs to a troupe of acrobats, and, until a few months ago, was perfectly happy and contented. Now she is miserable, because her supposed mother has told her that she is not her child at all, but was stolen when a baby from her home. She has always been very well treated, and loves her adopted parents dearly, but now she cannot help feeling that most likely she was born to fill a higher sphere than the one she now occupies, and longs to know who her real parents are.

If you are fond of the people you live with, and they are so good to you, "Zelia," I should advise you to be content as you are. Perhaps you will only find, after all, that your own people were ashamed of your bringing up, and it is also quite likely that they are not in as good a position as you seem to think likely.

STARTLING REVELATIONS OF THE STAGE.

THE ADVENTURES OF AN ACTRESS.

III.—Twice Foiled.

By DONOVAN MART.

CHAPTER I.

Mark Danvers, theatrical agent, was a man whose position in the stage world was unassailable. To be "on Danvers' books" and in his good books were the essentials for the would-be aspirant to theatrical laurels.

Hence from early morn till late in the afternoon his roomy offices in Covent Garden were besieged by all sorts and conditions of members of the profession.

Inside the famous agent's sanctum, upon a certain summer morning, two men were seated. The one was Danvers himself, a slim, dapper, dark man with a somewhat Semitic type of countenance, the other Raymond Venables, actor-manager.

Venables was speaking. "There's a girl amongst the crowd in the waiting-room," he said, "whose face I've never seen before. But, by Jove, she's a stunner. The figure of Diana, complexion like a peach, eyes like the sea of summer, and——" Danvers held up his hand with a deprecating voice. "Well, she's the girl for my money. She's built for the small part of Ruth in The Good Samaritan. My tour list is made up, and, bar Ruth, and my leading lady I'm fixed up. That girl's face would alone fill any theatre."

"My dear Ven.," answered Danvers, "let's have her in here. You'll probably get her for thirty shillings or two quid a week. And if Ruth's only a small part, you won't want much rehearsing."

The agent rose from his seat and went to the door. In an instant a sea of girls surged up around him, all eager for a word with the agent. But Danvers was used to importunities. The girl Venables had mentioned to him was easily recognisable. Her extraordinary beauty singled her out at once. She was standing apart from the rest, talking to a young man at her side, evidently no actor, as Danvers' experienced eye told him in a moment.

He beckoned to her. With a slight blush she made her way to his side. The next moment she was in Danvers' sanctum. Venables rose in an instant.

"Miss——"

"Harlow," put in the girl gently.

"Miss Harlow. You wish to go on the stage, I believe. Have you had any experience?"

"None whatever. But I am very anxious to get on."

"Then half the battle is won. I can offer you a small part in a travelling company of which I am manager. We open at Scarborough in August with The Good Samaritan, as the play is called. I can offer you a small part at £2 a week. Will you accept it?"

"Gladly." Hazel Harlow's beautiful face flushed with pleasure.

"Then all that remains is to fix up details."

Twenty minutes later and Hazel Harlow had signed her agreement for her first entrance into stage life.

As for Venables, his feelings were that at last he had hit upon a "star." Even the phlegmatic Danvers had to allow that Hazel Harlow was one of the most beautiful women he had ever seen.

When Venables left the agent's, with the agreement signed by his new acquisition in his pocket, he was still somewhat perturbed in his mind. For he was without a leading lady, and he could find no one who would suit his requirements.

"Mr. Venables," said a soft voice in his ear.

He wheeled round. "Valerie Bellairs!" he ejaculated. "How are you, old girl?"

The actress smiled. "Fit enough," she answered with a roguish smile, "only I want a 'shop.'"

Venables laughed. "That's a good wheeze," he answered. "Fancy our only Valerie saying she wants a 'shop,' when half the managers in London would give their heads to have her sign on for three years."

Valerie bowed. "Perhaps," she answered; "but I happen to have taken a fancy to the part of Ruth in The Good Samaritan, and——"

"Great Scott!" Venables broke in almost roughly, "you're joking. Why, what are you talking about? Do you mean to tell me that you, you of all people, want to go back to the road again?"

"Yes, and for £5 a week you can have me."

Venables' astonishment was too great for words. "Oh, look here," he said. "Come along to Gatti's and have a bottle of fizz, and sign on before you repent. But do you really mean it?"

The actress nodded. Venables said no more. He could only wonder in the deepest astonishment at the extraordinary whim suddenly evinced by his companion. Women were strange cattle! Yet had he known the real motive that had induced Valerie Bellairs to offer herself for the part that he had been so eager to find a suitable interpreter for, his amazement would have been still more intense. The awakening was to be rude indeed.

Hazel Harlow's adventures grow more exciting every week.

CHAPTER II.

Alice Monteith was alone in the drawing-room of the house in which she and her brother Eric lived. She was awaiting the return of her brother and Hazel Harlow, the girl who had gone off under Eric's protection to beard Mark Danvers in his den, with what result we know.

Suddenly the sound of the front door being opened caused the girl to spring up. The next moment Eric and Hazel entered the room. One glance at the young girl's radiant face told Alice that success had attended the venture.

"I've got an engagement in a touring company, Miss Monteith," cried Hazel. "Isn't it splendid?"

Alice threw a quick glance at her brother's grave face. She saw something there that filled her with vague alarm.

"What do you think, Eric?" she asked.

Monteith hesitated. "I hate to play the part of a wet-blanket," he said finally; "but, although I congratulate Miss Harlow with all my heart on her success, I cannot help feeling that her difficulties are not yet over."

Hazel's face paled. "What do you mean, Mr. Monteith?" she asked breathlessly.

"As we left the agent's," went on Eric gravely, "I caught sight of a woman who looked at you, Miss Harlow most intently—with malignance, it seemed. For a moment I could not remember where I had seen her. Suddenly I recollected. It was the woman I had seen at Caldecott's house on the occasion when you were so foully kidnapped. I looked after her. She was met by a man who came out of Danvers' office, Raymond Venables, the manager who has engaged you. They went off together."

Dead silence fellowed his words. Then Hazel spoke.

"Miss Valerie Bellairs," she said slowly. "Do you think——"

"I don't know what to think, Miss Harlow. It is not too late to throw up your project, to abandon your desire to go on the stage, to——"

"Never!" cried Hazel with flashing eyes. "What can she do? She cannot hurt me. I have done her no harm. Do not think me ungrateful, Mr. Monteith, Indeed you have already laid me under a debt of gratitude that I can never repay; but—" the girl's eyes kindled anew—"I have set my hand to the plough, and I will not go back now."

Eric realised in an instant that nothing he could say now would shake Hazel's resolve. His heart was filled with sickening forebodings. How could a girl, so pure, so lovely; so unsophisticated as Hazel Harlow, hope to enter upon a stage life with all its trials and temptations, with enemies whose only desire was her downfall, and come through unscathed? Oh, the pity of it! the pity of it!

CHAPTER III.

It was the first rehearsal of The Good Samaritan company at the rehearsal room of the Bedford Hotel, in Maiden Lane. With a beating heart Hazel entered the side door of the public house, and made her way up to the room, now really embarked upon her first theatrical venture. The room seemed full of strangers when she entered, and every eye was turned upon her. Raymond Venables stepped forward. "Good-morning, Miss Harlow," he said. "I am delighted to see you. First of all let me introduce you to your fellow comedians. Foremost is Miss Valerie Bellairs——" Hazel started violently, and the rich colour ebbed from her face. Venables looked his surprise. His eyes turned towards Valerie, who was holding out her hand with a smile to the other woman. "You know Miss Bellairs," he murmured.

"Miss Harlow and I have met before," answered Valerie swiftly. "We are going to know one another better," and she clasped Hazel's hand with apparent warmth. Hazel could find no words. Yet, like a flash, Eric's warning of the day before came back to her mind.

But with an effort she forced herself to answer Valerie's greeting with a commonplace remark. "This," went on Venables, in his character of introducer, "is Mr. Clive Pendennis, our lead——" a pale, tall young fellow with a rather dissipated face, whose admiration for the new acquisition to the company appeared with undisguised evidence upon his countenance—"Miss Jenny Lovelace, Mr. Ralph Garden, Miss Templeton Fane, Mr. Hayward Lindsay, Mr. Percy Carruthers—these are our principals. I would introduce you to the supers., only we don't bother about them here."

Trying to master her confusion, Hazel shook hands with her new colleagues. The men struck Hazel as being rather common and loud of speech. They seemed friendly disposed, however. The "ladies" had loud voices and louder laughs.

There is no need to dwell on the details of the rehearsal. Hazel was given her part, quite a small one, and instructed in the initiatory stages of her duties. She had a touching little love-scene with Pendennis in the last act, an episode that the actor showed that he meant to make the most of.

After the rehearsal, Valerie Bellairs approached Hazel calmly pushing aside the obsequious Pendennis, who ventured to offer to escort Hazel home.

"Will you come to my rooms with me, dear?" she said cordially.

Hazel's honest, frank temperament was touched by Valerie's apparent sincerity. Perhaps she had misjudged the actress. And yet she was the friend of Horace Caldecott, the man who had done his best to wreck Hazel's life.

Bellairs saw the other girl's hesitation, and read her thoughts like a book.

"Let bygones be bygones, dear," she said in a low voice: "Horace Caldecott can't hurt you any more. Will you let me be your friend?"

With these words, spoken with so much apparent warmth, all Hazel's suspicions fled. "Thank you," she said gratefully. "I shall esteem your friendship as a great honour."

"Then you will come with me?"

"With pleasure."

Hazel had promised the Monteiths that she would return to their house in the evening.

It was then about three o'clock, so that she would have plenty of time to accompany Valerie and then return to Bayswater.

Valerie hailed a hansom, and the two women were soon bowling away swiftly towards the actress's flat in Victoria.

But few words passed between them during the drive. Each was occupied in their own thoughts—thoughts as widely different as could be.

"And now," said Valerie, when they were alone, "tell me all about yourself."

Next week "Hazel Harlow in Newcastle."

With ready trustfulness Hazel complied. She told her listener all about her early life at Harlow Farm, how that her father had desired her to marry Squire Caldecott, how she had resolved to escape from such a contingency, how she had come to London.

Valerie's face darkened as she drank in every word of her visitor's story.

"Horace Caldecott wanted to marry you?" she said slowly.

"Yes."

"And you?"

"I loathe him. I feel sure he is a villain."

The actress's face grew harder still. "There are many villains in the world," she said. "You will want all the strength of your nature to resist the men in our profession. Your beauty will lay you open to many temptations—that and your inexperience."

Hazel sighed. Could this be true? Was beauty then of no account save to awaken vice, as a lure to the helpless and unprotected that led to disgrace and ruin?

Valerie Bellairs was watching her visitor intently. "Let us have some tea," she said, breaking in upon the other's musings.

She rang the bell. Tea was brought.

"Sugar and milk?" asked the actress.

"Please," answered Hazel. Her thoughts were still far away, in so much that she did not notice a furtive movement on the part of her hostess, who had slipped a tiny white pellet into her tea-cup, in addition to the sugar and milk.

Hazel stirred her tea slowly. Valerie seemed to have become of a sudden strangely hilarious. She lit a cigarette. "A custom you'll soon get used to on the boards, dear Miss Harlow," she laughed, though Hazel shook her head. Like a panther Valerie's eyes were fixed on the beautiful innocent face before her.

Hazel was just raising the cup to her lips when the re-entrance of the servant caused her to set down the liquid untasted. The maid was followed by a gentleman, whom one glance told Hazel to be Eric Monteith.

With a glad cry the girl arose. "Mr. Monteith!" she said. "Have you come to pay Miss Bellairs a call, too?"

Eric hesitated. Valerie had gone very pale, for she recognised Monteith in a moment as the man who had met her face to face at Horace Caldecott's house. What did he want here?

"Will Miss Bellairs pardon my intrusion?" he said, with cold politeness. "The fact is that my sister is called upon to go a journey to-night, and she wished to say good-bye to Miss Harlow before she went. I have a cab outside."

"I'll finish my tea and come at once," cried Hazel impulsively.

Then a strange thing happened. Valerie Bellairs lurched unaccountably forward. Her hand struck the tea-cup that Hazel had raised to her lips for the second time, and sent the dainty piece of china flying to the ground, where it broke into a dozen pieces.

"A thousand pardons!" cried Valerie, in apparent concern. "I can't think how I came to be so careless. Don't let me detain you, dear Miss Harlow. We shall meet again before long. Good-bye, Mr. Monteith. It is nice to think that Miss Harlow has such good friends," with which Parthian shot Valerie bowed her visitors out.

When they had gone the actress uttered an exclamation of anger, and stamped her foot upon the ground.

"So, Mr. Eric Monteith," she muttered, "you've taken up the cudgels for Miss Harlow. Had you come ten minutes later, your precious Hazel would have been drugged and at my mercy." Then her expression changed. "Can he know anything? It was clumsy of me to break the cup as I did, but it wouldn't have done for the girl to have drank it under the circumstances. Bah! What can he know? He can only suspect. It will only be a case of postponing my revenge. And nothing shall baulk me of that. Perdition! How beautiful the little innocent is! And Horace Caldecott loves her." Valerie clenched her teeth as she said these words, and then continued: "And I love him! Yes, he's bad right through; but I don't care. I love him, and I'll have him yet. I'll give you a respite, Miss Hazel Harlow, but at Scarborough look out for squalls."

And in the meanwhile Hazel was driving back towards Bayswater with Eric. The young man had explained to her that his sister's departure was a myth. He had come solely and simply to take Hazel away from Valerie Bellairs. "They told me at the Bedford," he said, "that you had gone off with her. I followed you, and——" He broke off. He dared not give voice to all the forebodings that crowded in upon his brain, dared not try and realise how dear Hazel had grown to him, how he longed to be always at her side, to protect her from any fancied harm. And so he kept silent. The question that surged through his brain remained unspoken: Why had Valerie Bellairs upset the tea-cup?

Had she meant foul play? He could scarcely repress a groan. For Valerie was the woman who would be with Hazel every day in a short time—would travel with her, act with her, perhaps lodge with her. And Hazel, with her innocent trustfulness, her unsullied soul, would look upon danger and see it not. Was ever lover's soul tortured more?

And, moreover, Eric knew that neither he nor Hazel had yet heard the last of Horace Caldecott

CHAPTER IV.

Let folks say what they will, the fact must always remain that stage-life is beset with trials and temptations for men and women whose refinement keeps pace with their desire to win fame in their profession.

And to Hazel Harlow, whose life had, up till now, been spent amidst the peace and quietude of the country—a peace broken only by Horace Caldecott's hateful wooing—the revelation of all that the life of a strolling player meant, seemed to become more terrifying every day.

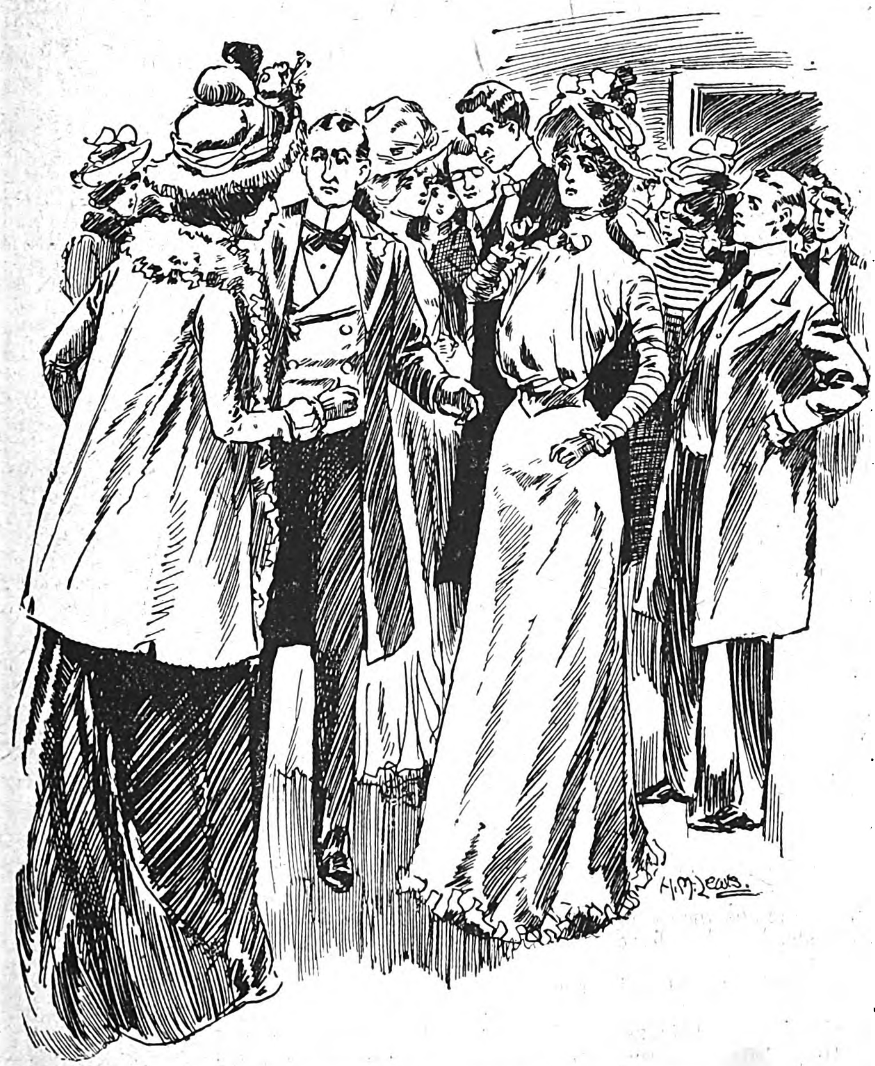
The stainless purity of her soul, coupled with her great beauty, proved, by their rarity, immense snares to her susceptibilities. In the first place, Raymond Venables, the manager of the company, had fallen violently in love with her, while "Clive Pendennis"—whose real name, by-the-bye, was Edmund Jenkins—had in a wonderfully short space of time begun to pay her unwelcome attentions. The other male members of the company, oblivious to the fact of her unassumed modesty and purity, made no disguise of their admiration and readiness to avail themselves of opportunities of showing their appreciation of her charms.

Nor was this all. The "ladies" of the company, with two exceptions, gave her the cold shoulder, jealous of her superior attractions, and incensed by her "stuck-up airs," as they styled her efforts to preserve her womanly virtues.

The two exceptions were Valerie Bellairs and Jenny

Look out for when Hazel Harlow visits your town.

Lovelace, the "soubrette" of the company—an impulsive, warm-hearted, merry little soul, who had a mind above petty jealousies, and was perfectly ready to bow down to Hazel's beauty and accept her as a friend. The two became fast friends, despite their incongruities, a fact that gave Valerie—who always treated Hazel deferentially and politely, for her own aims—cause for much hidden resentment. Jenny Lovelace made no disguise of her dislike for "the Bellairs," despite the latter's recognised talents and fame as an actress.



Hazel started violently, and the rich colour ebbed from her face.

Hazel's was, as has been mentioned, only a small part. Her lack of experience was soon counterbalanced by her conscientiousness and desire to shine in the profession she had chosen. And so the time passed quickly along until at last the day drew near for the commencement of the tour in Scarborough.

Of Caldecott Hazel had heard nothing since the day when he had been brought home unconscious. Neither could Eric give her any information as to the scoundrel's movements. His town house was shut up, and he himself had gone, no one knew whither. Valerie never mentioned him when talking with Hazel.

Indeed, Miss Bellairs was kindness itself to Hazel, who was ready enough to forget and forgive, and who was already lulled into a false sense of security by Valerie's behaviour. She failed to discern the keen blade that was so adroitly sheathed in the velvet scabbard of the actress's suave manner.

Hilda Hatherleigh was the stage name assumed by Hazel. At first she had been averse to sailing under false colours. It was only at Eric and his sister's urgent request that she had at last consented to adopt a nom de guerre.

And at last the day came when the company assembled at the Great Northern terminus, en route for Scarborough and the Theatre Royal.

CHAPTER V.

"I HAVE a confession to make, Alice."

"What is it, Eric?"

"I'm head over ears in love."

"With Hazel Harlow."

"Yes." And Eric Monteith gazed gloomily out of window upon the London street.

"And does she reciprocate your affection?" asked Alice gently.

"Not yet. But I pray Heaven she may." The young man wheeled abruptly round. "Look here, Alice, I'm going to Scarborough to-night. There's a train gets there about four to-morrow morning. I'm not going to let Hazel know I'm going. But I'm frightfully anxious about her. I can't get the idea out of my head that she's in danger. I must go, even if I'm making a fool of myself."

Alice knew her brother far too well to offer any opposition to his intention. And, besides, she had been captivated by Hazel's charms. She would dearly like to see her only brother happily married to the beautiful maiden who had unwittingly stolen his heart.

Let the Editor hear what you think of "Adventures of an Actress."

So all she said was: "Go, by all means, dear brother."

Eric kissed her fondly upon the cheek.

"How good you are to me, sister mine," he said.

He flew off to pack a bag. It was three days since the departure of The Good Samaritan company. Alice had had a short note from Hazel to say that they had had a very successful first night, and that she was enjoying Scarborough very much. The weather was perfect, and in the daytime she found plenty to amuse herself with.

It was a glorious summer morning when Eric arrived at Scarborough. There was a delicious freshness in the keen air that blew off the sea, while a faint haze betokened the advent of a perfect day.

There was scarcely a soul about, as was natural at that early hour, and Eric sauntered through the streets towards the promenade, meaning to sit there for an hour or so, before gaining admission at the Royal Hotel, St. Nicholas Street, the establishment he had patronised upon a former visit to the watering-place.

Sitting down upon one of the seats on the promenade, and turning up the collar of his light overcoat—for the early morning air was chilly—he lit a cigarette, and let his thoughts turn towards the plans for his future course of action, the self-constituted guardianship of Hazel Harlow.

"I should very much like to know where Mr. Horace Caldecott is at this moment," he mused, "also why on earth Miss Valerie Bellairs—who must surely have no difficulty in finding a London manager willing to engage her at, at least, £30 a week—why this noted actress should suddenly take it into her head to go on tour with a provincial company, where salaries rule small, and discomforts high. That's a question that wants answering, and I'll try and answer it before I leave Scarborough."

Suddenly the sound of footsteps proceeding slowly along the promenade towards the Spa Buildings attracted Eric's attention. He looked up to see a tall, strongly-built, bearded man, shabbily dressed, with a slouch hat pulled over his eyes, sauntering forward in a particularly aimless manner.

He looked furtively at Eric as he passed the seat upon which the young man sat. But Monteith had the appearance of being fast asleep. He had left his luggage at the station to be forwarded to his hotel. "Out on the spree, last night," muttered the stranger as he slouched past.

But Eric was very wide awake. His sporting instincts were aroused. It was not yet five o'clock. What should a man of the stranger's appearance be doing on Scarborough's promenade at so early an hour?

The question was answered without delay. The figure of a woman, cloaked and veiled, coming from the opposite direction, suddenly appeared in view. The motive for the early morning walk of the man in the slouch hat was made apparent by his coming to a halt before the woman, who had evidently come at that early hour for some business that could not be transacted at another time.

Languidly curious, Eric watched the pair from the corners of half-closed eyes. They threw a glance in his direction, and the man made some remark, with the result that they sat down upon a seat barely one hundred yards away from where Monteith reclined.

As the woman took her seat, she threw back for a few seconds the veil that cloaked her features. In a moment Eric's heart began beating with mad excitement. It was Valerie Bellairs!

What could the actress be doing at that early hour? Who was her companion? All Monteith's faculties leapt up with renewed vigour. The love he bore for Hazel Harlow had made him a detective, had made him see danger in every action of Valerie Bellairs.

The man and woman talked earnestly together for some time. Then Valerie rose to her feet. The man followed her example. She said something, of course inaudible to Eric, to her companion, and hurried away. The man raised his hat, and then, thrusting his hands into his coat pockets, strolled slowly back the way he had come.

As he passed Eric, Monteith was still sleeping, apparently. The man paused. The sleeper sprang to his feet. He looked extraordinarily wide awake for a man who a moment before had been in the depths of slumber.

The man looked his astonishment. Eric looked at him fixedly for a moment. The next instant he found his voice.

"What was that woman saying to you?" he said quietly.

The man started back as though he had been stung. "What d'ye mean?" he said hoarsely. "What's that to you?"

"A good deal. You'd better answer my question." If not——"

"What will you do if I don't?"

"Give you in charge, well"—Eric spoke with a curious significance—"you know what for."

Now Monteith knew nothing whatever about the man or his antecedents. He had merely drawn his bow at a venture. The arrow went home into the very heart of the target.

The man went pale. "See here, guv'nor," he said, "who are you? How did you find out?"

Eric's answer was a significant gesture. He dared not commit himself further, though it was plain that the man before him had some secret in his life that he had no desire of becoming known.

"Look here," Eric went on, a new inspiration having suddenly come to him. "I'll lie low about you and what I know, for a consideration. Let me take on the job that woman wanted you to do, and I'll give you £5 to clear out of Scarborough."

"How did you know she wanted me to do anything? And it was £50 she promised me."

Eric could scarcely restrain a chuckle. The second arrow had gone home like the first, and had had better results. The man was condemning himself out of his own mouth.

Monteith's face grew very stern. "Listen to me once and for all," he said. "Either you tell me all she told you, take £5 and clear, or—well, we'll go straight to the police-station and I'll tell all I know."

The strings of a guilty conscience are powerful incentives to obedience. It was good for Eric's schemes that the spur he used, had so much unknown weight behind it. The man gazed in his face, read a finality and knoledge that by no means existed, and—capitulated without a further struggle.

"I'll give in, guv'nor," he said huskily; "but don't let's stay here. Come on to St. Nicholas Cliff. We shall be safe from interruption there. You shall have my job and willing. If I hadn't been so hard up I'd never have taken it on."

Eric complied with the stranger's desire for less publicity. The pair crossed the cliff bridge, and sat down in the assured privacy that the early morning gave them at that spot.

"I'm not going to tell you how I came to know Miss Bellairs," the man began somewhat sullenly.

"Oh, I know Mr. Caldecott," broke in Eric.

The man swore under his breath. Monteith's quick intuition had tapped the only source from which the fair Valerie could have become acquainted with a rascal such as this fellow evidently was.

"Well, you seem to know a lot," the stranger went on gloomily. "Let's begin with Miss Bellairs asking me if I wanted to earn fifty quid. I says yes. She then tells me that she has a down on a Miss Hilda Hatherleigh"—then Monteith's forebodings were not groundless—"and wanted her—well, 'er got out of the way for a bit.

"So I was to come down here, and one night to present myself at the Theatre Royal with a note for Miss Hatherleigh"—the man took a sealed envelope addressed, "Miss Hilda Hatherleigh, urgent," out of his pocket—"I was to give it to Miss Bellairs, who would give it to the other one. After the show they were to accompany me to 95, North Row. I was to pretend to attack Miss Bellairs and the other, who was to be chloroformed. Miss Bellairs was to skedaddle, and the other——"

"You needn't say any more, I understand," broke in Eric sternly. "So you were going to add murder to your other crimes, you confounded ruffian, were you?"

"No, not murder, guv'nor. I swear that. The girl was to be got away to London, and—well, there are plenty of ways of getting rid of a girl there without killing her."

The cold-blooded villainy of this wretch for a moment made Eric long to seize him by the throat and hurl him over the cliff. Restraining himself with an effort, he turned to him, and said curtly:

"I'll give you three hours to get out of Scarborough." He looked at his watch. "There's a train at nine, or thereabouts. You go by that, or"—his rage almost mastered him—"I'll have you clapped back again into the prison you ought never to have left, as sure as my name is what it is. And if you make an effort to hold any communication with Miss Bellairs, I'll never rest till I see you hunted down to the doom you deserve." So saying, he thrust the note, delivered into his hand by the other, into his pocket.

His vehemence genuinely frightened the cowardly ruffian beside him. Eric took five pounds from his purse. "Here's all the blood-money you'll get," he said contemptuously. "Now make tracks!"

The man needed no second bidding. He literally took to his heels, while Eric strolled slowly towards breakfast and his hotel, pondering deeply over all that he had heard, and thinking out his own future plan of campaign.

CHAPTER VI.

Hazel Harlow was in her dressing-room on the evening of the day that had dawned so eventfully for Eric Monteith.

The theatre was filling up, for Scarborough did not often have the chance of seeing so well-known an actress as Valerie Bellairs, while already the beauty of the ingenue, "Hilda Hatherleigh," had proved that Raymond Venables' selection had been the "draw" he had hoped and believed.

Venables himself was taking a small part in the play, the theme of which was that an unpolished exterior often hides an interior of sterling worth. Valerie Bellairs as Ruth—"The Good Samaritan"—a madcap, and apparently a worthless woman, turned out at the conclusion of the play to be a heroine in the truest sense of the word.

This was the peg upon which dialogue and scenes were hung.

Venables was standing at the wings as Hazel came down from her dressing-room, ready for her first "call."

The manager drew a deep breath. "How lovely you look to-night," he murmured in Hazel's ear.

The girl drew herself up. There was a sparkle in her eyes as she answered: "Don't fish in profitless waters, Mr. Venables."

"I'll give you anything you like for a kiss," answered the enamoured Venables, who now never tried to conceal the passion he felt for his ingénue.

"The first man I allow to kiss me," answered Hazel with a flush and a voice full of contempt, "will do so because I love him and mean to be his wife."

"And couldn't I be that man?"

"Never, Mr. Venables."

The manager groaned, but further conversation—typical of many such carried on between Hazel and Venables, who pestered the poor girl with his attentions—was cut short by the ingénue's appearance behind the footlights. A great round of applause greeted her entrance.

At the conclusion of the play Valerie Bellairs came to Hazel with a grave face.

"Here's a man just brought this note for you, dear," she said. "It's marked 'Urgent.'"

Hazel looked at the note carelessly. Already, brief though her stage career was, she had become accustomed to billets-doux from unknown admirers, invitations to supper, and the like attentions, all of which she steadfastly took no notice of.

Was this letter another such as this? Suddenly her face paled. There was no mistaking the handwriting on the envelope. It was written in the large, sprawling caligraphy of her father, Farmer Harlow.

She tore open the letter. It was as follows:—

92 North Row,
Scarborough.

Dear Hazel,

I've tracked you at last, only to lose you. I'm sorely stricken—dying maybe. If you want to see your unhappy father alive in this world, accompany the bringer of this note,

Your father,
Harlow.

Hazel read the scanty message over two or three times before the full meaning of it was borne in to her brain. Her father! Here in Scarborough! Dying! There could be no mistake about the handwriting. She would have sworn anywhere that her father's hand had penned that note.

Helplessly she turned to Valerie, who stood beside her, with eyes that seemed to devour every detail of her countenance.

"Read it!" said Hazel in a low voice.

Valerie took the note and mastered the contents. Then she turned to the other.

"I will come with you," she said in a voice that rang genuinely of help and pity.

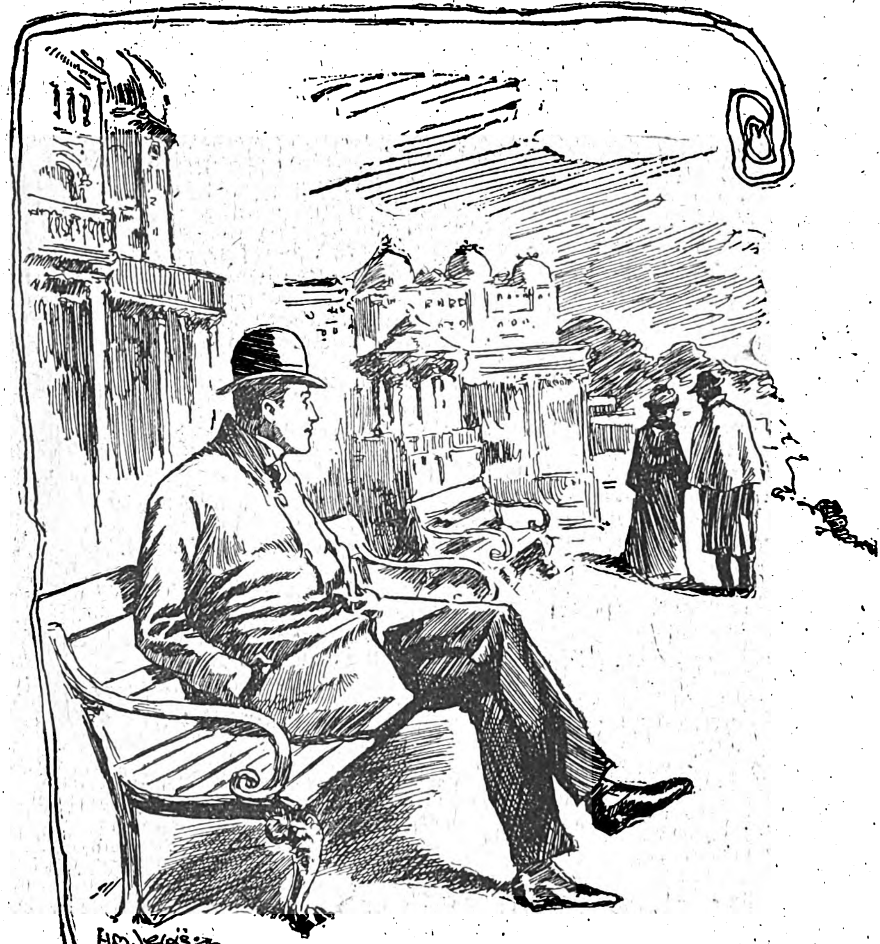
"I'll ask Jenny Lovelace to come," began Hazel, her thoughts turning to her recognised friend in her perplexity, rather than to Valerie, whom she felt she never could really like.

Next week "Hazel Harlow in Newcastle."

"And while you look for Jenny, your father may be breathing his last."

"True," replied Hazel. "Let us go. Is the messenger outside?"

The messenger was at the stage door—a tall, muffled figure in a slouch hat and somewhat seedy clothes, whose face was undiscernible in the gloom.



The figure of a woman, cloaked and veiled, coming in the opposite direction, suddenly appeared in view.

"This is Miss Harlow," said Valerie. The man nodded and motioned to the women to follow him. He hurried away from the theatre, and, leaving the main thoroughfare, turned down into a small side street. Before a door, numbered 92, he paused, and, fitting a key into the keyhole, threw it open. Valerie and Hazel stepped into a little hall, where intense darkness reigned.

The guide opened a door to the right, and ushered his guests into a small room lit by a solitary gas flare. There was no furniture in the room save a chair and a dilapidated table.

"My father," began Hazel, somewhat nervously, "where is he?"

For answer the man strode to the door of the room and with a swift motion turned the key in the lock. Then he turned to Valerie, who seemed somewhat surprised at his movements, and with a quick gesture threw off hat, cloak, and the false hair that had concealed his face from view.

With a faint cry Valerie fell back, in the blankest amazement. As for Hazel, she pressed her hands to her eyes to convince herself that she was not dreaming.

"Mr. Monteith!" she muttered.

Eric made a bow.

"Good evening, Miss Valerie Bellairs," he said. "You didn't expect to see me here, did you?"

The expression on Valerie,s face was terrible in its malignant concentration and baffled rage. Her eyes seemed to flash fire. Her bosom rose and fell in spasmodic sobs. She wrenched a revolver from her pocket.

"It's you again, is it?" she screamed. "Well, you've crossed my path once too often!" and the mad woman—for mad she was at that moment—levelled her pistol at Eric's head.

But she had forgotten Hazel. With a bound the girl sprang across the room and seized Valerie's wrist with a grip that a healthy country life had given her young muscles the capacity to employ—a grip that rendered Valerie powerless to fire her deadly weapon.

The next moment Eric had secured the weapon itself, and "the Bellairs," was disarmed.

"You shan't add murder to your other crimes, Miss Bellairs," he said quietly. "Will you come with me to the police-station?"

There was something in Eric's quiet, resolute manner that brought Valerie to her senses far quicker than any hot denunciation of her actions could have done.

The fierce light faded from her eyes. She looked helplessly at the man who, she realised, had foiled her once again in her dastardly attempt to get rid of the girl whose only crime was a beauty few men could resist. All the resolution died out of her. Fear, abject fear, sprang up in its place. She fell on her knees before Eric.

"Spare me," she wailed. "I meant Miss Harlow no real harm. She stole the man I love from me, and I wanted to get her away to a place of secrecy, so that he would believe she was dead, or had disappeared for ever from his ken. That was all. I swear it!"

"Don't kneel to me, Miss Bellairs," answered Eric coldly. "Your protestations are in vain. The man you employed was a nameless villain. What fate you had in store for Miss Harlow I know not. Yet I know enough to feel convinced that you meant to try and ruin her body and soul, to get her conveyed away to some vile den, where death, and worse than death, must have been in store for her. Providence sent me to frustrate your evil plans. With Miss Harlow's assent, I shall have you conveyed to the police-station, where——"

But Hazel sprang forward.

"No, no!" she cried vehemently, though her face was deadly pale, and she could not bear to look Valerie in the face, "not that, not that! Let her go, Mr. Monteith! Let her go!"

Eric bit his lip. He knew full well the tender womanliness that inspired Hazel's words. As for Valerie, she sprang to her feet, hope in her eyes.

"Listen," she said quickly, "I'll confess. I wrote to your father, Miss Harlow. I didn't tell him where you were. I told him to write a letter, the substance of which I supplied, to be forwarded to me that I might get you to return home. He did as I asked. I then made up my mind to have you incarcerated in London for a time, until I—I—had married Horace Caldecott."

A shudder ran through Hazel's frame.

"Will you take me back to my rooms, Mr. Monteith?" she said faintly.

In a moment Eric had placed her hand within his arm. The next moment Valerie Bellairs was alone.

"How can I thank you? Again you have been my saviour!" murmured Hazel, as Eric piloted her along the quiet streets.

"By becoming my wife," Eric longed to answer. But he felt that it would be ungenerous to press his suit now. He only said: "I only want your friendship, not your thanks." He then told Hazel how he had witnessed the interview between Valerie and the hired ruffian. "I determined to impersonate the man myself," he said. "I found out that Miss Bellairs had hired 92 North Row, a long deserted house, for a week, and for a sum of money that made inquiry superfluous. What would have happened had I not come to Scarborough last night and, by the hand of Providence, put right in the way of fathoming the intended crime, I dare not contemplate. Thank God you are safe."

There was such fervour in his voice that Hazel longed to be able to say: "You have earned the right to be my protector for life. Marry me." But as yet love had not awakened the power in her to give herself heart and soul to this man, who loved her so. She sighed and murmured out broken words of thanks. And with a dull pain at his heart, Eric realised that as yet he had no further right to ask Hazel to return the passionate love that surged like a mighty tempest in his breast.

CHAPTER VII.

"Valerie Bellairs has gone! What on earth shall I do? Was ever man in a worse hole?" And Raymond Venables stamped up and down his room like a man possessed.

It was the day after the events narrated in the preceding chapter. Valerie Bellairs had not dared to face the music again. Without a word of explanation beyond a curt note to the manager and a cheque for the money due to her during her term of agreement, she had disappeared.

Venables rushed round to Hazel's rooms, and, throwing ceremony to the winds, broke in upon her and Jenny Lovelace while at breakfast.

"Do you know where Valerie Bellairs has gone, and why?" he almost shrieked.

Hazel blushed a rosy red. Then the colour ebbed out of her face. For a moment she hesitated. "I do know," she said, in a low voice; "but I cannot tell you."

The manager stared at her in amazement.

"What plot is this?" he growled. "And what on earth am I to do without my lead?"

Jenny Lovelace sprang to her feet.

"Give Hilda Hatherleigh the lead," she cried, "and me her part. Cora Bond can take my part, and you can easily rake up someone to walk on for her."

Jenny's vehemence saved the situation, and drew the manager's bewildered thoughts into a new channel. He seemed to forget Valerie's existence, and the remarkable avowal Hazel had just made.

"Can you do it, Miss Harlow?" he cried anxiously. "It's a chance for you, and no mistake."

"I can but try," answered the girl gently.

"Then finish breakfast and come down to the theatre at once. We shall have to spend the rest of the day in rehearsing. I'll go and beat up the rest of the crowd," and without more ado he rushed from the room.

Jenny—whom Hazel had taken completely into her confidence—executed an impromptu skirt-dance round the table.

"Ta-ta, Bellairs!" she laughed. "Our chance has come, Hazel! We've cut the cat's claws! Venables will be too excited now to bother his head about Miss Valerie's exit. He's got the show to think of."

And that night the Scarborough audience howled themselves hoarse over the beautiful "Hilda Hatherleigh," whose rendering of the part vacated by Valerie Bellairs was unanimously voted a triumph in every way.

And among the audience was Eric Monteith. While Hazel had but little difficulty in guessing to whom she was indebted for a wonderful bouquet handed to her after her first appearance as "the Good Samaritan."

But Hazel's troubles were not yet over. The next town at which The Good Samaritan company was billed to appear in was Newcastle. Here it was the beautiful young debutante's lot to experience an adventure more thrilling even than the one related in this week's Short Stories.

The Reappearance of Garton Hope.

"I, HENRY SUTTON LYLE, knowing that I have but a few hours to live, do desire, in this my extremity, to disburden myself of a great crime; and, having done so, to avow, as before my Maker, my innocence of a greater.

"Twice have I stood at the bar to answer for the slaying of Mr. Garton Hope. On the first occasion, the judge, seeing that no body had been found, decided that I could not be proceeded against. Since then, I have been tried; found guilty of a murder I never committed, and—condemned.

"To-morrow morning, before the sun is fairly up, I am to die. But it will be as a man innocent of a brother man's blood. I now confess however—as one being in the antechamber of death—that I was guilty of wicked perjury when, a year ago, I accused myself of compassing Garton Hope's murder. Why I did this is known only to myself. Were I to reveal my motives it would not save me now.

"Why Garton Hope went away, or whither he bent his steps, I do not know. I only know that I did not kill him; that when I said I did, I lied! God forgive me! and be with me to-morrow!

"Yet one more word, and then—supreme knowledge!

"Within three months of my death, will Garton Hope return to take his place among his fellow-men. He will do me justice. Within three months,—and—I shall know it! Amen!

"(Signed) HENRY SUTTON LYLE.

In the summer of '97, there sat at dinner by an open window, looking out upon an up-river reach of water, three people—two men and a woman—the elder of the former, the most remarkably noticeable of the party.

A thoughtful man—his eyes, dreamy and far-away of expression, indicated that. A man, too, one would imagine, who would both do and suffer more than most men. Not grey, but inclining to it; the full, reddish-brown beard giving an air of masterful dignity to the otherwise super-sensitive features. Add to this that he stood well over six feet, and you have the man in brief—Garton Hope, the millionaire ex-colonist and sheep farmer in the flesh.

The other was just the ordinary "Society" male—to the "ordinary" observer that is—a trifle dilettante, more than a trifle selfish, and yet not, on the whole, an altogether bad fellow. Harry Lyle was the poor cadet of a poor "blue blood" family; and as such had to study the main chance, whensoever and wheresoever the opportunity for so doing presented itself. Dapper, opiniative, and not over knowledgeful, he contrived to render himself popular, after a fashion, in his little circle. Yet was all this but as the shell, the rind, the outer cuticle of the man; few people discerning beneath it the real grip and grit of a fine nature, actually existent there.

The lady—but by her own mouth shall she be discovered, it being merely noted that Xenia Brooke was young (two-and-twenty); fair (very); and bewitchingly bubbling over with absolutely infectious laughter—laughter without in it one discordant note or phrase.

"Mr. Hope," she was saying, in reply, evidently, to some observation of his. "You are really and truly going at last to settle down among us—to make London your home?"

"Yes, I think so—that is, if I can but get that which I covet."

"You covetous!" cried Xenia, a merry ripple floating out over the sun-flecked river until it reached the lock upon the other side. "You covetous! Why I don't think that a more generous man exists in all the world than you—saving your presence! Mr. Hope, you are surely joking!"

"No, Miss Brooke I am not," but spite an attempt to carry it off lightly, a keen observer might have detected in Garton Hope's voice a hesitant sadness; in his eyes a more than usual dreaminess of manner. "No, I am not joking. I am tired of roving about the earth, doing the Wandering Jew without the inducement that that uncomfortable person must, I take it, have had."

"And have you decided upon a house, yet? Have you thought about it?"

"I am afraid I must say No, again," he answered her, "I have—well—I have an important affair—important, that is, to me—to arrange first," here he looked steadfastly and earnestly at her; "that done, successfully done, I shall seek a habitation and a home.

Up to this Harry Lyle had kept silence. Dinner over,

Hazel Harlow's adventures grow more exciting every week.

he was now lounging at the window, apparently absorbed in the aquatic panorama passing below.

This last remark, however, of Garton Hope's, stimulated him to the exertion of making comment.

"Thought you had done with business," he said. "Left it behind you at Woolla-Woolla."

"So I have," retorted the other; "but—well, I cannot exactly explain—now."

"Oh! don't apologise, my dear fellow! I'm not in any way curious. I leave all that sort of thing to Xenia—and with very good reason; for I happen to know, being her cousin."

"And, sir, being my cousin, you often take unwarrantable liberties in the way of probing my motives and making yourself generally objectionable!"

"Hear her, Hope! hear her!" cried the young man. "One would imagine that I deserved hanging, at the very least, if all that she says be true."

"As it most certainly is!" said Xenia, with the slightest possible suspicion of a pout.

"Ah, well, I shall take a stroll for an hour, and return when the carriage is ready. I know that you, Xenia, are dying to do the honours of the old Palace; and that Hope is obediently waiting for his chain and muzzle. Au revoir!"

The two left behind sat for a few minutes without speaking; and then, on Hope's initiative, they quitted the hotel.

The waiter who had served the party, on their departure found, on the floor under Garton Hope's chair, a morocco leather pocket-book, evidently dropped by that gentleman. He put it on one side for return to its owner later on.

Walking in the direction of the park. The glades and avenues of stately elms and chestnuts were in all their glory, and Garton Hope, at Xenia's side, and slowly pacing the velvety sward under the leafy shadow, deemed earth to be Heaven, desiring no other interpretation.

Ever since his introduction to her the season before he had worshipped the very ground upon which she trod. Time and again had he sought the necessary courage to tell his tale, but had always failed upon the crisis.

When Xenia and her cousin had accepted his invitation to dine with him up the river, he desperately thought that, perchance, some opportunity would be given him for speaking to her—for reaching out towards his heart's desire.

That he was years and years her senior did not occur to him. He was one of those ever-young natures who, young to the end, are at once the admiration and the scorn of the rising generation.

It was done before he well knew it; and she, Xenia, for once in her life was grave and sorrowful beyond recognition.

"Mr. Hope," she said, "you should not! you should not! for I can have but one answer for you! You must not ask me why I refuse you, as I am compelled to do. Nay, I accuse you wrongfully, for you are too knightly to even think of it. I am sorry—very sorry—for you.

"And now let us get back, please, for Harry may, perhaps, be waiting for us."

Disappointed people are ever more keenly alive to shades of meaning in others, than are their more fortunate fellows.

Garton Hope fancied that he could detect in Xenia's casual mentioning of her cousin's name a something verylike to interest, or, perhaps, a deeper feeling.

This notion, rapidly incepted, as rapidly became a fixed idea that grew, and grew with every moment.

At the foot of the hotel steps he lifted his hat, craved pardon for half-an-hour's absence, and turned his face again towards the park.

From that moment nothing was seen or heard of Garton Hope.

The police, and a certain proportion of public opinion, counted the missing man as dead, and this, although no body was found.

Garton Hope had vanished, and that utterly.

* * * * *

Three days after the dinner at Hampton Court, Harry Lyle called at Pont Street and asked for his cousin Xenia.

There was a peculiar look about her, he thought. The merry, irresponsible laughter was gone, completely gone, in its stead being a curious, grave decidedness, a marked disposition to hear all, and to say as little as possible.

After expressing his regretful wonder at Hope's strange disappearance, Lyle stated the object of his visit. It was to formally ask the hand of his cousin. He quite believed that he had her heart; told her so, indeed; and assured her that his was hers for ever.

He was not prepared for that which followed.

She had listened with a silent impassiveness, but when he had ended his pleading she told him that of all men she loved him least.

"Do you know why? Shall I tell you why?" she flung at him, her usually dancing eyes blazing with wrath, her limbs trembling so with passionate excess that he feared she was ill, or—out of her mind. "Well, I will tell you. It is because I believe you to have killed Garton Hope!"

* * * * *

On the evening of the 8th of June, 1898, a gentleman, well-dressed, and of age five-and-twenty, or thereabouts, descended from a hansom at the door of a certain police-station in the West End, and, entering, asked for the inspector on duty.

"You are looking, I believe," said he, quite collectedly, and in matter-of-fact tones, "for the presumable murderer of Mr. Gordon Hope. Well, I killed him!"

You might have knocked down the astonished inspector with a feather.

"Oh, it is quite right! But be good enough, please, to give this," handing some loose silver to an attendant constable, "to the cabby. Thanks! And now, inspector, do your duty."

The still wondering official could hardly take it in that this courteous, refined gentleman was in earnest—was a slayer of men! His common sense seemed to scoff at it.

"Are you sure, sir?" said he; "quite sure, that this isn't a genuine practical joke. If it is, then, although it is a very poor one, I'm disposed to take your word for it and end the game."

"No," said Henry Lyle, "it is not a practical joke, or a game. I met Mr. Hope——"

"Excuse me, sir; but I must caution you that anything you may now say will be used in evidence against you at your trial."

Next week "Hazel Harlow in Newcastle."

"I quite understand that, of course. Well, as I was going to say, I met Mr. Hope in Bushey Park, as I was returning to the hotel, where he, my cousin, Miss Xenia Brooke, and myself had been dining earlier. Mr. Hope and I had words. He accused me of something which I considered disgraceful, but which I do not care to mention, and—I shot him!"

"But, sir," said the inspector, "nobody has been found; and although we hold that Mr. Hope has most certainly been murdered, yet I cannot for the life of me see how it could have happened in the way you state."

"That is your affair," said the voluntary prisoner. "I shot him!—that is all I know. As to what became of his body I am as ignorant as you are. With regard to my share in the transaction, perhaps this will convince you. Mr. Hope had in his possession a large morocco leather pocket-book. In this book was a paper I needed. Well, I took the case from him, and—here it is!" handing it to the inspector.

As a matter of fact, the pocket-book had been delivered to Lyle by the hotel people, with the idea that Mr. Hope's friend was the proper person to have possession of it until the rightful owner turned up.

"Good Lord!" ejaculated the inspector. "So it is." Then, after a bewildered pause: "It will be my duty, Henry Sutton Lyle, to detain you, pending inquiries, as having, on your own confession, killed one Garton Hope, by shooting him with a revolver in Bushey Park, on the 14th of August, 1897."

* * * * *

"The Queen against Lyle."

The issue of the first presentment before a jury, and the result of the actual trial, which took place, at the instance of the Public Prosecutor, three months later, are still fresh in the public mind, and therefore generally known.

With regard to Xenia Brooke's experiences, it is far different.

Completely secluded from Society and the world, she saw no one, from the day of her interview with young Lyle, save her mother. Anything approaching to outside information was not so much as breathed in her presence. It was not that she was exactly mad, or even that her mind was temporarily unhinged. Doctors were puzzled, because that, although this terrible family calamity would, in the nature of things, undoubtedly account for much, it did not act upon her mind and body in the way it should have done, according to the allopathic theory.

Xenia had become, to all intents and purposes, a dumb woman.

One thing only was there capable of rousing her out of her lethargy, and that to a state of frenzy. It was her cousin's name. The danger of speaking it in her hearing was fully realised; but sometimes inadvertently, in an unguarded moment, it would escape her mother's lips, and for days afterwards would Xenia be unapproachable by even that best of friends.

By some means she had contrived to procure a newspaper giving an account of Henry Lyle's condemnation; and it was terrible, horrible even, to witness her exultation.

"Now!" she cried, "Now he will be avenged! Now! now! now! Blood for blood! Harry Lyle for Garton Hope! For once man's justice follows hard after the Almighty's!"

The other friends of the doomed man would have none of his confession of deliberate homicide. His father, General Lyle, V.C., an old Indian veteran, besieged, not alone the Home Office, but the Throne itself.

"He is mad!" he pleaded. "My son is mad! Foolish he may have been—wild, extravagant, even—what young man of spirit is not? but wicked! no! A murderer? NO! He is distraught, I tell you! And in the name of the God of Mercy and of Justice, I ask of you—I demand of you!—not to believe him! and to—have pity upon me!"

But the ears of authority were stopped—the "powers that be" were obstinately deaf to the old man's cry for mercy for his first-born.

Certain press advocates, as representing a large section of the public, spoke strongly for reconsideration. Useless; worse than useless.

If the father's piteous appeal must needs fall to the ground, how could it be that the efforts of the Fourth Estate, powerful as it is, should have it in them to open the door of fate for Henry Lyle?

Of no avail seemed the voice of man with man for man.

So, fearsome, hopeless, it all remained, until the night of the day before that appointed for the last dread exit.

Then a strange thing happened.

At a few minutes before midnight of this same day, an elderly man, white-haired, bowed of shoulder, and wrapped in furs, alighted from the boat train at Charing Cross, and drove immediately to the "Savoy." He was accompanied by one servant, a valet, whose aid was frequently in requisition by reason of his master's feebleness and evident general ill-health.

The gentleman registered at the hotel in the name of Philip Garton; the servant stating for the information of those curious to know, that his master had but now returned from a two years' trip round the world; and that his present state of health was due to fever contracted at Cairo on the way back to England.

Mr. Garton appearing to be well provided with this world's gear, and a suite of apartments on the main floor having been secured for him by telegraph from Paris the day before, the above explanation was accepted as being eminently satisfactory.

Mr. Garton had commissioned his valet to procure everything in the shape of morning and evening newspaper literature.

"Sit down, Barnes," he said, after a light meal, and when he had been placed by his attendant in an armchair by the blazing fire (May of that year was very cold), over which he spread his long thin hands in evident enjoyment. "Sit down, and read me anything that strikes you as being interesting."

Political items, Society doings, public opinion—or rather press opinion—on this, that, and the other occupied the first quarter of an hour.

The hands of the clock on the mantelpiece were nearing "two" when the man read out to the master the following paragraph:

> It is now definitely announced that the Home Secretary cannot see any reason for interfering with the due course of law in the case of Henry Sutton Lyle, now under sentence of death for the murder of Mr. Garton Hope in Bushey Park, on the 14th of August, 1897.

The valet will never, so long as he shall live, forget the look of horror and desperate despair such as was on his master's face as he struggled to rise from the depths of his chair.

"Barnes! Barnes! It is life or death! Do you hear, man? Life or death! I must go out!—now, man, now! Quick! I say, dress me, or it will be too late!"

Within half-an-hour the night watchman on duty at the Home Office in Whitehall was roused to something like wakefulness by a summons from a police patrol.

A gentleman, accompanied by a man-servant, was in a four-wheeler at the door.

"The Home Secretary's address? I want it! I must have it—at once!"

This was so unusual a request, and at such an unusual hour, that the watchman might well be pardoned for hesitating to comply with it.

A few words, however, spoken in his ear by the gentleman's companion, speedily put an altogether different complexion upon matters.

The address given—fortunately the Minister was in town—the cab dashed away again in the direction of ——— Square.

It was now well past three, and the Secretary's house, when they arrived in front of it, was silent and dark from roof to basement.

The cabby's vigorous ring at the front door bell echoed and re-echoed through house and street.

"What's up, cabby?" said the policeman on the beat, flashing his bull's-eye on the cab and its occupants.

"Gentleman wants the 'ome Secretary. Case o' life an' death, 'e says."

"Oh! well, I'll make 'em hear!" and forthwith the constable began hammering at the door in veritable Viking fashion.

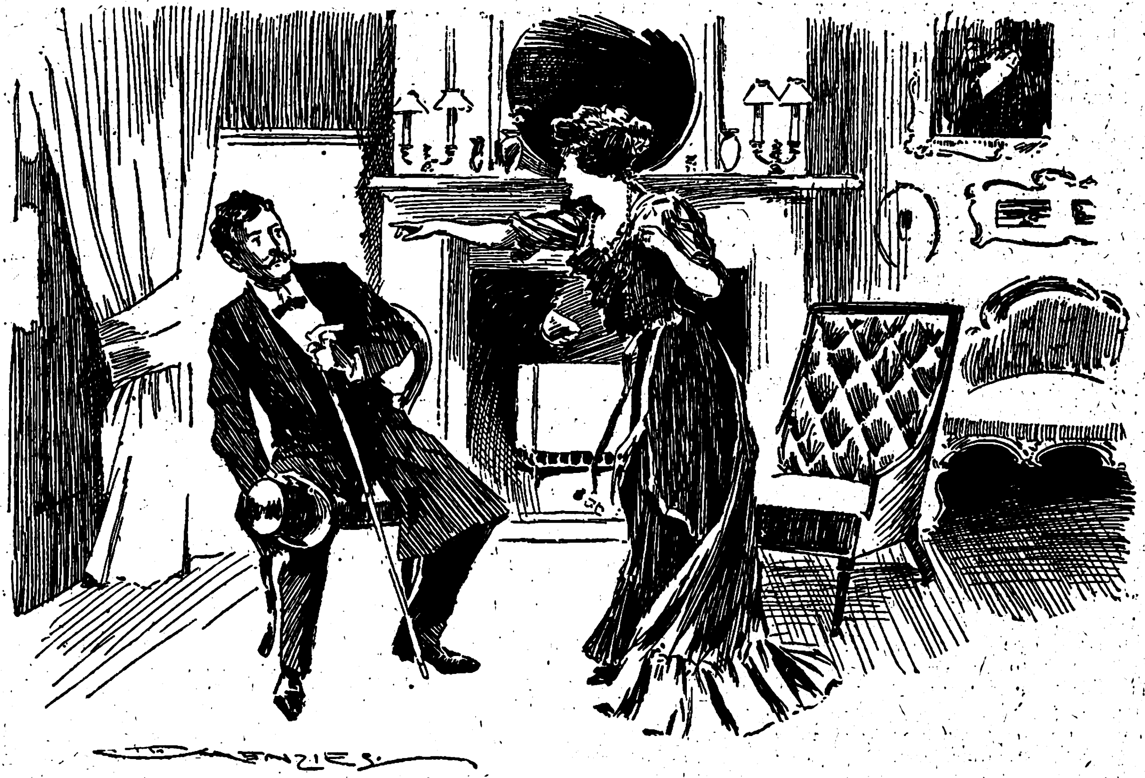
In a minute or two sounds inside were audible, and then lights gleamed from the upper windows, and anon from the fanlight and sidelights of the entrance.

A rattle of bolts and chains, and the door was flung open by a sleepy-looking footman.

Just fifteen minutes later and the cab, with now an additional passenger, was on its way back again to Whitehall, calling on the route at Scotland Yard.

In another hour that same cab might have been seen waiting outside the grey City prison.

What actually took place inside, no man, save the two intimately concerned, and the chief prison officials, will ever know.



"Shall I tell you why?" she flung at him. "Because I believe you to have killed Garton Hope."

Let the Editor hear what you think of "Adventures of an Actress."

The two or three night wanderers in the neighbourhood saw in the early morning three people emerge from the prison gate, get into the cab, and drive away westward.

The next morning's papers had a brief preliminary announcement:

> A stop-press message says that Henry Sutton Lyle, who was to have been executed this morning for the murder of Mr. Garton Hope, has been unconditionally released, by special order of the Home Secretary. The reason given is that Mr. Hope is in London, alive, though far from well. Further details may be expected later on.

Two men sat by the fire in a sitting-room at the Savoy.

"Lyle," said the elder, "will you tell me why you did this thing?"

"Only upon your promise given that you will keep my secret."

"Tell me," was all the other said.

"Well, awhile after you had so mysteriously disappeared, I asked Xenia to marry me. She refused, and not only so, but she deliberately accused me of murdering you! I can only suppose that the horrible suggestion, coming as it did from her lips, had an adverse, or rather perverse, influence for the time being upon my reason; for from that moment, until that day when I walked into the police-station and accused myself of the crime, the persuasion in my own mind that I had really slain you became more and more a fixed conviction. It was only when, so to speak, I came to myself after the catastrophe, that I knew what I had done."

"Ah, well!" sighed Garton Hope. "Your first duty, as is mine, is to thank God that I was in time."

"Yes," replied the other. "I suppose so—I am sure so!—but—I shall never understand, never! Now, tell me why you went away."

"Partly," said Hope, "for the same reason that prompted you to your act of mad self-delusion. I also asked Xenia Brooke to marry. Also, she refused me; and I—who had put my all into the scale of her love—could not face the inevitable. I fled, as much from myself as from human ken and human association. It is all, of course, very unreasonable, both my act and yours. But I think it should make us better friends; and if you are of the same mind as I am, you will leave London—England—Europe!—behind you, and come with me to a place I wot of by the waters of the Pacific. There on a new earth, beneath new skies, you and I will lead our new lives. Xenia is for neither of us—we know that. What say you?"

"I will go! Just, however, let me bid farewell to my old dad, and to—no, not to Xenia, and then I will go."

As the Egyptian, Pacific Mail steamer, came in sight of the Golden Gate on a glorious morning at the summer end of '99, two gentlemen, one much older than the other, stood by the hurricane deck rail, looking at the rapidly nearing shore.

Said the elder, pointing with his finger landwards: "Was I not wise to persuade you?"

"I was wiser far in the being persuaded," said Henry Lyle.

COMMONPLACE JIM.

"If Jim wasn't so hopelessly commonplace!" sighed Mary Partridge as she leaned over the garden gate and watched her husband's clumsy figure move heavily down the village street. "And it does seem as though he grew more homely and awkward every day of life," muttered she.

A step on the gravel walk aroused her from her discontented musing, and turning, she met the smiling face and handsome dark eyes of the young clerk who boarded next door.

"Don't look so disconsolate, Mrs. Partridge," said he gaily, disclosing his white teeth in a mocking smile. "Jim is coming home to dinner, isn't he?"

"Of course, Mr. Blake," answered Mary, the colour deepening in her face as she moved back a step.

"I—I was only thinking a bit," continued Mary, forcing a smile.

"Come, Mary, tell me all about it," said he softly. "Is marriage a failure or is it not?"

Mary gave a slight toss of her head, and without a word turned and walked swiftly toward the house.

A complacent smile curved the young man's lips as he proceeded on his way.

"That girl is about as much in love with her middle-aged husband as I am," muttered he.

Indeed, that was the whole truth of the matter. Mary Partridge was not in love with her husband and never had been. Like many another village maiden she had grown weary with the struggle for self-maintenance and had accepted her first good offer of marriage. Jim Partridge was a bachelor of forty, plain looking, steady and industrious, earning the good wages of a mechanic, and the owner of a pretty cottage house. To Mary this seemed almost wealth, and smothering her desire for a more romantic attachment, she had gladly accepted the good fortune that had come to her. A year had passed, and with it the novelty of her comfortable surroundings, and a feeling of discontent had crept into Mary's heart.

Jim's quiet good-nature, his simple, unpretending manners and homely domestic ways had begun to pall upon her.

Her face burned and her heart beat uncomfortably as she hastened into the house with Arthur Blake's words ringing in her ears.

"Is marriage a failure, Mary, or is it not?"

Over and over again Mary asked herself this question as she busied herself about the sunny kitchen, dusted her pretty parlour, and arranged the china and silver upon the snowy cloth of the dinner table.

Suddenly the answer came with swift conviction, and Mary clasped her hands together in mute despair. It was a failure—a miserable failure, she thought bitterly.

To give up for ever her freedom, her liberty of action, her every chance in life, for what? Mary's eyes glanced around the room and answered for her. Yes, she had a pretty home, and Jim was kind to her and loved her more than she deserved, and yet, ah! her life was simply unbearable.

With this thought came an uncontrollable desire to escape from the bonds that held her, to snap the chains that she herself had wrought, and to go away, somewhere, anywhere, only to go—go! As if driven by some invisible power, Mary snatched a hat from its nail and rushed from the house.

Across the well-kept grass-plot at the rear of the cottage Mary sped, out though the gate, and over the wide pasture lot that lay between the lawn and the dusty highway.

The sun shone, the birds sang, the grass was strewn with buttercups and daisies, and the air was fragrant with summer's sweetest perfume, but Mary heeded them not. Breathless and panting, she reached the long stretch of country road just as the village clock struck twelve. Jim would be coming home to dinner and sometimes he came that way, thought Mary, and again that feeling that she must flee from him, from the pretty home, the hateful marriage bonds, urged her footsteps. The gleaming railroad track lay across the road a short distance ahead.

The throbbing of her brain, the beating of her heart, deafened her ears to the approaching train, and swiftly she crossed the track. As she gained the other side she saw Jim's familiar figure coming towards her. Again that curious desire to fly from him took possession of her, and she turned back.

"Mary! What are you about?" cried a man's voice and two strong arms pushed her from the track, and she fell forward upon her face in the dusty road while the train thundered on. Stunned for a few moments, Mary did not move, then with an effort she rose to her feet, wondering at the strange silence about her.

Where was Jim? Her dazed eyes glanced up and down the road and fell at last upon a silent form that lay huddled against the track.

"Oh, Jim, have I killed you?" she cried in agony as she bent over him.

Gathering his head and shoulders within her strong young arms, Mary dragged him into the cool grass beneath the shade of a huge tree.

Save for the slow rise and fall of that broad chest, Jim Partridge lay as one dead, and Mary's repentant tears and the touch of her trembling fingers fell unheeded upon that pale face.

It was but a few minutes, but it seemed hours to Mary in her suspense and remorse, before help arrived and her husband was carried slowly and carefully back to his cottage home.

Through the long night hours, while two physicians were working over Jim's poor bruised body, there awoke in the heart of Mary Partridge a revelation. With horror and disgust she looked back upon her wild impulse of the morning.

"If Jim dies he will have given his life for mine," she murmured, through her sobs, "and no man can do more than that. What am I that I should scorn such a love, or call it commonplace?"

"Your husband will live. He has asked to see you," said the physician's voice.

"A pretty close shave, wasn't it?" whispered Jim, as his wife leaned tenderly over him. "But whatever possessed you to come to meet me this morning, Mary?"

"I cannot tell, Jim, dear," answered Mary, as she bent and kissed him.

The Golden Dwarf

A Sensational Romance of To-Day.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "A Keeper of Secrets," "Hate, the Destroyer," "A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS OF "GOLDEN DWARF."

"It is the body of Sir Christopher Dering!"

The words are spoken by a pretty girl—fair-haired, blue-eyed. She stands, horrified, by a grass-grown ditch in a country lane, out of which a great mastiff is climbing. The ditch contains the corpse of a stalwart man—a handkerchief bound over his mouth and nostrils.

Close to there is a strange figure, graceful, well-dressed, even handsome, but with the stature of a boy and the face of an adult. He carries a heavy dog-whip, and stares, fixedly, at the dead body just discovered by his mastiff, Cerberus.

The girl is Esther Carew; the dwarf, Otto Hare, the richest landowner in Derbyshire, and the mystery of Wyresdale, a village in that county. For the first time in fifteen years he has set foot in a public thoroughfare, to attract the attention of Esther, whom he has watched from his park.

Sir Christopher Dering was alive at seven o'clock the preceding day. He and his nephew, Felix, had quarrelled over the latter's love for Esther. Sir Christopher wanted Felix to make a good marriage—the birth of his little cousin Brian has put him out of the succession to the baronetcy. Felix is faithful to the penniless Esther Carew.

Much turns on the whereabouts of Felix on the night before. It appears that he was in Duchester, some miles off, whither he went on business, and spent a night at the theatre. Could he have killed the squire?

Felix in vain protests his innocence.

But the cloud of suspicion gathers around him. Meantime, the child Brian has been kidnapped, and Felix is suspected of this too. He discovers a riding whip with some peculiar marks upon it.

CHAPTER XXIV. (continued).

He strolled on, his fingers interlaced behind him, his big head drooped to his breast.

Slowly he lounged down the avenue, cleared the gates, threaded a bye-path to the High-Street, and went along it in the direction of Otto Hare's jealously-enclosed domains.

As he strode by Caleb Forster's shop, someone came from the back of the counter and called to him. Dr. Kraft spun about to behold Archibald Geddes.

"Excuse my stopping you, Professor," observed the Scotchman, "but when you were in the other day you let this fall."

The chemist's assistant proffered a tiny roll of discoloured paper.

Kraft peered at it, and then, quivering with an odd nervousness, caught it and drew it out flat. The motion revealed an unmounted photograph of the snap-shot order.

Geddes looked, not at the exposed sheet, but at the German's countenance. Instead of its native pink it had grown white—a drab, slatey-white.

"Thank you," said Joseph Kraft; the words broke jerkily from his twitching mouth, and he crumpled the photograph to a ball. "Thank you," he reiterated, in the same dazed tone—"a—a curiosity, Mr. Geddes—from abroad."

"Interesting, but—but horrible, don't you think?" reiterated the Scotchman, drily.

Kraft glanced up quickly over his glasses.

"A matter of temperament," he answered; "thank you again, Mr. Geddes, and good night."

Joseph Kraft stalked on, the pallor ebbing from his damp skin. Rounding the corner to the cross-roads, he threw up his arms.

"Sakerment!" he cried; "what luck! what teufel's luck! There are eight hundred fools in this verdamdt hamlet and that cursed picture escapes them all, to reach his hands!"

CHAPTER XXV.

In which Foley Carries a Box.

"I just wanted to have a trifle of conversation with you, Mr. Forester, touching what I may almost call a—a family matter. So, as I know you breakfast latish, I timed myself to find you over your second cup of tea."

Inspector Brasher deposited a peaked official cap on the horse-hair sofa in the parlour behind Caleb Forester's shop and sat down at the neat table.

The old chemist, still drowsy from the previous evening's debauch at the "Wheatsheaf," ruffled his silver locks and shot an anxious glance at the visitor.

"A—a family matter," he stammered; "I'm afraid I don't understand."

Michael Brasher coughed and stroked his crisp, black beard.

"Well," he said, "it's about an alleged brother-in-law of yours—one Nick or Nicholas Foley, a retired seaman, I am told; a powerful, bullet-headed fellow who has lost an arm."

Caleb Forester pushed away the balance of the meal before him—he had scarcely tasted it.

"Nick Foley is a relation of mine by marriage," was the chemist's answer, "yet for years I have seen little of him, and wish to see less. He has been a rover since boyhood, drinks like a fish, and blusters as if he were a recruiting-sergeant."

The Inspector nodded.

"Mr. Foley asserts that he has but recently come back to Wyresdale," went on Michael Brasher; "within a fortnight or so. Can you give me the exact date of his arrival?"

Caleb started.

"I—I am not aware of that," he faltered, "but as long ago as the—the twenty-second of last month I myself saw him, quite by chance, in the—the evening."

Mr. Brasher made a note of the detail.

"Do you recollect the hour?" queried the Inspector, abstractedly.

"N—no," murmured the chemist; "but it was close on midnight. I had been round to the Wheatsheaf Hotel. I have an occasional smoke and glass of claret there, Mr. Brasher."

"An agreeable relaxation," was the calm response; "and by-the-bye, Mr. Forester, when precisely did you happen to pick up this relative of yours? During your return home, I presume it was."

Caleb Forester hesitated. Michael Brasher leaned forward and laid a hand upon the other's coat sleeve.

"Mr. Forester," he observed, "I wish to be your friend, that is, I wish to be more than a friend to your daughter, as you may or may not have suspected. The fact has made me cautious in following the clue which first, in my opinion, connected you with a particular event. Yet duty is duty, and I can do little but provide, for Miss Connie's sake, against wronging you by imperfectly tested conclusions."

The chemist shrank from him, alarmed. Caleb Forester had grown wan and bloodless.

"Now," pursued the Inspector, "I can easily comprehend that you shy at putting the noose round your dead wife's brother's neck. But if, as I infer, you noticed Foley near the cross-roads on the night which was doubtless that of Sir Christopher Dering's murder, it can serve no practical end for you to hold your tongue. Should you not choose to be frank with me I must needs believe you to be an accomplice or an accessory, and treat you as such."

Caleb shuddered and looked askance from side to side of the trim parlour. An atmosphere of his daughter seemed to cling about it. She had laid the table for his belated breakfast; she had set out the flowers which stood on the plaster mantel, and starched the snowy curtains that screened the window. He dare not think of all that Mr. Brasher's threat might mean to him and his.

The grave features of Michael Brasher bent on the chemist a steadfast regard.

"Am I correct?" demanded the Inspector; "you did see Foley near the cross roads?"

Caleb assented with a sigh and a miserable gesture. "But," he said, "you forget Nicholas has only a single arm—it would have been impossible for him to have——"

Mr. Brasher stowed a leather-bound memorandum-book in his braided skirts.

"It is beyond my province to discuss that," was his curt decision; "let me warn you against referring to the question in any fashion, abroad or to your customers, and especially at the Wheatsheaf."

He reached his cap and prepared to depart, but checked himself, and stepped to Caleb Forester's elbow. The chemist had begun to pour a modicum of hot water into the flat, unglazed teapot.

"Oh," said the Inspector, "I gather you spoke at the Wheatsheaf awhile since of some service you had been able to do Mr. Felix Dering. May I ask what it was?"

A crash punctuated Michael Brasher's sentence; the teapot shattered itself on the flagged hearth, distributing wet leaves and ruddy fluid over the rug and the polished stone. Caleb muttered an excuse, and stooped to collect the fragments of earthenware; when he rose his withered countenance was firm and cool.

"Why," he answered, "it was I who recommended him to drop in at the Duchester Theatre while the Colleen Bawn was being played. But for going that night he might have returned to Wyresdale; and they do say, Mr. Brasher, if he hadn't had a clear alibi he'd have been arrested instead of poor Spencer, whom people fancy you took to throw the real criminal off his guard."

Michael Brasher shrugged a pair of massive shoulders. "It's a pity the public can't do its own police work," he grumbled; "then it'd learn a thing or two. Good-day, Mr. Forester, and recollect a still tongue makes a wise head. You'll hear from me again."

He twisted the latch, strode out, and descended into the shop. As he passed the counter, with its gleaming bottles and glass cases of puffs and sponges, Mr. Brasher paused to salute the grim form of Archibald Geddes.

"You're an early caller, Inspector," vouchsafed the Scotchman, plying a lump of parcel-wax about the wrapper of a prescription.

Michael Brasher assumed a confidential air.

"I've been endeavouring," he said, "to do Miss Forester a sort of service—candidly, to frighten Mr. Forester off his evenings at the Wheatsheaf. It would be a pity if he were apprehended some night; he gets foolish enough for it."

"You could surely strain a point, for Miss Connie's father," snapped Geddes; "and the old chap's innoffensive, at all events."

"I would strain half a dozen," retorted the Inspector, "but I am not omnipotent in Wyresdale, Mr. Geddes. Perhaps, for Miss Forester's sake, you might keep an eye on Mr. F."

And with this Parthian shot, Michael Brasher gained the High Street.

Geddes stared after him jealously.

"I wonder," growled the Scotchman, "if he's been tapping the governor for permission to approach Connie on the score of marriage. Be hanged to him for a solemn ass. Not such an ass, though; Michael Brasher recognises me for his sworn rival and I've done my best to keep that dark."

Unconscious of Mr. Geddes' indignation at his actual penetration and imagined audacity, the Inspector was threading a series of by-paths towards the narrow lane, where, not far from the lodge gates of Dering House, Nicholas Foley's dilapidated cottage sentinelled the grassy margin of the road.

On the low threshold of his abode sat the sailor himself —a briar pipe between his lips, his chin in his palms, and the characteristic slouch hat thrust to the nape of his neck.

Perceiving that Mr. Brasher halted at the clumsy wicket. Nicholas stretched his limbs, resumed an erect position and sauntered down the path.

"Mornin'," he said, and plucked the briar from his mouth to replenish it; "thought I knew the cut of your jib. Have some baccy," he supplemented, offering his pouch "it's real Virginian leaf, and if you don't make no inquires as to how I got it, I won't tell you no lies. But you'll not have a pull at the likes of it often in your life."

Tempted by the appearance of the tobacco, Michael Brasher accepted a pipeful.

"Didn't seem as if we should hit it when we fouled spars at Wyresdale Park wall a week ago," said the sailor, "but I bear no malice, love you. You found I was right about being allowed to set a few snares up yonder."

"I haven't troubled to ask," replied Mr. Brasher, cheerfully, blowing a fragrant cloud, "I accepted your word for it when I learned you were a kind of kith to Caleb Forester. How do your snares work, by the way?—you should be lucky in Wyresdale Park, Mr. Hare preserves a pile of game. But those big dogs he keeps to scare trespassers must make it wild."

"That'll be why I've done precious little yet," said Nicholas, hiding a grin.

"Not easy to set a snare one-handed?" suggested the Inspector, designedly. Nicholas showed a rugged fist.

"I'm not as gammy as I look," he observed, "my five fingers are as useful as your ten, I'll go bail."

"When it comes to tying a knot," demurred Michael Brasher.

The sailor bared his teeth. "These help me out," was his answer, "there ain't many knots I can't do and undo, thread, line and rope."

Brasher fumbled in his pockets.

"I don't mean to argue I dispute your ability," declared the Inspector, "but do you mind my seeing how you contrive; I'd no idea, with your affliction, you could be so smart. No," he broke off, ceasing to rummage, "I've not a bit of string. But a handkerchief might do?"

He produced the article as he spoke, a species of suspense revealing itself in his demeanour. Nicholas Foley seized it, placed an extremity between his teeth, shifted his grip once or twice and, lo, the wisp of linen was knotted into a circle.

"Marvellous!" cried Mr. Brasher; "and what a palm you have—as strong as a gorilla's, you could smash every bone in mine, I guess."

The guileful Inspector extended his arm seductively. Nicholas clutched and squeezed the proffered fingers; his grasp was that of a steel vice.

"Incredible!" ejaculated Michael Brasher; "Mr. Foley, you are a miracle. As a two-handed person I envy you your single one. Thanks for the tobacco, which is all you claim for it. I am due at the station now, but I shall hope to improve your acquaintance."

The sailor waved a flattered adieu with his briar, and Mr. Brasher walked off.

"It's a pretty clue," he said to himself, "but the case is incomplete. Sir Christopher was suffocated by a knotted bandanna, after being stunned by a blow. Forester can prove this fellow to have been near the spot at the time, and he is obviously capable in a physical sense, of the deed. But would that convict him? No, I must root out some more evidence, and then, then for a big success, and possibly a London berth."

Lost in ambitious dreams, he proceeded on his way. He had just rounded the corner of a transverse by-path which shortened the route to the police-depôt, when there stopped at the wicket of the sailor's garden, a small, shrewd lad, clothed with a blue uniform, ornamented by a brass badge and buttons. The new arrival carried a heavy wooden box.

"Can you tell me the road to Wyresdale Park?" he inquired, his accent a pronounced Cockney.

Nicholas surveyed him critically—the lad was a pleasant, red-cheeked youngster. "What ship are you middy of, my cherub?" rejoined the sailor.

The boy deposited his load cautiously. It was a deal casket, three and a quarter feet by eighteen inches, and half as many deep. The lid, pierced with several apertures,

Hazel Harlow's adventures grow more exciting every week.

the size of a sixpence, allowed to be seen, at the bottom of these ventilators, a perforated metal lining. The whole of the box was bound by broad bands of tape, lavishly sealed, and supplementing its component nails and screws. On it was a label, addressed in bold written characters.

This side up: with great care. Zoological specimen, alive.

Otto Hare, Esq.,
Wyresdale Park,
Wyresdale, Derbyshire.

"I'm a messenger boy, from London," said the bearer of this coffer, gazing curiously at the one-armed sailor, and noting, with a boyish instinct for the romance of the sea, his tattooed wrist and tanned skin.

Nicholas drew the wicket ajar, rolled through, and lifted the box. "I'm steering that course," he announced, "and you are dead beat, my lad. I'll give you a convoy. Come on—it's just a few cables-length off."

The messenger yielded, and they went on together up the lane. Foley was surreptitiously weighing and shaking the box; but no sound emerged to slake or to whet his inquisitiveness.

"It's a decent distance to send a nest of snakes by a nipper like you," he ventured; "or is it a baby alligator?"

"I don't know what's in the thing," answered the youngster, wiping the perspiration from his brow. "I was to bring it as fast as I could. A hansom to St. Pancras, and second-class fare all the way."

"I reckon them dealers charge the swells any price they choose," pursued Nicholas; "was this out of Jamrach's? I've sold him an odd monkey or so, and a 'strictor or two, in my time."

"It wasn't a dealer that sent me," said the boy, innocently; "I fetched it from a hotel. A gentleman rang up for a messenger to go to Derbyshire with a valuable box, and I was told to take it. A tall, fat gentleman he was—a foreigner—and gave me a sovereign for myself."

Foley whistled. "Kraft," he muttered, and rolled on in silence, still poising the casket critically. His next device was to sniff at it; but the only result appeared to be a discontented shake of the head. Then he listened at the ventilator-holes.

The lad fidgeted. "'Arf time with that," he said. "I was to carry it quite level. You'll be getting me into trouble. I'll take it now, if you don't mind—I'm a lot rested, thank you," he added, softening.

Nicholas returned the box. They were at the extremity of the fine avenue that led to Otto Hare's classic white mansion.

"Bear straight ahead," he instructed, "and you'll twig it. So-long, my lad. You're a trump to obey orders, and you musn't mind an old sailor's freedom."

Colouring at his elder's apology, the messenger pressed forward, and was soon out of sight. Nicholas, left to himself, meditated—and scratched his ear. Suddenly his reflective countenance was illuminated by a broad smile. He slapped his thigh and set off running.

A quick trot brought him to the convenient bough which overhung the park wall. He climbed in and hurried through the plantation to the skirt of the rounded hill where stood the singular tower and the fort-like structure on which he had concentrated such an obstinate attention.

Partially screened by a dense thicket, he kneeled down and examined the turf in front of him. It undulated slightly, and betrayed signs of recent displacement.

Nicholas wrinkled his forehead, then pulled out his clasp-knife, adjusted the blade, and began to dig. He had struck upon the exact spot where, some days before, those shadowy figures from the tower had been interrupted in their unexplained task by the breaking of the branch that had secretly served Nicholas Foley as a means of espionage.

While the sailor worked, a small form emerged stealthily from the door in the base of the tower. Its masculine outlines and scrupulous morning costume marked it for that of the Golden Dwarf. Otto Hare clutched by the collar a great liver-hued mastiff.

Picking up a stone, he tossed it lightly in the direction of the thicket that hid the operations of the sailor. The dog darted after it with a fierce bellow. Foley leapt up, startled. The mastiff swerved, recoiled, and rushed in again, to catch the sailor by the throat. The clasp-knife fell from Nicholas's grasp as he reeled back. He struggled to thrust his thumb into an eye of the creature, but the brute bore him to the ground and worried him.

A moment the Golden Dwarf watched the fight. When he whistled off the dog, Foley remained motionless, the blood streaming from his neck.

A grim smile distorted the Dwarf's face, and he strode away, followed by the reluctant mastiff. The beast's jaws and gleaming fangs were stained by gouts of crimson fluid.

CHAPTER XXVI.

"THAT WOMAN IS NOT YOU."

"MY darling, do not weep so; you will break my heart. And I have never had more need of all my strength and determination, Let me see you smile once—if only to give me courage—or I shall be sorry I met Barbara and asked her to tell you I would be here."

Esther Carew raised her golden head; it had been lying on her folded arms, which were supported by the end of the rustic seat in the Rosery garden.

Her blue eyes were limpid, her fair cheeks wet with tears.

"You don't understand, Felix," she said; "it must be all over between us. For your sake it must."

Felix Dering put a palm on the clustered curls and drew them from Esther's white brow. "Poor child," he murmured; "you are frightened, I can read it in your face. What is the matter?"

Esther gathered his firm fingers in her own tender ones, a terrified glow had dilated her sensitive pupils.

"Dearest," she whispered; "Mr. Hare knows about your—your coming back to Wyresdale that evening; oh, I kept your secret, he did not learn it from me. But he says he could do you an ill-turn and would, if he thought—forgive me, dearest—if he thought you continued to insult me with your attentions."

Her lover started and clenched a brown hand.

"The little asp!" he cried; "so his plan is, by threatening me, to force you into accepting him, But I will spoil the plot, and in a way he does not look for. I will ask Brasher to arrest me, and take my trial like a man. Why should I fear, I am guiltless. Whatever happens, then, you will be free of the Golden Dwarf—he has no hold over you except through me."

Esther sprang and clung to him. "Don't dream of it," she cried; "don't dream of it—I should go mad if you were in prison. Felix, they might kill you, the law sometimes makes mistakes. I couldn't bear the suspense."

Felix clasped her to his breast. "I wish I had never knit our destinies together," he muttered huskily. "Be brave, dear; I cannot protect myself from Hare's vindictiveness by allowing you to tolerate his overtures. But, tell me, did he openly assert his power to prove my presence in Wyresdale on the night of my uncle's death?"

"N—no," faltered Esther; "it was Dr. Kraft who warned me Mr. Hare could do that. Mr. Hare only hinted."

"Dr. Kraft!" exclaimed Felix amazed. "He and the Golden Dwarf are inseparable. Esther, this means mischief of some sort, and I will fathom it. Yet have no alarm on my account; it is not enough to show that I was at Wyresdale on a certain occasion. If Mr. Hare does no more he cannot harrass me much. There is, to be honest, another who may cause me still greater trouble."

He was silent, pondering. "Esther," he said at length, "a malignant fate has hemmed me round with dangers, and I myself am offered—tactfully, skilfully, vaguely—dishonourable terms of escape. I shall not accept them. While I live you are the one woman in the world for me, and rather than prove false, or lose you through cowardice, I would mount the scaffold or enter the convict's cell."

The girl shivered. Her lover's words were deliberate and significant.

Felix stooped and kissed her lips. "Believe in me always, dear," he said; "I will not, as I have been urged to, fly from those who attack me, nor will I fight, if I can help it, a losing battle! And now, good-bye for the present. But, till I bid you, do not abandon hope."

Esther choked down a sob. "You won't leave me a second week with no sign of your existence," she pleaded. "Not that it would be the slightest use asking you to call; mamma wouldn't be at home if you did."

Felix sighed. "I could not think how to get speech of you," he rejoined, "and, indeed, I have been too miserable to bear even your sweet society. If it were not the trick of a poltroon, Esther, I would terminate the imbroglio by a merciful bullet."

A soft clasp stole about Felix Dering's neck, and a pair of piteous orbs looked into his. Felix answered their mute appeal.

"No," he said; "I will not do it—they may hang me if they like. I will die an innocent gentleman, and not a suicide."

He considered a moment.

"You recollect the old hawthorn at the top of the strawberry-bed," he added, "where the robins built last year?"

Esther nodded: she could not speak, the phrase recalled memories of a happy summer, before the shadow of a twin crime had banished the joy of their young romance.

"In the hole at the root," promised Felix, "I will put you a letter twice a week—I can reach it at night from the paddock. And you must post me notes the same way. Farewell, dearest."

Felix snatched a last embrace, and, not daring to glance back, stepped through the hawthorn hedge.

Look out for when Hazel Harlow visits your town.

From the Rosery he turned towards the High Street, strode along its drowsy avenue of shops and entered that of Caleb Forester. Archibald Geddes was behind the counter, his sober countenance bent over the pages of a book—the Scotchman was an indefatigable student. Relinquishing his volume, he looked up; Felix and he had not met since that Sunday when they had contemplated the dismantled window of the strong-room at the police-station, and the chemist's assistant had shown himself so oddly critical of his companion.

"Good morning, sir," said the Scotchman, and waited for the other to speak.

Felix acknowledged the salutation.

"I want to buy or to borrow a magnifying lens, Geddes," he explained; "do you stock such articles?"

Archibald Geddes twisted his thick moustache. "N-no," was his rejoinder; "but I can lend you a decent one I have by me. I use it for botanical purposes."

The Scotchman had recourse to a drawer, produced the lens in its nickel frame, and held it over his thumb. It was a rather powerful glass—enlarging twenty or thirty times.

Felix thanked the owner and accepted the proffered loan of the instrument.

"I will restore it in a day or two," he added.

Geddes wrapped up the glass.

"No word of little Sir Brian yet?" asked the chemist's assistant, passing it across.

"None," responded Felix; "I quite realise what Wyresdale folk think of me, Geddes—you may share their suspicions, for anything I know."

The Scotchman coughed.

"I don't say, Mr. Dering," he conceded, "I find it easy to look upon you in the light of a child-stealer."

Felix put away the borrowed lens and moved to the door.

"I am glad of that," was his melancholy comment; "I imagine, some fine day, Geddes, you'll not regret having tried to think well of me."

He paused for an answer, but as the Scotchman preserved a judicious reticence, took his departure.

Through the hot sunbeams he strode on, by the small and winding roads of the place, to the lodge-gates of Dering House. His shoulders stooped and his head was bowed upon his chest like that of a greybeard. Vainly he strove with the difficulties of his situation—to remain passive seemed madness, to act was to court ruin.

Mechanically he gained the terrace and entered the lofty hall. In the embayed window commanding the lawn, sat Judith Garland. The lustre of the yellow noon picked her out as a handsome silhouette against the panes of the recess.

She rose and came to him—her black train rustled on the polished oak of the floor.

"Ah," she murmured, with the daring affectation of a mutual intelligence that had grown habitual to her in his presence; "I was waiting for you. I couldn't resist your pathetic demeanour during the past week. But Lady Dering has positively tied me to her apron-string. Never mind, we will have our deferred tête-à-tête now. Where shall we go—into the conservatory."

The net of her audacious and unwomanly wooing had been well woven, and strengthened by the perception that his life and honour lay, to a mysterious extent, in her power—it had paralysed Felix Dering too long.

He faced her determinedly. "Miss Garland," he said, "I must confess myself at a loss to comprehend this persistent tone on your part. But I should be culpable were I to risk your misinterpretation of my tolerance. I owe respect to all women, one only has my heart, and that woman—pardon my frankness, Miss Garland—is not you."

Judith gasped, and put her hand to her side; a real pang had stricken her at the failure of her immodest plot to entrap him.

"Fool!" she snarled, "and I would have saved you—I would have smoothed the way for you to take my assistance—and my love. You fling me off; then beware, beware! You shall suffer as I suffer."

And darting by him, she vanished in the gloom of the great staircase.

Felix drew a deep breath—the die was cast! He lingered a moment, before gaining his own chamber by the other side of the double flight. There he unwrapped the lens he had borrowed from Geddes, and, out of a locked cabinet, produced the Malacca hunting-crop that had been the dead St. Christopher's.

He poised the glass above the extremity where he had discovered the scratched characters. Without the lens he had been able to read a mutilated sentence, meaning little, yet suggesting much. What would the glass reveal?

CHAPTER XXVII.

The Trail to the Wall.

"So you have been to Paris for a holiday, Mr. Neal Garland? Thanks to the small token of esteem which I presented to you on my last visit, no doubt. Well, I have nothing to say against that. But why did you come back, to-day of all days, and telegraph to my hotel you must see me?"

"Why?" repeated Neal, throwing one leg over the other as he lounged on the corner of the table in Keturah Schwartz's dingy upper parlour, by the ponderous figure of the stout woman herself. "Because you've been here trying to pick Mrs. Schwartz's brains, and I won't have it. I made a bargain with you, and I'll stick to it. But you keep your own side of the fence."

"If you allude," said Dr. Kraft, calmly, "to the fact that I called to ask Mrs. Schwartz about a child I noticed in this house some while ago, I admit the imputation, though I do not comprehend for what reason you have caused me the inconvenience to break a journey North and travel to Pimlico when I was bound for Derbyshire under most important circumstances. Nor do I allow myself to be inconvenienced without making people suffer for it."

And the German smiled cruelly at the odd couple who sat opposite him.

"The reason is," snarled Neal, "you've been on the prowl, and we'll not stand it. We know too much about you for your good, Dr. Kraft, and if you're wise you won't threaten us."

Joseph Kraft's yellow eyes flashed behind his glasses. He gazed thoughtfully out of the window. It was a dull afternoon in Pimlico; the panes were splashed with shower drops.

"Let us exchange information," he said. "Now, I am aware you have certain quite respectable connections, Mr. Garland; that your sister is companion to a Lady Dering, of Wyresdale Park."

The German launched a quick scrutiny at Neal Garland, on whom bewilderment had laid an unmistakeable grip.

"You've been on the prowl there, too, have you?" hissed Neal; "anything else, Dr. Joseph Kraft?"

"Yes," said Kraft; "she is ashamed of you—she denies your existence."

"Ho, ho!" broke out Keturah Schwartz; "I like her impudence."

"Shut up, Keturah!" commanded her peculiar lodger; "come, Kraft, how does my having a sister affect my hold over you or your hold over me?"

Kraft was nonplussed; he had put down a trump card and had been overtrumped.

"Who told you she was my sister?" proceeded Neal; "let's get at the bottom of your prowling. There was none aware of it in Wyresdale—except——" he broke off ——"except Foley. Curse him, has he been blabbing?"

An expression of mixed incredulity and alarm flashed across the German's smooth visage. An instant later it regained its humourous cynicism.

"Do not blame your Foley, whoever he may be," said Joseph Kraft, smiling the thin, false smile characteristic of him; "I heard the name by chance, interviewed the lady, and observed the likeness. You gather that I am curious about you, Mr. Garland. Grant it; I have discovered in you the proverbial weasel; I will not hope to catch you asleep."

He got up out of his chair.

"You score, Mr. Garland," he conceded; "since you enter an objection to my inquiries about the child, I will not pursue them. An acquaintance of mine—abroad—desired such a little boy to adopt. But it is of no moment —no moment whatever."

The German brushed the loose sleeve of his frock-coat against his hat—a broad-brimmed silk on this occasion had displaced his soft straw.

"By the way," he added, "if I should want you to convince a certain person—a—a young lady—of Mr. Felix Dering's presence in Wyresdale on a particular night, you could run down, for a consideration, as per our agreement?"

Neal glanced at Mrs. Schwartz, who wrinkled her brows warningly. Joseph Kraft tapped the crown of his hat.

"The consideration," he murmured, "would be substantial."

"I'll be there when I'm required," growled Neal; "and woe betide you, Kraft, if you play any dogs-trick on me."

"I am as guileless as a—a newly-arrived infant," said the German.

He bowed to Keturah Schwartz, nodded cheerfully to Neal, and stepped out of the creaking door with so much address they did not hear him go.

In the squalid thoroughfare beneath, Joseph Kraft's mild self-possession vanished. His saffron pupils contracted, his mouth set, his nostrils drew together. Ferocity was stamped on every line of his features.

"The world is too small, curse it!" he cried; "else how should they have met Foley. The combination is dangerous —I must break it, and without delay. Foley, my friend, you had better have stopped out of Wyresdale. And Mr. Neal Garland, too—but he is useful for the moment. Sakerment, how many flies there are to buzz about such a man as I! Well, they must be crushed, one by one."

He hailed a cab, which swayed under his weight as he mounted into it, and gave the order, "St. Pancras."

At the Midland depot a commissionaire met him with his bag; the German took a ticket, boarded his train, and was whirled Northwards.

It was night when he reached Wyresdale. He left his bag at the station and walked down, under a harvest moon, to the park. Entering by the iron wicket near the tower, he started—his hand had touched something moist and adhesive. Joseph Kraft scanned his finger-tips—they were reddened. The bars of the gate bore clotting smears of a crimson substance—they spattered the wall above and the road outside.

The German pursed his lips and looked about for the continuation of the crimson drops—they stopped suddenly on the earthern kerb. He studied the turf beyond the wicket—there was a distinct trail; he pursued it backwards into the park. (To be continued.)

THE STOLEN SKYSCRAPER.

For seven years and a half it remained the most stupendous of mysteries—that perplexing and incredible event which took place on the night of the 28th of June, 1891. Black magic seemed the only possible explanation, and, except those who are Theosophists, we do not believe in black magic any more. I know of two persons, at least, who became violently insane over that night's happenings—or, rather, I suppose their growing madness was precipitated by the event, and in my professional experience I encountered not less than a score of deaths which were indirectly due to the same cause. This is, of course, besides the lives that disappeared utterly with the great office buildings.

The building was known as the "Morrison," and it was the first of the modern iron sky-scrapers to be put up in the South. It stood sixteen stories, or 235 feet high, and occupied a ground space of ninety-seven feet by eighty. It was constructed with a steel skeleton of especial rigidity, covered with the usual shell of brick and terra-cotta, while the first two floors were handsomely finished in stone. Next to it on one side was a paved area, used in connection with a tobacco warehouse; on the other side, and separated by a wide drive, was the Brown Bros. building looking flat and squat beside its towering neighbour. At the rear of the sky-scraper ran a twenty-foot alley.

The erection of the monster was not by any means an operation of pacific industry. Arthur John Morrison, the president of the syndicate which was to put up the building, was well known as an uncompromising and bitter opponent of labour unionism in every form, and it was owing to his influence and assistance that the Cummings lock-out had been persisted in, the year before, to the strikers' discomfiture.

His was a name hated in lodge-rooms, and, as the consequence, the men, while accepting his work, did so with an aggressive spirit of independence, keenly alive for any action that might be constructed into bullying or injustice.

Mr. Morrison had not chosen to let out the work by contract, but was seeing it through himself, and, whether or not he was aware of the feeling among his men, his conduct was certainly not conciliatory. It became known that he was getting his steel girders from the Boekh Iron Co., which was at that time warring with the Amalgamated Brotherhood of Iron and Steel Workers, and a deputation of this order employed upon the building went to remonstrate with him. Mr. Morrison not only refused to listen to what he termed their "dictation," but ordered his foreman to "give these men their time" at once, and to engage others.

This was a declaration of war, and at once every iron-worker, riveter, fitter, and machinist took up his dinner pail and marched home, leaving the half-completed framework looking like an army of dissipated gibbets.

The president not only declined to reinstate the discharged men, but announced his intention of completing his building by the use of "scabs," and in view of the enormity of this conduct, a sympathetic strike was ordered by the stone and brick masons and the other unions concerned. Mr. Morrison thereupon instructed his foreman to engage none but non-union labour, and as there was an insufficient supply of this at hand, he imported it from Pennsylvania and New York.

This action aroused the greatest indignation among the strikers and caused a series of small riots which lasted till the completion of the building. On more than one occasion an armed mob attempted to intimidate the imported workmen from landing from the train; one day a high scaffolding fell with three men, and it was rumoured that the ropes had been cut by the strikers. A little later the crowds assumed so threatening an attitude around the big building that the mayor read the riot act and called out half a battalion of military. Happily no lives were lost in the fracas that followed, and the disturbance was smothered though not exactly quieted; but day after day the petty war continued in spite of mayor and police. Under such circumstances the work did not progress with much rapidity, and it was not until the 8th of April, 1891, that the last of the painters and decoraters left the completed building.

To the union men it seemed an additional insult that the building should be called by their enemy's name, but as the "Morrison Building" it was opened on April 24th, and the Bank of Kentucky immediately established its headquarters on the ground floor, offices were quickly let upon the other floors, and though no union elevator man, machinist, or electrician could be induced to work in the building, yet men were found for these posts, and the enterprise seemed to promise every success.

On the night of June 28th. there were many complaints received at the electric light station of defective circuiting and unlighted lamps. Policeman No. 37 passing along his beat in the business portion of the town about one o'clock found that quarter in almost complete darkness.

It was a moonless, cloudy night, and as the officer looked up the unlighted bulk of the Morrison Building could not even be discerned against the black sky. As he approached this edifice, wondering a little at the absence of light, he was suddenly felled by a crashing blow on the back of the head. and he knew no more till he revived in the hospital fifty hours later.

A few minutes after, a sensible tremor of the earth was felt by almost every inhabitant of the city, asleep or awake, and this was instantly followed by a smothered low-toned roar indescribably vast in volume, but dulled as if by distance. The sound was so vague in quality that it was impossible to locate it, but it was so impressive that most persons ascribed it to an earthquake, and many sat up all night in expectation of a second shock. They were certainly justified in their apprehension, for the seismometer at the observatory registered a very considerable vibration.

The few watchmen and night hands, who were almost alone in the down-town city, were most affected by the shock, but the sound appeared so distant that, as no damage was done, none of them went far beyond their doors to investigate in the inky darkness. They supposed it to be an earthquake, since there was absolutely no blast such as must have accompanied a heavy explosion.

But with the earliest dawn the amazing truth stood revealed. The stately building that had towered over the city towered no more. From a distance it might have been supposed that it had collapsed in the night, but it was not so.

An early workman was the first to discover the fact that the Morrison Building was gone bodily, actually spirited away, with not so much as a brick left behind. Where it had stood the ground was level and smooth as the ordinary neglected vacant city lot, strewn with sticks and stones and an occasional rusty tin can.

The man put both hands to his head, in horrid fear that his brain was going. The other buildings stood undisturbed around, the early sun shone clear, a distant clock struck five. Everything was natural and as it should be, except that terribly incomprehensible vacancy.

Two or three other men now appeared on the spot, and they likewise stood petrified with sheer amazement. It is a dreadful thing, and near akin to madness, when you chance upon something that the brain positively refuses to accept in spite of the testimony of the senses. Some approached the spot and poked about cautiously in the air, vaguely fancying that in some mysterious way the building might have become invisible; but there was nothing but thin air.

The excitement of that day was a thing never to be forgotten in the city. All business was suspended, and vast crowds besieged the place, so that a double cordon of ropes and policemen was necessary to keep them back.

The sand-bagged officer had been discovered before this, and no less than five other persons were found in exactly similar condition—all insensible from blows on the skull, and the whole six were found within two hundred yards of each other.

On their recovery not one was able to throw any light on the mystery, and they told an exactly uniform story of having been struck down by an unseen force. Meanwhile the hard-packed clay where the sky-scraper had stood was carefully examined by the municipal authorities and some excavations were undertaken, but there were no traces of even the foundations. The missing building seemed torn out by the roots.

The insurance companies refused to pay policies on the lost building, alleging very plausibly that there was no proof of its destruction, but at the same time the rates of insurance on real estate were raised throughout the city. It was a period of panic for property-holders, and indeed for everyone. The terrible mystery of the whole affair was a thing to prey on the mind, and it was about this time that two women became violently insane unquestionably owing to the prevailing high nervous tension.

A great many persons left the city, and nervous prostration became almost epidemic. A fact afterwards remarked was that the consumption of liquors increased nearly 200 per cent in the week following the disappearance.

Meanwhile the most energetic efforts were being made to solve the mystery. The city offered a reward of 5,000 dollars for the correct explanation, and the Bank of Kentucky, which had lost nearly a quarter of a million in its vanished vaults, supplemented this offer by 10,000 dollars more. Excavations were made to the depth of fifteen or twenty feet where the building had stood without finding the slightest indication that the ground had ever been before disturbed.

Detectives and scientists were equally at a loss. It was suspected that prominent labour chieftains might know something of the secret, but nothing could be gained by this suspicion, for the mode of operation could not even be guessed at. The newspapers at last put forward a suggestion that the entire city had been hypnotised by some unknown agency and that the building was really there all the time, and this absurd theory was for some weeks discussed with the greatest seriousness.

At last, and very gradually, the excitement subsided, for the strain was in the truth too great for the public to endure. A gubernatorial election in the fall helped to distract attention, and the mystery never quite recovered its grip. From time to time there have been tentative explanations put forth, but no satisfactory one, and this is almost wonderful since, as I know, there were no less than 350 men in the United States who were in the secret. But that secret remained a secret—up to this day.

Last year I was employed as a volunteer surgeon at the notorious Camp Wykoff, and there I came in contact with a private of volunteers (I do not care to mention the regiment) who was gradually dying of necrosis. He was plainly a man of education and of unusual force—of a rather unscrupulous character, I should judge, but his conversation was interesting, and we came to talk together a good deal. I was able to perform some small services for him, for which he conceived himself under a disproportionate debt of gratitude, and one day he said to me rather drily:

"I can't pay you, doctor, for your kindness, and I can't leave you anything——"

"Don't talk nonsense, Dan!" I said rather brusquely.

"But I can tell you what became of the Morrison Building if you would like to know. I used to see you around the place at that time."

He told me that evening in the great dim hospital tent, where the mingled odours of iodine and tobacco smoke made the hot summer air unbearable.

"I was a workman then in a large labour union," he said, "and I was in the councils of the big chiefs enough to know that they were ready to do almost anything to get even with that man Morrison, and, in fact, we all felt that way. It wasn't the cash in the bank that tempted them, though they didn't let that waste away when it came their way. I don't know who invented the scheme but I believe somebody found out about the cave and they worked it out from that.

"It seems that there is a long cavern running under the place, so that about half the town stands on a shell of earth from thirty to fifty feet thick. This cave is geologically like the Luray Cavern in Virginia and the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky, and it can be entered at a point some miles outside the town. The first I heard of the scheme was when I was ordered from headquarters to hire a hundred of the most reliable union men I knew for secret work at a dollar an hour. Then came a man from New York to show us what to do. We bought an old warehouse a block away from the Morrison Building, and, beginning in the cellar, we tunnelled toward the sky-scraper like a lot of bank robbers.

"I was foreman and had a hundred men under me, but they worked in shifts an hour long, ten men to the shift. We used to cut shafts right down to the top of the cave to drop our dirt out of the way, and it used to make us nervous to see that black gulf down below. But it wasn't long before the union had men working down there too, as we found later.

"In the course of ten days we got under the big structure and our engineers marked out its sides for us. In ten days more we had all the earth under the foundations completely honeycombed with tunnels, so that it seemed as if it must cave in upon us. But the engineers had calculated the strain to a ton, and knew just how far to go. Towards the last we didn't drop the earth through, but stored it up in big cross galleries cut away from under the foundations.

"The shell of earth was, I remember, just about thirty-seven feet thick, the cave below was 270 feet deep, and the building was 235 feet high. Now, while we were tunnelling, a gang of 200 men was working below by the light of great fires. They had heaped a great pile of packed earth forty or fifty feet high, and placed with mathematical exactitude perpendicularly under the position of the building. We could see the light of their fires far, far down in the darkness, when we looked through our dump shafts.

"All was finished by the middle of June; but we waited a couple of weeks for a dark night, and it came on the 28th. We had placed a dozen light charges of rack-a-rock, attached to an electric-light wire, in the tunnels under the big building, and all our men were out of danger and ready for business. We had cut the electric light wires leading to that part of the city, and we had two dozen men with "life-preservers" stationed all round the block instructed to knock down senseless anyone who came near.

"At a little after one we touched it off. There was a very slight explosion, then a dull, rending roar as the giant building broke through its foundation. It was too dark for us to see it; we could only hear the appalling rush of its descent. Yet it seemed to go down slowly, for the sides of the hole were barely large enough to permit its passage, though no doubt our nerves greatly exaggerated the time. Probably it was not more than fifteen seconds before an earthshaking jar announced that it had reached the bed prepared for it at the bottom. In its new position a few feet of its top remained in the bottom of the hole, completely plugging it, while the large chimney reached nearly to the ground level.

"In an instant we were all at work. The big chimney was broken off and the loose earth we had stored was hoisted up with inconceivable rapidity, emptied into the cavity, and packed hard. There were 200 men at work by the light of dark lanterns close to the ground, and with no more noise than a low-toned hum that could not have been heard a hundred yards off. When the hole was filled up and packed down hard we scattered over it a cart-load of rubbish—and the thing was done. It had taken just one hour and thirty-five minutes after firing the shock.

"The strongly-constructed steel frame of the building had prevented it from collapsing, but I heard that it was frightfully twisted and bent. There were three men in it at the time, killed, of course. Half the money found in the bank was divided among us, and the other half went into the fund for the support of strikes. I got £60 as my share.

"After the job was done we got together and took a solemn oath of secrecy, and I believe that it has been faithfully kept till now. All I ask is that you will say nothing till after I am dead. It has been a mystery long enough; it is time that the Morrison gang should learn what was the power that did the thing."

I did not have to wait long, for he died thirteen days later. He gave me no names, and I have revealed none.

Look out for when Hazel Harlow visits your town.

GENTLEMAN PETE.

UNKEMPT—in rags—unutterably wretched.

This was Pete; a vagabond of vagabonds.

In all London none more lost than he, to all sense of personal responsibility and right-doing.

Wretched, did I say? Well, there were times when he seemed and appeared to be as happy as the proverbial sandboy. I venture to think, however, that these moments were rare.

There is not much happiness (of the true sort, I mean) to be found in the gutter, and the gutter it was, that served as Pete's hunting-ground for the article.

His favourite play-place (for he never did work of any kind) was under one or other of the railway arches that span the network of mean streets on the south side of the river. Here would he loaf by the hour together, and generally alone. He was anything but a gregarious child (his age, I fancy, at this particular period was about ten), loving his own society above everything, and giving no encouragement to would-be companions of his own kidney. How he lived was a mystery, though I very much fear that somebody suffered whenever he repleted.

There was a certain big policeman in the neighbourhood (that of the "Elephant and Castle") who knew more about him than a good many.

This man declared it to be his conviction that Pete, though living in a perpetual state of temptation, owing to circumstances, was nevertheless an honest boy—a good boy. This spoke volumes, as coming from a policeman, who, as a rule, are more often than not given to the indulgence of hard thoughts, where such as Pete are concerned.

But that which probably contributed more than anything else, to make the lad a bit of a pet, so to speak, with C 29 was his gentleness, his patient contentedness, his natural good breeding, which, hot or cold, wet weather or fine, always showed to advantage in his dealings (social, not commercial) with people generally.

This was the origin of his nickname, "Gentleman," which was first given him by "C 29." It leaking out, as such things, even the most ordinary, will do, he became, generally, in fact exclusively, known by it in his little circle, both socially and officially. As "Gentleman Pete," therefore, he was, in his little way, a more or less local celebrity.

Pete and his "blue" friend were on such terms that a morning conversation, when "duty" permitted, was the regular thing, and relished, I verily believe, quite as much by one as by the other.

"No, I aint 'ticler 'ungry," said Pete, one wet, cold, miserable morning in November, "leastways not very. Roun' the Boro' Markit, I were, 'afore six. I knows a cove there, a toff as sells things, 'taters, an' greenses, an'—an' turmits—'e guv me a 'doorstep' an' a 'aporth o' tea. I'm orl right." And Pete, to prove his contention, did a "breakdown," with a "cartwheel" as a wind-up.

"Don't look it," remarked C 29 slowly. "Look here, Pete, you just run to No. 1 Smith Street, second turning to the left along the Walworth Road, knock two knocks, and tell my missus I sent you for a bit o' breakfast. Hold hard! I'll put it on a bit o' paper."

The kind-hearted chap wrote a few words on a leaf of his note-book, tore it out, and gave it to Pete, who darted off with it at the "double."

That afternoon, when Constable Jessup went off duty, thoughts of his little friend pressed upon him, to the exclusion of everything else.

It was the same when he sat down to his tea, Mrs. Jessup at length noticing his abstraction, and questioning him as to the cause.

"Can't shake that youngster Pete out of my head," he said, musingly, to his wife in reply to her inquiries. "There seems something wrong about him this last day or two, and, for the life o' me, I can't make it out."

"Pete," said his wife, "is that the boy you sent round here this morning?"

"Yes, that's him."

"Poor little mite. Why, he's all skin-and-bone, Dick. Who, in pity's name, looks after him?"

"Nobody. The street's his home, his mother, and—all he's got."

"Then all I can say is, as it's a sin and a shame as folks as has got tons o' money, and only spends it on their own backs and stummicks, and on making theirselves comfortable, don't do something real good for the poor little street kiddies. I tell you, Dick, I cried my eyes out this morning after the little un' had gone, he did look so dirty, and so as if he wanted a mother!"

"Well," said Dick, "all the talk in the world won't alter things, and selfish gentlefolks 'll go on dancing, and dining, and Monte-Carloing, in spite of all we can say, and in spite of all the little 'uns in London as hasn't a shelter or a rag to cover 'em."

"I'm afraid that's about it," said Mrs. Jessup sorrowfully, "but I do think that if, instead of them giving, as these big people now and again do, so much to libraries, churches, and hospitals, they would take a few of these children in trust for God A'mighty, as gave 'em their money, they'd do more good in six months to make things a little more like 'kingdom come' than ever they will by all the libraries and churches as was ever built!"

"Right you are, Nell," said Dick, "but, meantime, I want to get to the bottom of this mystery of Pete's. P'raps it'll come to me when I'm in bed," and Dick Jessup went to bed accordingly.

His wife by-and-by called out to him, the doors of the two rooms being both half open:

"Dick! I gave the boy that jacket—you know the one I mean—our little Dick's."

"I know—did you?" responded "big" Dick in muffled tones from under the clothes. "I'm glad; it's doing more good than lying idle away there in the drawer."

Dick Jessup and his wife had no children now; the only one, a boy, they had ever had having died when about eight years old, eighteen months before.

It was this which certainly made the lonely mother's heart to be so full of sympathy and tender pity for the little waif whom she had seen that morning for the first time.

She longed to do something for "Gentleman," and when Dick went on duty the next day she set her woman's wit to work to scheme out a plan whereby she could benefit the child.

Shame on you! men and women at ease! Here was a poor, hard-working sister of yours, possessed of about as much "gear" as would serve the majority of you for "scent" and "cigarettes," seeking for some way to do that which you, with all your money and opportunities, never give even a thought to doing. An example to you now, depend upon it, she will be a damning witness against you at the great trial of souls!

Next morning C 29 sought the particular arch usually affected by Pete at that hour.

He was not there!

"Rum! he's never hardly missed being here before. I'm getting right down uneasy about it. Well, it's come to something when the likes o' me worrits myself so about the likes o' him. But I can't help it. P'raps he'll turn up later on—we'll see."

But he didn't. "Gentleman Pete," for the time being at any rate, was not to be found.

Then a strange thing happened.

In the afternoon, on his way home from the station, just when he had passed under the railway arch which spans Walworth Road, he was conscious of a touch on his coat, from behind.

Quickly turning, he sees poor "Gentleman"—gasping, white, and, although it was raining hard, and very cold, in his apology for a shirt, with bare feet, and his hair lank and dripping with water.

"Where's your coat?" asked the constable, catching hold of the boy by the shoulder, and speaking a trifle severely. "Where's the coat as my missus give you yesterday?"

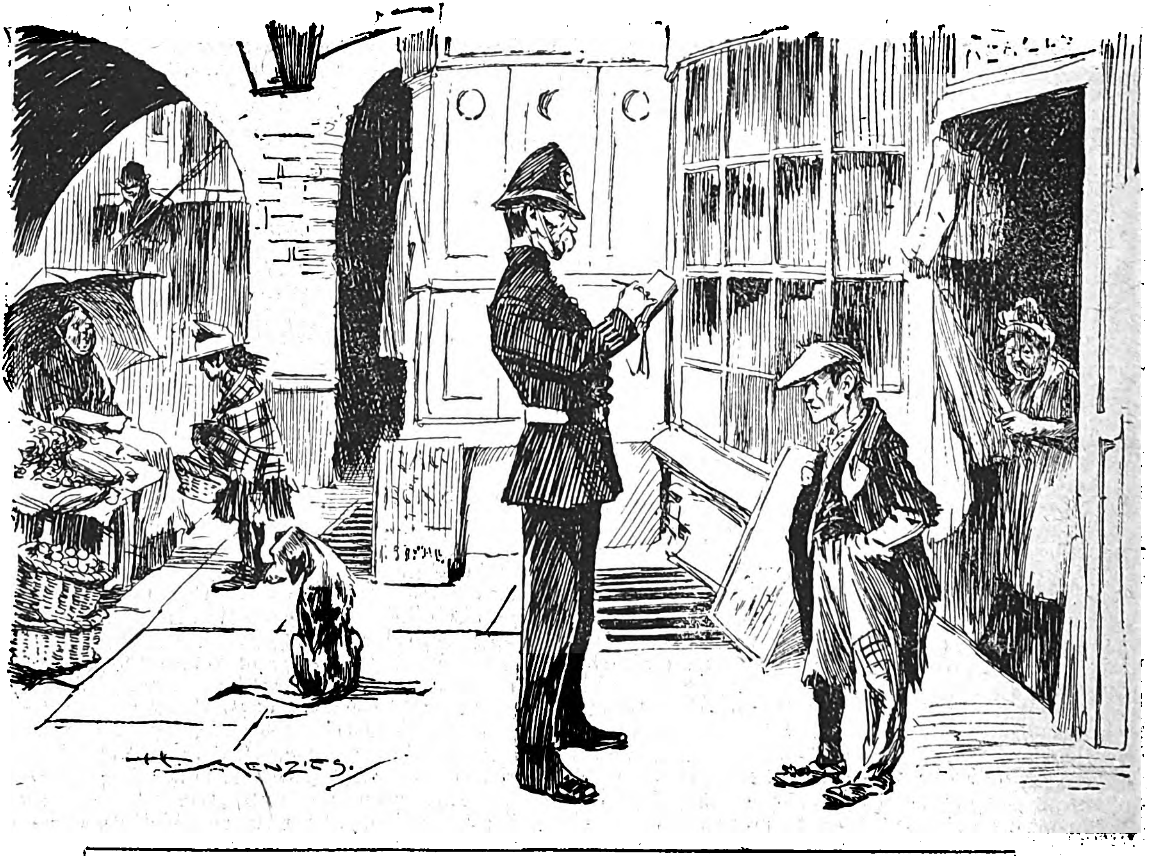
"Please, 'twenty-nine'" (he always called his big friend "twenty-nine"), "they've tuk it away; an' me trotter-cases; an' they'd 'ave tuk my 'britches' if I 'adn't a slipped 'em, an' cut."

"They! Who's they?" asked Dick.

"Pearly Bill an' Sheeny Ike," said Pete, now hardly able to stand from evident exhaustion.

It was then that the good "Samaritan" saw blood issuing from the bosom of the dirty rag which did duty for a shirt.

Without a moment's hesitation, and quite oblivious of the somewhat oppressive curiosity of the growing crowd, the policeman, catching up "Gentleman" in his arms, strode away rapidly in the direction of his own home



The kind-hearted chap wrote a few words on a leaf of his note-book.

Hazel Harlow's adventures grow more exciting every week.

"Here, mother! Here's something for you to do! Put him to bed—little Dick's bed—give him something warm, and when he's tucked in and comfortable, call me."

An hour afterwards, Mrs. Jessup summoned her husband out of the kitchen into the sitting-room, where, in a corner, stood a little cot-bed, never removed since little Dick's death.

"Gentleman's" head lay, with his face a few shade cleaner, on the white pillow, his eyes fixed on the ceiling, and his breath coming in laboured pants.

"Hullo, old chap! what's the matter?" But Mrs. Jessup bid him be careful not to excite the child too much.

"'S that you, 'twenty-nine'?" asked Pete; "why, yer aint got yer 'elmet on, nor yer big coat! Put 'em on!" almost screamed the boy. "Yer'll want 'em, I tells yer! yer'll want 'em!"

"You'd best humour him," said the wife; "go and put 'em on, Dick."

"Well, 'Gentleman,' what is it?" said Dick, when, fully "helmeted" and "coated," he stood again by the bed.

"Now it's orl right! Look a' 'ere, 'twenty-nine,' d'yer want to be a hinspector? Well, do as I tells yer, an' yer'll be one—quick!"

Both husband and wife thought the boy was wandering, but they said nothing.

"Listen!" went on "Gentleman"—but for the gently restraining hand of his nurse he would have raised, or tried to raise himself, up in the bed—"them two I told yer on when yer grabbed me is a'-goin' ter 'do' that big 'ouse on Brixton 'Ill ter-night! You knows the 'ouse—the one as 'as all the red flowers in the winders an' in the gardin'."

"I know," said Dick, now strangely attentive. "Well, 'Gentleman.'"

"Well, they wanted a boy ter go up to the 'ouse an' poison the dorg—that big black 'un. They arstes me; I thought o' you, an' kids 'em I would. Then, like a mug, I drops summat, I couldn't help it, as made 'em wish they 'adn't said nothin'—an'—they bashes me, an' tuk me cloes away, an' locks me up in 'Sheeny's' place. But I done 'em—I done 'em, for I smashes the winder an' bolts—an'—an' tells yer—that's orl!"

White-faced before, he now became deathly—fainted away, in fact.

The rest is a matter of criminal history. When the two night-raiders made their attempt, Constable C 29, with one or two more to help him, received them, and made it impossible for them to disturb the peace of Her Majesty's lieges for some years to come.

* * * * *

The little cot-bed in the front room has a permanent tenant now, for both Dick (a full-blown sergeant for meritorious service rendered at the Brixton Hill burglary and his wife have adopted "Gentleman."

Mrs. Jessup's love for him is wonderful. He seems quite to have taken the place of her lost; though little Dick will, as must needs be, ever have the first place in her heart.

With regard to Dick, I should advise all those who value his good opinion not to speak contemptuously and cruelly of the London street boy, for "I believe," Dick will say, "you know nothing about it, and—I do, for I've had some, and—I likes it."

RALPH ENDERBY.

THE PROFESSOR'S STORY.

I AM a professor—no matter of which special ology. Let it suffice that my wife says I should always confine myself to my profession, as in any other line I am decidedly astray. I confess that I am slightly afflicted with absence of mind, and a proneness to neglect the affairs of everyday life, when I am immersed in deep study. I am, however, occasionally aroused into active interest in the actions of those about me by some of Nature's phenomena.

The whims of the human species, which cause them to do things entirely inconsistent with their general conduct, have always been a subject of scientific consideration with me. I will illustrate my meaning by the following tale, which so plainly proves that a woman is without logic.

Two years ago our coachman and man-of-all-work died, and we found ourselves just at harvest time without a person to conduct the affairs of the stable. I confess I was quite overwhelmed by the mischance, as I had just received an order to write a profound article on jurisprudence, for a scientific magazine, and to set aside the collateral ideas and become a practical groom was somewhat confusing.

My wife told me not to think about anything but my work, and they would manage to get on; but this I felt sure was not to be listened to. I bade the two girls seek assistance from some neighbours, and they did so, but help of the masculine gender was unobtainable. I became very uneasy over the strange situation. The second night after our man's demise I was unable to sleep, as thoughts of the hateful subject obtruded themselves on me. I determined, however, to meet the emergency boldly, and at breakfast I astonished my family by announcing that I would, presently, go to the barn to attend to the requisites of the cattle. I perceived an expression of amusement on the faces of my daughters, and I mentally determined that they thought me incapable of physical labour. I concluded to make them regret their temerity by being very practical. Unfortunately for my resolve, I received some letters while we were at table, among which was an official document from London. It contained valuable data, in the perusal of which I became much interested and am ashamed to say I entirely forgot all about the requirements of the poor animals in the stables.

I was so thoroughly engrossed with the interesting matter in hand, and the collateral ideas it involved, that I was oblivious to all surrounding objects, but was somewhat rudely awakened by being seized by the shoulders and shaken violently. Looking up I saw Kitty laughing at me.

Permit me to interpolate here that Kitty is my youngest daughter, and is prone to take more liberties with me than any of my other children. She is very, perhaps abnormally so, quick to learn, but she is very frolicsome, as all young animals should be. I have never had the heart to restrict Kitty in her innocent little foibles; in fact, my wife, in somewhat vulgar vernacular, says:

"You have spoiled Kitty to death."

Many women make these homely figures of speech convey added strength to a sentence. However, as I said, Kitty was laughing heartily, and shaking me as she talked.

"Dad, you are a cruel monster. Do you know it is ten o'clock? I thought that you were going to feed the cattle?"

"Why, my dear," I said with perturbation, "I am so sorry I forgot the poor things. I will make haste to attend to them." She put her little hand on my arm to detain me as I rose.

"Don't worry, you sweet old love; mother, Helen and I watered them and turned them out. You were so absorbed with your papers that we knew you would be liable to put the water in the feed-box, so we did not disturb you; but now you must rouse up and listen to me."

"My dear, I feel terribly self-reproached to think I permitted you and your mother to carry water and—and—feed, while I sat here reading," I began in a deprecatory manner.

"Don't waste time apologising, dad," Kitty interrupted, "we all know you can't help being moony. But listen, there is a man outside who wants to come and work for us; however, he is a stranger, and has no reference. He looks like a person who has seen better days. Mother does not know what to do about hiring him; do try, for once, to be practical, and come out and see him."

"By all means, my dear, by all means," I said, somewhat thrown off my equilibrium by this unexpected turn of affairs. "But first, would you be so kind as to tell me if you see anything of my—er— my eyeglasses?"

The girl's merry laughter floated through the room like a flood of music.

"Oh, you dear, delightful dad!" she said. "Your eyeglasses are on your nose."

Then holding my arm, as if she feared my escape, she led me out on the side veranda, where my wife and Helen stood conversing with a young man, whose personal appearance met with my approbation. He was a fine specimen of youthful vigour. Fully six feet two in height, he must have weighed about one hundred and sixty pounds. His face was smooth, and the features were straight and well shaped. Eyes as blue as an Italian sky looked fearlessly from beneath a cheap hat, which he lifted as I approached, showing his very straight blond hair. I noticed that his hands were brown, but did not look as if he had been reared to do great physical labour. His plain but clean clothing caused me to class him with a reputable farmer's son.

"You—er—I understand you would like to—er—become an—an—assistant of mine?" I asked kindly, not wishing to wound him by using the word servant. His eyes twinkled as he replied:

"I have applied to you for a position as general outdoor servant." I admired his brevity and humility.

"You—er—understand the care of horses, and—er—we have a Jersey cow," I explained. I realised that I was hopelessly out of my depth by the girls' silent laughter.

"I know how to care for animals," he asserted.

"He comes from London," remarked my wife. "I am sure he can do all we require, but he has no references."

"His face is reference enough, my dear," I said, with an assumption of importance I by no means felt.

"We will engage him, but—er—you—er—have not told me your name, young man."

"James McGruger," he stated, looking me straight in the eyes. I approved of that. It appeared honest.

"Well, James, I will show you the stables," I said. "And—er—we might as well go at once." I felt anxious to be back in the library with my papers.

"My dear," said my wife, "you have not said one word about his salary."

"We will arrange about that later," I asserted with dignity; "in the meanwhile, let us see if he can—er—affiliate with his new duties."

My wife gave me a look which told me she felt me incorrigible, and I saw my two girls were convulsed by my innovation from prescribed rules. Even the man had an expression of subdued mirth on his comely face. I thought it best to seem oblivious of this. I suppose I am a little odd at times. I, however, had not wished to humiliate him, as I saw at once he had not always been in this humble position.

I accompanied him to the barn and showed him about, explaining where things were kept as well as I could. I fear I should have come out of the affair in a somewhat ignominious manner if it had not been for Kitty; that girl's faculty for detail is remarkable. She even knew where the curry comb was kept. I saw James stare at her when she showed him where the harness oil was hidden. He evinced surprise, too, when the horses whinnied after her when she left the shed. As Kitty had been rather prone to arrogance, I told her I wished her to be very careful in her mode of speaking to James, as I was sure he had seen better days.

"If you should cause him to feel his menial position he might have recourse to alcoholic liquors, and thus become addicted to the use of stimulating beverages," I said.

"Oh, daddy, why can't you say he might get drunk?" laughingly inquired Kitty, with a happy girl's indifference to a cultivated choice of language. But despite her levity the girl had a very good heart, and she promised to be kind and considerate to our new man. Having attended to these trifles I retired to my study, and was soon immersed in serious work.

Nothing occurred to disturb our tranquility for two days, in fact my wife informed me that the horses had never been so well groomed and the cow gave more milk than usual, over which fact she seemed very jubilant. On the third day I was roused from my labour on a scientific essay on conchology by hearing screams out on the lawn. I hastened forth to ascertain the occasion of the I found my wife and Helen on the veranda watching Kitty who, mounted on her pony, was being carried about the grounds in a most reckless manner. The bridle had broken, and the girl was utterly at the mercy of the savage little beast that I had always been disposed to distrust. While I was standing in a state of great perturbation, wondering how I could assist my dear good child, James darted from the barn, and shouting to Kitty to keep her seat, tried to head off the pony, to prevent it from reaching the highway. In some way the ugly brute managed to get the man crowded against the gate-post, then it reared and struck at him with his forepaws. There was a moment of fearful suspense, then James had the creature by the nostrils, and by the exertion of marvellous strength, forced him to the ground. The beast kicked and plunged, and finally made an effort to lie down, at which James told Kitty to jump off, and he fairly held that animal up till she was out of the saddle, and at a safe distance. The man and beast then struggled for supremacy. After a fierce battle the man came off victor. He led the tamed creature up to the veranda and said quietly:

"You can ride him now, miss, he has had enough." Kitty stared at him for a mment.

"How are you, hurt?" she inquired, the first, as usual to perceive that something was wrong. My wife then remarked:

"You are very pale, James; what is the matter?"

"It is nothing," he replied, almost sullenly, "I've just scratched my hand."

"Let me see," commanded Kitty. He hesitated. She went up to him and said softly: "You have just risked your life for me, let me at least sympathise with you."

It seemed to me a very pretty sight, they were both so young and innocent, but I saw my wife shake her head in disapprobation. I did not understand why. Women are so whimsical.

James looked full into Kitty's sympathising face for a moment, then he held out his left hand. A deep, jagged wound had been made on it by the broken bit. We all endeavoured to show our kindly gratitude. My wife tried to alleviate the pain by getting bandages to bind the wound; Kitty and Helen brought lotion by the gallon. I ordered that all labour should be suspended for the day, and asked him if he would like Rollin's "Universal History" to read, as it was the only light book I could think of for the moment.

James got away from us all as soon as he could. When he walked off I noticed that his shoes were broken. I told my wife to give him the money for a new pair when he came for his noonday meal. She did so. After supper she sought me very much troubled. To my surprise and dismay, she said:

"My dear, James is at the door very much intoxicated, and he insists on speaking to you." I hurried outside. There stood James, on the lawn, holding himself up by a tree.

"Sir," he said, "I have come to tell you I must leave to-night."

"Why, James, what have we done to you."

"You have been too good to me."

"I do not understand. Has anyone hurt your feelings? If so it has been unintentionally, for we all like you."

"I ain't worth it," he declared; "you see I am drunk now."

"We will overlook that, my man. We all have faults, and cannot expect perfection in others. You must not go."

"I must," he said. "Oh, you make me feel so mean. You are the best people I have ever seen in my life. Your young ladies speak to me as if I were a prince, and mother—she's been like a mother to me. I never knew there were such women in the world."

Here was a recommendation for us. I felt pleased.

"We like you, James, so stay with us," I said.

"I can't, sir, I can't tell you why, but when I hear them horses whinny after Miss Kitty, I feel choked with thinking. Some day, maybe, you'll know why."

This was all he would say, and he left us that night. About a month later Kitty dashed into my room with a paper.

"Oh, papa," she cried, "read that."

Kitty always insists on having her own way, so with a sigh I pushed aside my documents and took the daily from her hand. She pointed to a paragraph, and I read:

"A well known burglar, named James Lincoln, but known as 'Long James,' was captured last night, with the rest of his gang, as they were en route for Liverpool, with a quantity of stolen goods. The leader is a professional, has served three terms in prison, and is one of the hardest specimens of his craft. He has evidently been in a fierce fight lately, as he had a long, jagged wound on his left hand. He will probably be sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment."

"What an escape we have had," I exclaimed.

Kitty burst into tears, saying wildly:

"He was such a handsome fellow, too, and he saved my life."

Meeting my astonished gaze she flew out of the room like a whirlwind. I felt strangely uncomfortable. Kitty was the last person one would have expected to shed tears over a burglar. It seemed to me that we had been standing on the brink of a pit of trouble.

I never felt quite easy about Kitty again until I saw her married to a lawyer dignified enough to protect her from any flightiness. If she had remained single I would not have sought and obtained a pardon for James, as his return to active life again might have been of moment to—well, yes—it might have been of moment to my family, as there is no accounting for the whims of the female sex.

I have proved my hypothesis; women are without logic. They are ruled altogether by emotions of the heart. Kitty proved it by her tears for a burglar.

Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a Stereoscope to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, August 26th. Postcards only, please. The prize of £1 1s. has been awarded this week to Miss Sharpe, c.o. Mr. T. Sharpe, of High Street, Ibstock, Leicester, whose contribution is denoted by a star thus.*

"YOUR son, I hear, is becoming an excellent landscape painter." "He is." "Does he imitate Nature well?" "Imitate Nature! He beats Nature. He can put colours into a landscape that Nature never dreamed of."

*A LADY in the Lake District, having sent an order for a leg of mutton to the butcher who usually supplied the wants of her household, received the following note in reply: "Dear mem, I am sorry I have not killed myself this week, but you can have a leg off my brother."

ETHEL: "When angels come upon earth, mamma, are they in disguise?" Mamma: "Yes, dear; why do you ask?" Ethel: "Because I heard cousin Frank say to papa this morning that you were an angel, and papa said perhaps you were, but that you must be one in disguise."

MISTRESS (to late servant, now married, who has called): "And I hope you are very happy with your husband, Mary?" Mrs. O'Brien (late servant): "Oi am that, ma'am. Whoi, I've been married now close on six months, and in all that toime O'Brien's never been in gaol but twice!"

DURING a dense fog a large river steamer had to cast anchor. A traveller, anxious to go ahead, came to the man at the wheel and asked why they stopped. "Too much fog, can't see the river." "But you can see the stars overhead." "Yes," replied the sailor, "but until the boiler bursts we ain't going that way."

HE was a bad boy, and his father knew it. As soon as he came downstairs in the morning, the poor lad was greeted with a terrific box on the ears. "What's that for?" he cried, "Aw've done nowt wrong yet, have Aw?" "No," answered the father, "but tha soon will be doin', and that's one to be goin' on wi'!"

A YORKSHIRE farmer who had come to London for the first time, was walking along the Strand, filling his pipe, when a boy, selling wax-lights, came up to him with the usual "Lights, sir?" The farmer took a box from the boy, extracted a match, lit his pipe, and handed the box back to the astonished lad, passing on with the remark, "Lor! what a wonnerful place Lunnon is, to be sure!"

A GOOD story is told of the late Lord Chief Justice. One day, while travelling to Scotland, he entered the train at Rugby. There were only four passengers in the carriage, the rest of the seats being occupied by their luggage. Neither attempting to make room for him, he stood up, till at last one began to sulkily shift his luggage, when his lordship blandly remarked, "Pray don't trouble; I am getting out at Scotland."

WIGG: "There is one class of men that whisky never injures." Wagg: "And that is?" Wigg: "The men who leave it alone."

UGLY HUSBAND (snarling): "You married me for better or worse, didn't you?" Wife (hesitatingly): "Yes, but I supposed I would have some variety."

KINGLEY: "Wouldn't you like a copy of my poem on the girl who don't know how to cook?" Binzo: "Thanks, old man, but I've got the original at home."

IT is quite time to call a man absent-minded when, on coming down to breakfast, he kisses the sardine-box and begins operating on his wife's head with the tin-opener.

MISS PRIMROSE: "Don't you give your dog any exercise?" Miss Hollyhock (fondling a fat pug-dog): "Of course; I feed him with chocolates every few minutes just to make him wag his tail."

AUNT NANCY: "Think of the studyin' to be a doctor, eh? Don't you do it." Young Man: "Why not, aunty?" Aunt Nancy: "You can't git no practice till ye git married, and ye can't git married till ye git practice; that's why."

"GOOD morning, Mrs. McCluskey," remarked the neighbour, "you are quite well, I hope?" "Yes, quite well," responded Mrs. McC. "And strong?" "Yes, quite strong." "Then would you mind fetching those two wash-tubs back I lent you some time ago?"

A SMALL boy was detected by a farmer up his apple tree. When he had made the boy come down, the owner began to lecture him on his action. The boy answered him indignantly, "Now, you just count them apples over again before you insinuate that I stole any of them."

HOUSEHOLDER: "I am going to move to the suburbs next Monday, and I'd like you to do the job." Mover: "How many loads?" "I don't know. You moved me once, you may remember." "Yes; I needed three waggons then to get through, but that was some years ago. Have you moved since?" "Yes, indeed, half a dozen times." "Hum! I guess one waggon will carry all you have left."

IT was evening time in one of the London hospitals, and the nurse on duty was giving the little ones their last meal for the day. All, save one, were patiently waiting their turn to be served, the one in question being a little rosy-cheeked convalescent, who was calling lustily for her portion. "Aren't you just a little impatient, Dorothy?" inquired the kindly nurse, with just a tinge of correction in her tone. "No, I'm not!" retorted Dorothy, promptly. "I'm a little she patient!"

TWO Irish labouring bricklayers were working at some houses near Russell Square, and one of them was boasting of the steadiness with which he could carry a load to any height that might be required. The other contested the point, and the conversation ended in a bet that he could not carry him, in his bed, up a ladder to the top of the building. The experiment was made; Pat placed himself in the bed, and his comrade, after a great deal of care and exertion, succeeded in taking him up and bringing him down safely. The loser, without any reflection on the danger he had escaped, observed to the winner, "Well, to be sure, I've lost; but don't you remember about the third storey you made a slip?—I was then in hopes."

THE EDITOR'S PAGE.

With the appearance of the first of the series, "Adventures of an Actress" have "caught on." So much I can tell by the letters I have received from numerous correspondents all over the country. This gives me the more pleasure because I am perfectly convinced that if you like the first story you will be more pleased than ever with those which follow.

The first was, to some extent, necessarily of an introductory kind, while the stories that come after plunge right into the middle of exciting incidents at once. The scene of beautiful Hazel Harlow's adventure in this number is laid at Scarborough. Next week's will find its venue at Newcastle. Readers in these particular towns will be especially interested. Therefore, once more I ask you to kindly recommend these tales to your friends.

Love, Courtship and Marriage.

(Replies to Correspondents.)

"Doleful Dumps" is eighteen, and very unhappy; do what she may, she never feels happy, and it makes her miserable to see people around her enjoying themselves. She has often tried to have a good time with her sisters, but never succeeds. They are all engaged, but young men seem to give her a wide berth.

No wonder, "Doleful Dumps!" I expect you make everyone miserable who comes near you! I should say your liver is out of order, and you should see a good doctor at once. Go out in the fresh air, walk, bicycle, ride, and take plenty of exercise. Moping never did a girl any good. It is ridiculous to be in the condition you describe at eighteen years of age.

"Army" writes to tell me that she was secretly married by special licence about four months ago. She wants to know if it is right for her to receive money from her husband, and for him to address her as his wife. He says he is coming back soon to take her home, and she is afraid her parents will refuse him. She wants to wear her ring, but does not like to, as she is afraid her fellow workers would suspect that she is married.

Yours is a difficult position, "Army," but I see no reason why you should not receive money from him. He is your husband, although being married secretly makes it difficult for you to realise it. Certainly, he has every right to address you as his wife. I do not see how your parents can refuse to let you go with him, as you certainly are old enough to know your own mind. Why don't you wear your rings on a ribbon round your neck? You will know you are wearing them all the time then, won't you? I hope your marriage will turn out very happily.

You tell me, "A. M. H.," that you are deeply in love with a young Irishman who seems very fond of you, though he has never told you so. You have known him for more than a year, and have been out with him on several occasions, but, although he has been very kind to you, he has never asked you to meet him again, or remarked on what you wear, neither has he ever given you a present. He is twenty-one, and you think it time he thought of a young girl, and you know for a fact that he is not going out with anyone else. There is a young girl who has just come up from the country that he is friendly with, but she does not care for him. You want to know if he is to be your husband, as you have taken to him such a lot more than you have to anyone else.

Well, "A. M. H.," I really do not see how I can tell any more than you can. I do not think, from what you tell me, that you ought to consider he cares for you any more than he does for anyone else, and you can only wait, and time will show whether he is to be anything more than a friend to you. I am glad you like the paper.

Take my advice, "Elinor," and don't rush into marriage without consideration. It is true, as you say, that the old proverb says, "Happy's the wooing that's not long a-doing," and many of those proverbs are very wise; but the circumstances of the present day are different, and it can hardly be considered wise to be "woo'd and married, and a'" in six weeks. If you were relations who had known each other for years, the case might be different; but considering that you did not know him two weeks ago, it is very rash. Postpone it, "Elinor," until you are sure that you know him well enough to be confident that he will prove a suitable partner.

"Trilby" wants to know what she can do to reduce the size of her feet. She is engaged to a young man, and ever since Christmas he has been lame in consequence of her crushing one of his toes while dancing. She adds a postscript to the effect that since the dance he does not seem so fond of her as he was before.

I am afraid you cannot reduce the size of your feet, "Trilby," but you can try and be more careful, can't you? I don't wonder at your lover feeling annoyed, though, of course, it was purely accidental. I hope he will soon be well again.

TO CONTRIBUTORS.

I am open to consider original stories of any length from 1,500 to 6,000 words. The character of stories required may be best ascertained by a careful reading of the contents of the paper. All MSS. are dealt with promptly, and every effort is made to return rejected stories which are accompanied by stamped addressed envelopes. At the same time, I cannot hold myself responsible for MSS. accidentally lost. SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Mrs. DARNLEV SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 21lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me.

"Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Risholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mr. WALKER, 236 London Road, Hazelgrove, Stockport, says: "I have used one box and am 14lb. lighter. Send another soon as possible."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. E. ALEXANDER, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They have reduced me quite 2 stone, and I am now quite cured."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Mrs. TAYLOR-ROBINSON, of Tweed Green House, Whalley Range, Manchester, says: "I feel so much lighter and better since taking your Tablets, and am so much thinner that I hardly recognise myself."

Miss A. LONG, of 9 South Parade, Waterford, writes: "Your Tablets have reduced me 14lb."

Miss A. DAWSON, 62 Orchard Street, Weston-super-Mare, says: "Glad to say the Tablets have sufficiently reduced me. I shall always recommend them."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

Mrs. DREW, of 1 Bellevue Gardens, The Nursery, Devizes, writes: "I took Tablets some years ago; they soon reduced me and I have not got stout since. Send me a box for my mother."

STARTLING REVELATIONS OF THE STAGE.

THE ADVENTURES OF AN ACTRESS.

IV.—A Baffled Vengeance.

By DONOVAN MART.

CHAPTER I.

At a marble-topped table at one of the best restaurants in Sheffield, two men were sitting.

Before each was a stiff tumbler of brandy and water. Both were smoking cigars. Both had the appearance of second or third-rate actors, very much "down on their luck," while in their bloodshot eyes and dissipated unshaven countenances lurked, it would seem, a hundred evil passions.

"And I tell you, Dan," one was saying in a low voice, "I'll get even with Raymond Venables this time, as sure as my name's Stephen Guttridge."

The other took a long pull at the drink before him. "And I'm with you through thick and thin," he answered gutturally.

The fellow called Guttridge leant forward across the little table. "But how are we to start?" he asked. "Have you any plan?"

"I have!" suddenly broke in the voice of a third man, sitting, unperceived by the two maudlin conspirators, at a table almost adjoining the one at which they sat.

The effect of a so totally unlooked for interruption was electrifying. The two men swerved round somewhat unsteadily, and gazed at the other.

"Who the dickens are you?" asked Guttridge wrathfully, "and why do you go and thrust yourself into business that is no concern of yours."

The stranger, who was a dark, tall man, with a somewhat sinister expression, and whose right arm was tightly bound in a sling, was in no wise disconcerted by this display of spleen.

"I am someone who can be exceedingly useful to you," he answered; "and as for your business being no concern of mine, well, I think you'll find that it concerns me very closely indeed."

The two men exchanged stealthy glances. Guttridge cast a furtive glance round the café, which was fast filling up.

"Have you a down against Raymond Venables?" he muttered.

The other paused. Then he rose to his feet. "Come with me," he said, "to my hotel. We shall be free from interruption there."

The other two rose instantly, and prepared to follow their mysterious new acquaintance. It then became apparent that in addition to his crippled arm the stranger walked with a slight limp, as though suffering from some affection of the right leg.

Few words passed between the trio until the hotel was reached. The stranger then led the way to a private sitting-room, having first of all ordered liquid refreshments to be sent up—a command that evidently agreed entirely with the wishes of the two bibulous conspirators.

When they were alone the stranger bade his guests be seated.

"To whom have I the pleasure of talking?" he said suavely.

Guttridge rose to his feet with a melodramatic gesture, that betokened beyond a doubt a previous theatrical training, and said grandiloquently: "Mr. Daniel Poindexter," indicating his companion with a grand flourish; "Mr. Stephen Guttridge—very much at your service. And to whom have we the honour of addressing ourselves?"

"John Smith," came the cool answer. Guttridge shrugged his shoulders, and by the wink he bestowed on the self-styled member of the powerful "Smith" family, it was evident that he had his own suspicions as to the authenticity of the name.

"And now to business," said Smith. "You asked me whether I had a down on Raymond Venables, manager of the Good Samaritan company on tour. Well, I can answer you in the affirmative. Nay, more, I am anxious to give him a fall. I can't speak plainer, can I?"

Poindexter rapped out an oath. "Curse Raymond Venables," he said. "Last year Guttridge and I had good walking-on parts in a company of which he was manager. And he sacked us, because he said we got drunk. More than that, he warned another manager about us, with the result that we couldn't take on another shop. And now he's come to us here in Sheffield, and if we can't get even with him, well——" the man drank thirstily to lend emphasis to his lust for vengeance.

"I see," put in Smith, "you have indeed cause for attempting to give Venables a dressing-down. I suppose you have already matured your plan of campaign?"

"Not yet," answered Guttridge with an assumed air of carelessness; "but——"

"Then if you will put yourselves entirely in my hands," broke in Smith, "I will not only show you how you can get Raymond Venables at your mercy, but also how you will be able to line your pockets at the same time."

Cupidity and re-awakened desire for revenge, fomented by the potations consumed, shone forth from Guttridge's and his comrade's eyes,

"We will follow you to death, if need be," cried Poindexter theatrically.

"Ay, ay," echoed Guttridge.

Smith could hardly restrain himself from bursting out into a loud laugh. The two ex-supers seemed to retain all the flavour of the footlights about their person. Their gestures spoke eloquently of the Adelphi and Drury Lane.

"Then listen carefully," he said. "To-night Raymond Venables, after the performance of his piece, sups with some friends. His lodgings are in East-street, a lonely, unfrequented thoroughfare, of tidy, unpretentious houses. I shall be there at about three a.m., the time when Venables will return. I shall have a vehicle ready. All you will have to do is to lie in wait for him in a doorway, jump out upon him before he has time to shout for help, stun him, and then carry him to my carriage. He will be at our mercy then, beyond recall."

"And you talked about remuneration?" broke in Guttridge eagerly.

"True," answered the other calmly; "but so far you must admit the debt is rather one-sided. If I show you a way how to get the better of your enemy, it is myself who ought to be rewarded."

The faces of the two ex-supers fell. This mysterious Smith had evidently an eye for a bargain.

"Nevertheless," continued Smith, "I will give you £10 apiece, provided that when we have once got Venables in our power you will help me in the furtherance of another little scheme that touches his star, Miss Hilda Hatherleigh!"

"Hilda Hatherleigh," echoed Guttridge in amazement, an expression that was marked as well strongly upon his comrade's face. "Hilda Hatherleigh, the beautiful ingénue who has been given the lead in place of Valerie Bellairs! What can you want with her?"

"That is my business. All that you need bother yourselves about is whether, for £10 apiece, you are willing to stand in with me, hand and glove. I help you to get hold of Venables, and you help me to get hold of the Hatherleigh. There's no danger. For I've got a plan that will bring the fair Hilda to the net, like a bird, and without any bother at all. Will you accept my offer?"

"We will," the two men cried simultaneously. "You can count on us."

Smith looked closely at his two would-be colleagues in villainy. Could he indeed count upon them? So long as they were not actually hopelessly intoxicated, he believed he could. In their present condition they were just sufficiently primed with "Dutch courage" to make them ready tools. Alcohol was food and drink to them. Under the terrible auspices of brandy these two ex-supers were converted from bombastic cowards into truculent ruffians

And Smith registered a silent vow that not another drop of liquor should cross their lips that night, unaccompanied by food. "Shall we sup?" he said, "then we can discuss with minuteness our plan of campaign." And in this proposition, too, Guttridge and Poindexter found ready acquiescence.

CHAPTER II.

Raymond Venables was in excellent spirits. His supper party had proved most enjoyable, and he was strolling placidly along the deserted streets of Sheffield, smoking a choice cigar, and ruminating over the exceptionally prosperous condition of his exchequer and future prospects.

"That was really a piece of luck at Scarborough," he mused, "when Valerie Bellairs, for some reason or other threw up her engagement and made tracks. I didn't think so at the time. But now that Hazel Harlow has got the lead, why, people buy seats only to see her face. If we go on like this I shall have to make her a good offer to keep her from finding a new and more lucrative shop.

"And she can act, too. Throws herself into it. By Jove! what a beautiful woman she is! If I could only get her to become Mrs. Raymond Venables, why I'd take a theatre in town and run her for all she's worth, which is a good deal.

"Yes, and I love her, too. But she isn't like the ordinary run. There's no stealing a kiss, or taking out to supper, or giving diamonds to Hazel Harlow. She's as straight as she's beautiful, and hang me if I wouldn't give all I'm worth to get her to name the day," from which it will be seen that the manager of The Good Samaritan company was about as much in love with his "lead" as it was possible to be.

The rooms that Venables had engaged for his own accommodation had been selected by the manager many years ago on his first visit to the town, and thus he always made a point of securing them whenever business took him to Sheffield.

They were quiet, clean, and above all cheap; for Raymond Venables was ever a man whose first consideration was his pocket.

Without a suspicion of any danger ahead, the manager turned into East Street, his thoughts still fixed upon Hazel Harlow. His hand sought his waistcoat pocket for his latch-key. Suddenly two figures sprang out from the shelter of a doorway. Before Venables could recover from the surprise caused by this unexpected event, one of the men had struck him a heavy blow on the back of the head with a weapon notorious for inflicting a stunning and effective blow—a sandbag.

Venables dropped like a pole-axed bullock. The next instant he was lifted off his feet and borne hastily away, to where a vehicle was drawn up against the kerb.

Without any ceremony the unfortunate manager was driven away through the deserted and dark streets of Sheffield—for it was too early yet for even the first workmen to have set out for the gloomy factories.

The vehicle pulled up at length before a deserted-looking house in a squalid street. The still unconscious manager was lifted out of the conveyance and borne inside the house.

When he recovered consciousness it was to find himself lying upon a pallet, the faint light of the coming dawn striking in through a grimy window above his head. There was only one other occupant of the room, the man "Smith." Of Guttridge and Poindexter there was no trace.

Venables' head ached furiously. "Where am I?" he asked faintly.

"With a friend," answered "Smith" suavely.

Hazel Harlow will be in Newcastle next week.

"Then why was I knocked on the head and brought here?" queried the manager.

"You were certainly knocked on the head," answered "Smith," with ready mendacity, "by a couple of ruffians, from whom I rescued you and brought you here. The accommodation is not of the best, but such as it is you are quite welcome to it."

"But I need trouble you no longer," cried Venables eagerly. "I am deeply grateful to you for having proved my saviour. I cannot trespass upon your hospitality further. Let me return to my own lodgings without delay."

"Smith" held up his hand.

"One moment, sir," he said. "You have been so generous as to rate my services to you as worthy of gratitude. Will you therefore do me a trifling service. As you see, my hand is in a sling, and I cannot write. Will you write a letter for me? I will then see that you reach your lodgings without more ado."

There seemed nothing outrageous in this request, and Venables at once signified his readiness to comply with it. It would be a cheap way out of his dilemma.

"And you will pass me your word as a gentleman not to betray my confidence in you," continued Smith. "I mean, you will not, when you are safe among your friends again, divulge what I shall ask you to write for me?"

"Certainly not," answered Venables.

"Here then is paper. What I want you to write is as follows:

> "Will you accompany the bearer of this note? I am in great distress. It is of the utmost importance to my welfare that you should come in person and alone. Upon your complying with this request hangs, maybe, my life. I cannot explain more.
> "R. V."

Venables wrote the note glibly enough until he came to the end. Before adding the two initials he paused, and looked somewhat suspiciously at "Smith." "R. V.," he said. "Why R. V.?"

"Because my name happens to be Ralph Verney," answered "Smith," calmly. "There is no need for you to write my whole name."

Venables was too anxious to escape from his present position to stop to reflect very deeply upon the matter. He had written the note mechanically. His head still ached violently. He only wanted to get away. Hence the irregularities in the proceeding did not touch him very deeply.

"There's your note, then," he said; "and now, sir, may I go? A thousand thanks for your good offices in rescuing me from those footpads. I did not see them distinctly, the scoundrels. One thing, it's quite light now. I shall be able to reach my lodgings without fear of further molestation."

So saying he rose from the pallet that had served for a writing-table, and put his hand in his pocket to assure himself that his latch-key was safe. To his annoyance he found it was gone. A prolonged search failed to reveal it. Ah well, his landlady would be up by the time he got back.

"Smith" accompanied him downstairs. Then for the first time Venables became aware of a fact that he had hitherto disregarded. His rescuer was a well-dressed man, apparently a gentleman. How did he come to be living in that squalid house in a mean Sheffield street? Ah well, it was no business of his. And any how he had escaped from serious injury. It was Shakespeare who said: "There are more things in Heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamt of in your philosophy." With which comforting assurance Raymond Venables made bold to think he could close the incident. Whereas, in reality, it had scarcely begun.

It was nearly seven o'clock when he reached East Street. His landlady's maid-of-all-work was sleepily imparting a show of radiancy to the front door-step as he drew in sight of the house. The girl stared at the actor in amazement.

Venables, annoyed at her vigorous scrutiny, hurried past her and up the narrow stairs that led to his "suite" of rooms, a bed-chamber and parlour connected by a folding-door.

He was by this time thoroughly wearied, as can be well understood, while his head still ached, unpleasantly reminiscent of the "sand-bagging" he had received only a few hours ago.

He had determined to go straight to bed. He opened the door of his sitting-room and entered the apartment with a sigh of relief, that changed to a faint cry of mingled horror and chagrin as he found that even here there was to be no respite from the adventures that the day had ushered in.

Two men, each armed with a pistol, confronted him—unshaven, truculent beings, whose eyes were bloodshot from want of rest and alcohol—whom Raymond Venables instantly recognised as the two theatrical supers whose dismissal he had been instrumental in obtaining the year before.

"What do you two rascals want here?" he began stormily. "I suppose you are the scoundrels who knocked me on the head and stole my latch-key."

"We want revenge, Raymond Venables," answered Guttridge. "You ruined us, we want to ruin you. Don't make a noise, or I shall put a bullet through you."

With all his faults, Venables was no coward. But his heart sank within him as his eye turned first to one and then to the other of his captors. For in their drink-inflamed countenances he read the lust of vengeance. And he was unarmed, and weak from his recent experience. Hopelessly he looked around him with quick, furtive glances, seeking for some loophole of escape.

Guttridge noted his action.

"The first sound that escapes your lips," he said hoarsely, "signs your death-warrant."

CHAPTER III.

It was nine o'clock on the morning of the same day that had opened so inauspiciously for Raymond Venables. Hazel Harlow, or—to give her her stage-name Hilda Hatherleigh, and Jenny Lovelace, sat at breakfast in the lodgings they shared together.

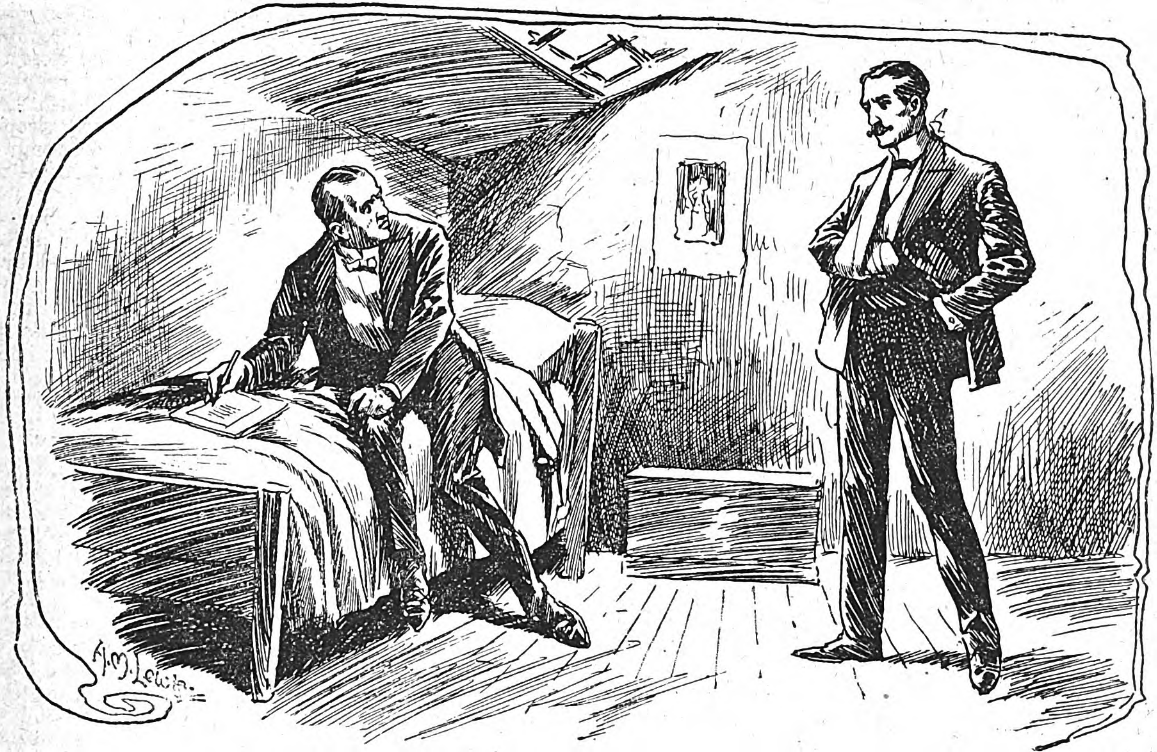
"I tell you what, Hazel," Jenny was saying, "that Mr. Eric Monteith is over head and ears in love with you. He's a nice chap, too. Don't you care for him?"

"Yes," answered Hazel, slowly, "I like him immensely. But I'm not in love with him. And surely no girl ought to marry unless her heart tells her that she has really met her affinity."

Jenny shrugged her shoulders.

"That's all right enough," she said, "and yet there are hundreds of girls in our profession who marry every day without being a bit in love. Why, I know plenty who would marry Raymond Venables to-morrow, if he'd

Hazel Harlow will travel from town to town.



He paused and looked somewhat suspiciously at Smith. "R. V.," he said. "Why R. V.?"

ask them—merely for the chance of getting a part. Yet all the world knows that Master Venables wants to marry his lead, as does every other man who sees her.

Hazel's eyes grew suddenly sad. "It's a terrible thing to be good-looking," she said slowly. "I can't help knowing I am that. To have good looks, and to be upon the stage are synonymous to announcing that you are ready to receive any kind of insult that men care to pay you." Her eyes flashed. "I am going to try and show the world," she said, "that it is possible to be on the stage and still keep oneself unsullied by the world."

Jenny gazed admiringly at her friend. "And I'll stick by you, Hazel," she said fervently.

The conversation then drifted to other topics, the reception of the piece in Sheffield, the prospects of the receipts keeping up.

"I had another proposal last night," said Hazel suddenly, with a smile. "Mr. Clive Pendennis was good enough to offer me his heart and hand."

Jenny burst out laughing. "What an honour!" she cried.

"Yes," answered Hazel, "but I'm slowly getting used to stage methods. It seems to be the correct thing for the men to propose to one in turn. I think they must draw lots as to whose turn is to come next. I expect the property man will be offering himself soon."

At that moment there came a knock at the door, and a maidservant entered with a note upon a salver, which she handed to Hazel.

The note was written in pencil, upon a common piece of notepaper, and enclosed in an envelope upon which was scribbled "Miss Hilda Hatherleigh."

With a growing sense of mystification Hazel read the missive, in the undoubted handwriting of Raymond Venables, which was as follows:

Will you accompany the bearer of this note? I am in great distress. It is of the utmost importance to my welfare that you should come in person and alone. Upon your complying with this request hangs, maybe, my life. I cannot explain more.—R. V.

Hazel read the note through carefully twice. Then she handed it across to Jenny. "What do you make of that?" she said quietly.

Jenny read the few mysterious words as carefully as Hazel had done. "There's no mistaking Venables' handwriting," she said. "I wonder what on earth it means."

Hazel rose to her feet. "Is the bringer of this outside?" she said to the servant.

The maid answered in the affirmative.

"Then tell him I will be ready in a few minutes."

The servant retired.

"You mean to go, Hazel?" cried Jenny.

"I cannot do otherwise than go," came the quiet answer. "Raymond Venables is not the sort of man to write a note like that for nothing. I am absolutely at a loss to understand what has happened. But it is plainly my duty to help him if I can."

"Then I will come with you!"

"But the note says 'come alone.'"

Jenny's face fell. "And supposing something should happen to you?" she said.

"I am not afraid," answered Hazel lightly. "I am anxious to know what can have happened to Mr. Venables. It must be that he has met with an accident that necessitates his sending for someone in whom he trusts. I ought to feel proud that he has chosen me to be the means of helping him out of a difficulty."

Thus spoke Hazel, with all the confiding unsophistication of a pure-hearted girl. Not even the terrible experiences she had undergone since her embarkation upon the troubled sea of theatrical life had been able to destroy her trust in human nature. The plausible would always find a ready prey in Hazel Harlow. Yet it was not folly that prompted her to turn a ready ear to the appeals of those who, for all she knew to the contrary, were the most flagrant charlatans. It was merely a superabundance of the milk of human kindness, that and a total inexperience of the dark places of the world around her.

The bearer of the note from Venables turned out to be a rather seedy-looking individual, about whose person there seemed indefinably to cling a faint flavour of the footlights. It was in fact our old friend Guttridge.

"Has Mr. Venables met with an accident?" asked Hazel.

Guttridge nodded.

"Do you know what he wants me for?"

"I only know I was to bring you the note and wait for an answer," answered the ex-super promptly.

"Then you can take me to Mr. Venables?" went on the girl.

"At once, miss."

It did not seem as if there was anything else to be got out of the man, and Hazel prepared at once to accompany him. The fact that the note was indubitably in Venables' handwriting lulled any initiatory suspicions as to its genuineness to rest.

And so the curiously assorted pair set out together. Yet neither observed that Jenny Lovelace had slipped out of the house after them and was quietly following behind them. "Hazel never thinks of danger," the girl muttered to herself, "and there is something about this I don't quite understand."

In the meanwhile Guttridge led his fair companion along the now crowded streets, and down towards that part of the town that lies above the harbour—a district inhabited for the most part by the poorer classes of dock-labourers. Hazel's wonderment increased as she followed her guide. What business could have brought Raymond Venables to such a neighbourhood?

Suddenly Guttridge came to a halt, and, pausing before the door of a gloomy-looking house, gave a peculiar knock. The door was at once thrown open, and a voice said, "Come in."

Guttridge made a sign for Hazel to enter. Stifling a swift pang of apprehension, the girl obeyed his directions.

A man was standing behind the door, evidently he who had thrown it open. "Will you go upstairs, Miss?" he said. "The first door on the left on the top of the stairs."

Mechanically Hazel began to mount the rickety stairs, her wonderment increasing with every upward step. What on earth could be the meaning of this performance? Nothing but the assurance she had received, in the handwriting of Raymond Venables, could reconcile Hazel to the continuation of an adventure that savoured so much of apparently useless melodrama. And yet she could not believe that there was anything approaching danger in her mysterious mission.

She paused for a moment before opening the door at the top of the stairs. Then curiosity overcame her doubts. She quietly turned the handle, to find herself a moment later in a small, barely furnished apartment, in which was a man, standing with his back towards the door, and with bowed head.

Of Raymond Venables there was no sign. The next instant the door behind her closed sharply. She was alone in the chamber with the unknown man, who wheeled round at the sound of the closing door to disclose the hated personality of Horace Caldecott, alias Smith, alias Ralph Verney—the one man in all the world whom Hazel had reason to fear and loathe.

For a moment Hazel could not believe the evidence of her own senses. It could not be true. She put her hands to her eyes to shut out the hated apparition. Then she turned to the door and tried to open it. It was locked from the outside.

"Once more!" said Caldecott in a low voice; "once more we meet face to face, sweet Hazel. You didn't think to find me in Sheffield. It just shows you what love can do. How quietly you walked into the trap. And now I've got you I don't mean to let you go as I did before."

A low moan came from the girl's lips. This, then, was the meaning of Raymond Venables' note. It had been prompted by Caldecott. How? Surely the manager was not so great a villain as to seek the ruin of the girl he had pretended to love.

Yet, in the face of existing circumstances, all speculation as to Venables' complicity in the affair was useless. The fact that remained poignantly, horribly obvious, was that she, Hazel Harlow, was in the clutches of as unprincipled a villain as had ever laid siege to the heart of a pure and innocent maiden.

"By a foul plot you have lured me here, Mr. Caldecott," the girl said bravely, "even as on a former occasion you tried to entrap me. Yet what can you do? You must know that I can never care for you, indeed I despise you more thoroughly than I do anyone else in the world——"

"Enough," broke in Caldecott roughly. "You should know sufficient of me by this time, to understand that I have made up my mind to possess you, and keep my word I will. Fair means failed, there were only foul ones left. And now I'll tell you what I am going to do. Either you marry me at once, or I take you straight back to Harlow Farm and your father. It will be the same thing in the end anyhow. For your father's only desire is for you to become Mrs. Caldecott, and reign at the Hall. Consent to come with me quietly, to throw up this absurd idea of going on with a stage life, and you shall have my word of honour as a gentleman to be unmolested further. Think, Hazel, what I offer you—a life of ease, with everything that money can offer you, in exchange for the hardships that must be yours if you persist in a theatrical career."

Hazel Harlow is in Sheffield this week.

"You need say no more," broke in Hazel. "I had sooner starve in the streets than be your wife, Mr. Caldecott."

The girl's unflinching demeanour and decisively-worded answer, roused a veritable demon of baffled rage and passion in Caldecott's breast. With an oath he sprang forward and drew forth from his pocket a handkerchief—he no longer wore his arm in a sling, it had evidently been a blind to enable him to procure Venables' assistance, as we have seen—into which, with amazing rapidity, he emptied the contents of a small phial.

Before Hazel had had time to realise his purpose, before the scream of terror that rose to her lips could become articulate, the sickening odour of chloroform filled her nostrils. The next moment she had fallen forward into her captor's arms, insensible.

In the meanwhile, Jenny Lovelace had succeeded in following Hazel and Guttridge to the house where the event narrated above, had been enacted. The girl, determined on following Hazel's movements closely, had taken up a position at the end of the street, from whence she could keep an eye upon the building that held Hazel and the mystery surrounding Raymond Venables.

For some time the girl watched without her vigilance being in any way rewarded. Suddenly the door of the house opened and a man issued forth—the same man that had brought Venables' note to Hazel. He hurried away, evidently intent on some errand. Jenny vacillated. Should she follow him, or remain where she was. She decided on the latter course of action.

Five minutes passed away. Then suddenly the sound of carriage wheels echoed along the dingy street. The next moment a cab drew up opposite the door of the house that contained Hazel Harlow and what else Jenny could only conjecture.

But conjecture soon gave way to certainty. The man who alighted from the vehicle to re-enter the house was he that had left it only a short time previously—Guttridge, in fact—though Jenny did not know his name.

In a few moments the house door opened again. Three men appeared, two of them bearing the figure of a girl, whom one horrified glance assured Jenny to be Hazel herself, and insensible. Of Venables there was no sign. The inert body was deposited inside the cab.

One of the three men, evidently a person of more importance than Guttridge and his colleague, entered the vehicle. The next moment the cabman had whipped up his horse, and Jenny realised that Hazel must have been the victim of foul play.

Jenny's agony of mind can be well imagined. She was torn between two courses—the one to go as fast as possible for aid, the other to keep the cab containing Hazel and the unknown abductor in view.

She came to the conclusion that the last course of action would after all be the best. Were she once to lose sight of the vehicle, of what use would it be for her to endeavour to effect a rescue? Sheffield was a big place, and Jenny had but a cursory knowledge of the town. She would have, therefore, to trust to the actual testimony of her own eyes as a guide to the identification of Hazel's unknown destination.

Luckily for Jenny the cab-horse that drew the vehicle she was following had long passed its prime. Its best attempt at a gallop was but a sorry jog-trot, so that the young actress had but little difficulty in keeping her quarry in view

It soon became evident that the destination of the cab lay towards the railway station. Jenny's mystification and fear began to deepen. What could be the motive of the unknown man who had so callously carried away the star of the travelling company?

Yet she registered a silent oath that she would at all costs keep her quarry in view. Upon her, weak woman that she was, hung, for all she knew to the contrary, Hazel Harlow's very life itself.

CHAPTER IV.

"Have you taken up Mr. Venables' lunch, yet?"

It was nearly one o'clock. The actor-manager's landlady was addressing her small domestic, who looked up with a scared face and at last said:

"Mr. Venables came back at about seven o'clock. An hour or so later two gentlemen came out of 'is room. I haven't seen 'im since."

The landlady stared in blankest amazement at her diminutive help.

"Do you mean to say that Mr. Venables didn't come back till seven o'clock this morning?" she cried. "And whatever d'ye mean about two gents, a-coming out of his room at eight. You must be dreaming."

The maid, realising that she had kept her tit-bits of information too long, began to whimper.

"Sr'help me, it's true!" she said.

The landlady treated her to a withering stare and hurried upstairs to Venables' apartment and knocked vigorously at the door. No answer was vouchsafed. She tried the door. It was locked. Again she knocked, her growing anxiety as to her lodger's safety lending vigour to her knuckles. "Sposin' he's ill," she murmured.

Silence still rewarded her summons. She hurried downstairs and sought out her husband. "Coppock," she said, "come up to Mr. Venables' room and see if you can open the door. I've scraped all the skin off my knuckles, and I can't make him hear. Something must be the matter."

Thus adjured, Captain Coppock, of the mercantile marine, rose to his full height of five foot five and followed his wife with all the pompous roll his short legs could assume.

Following his wife's commands, he proceeded to pound vigorously at the door of the lodger's chamber, accompanying the manual exercise with a fine display of nautical "Yo ho, there's" and other seamanlike expressions. Yet his efforts were no more attended with success than his wife's had been.

"He's either blind to the world or in Davy Jones' locker," said the seaman conclusively.

Mrs. Coppock gave vent to a faint scream. "Not dead, Nathaniel!" she gasped. "We must break the door open."

The gallant seaman rolled up his sleeves, drew back a few paces, and with a fine disregard of consequences hurled himself, shoulder first, at the door. The sound of splintering woodwork was followed by the unceremonious entrance into the room of the human battering-ram, as the door, its lock burst asunder, flew open.

The sight that awaited the captain and his wife, while it proved conclusively the justification of their course of action, was so startling in its entire unexpectedness, that it literally took their breath away and left them standing speechless and incapable of action side by side in their lodger's room.

Hazel Harlow will be in Newcastle next week.

Upon the bed lay Raymond Venables, like a trussed fowl. An improvised gag was in his mouth. The sheets and blankets of his bed had been used as thongs to bind him to the couch itself. No wonder that he had been unable to answer his landlady's summons.

Captain Coppock came to his senses first. He strode forward, and, with quick, dexterous fingers, began to unbind the knots that cut so cruelly into Venables' flesh. In a few minutes the prisoner was free.

For a few moments the actor was so cramped he could only sit still and try to induce renewed feelings of life into his limbs. Then he found his tongue.

"I have been the victim of a base plot," he said vindictively. "I got back here at about seven o'clock to find that my latch-key had been stolen and two men had got got into my room here. They threatened to kill me, and finally bound me up like this."

"Well, I'm blowed!" ejaculated Captain Coppock.

"Well, to be sure," echoed his better half, more faintly astonished. The recent apparent incoherence of her youthful domestic became more obvious. If only the girl had given voice to what she had seen before so long an interval had elapsed.

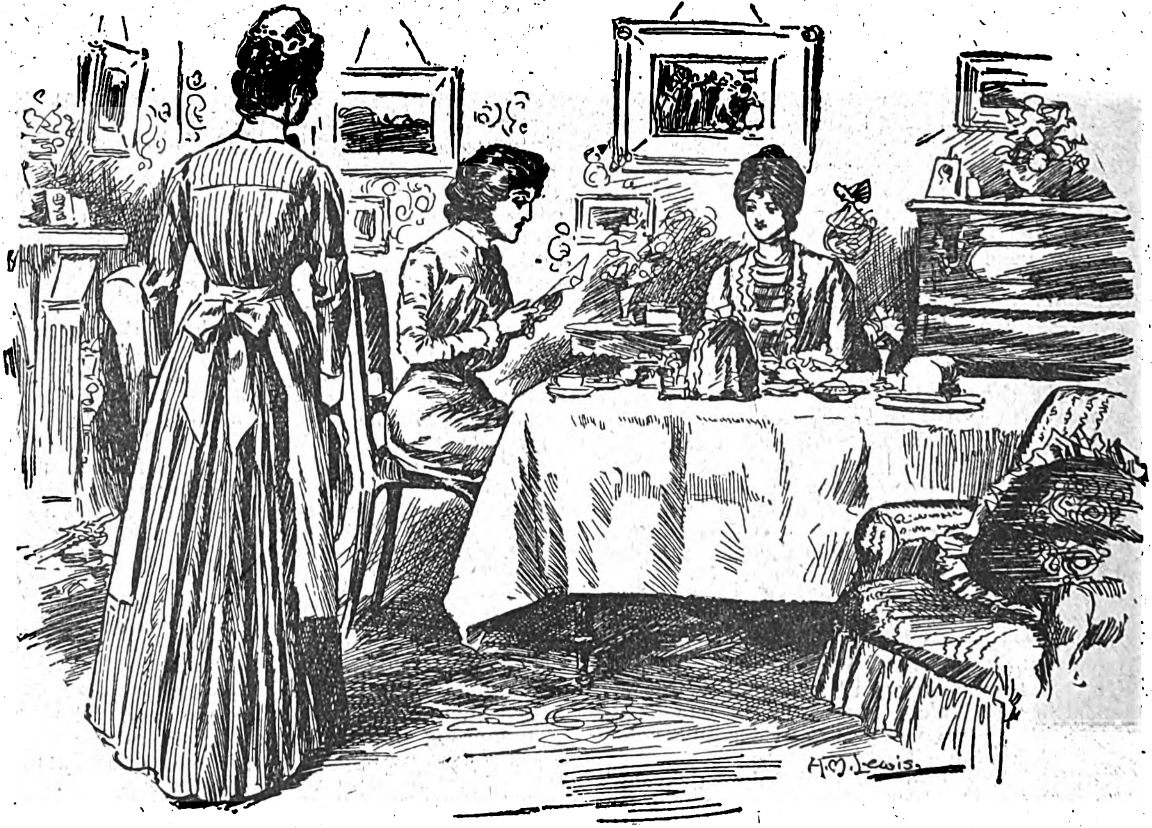
Smarting as he was, both from a sense of injured dignity and physical pain, Raymond Venables felt that he could not bear to remain under the commiserating eyes of his landlady and her husband, neither did he care to take them further into his confidence and relate the whole history of his adventures since his supper-party of the night before.

For nearly four hours he had lain helpless on his bed. He determined to go out and obtain some lunch, and then pay a call on Hazel. Little did he dream how intimately was his own recent adventure bound up with the fate of his leading lady.

He ate but a poor lunch. The appearance of the two ex-supers, and the revenge they had taken, coupled with the mysterious connection of the man "Ralph Verney" with the affair, were events each one of which was surely sufficient to account for the manager's loss of appetite.

As regards the hasty penning of the note for "Verney," Venables was beginning to think that he had been more anxious to buy his freedom, at any cost, than prudence really dictated. Supposing that the note covered some sinister design on the part of the stranger. "Confound it," said Raymond Venables, "I've never had a more uncomfortable day in my life before."

He left the restaurant and hurried round to Hazel's lodgings. Just as he reached the house a man came down the few steps that led up to the front door.



With a growing sense of mystification, Hazel read the missive.

Hazel Harlow will travel from town to town.

"Mr. Eric Monteith," muttered the manager, "the man that was always dangling after Hazel at Scarborough. I wonder what he's after."

No sooner did Monteith's eyes light upon Venables' figure than the young man hastened up to the manager.

"Good afternoon, Mr. Venables," he said, "can you tell me where Miss Harlow is?"

The manager answered rather stiffly.

"No, Mr. Monteith," he said, "I cannot," and would have passed on, but the other stopped him.

"Wait a moment, Mr. Venables," he said, "I think this is in your handwriting," and he thrust the note the actor had written that morning for the pseudo Ralph Verney, the note which had led Hazel into so serious a predicament.

Venables went white to the lips.

"In heaven's name," he gasped, "where did you find that?"

"On Miss Harlow's sitting-room table."

"On Miss Harlow's table!" echoed the other faintly, the sweat standing out on his forehead in great beads, "Then there's foul play somewhere!"

"Foul play! What d'ye mean?"

Eric spoke roughly, but Venables was in no state of mind to resent his tone.

"I can't tell you the story in the street," he answered. "Come inside Miss Harlow's room, and I'll tell you every thing I know."

And in a few moments the two men were seated in Hazel's sitting-room, and Eric grew sick with horror as he listened to the story we know already, and in which he could see, with fatal distinctness, the hand of the villain, Horace Caldecott. Once before he had tried a fall with Caldecott, and had come off victorious. But this time the scoundrel had stolen a march upon him. He gnashed his teeth together in impotent fury and agony of mind. And Venables, as he watched his hearer's face, realised that the careless desire for freedom that had made him write the fatal note, had perhaps cost him not only his leading lady, but his honour and all hopes of making Hazel his wife as well. Could nothing be done to bring the scoundrel Caldecott to book?

CHAPTER V.

Horace Caldecott sat, white-faced and sullen, in one corner of the vehicle he had chartered to bear away the unconscious Hazel to her fate.

As the cab rolled slowly onward, and as the girl began to show no signs of returning consciousness, his exultation in the fact that he at last held her in his power began to be tempered with feelings of apprehension.

He had no desire for her to regain consciousness until they were on the train that would bear them away from Sheffield towards London. And yet supposing that he had been too liberal with the use of the chloroform! How still she lay! Yet how beautiful she was. Caldecott's black eyes gloated on every line of her white face, every curve of her glorious figure. "By heaven, but I won't lose her now," he muttered hoarsely. "I'd sell my soul for her."

But he had little time for sentiment just then. The cab had turned into the station enclosure and pulled up with a jerk. In a moment Caldecott had opened the cab-door and leapt outside.

"I'll be back in a minute," he said to the Jehu, "my wife's still unconscious. I will go and get our tickets and some brandy. If she doesn't recover I shall have to get someone to help me get her into the train. Just keep your eye on her. And cabby"—the villain's voice sank to a confidential whisper—"it's as well to warn you that if she does come to herself she may be violent, and say all sorts of extravagant things. You must keep her quiet somehow. I'll square with you when I come back."

The cabman touched his hat. He supposed it was merely a repetition of a story that was too painfully common, a young wife addicted to drink, and a husband who had to bear the brunt of the sad state of affairs. Ah, well, it was no business of his. There was no fear of the girl coming round as the husband had suggested. She was evidently dead drunk.

Thus musing, he gathered up his reins and sat motionless on his box, awaiting Caldecott's return.

The latter hurried away to the booking-office and bought two first-class tickets to London. There was a train due out in about ten minutes. Once get Hazel safely aboard and he felt he could snap his fingers in the face of any chance of losing her. "There's no Mr. Eric Monteith on the spot now to come to spoil sport," he muttered to himself. "You're mine now, Hazel. Ay, and will be body and soul ere long," and the fierce light of a devilish passion burnt in his eyes.

Not five minutes had elapsed from the time when he had left the cab, and all his business was concluded. Nothing now remained but to get Hazel on to the train with as little fuss as possible. It would merely be a case of "palm-oil," that, and a continuance of the glib plausibilities at which Horace Caldecott was such an adept.

He retraced his steps to the vehicle. The man was quietly seated on the box. Everything seemed as he had left it. Caldecott's heart began to beat with quicker pulsations in anticipation of the triumph in store, the triumph over Hazel Harlow and the loathing she bore him. For Caldecott's passion had made him blind. He saw no obstacles in the path of his desires, he saw only the goal ahead, the end he had longed for so ardently, with all the baseness of a soul already depraved and hardened beyond belief.

He opened the door of the cab. The next instant he had staggered back as though struck in the face by a whip. "I must be dreaming," he murmured hoarsely. For there were two women in the cab! The one was beyond doubt Hazel, and just as he had left her, still white, mute, and unconscious, the other was a small, dark-featured woman, pretty in a way, whose right arm was round Hazel, and whose bosom pillowed the beautiful head of Caldecott's victim.

It was no dream. Caldecott realised that in a moment. He thrust his head inside the cab. "Woman!" he muttered hoarsely, "how dare you intrude thus upon my wife's privacy? Leave the cab this instant, or I summon the police."

"Your wife!" answered the girl, in whom my readers will doubtless recognise the intrepid Jenny. "Your wife!" and the scorn in her voice lashed the man's understanding. "Villain! Abductor! Do you think you can carry off Hilda Hatherleigh, the idol of Sheffield, so easily? Why, I followed you. I slipped inside the cab while you were gone, and now, unless you take to your heels, I will scream for help. And then you will be lynched!"

There was something in the girl's voice that made

Caldecott realise that she meant every word she had said. A murderous light sprang up in his eyes. Baffled rage and lust fought for mastery in his voice, as he said almost incoherently: "Get out of the cab. I'll kill you if you don't get out, I say!"

The commotion had by this time aroused the attention of the lethargic driver of the cab, who clambered off his box, and, with great astonishment visible on his countenance, came to Caldecott's side just to hear the latter's last remark.

"What's up?" he said. "Has she turned obstreperous?"

Caldecott looked fixedly at the man. He determined on making one last effort to get rid of Hazel's unknown champion.

"There's a fool of a woman who says my wife's not drunk," he whispered rapidly. "She's got inside the cab. I'll give you a hundred pounds if you'll get her out. My train goes in a few minutes. I must catch it. A hundred pounds, I say!"

The cabman rapped out an oath. A hundred pounds was a lot of money. And if— He tore open the cab door, and prepared to pull Jenny out by main force. But he had reckoned without his host.

Jenny determined on playing her trump card. Flinging her arms tightly round Hazel, she gave vent to a scream that rang out with startling distinctness. "Help Help!" she yelled. "Rescue for Hilda Hatherleigh!"

For a moment Caldecott stood petrified with amazement. Then his astonishment gave way to fear. He knew that the scales had turned against him now. He had played his stake and lost—lost through the cursed interference of a chit of a girl.

He gave one swift glance around him. From every side people hurried up, drawn to the spot by Jenny's frenzied screams—porters, passengers, policemen, pedestrians passing outside the station, all dashed towards the unexpected centre of attraction, the harmless-looking cab inside the station precincts.

The next moment Caldecott took to his heels. Fear lent him wings. The London train was moving out of the station as he raced down the platform. He flung open a carriage door and tumbled pell-mell inside. To his intense relief it was empty. He was safe from pursuit now.

Safe from pursuit! This then was the end of the scheme he had elaborated so carefully. For the third time he had been foiled in his attempt to abduct Hazel Harlow. In vain the subtle use he had made of the two ex-supers and their childish desire for revenge against Raymond Venables; in vain the cunning way in which he had coerced the manager to be the unconscious tool for Hazel's abduction; in vain the further details of the vile plot he had nursed so carefully towards completion.

And now he was further away from Hazel than ever. Yet that very fact made him wish to possess her all the more. "I'll have her yet," he muttered, as pale and savage-eyed, he sat in the corner of the carriage. "I'll have her yet!"

* * * * *

"What is to be done?" cried Raymond Venables, half beside himself. "What can I do to retrieve the hideous blunder of which I have been guilty? Why, Mr. Monteith, I'd give my soul to be able to save Hazel Harlow."

Eric did not answer for a minute or so. Such wild expressions of sentiment, coming from the lips of the man who had, unwittingly, yet surely betrayed Hazel into the hands of her enemy, were distasteful in the extreme to his quiet steadfast nature.

"We must communicate with the police," he said at last. "I don't see what else we can do. Every hole and corner of Sheffield must be ransacked. Huge rewards must be offered. It's terrible to think how much precious time has been wasted."

At that moment an interruption occurred. The noise as of a vehicle drawing up outside the door, accompanied by the sound as of a great concourse of people following after it fell on the ears of the two men. They rushed to the window which was open. A strange sight awaited them.

A cab, drawn by a miserably thin horse, had stopped at the door. Following the vehicle was a crowd of men and women that seemed to fill the narrow street.

The next moment the cab door opened. A girl got out, supporting on her arm another female figure. A dozen or so of the bystanders thronged round this couple, all evidently anxious only to offer assistance.

One glance told Eric and his comrade who the two girls were.

"Hazel Harlow and Jenny Lovelace!" cried Venables.

And thus was Hazel Harlow brought back to her friends, in triumph like a Queen.

CHAPTER VI.

The theatre was packed to suffocation that night.

The story of "Hilda Hatherleigh's" attempted abduction, and the dramatic way in which she had been rescued by Miss Lovelace, had got about all over Sheffield. Everyone was anxious to convey to the beautiful young actress genuine and hearty expressions of congratulations for her escape.

Before the rise of the curtain, Raymond Venables went in front. A roar of applause greeted the manager's appearance in front of the footlights.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he said. "I have come here before the commencement of our play as the mouthpiece of Miss Hilda Hatherleigh. I regret to say that Miss Hatherleigh will be unable to appear in her role to-night, as she is suffering from a severe nervous shock due to the terrible experience she has gone through to-day, and has been expressly forbidden by medical orders from acting to-night. She hopes that you will forgive her non-appearance, and thanks you most heartily for the generous way in which you have shown sympathy for her accident." With which Venables gracefully withdrew.

The disappointment of the audience at the non-appearance of the new and beautiful star was tempered somewhat by the fact that Jenny Lovelace, whose name had figured largely in everyone's mouth that evening, appeared as usual. The young girl received a tremendous ovation, which, if anyone deserved she assuredly did, for she had behaved with wonderful bravery and presence of mind.

[The next place on the tour list of The Good Samaritan company was Newcastle. Here Hazel Harlow was to encounter an adventure of a quite different calibre to the one related in this issue of Short Stories; but one that was to be scarcely less terrible in its danger to her existence as an actress.]

Hazel Harlow is in Sheffield this week.

A Mercenary Motive.

ARTHUR LESLIE laid on the table the new Society paper at which he had been glancing, and stared thoughtfully at the opposite end of his comfortably-furnished study. He remained so long in that attitude that his cigar went out, and the wind passing gently through the open window scattered the written sheets of foolscap one by one over the floor.

Leslie did not purchase Society weeklies as a rule, and it would have puzzled all his friends to understand why he descended to such a frivolity on the present occasion. Leslie would have been equally at a loss to give any other answer than his favourite one of "fate."

He had only read one paragraph—that which gave a few details about a grand reception in Piccadilly; in it he had read about the beautiful Lady Carstone, together with some observations by the writer on the surprising fact that the lovely and comparatively youthful widow should remain in her present position when she might have half a dozen titled and desirable bachelors or widowers for the asking—or, as the writer remarked with an attempt at wit, "for merely permitting herself to be asked."

It was this paragraph which had brought on Leslie's meditative mood. It was not his wish to go back over the past. It was an integral part of his creed not to sorrow over that which is dead; but he could not help himself this time, for memory proved stronger than will.

Arthur Leslie, F.R.S., etc., although only thirty-five, had earned a great reputation in the world of science as an electrical expert. He had been one of the few men keen enough to recognise in the early days of the science that electricity was the power of the future. He had devoted himself to it, and by dint of hard work had gained his present position. He was known among his friends as a grave, matter-of-fact scientist, quite above the smaller things of life, and almost entirely devoid of humour. No one had ever seen him laugh; and although in his lectures there was an occasional witticism it was far more akin to sarcasm than humour. Had those friends been able to follow Leslie's present thoughts they would have found in it an explanation of his hardness.

His mind carried him back twelve years, when he was struggling to earn a living in an office during the day, and working hard during every spare moment and far into the night at his favourite study—electricity—and at the other subjects necessary to pass an examination at London University. He had already attracted some attention by his contributions on electrical appliances in technical journals, but the object of his ambition seemed well nigh unattainable, and in moments of discouragement he felt inclined to give up entirely, and resign himself to the life of a clerk in a commercial firm.

Then came to Arthur Leslie a period which comes to most men who try to rise in life—a period of intense discouragement, when everything goes wrong, or seems to, and when the very sight of favourite books or tools makes him feel sick. At that moment it requires but another straw of failure to send a man wrong for ever; at that moment he is ready to clutch at anything to save himself.

It was when Arthur Leslie had reached this stage that he was brought into contact with Mr. Stevens and his daughter Marian.

At the urgent request of a friend, who gave him a ticket, he attended a conversazione at one of the learned societies. He was standing listlessly in a corner, gazing, with feelings of bitterness, at the apparently happy people who thronged the hall, "Come with me, quick!"

He was hurried towards a gentleman whom he knew to be an authority on electrical engineering, who, after a few words of introduction and greeting, told Leslie that he wished to introduce him to someone who wished to make his acquaintance and might help him in return. A moment later, the wondering young man was shaking hands with a gentleman about fifty years of age.

"I have read several of your contributions to the electrical papers, Mr. Leslie," said the gentleman, "and I was much pleased with them. I made enquiry this evening in order to find out if you were here; hence our meeting. I think you can help me."

Leslie was more astonished than ever. He had been told that the stranger might help him.

"I am an amateur in electricity—which means that I study it and work at it for amusement," said the gentleman apologetically. "I am trying to perfect an idea for a new dynamo; if I can realise my idea I shall revolutionise electrical engineering. Now, there was a passage in your last article which struck me very forcibly, and it leads me to think that if we joined hands we can complete the invention. I am rich, and willing to pay for the help you give me; but of course the invention is mine, and the new dynamo will bear my name."

Leslie uttered a few half audible words, and Mr. Stevens continued:

"Come to my house and have lunch with me to-morrow, then we can talk quietly."

This was Leslie's chance. He was not perfect; and he resolved to cling to Mr. Stevens like a parasite and without scruple in order to lift himself from his present position.

Leslie accepted the invitation, and at the table he met Marian.

Although they were unable to accomplish the desired object, the two men evolved other ideas, and Leslie visited Mr. Stevens at least once a week. The greater part of the time occupied by his visit was spent in the study or laboratory with Mr. Stevens, but he never failed to have a few minutes with Marian; and by the termination of his third visit he had determined to win her, and was more set upon conquering in the domain of Cupid than in the kingdom of electricity.

Marian was enchanting, and willing to receive Leslie's advances. At last he ventured upon a definite expression of his love; Marian listened with evident pleasure, but gave no definite reply—only bidding him wait. This was enough for Leslie, who now felt that he was within reasonable distance of happiness.

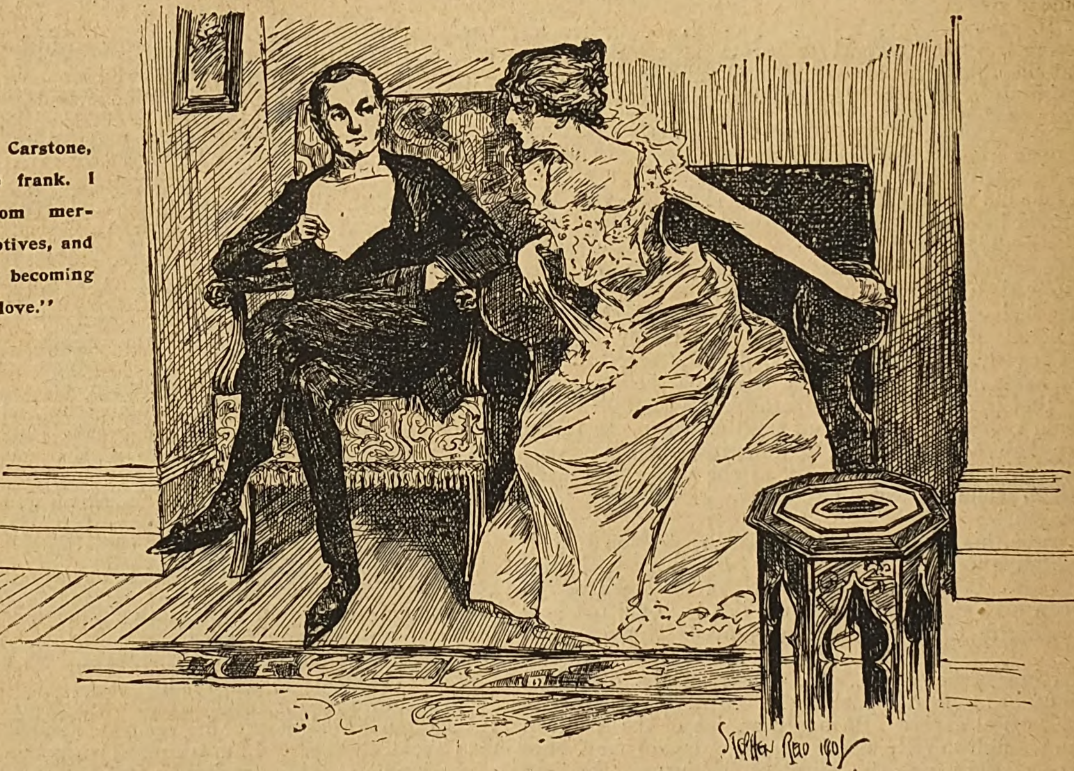
His connection with Stevens had been profitable to him, and he had been able to throw up his situation and live on the results of his pen and sundry commissions which he had received from engineering firms on the strength of Stevens' recommendations. He had gradually given up studying for the London University examination, and was taking life more easily, confident in his ability and with the hope of sharing the wealth of Mr. Stevens when he should marry Marian. For there was now no doubt that the young lady was distinctly encouraging him.

They had pleasant interviews in her father's house, they met in the Park and at Picture galleries, as well as at some Society gatherings to which he contrived to get an invitation; and at all these gatherings he spoke to her with a tenderness and freedom that seemingly left no doubt as to his feelings, while Marian raised his hopes to the level of certainty, and set his heart beating at a rapid rate by a drooping of the eyes, coquettish speeches, and glances, and other feminine wiles.

"I am going away to Neuenahr," she said to him suddenly one August afternoon, just as he had taken advantage of the fact that they were alone to begin an incoherent request for her hand.

He stopped abruptly; he had several times been on the point of making this request, which he regarded as a mere formality—for, he argued, she knew that he loved her and that she loved him—but he had delayed his request for some unknown reason. That she should now stop him so coolly with the information that she was going abroad for a holiday, sent a chill through him.

"But—when you return, Marian," he stammered, "may I hope— Your affection, your love, will not change? When you return, I may claim you?"



"Lady Carstone, let us be frank. I began from mercenary motives, and ended by becoming madly in love."

"Of course, you foolish boy," she returned lightly. "I shall be away for six weeks, and everything will go on again just as usual when I come back."

He leant forward as if to kiss her; she half drew back to avoid it, but apparently changed her mind and permitted the embrace.

Although vexed that she should be out of his reach for the next six weeks, Leslie was exultant in the thought that he had won the prize. His days of struggling poverty were over, and he could look forward to a life free from those cares which accompany want of money and the necessity to earn one's living.

By the end of the first week he found that he missed the girl more than he had believed possible. He had wished to correspond during the interval, but she had laughingly said that absence makes the heart grow fonder, and that it would be best not to enter into correspondence while she was away.

Leslie was busy with work for Mr. Stevens and others, so it was not because his mind was unoccupied that he longed for a letter or some token of remembrance from Marian. Why was he thus troubled? This question occurred to him one morning during the second week after the postman had passed his door, and the answer which came to him startled him and made him pace up and down the room.

"Yes," he said, half aloud, as he resumed his seat a few minutes later, but not to work. "I am in love with Marian! I began to court her because I thought it was the high road to worldly advancement, and only for that reason; and I find that I am caught in the meshes, and that I have gradually and unconsciously come to love her.

"In my own eyes I am a mean-spirited wretch for having tried to win a girl for her money; but I believe that she thinks me sincere. And I am sincere now. I was sorely tried when this temptation came to me, and I was weak enough to yield. I hate myself for it now, and I swear that my love for her shall act as the spur to endeavour, and as the guide to keep me in the path of nobility and honourable conduct. The life of ease which I had mapped out for myself shall give place to a life of work, and I will make a name for myself that will be honoured throughout the country, and which she will be proud to bear!"

This awakening marked a new era in the life of Arthur Leslie, and he set to work with an energy and a determination even greater than he had exhibited in the old "office" days. His love had brought back nobility of purpose, and he eagerly awaited the return of Marian to ask her to promise that she would wed him when he was able to offer her a worthy position.

"I will not ask her to marry me now, as I wish to avoid all semblance of mercenary motive. And I feel sure that she will wait for me."

Marian came back, and he took the earliest opportunity of seeking an interview with her. She welcomed him coldly, and displayed her left hand in such a way that he should see a ring on the third finger.

"What does that mean?" he asked hoarsely.

"I am engaged to be married to Sir Thomas Carstone, Mr. Leslie," she replied frigidly.

"But your promise to me?"

"Oh, that was—— Of course, we were only having a little fun together," she said with a laugh, although her cheeks coloured slightly. "You must have known that with my money I could marry a title."

Arthur Leslie left the house without exchanging another word with Marian Stevens. She was a heartless coquette, he said to himself, but he had no right to complain; he had played with her, so the reward was a just one, and the fact that he now really loved her could not be taken into consideration.

It was a severe lesson, but Leslie was now strong enough to learn it and take it aright. It had taught him that whatever he did should be done from honest motives, and that any other line of conduct would sooner or later meet with a fitting reward.

At the end of seven years, Arthur Leslie had reached a point which was very near to the summit of his ambition. He had gained a University degree, he had been elected Fellow of a famous society—one of the few distinctions that can only be gained by merit—he was a professor, and his income was larger than he had ever dreamt that it could be. It was even mooted that, in spite of his youth, he would soon receive the honour of knighthood in recognition of his services to science.

Many a woman would gladly have shared the fortunes of the clever scientist, but it was currently believed that he was a woman-hater. He was courteous to ladies when thrown in contact with them, but he never sought their society, and never indulged in pretty compliments. He heard from time to time of Lady Carstone, and knew that she was a widow. He saw her occasionally at some social gathering, but he invariably avoided her. It was as nearly as possible seven years after her marriage with Sir Thomas that he was brought face to face with her and spoke to her.

He could not avoid it this time, for the hostess had deliberately conducted him to her. He had to talk to her, and she asked him to explain some natural phenomena, and gradually contrived to get him to a recess where they could talk without interruption.

"Professor Leslie," she said with assumed frankness, "I did you a great wrong some years ago, and I have never ceased to regret it. I married for position instead of love."

Leslie looked at her curiously. He was accustomed to analytical methods, and although he could not claim to possess a very close knowledge of feminine ways, yet he was sufficiently a student of human nature to be able to penetrate below the surface of her words. He was able to look calmly on the past, and he had long since recognised that the girl had never cared for him, and had only been playing with him. Lady Carstone's words amused and yet irritated him; he was amused at this attempt to capture a man who could give her a far more important position in Society than the old man she had wedded, and he was irritated by the daring attempt.

"When did you discover that, Lady Carstone?" he asked, keeping his voice and features under perfect control. "Was it before or after your marriage that you discovered you were in love?"

It was a cruel thrust, but he could not resist it. As he had half expected, she evaded the question.

"Have I not said that I married for position instead of love?"

She felt that he was judging her correctly, and she was uncomfortable. Her attempt had failed, and she wished to escape the consequences of defeat. She rose to go, but he detained her.

"Lady Carstone, let us be frank. I began from mercenary motives, and ended by becoming madly in love. The girl I loved was only amusing herself with me, and never loved me. She wanted a position then—and she wants it now My love died a natural death as the result of the awakening, but the experience made a nobler man of me. I am not the only being who is capable of learning a lesson."

They parted, and he had never spoken to her since.

That was five years ago, yet she was still Lady Carstone, although he knew that the writer in the Society paper was correct when he said that she might have any one of at least half a dozen titled men. Had she discovered that she really loved the man with whom she had flirted? And if so——?

"No, no!" murmured Leslie, as he laid down his cigar and picked up the scattered sheets of his lecture for the Royal Institution. "The girl I loved was not the Marian Stevens who married Sir Thomas Carstone, but a Marian Stevens who existed only in my own brain. If it had been otherwise——."

Tell your friends about Hazel Harlow.

J. Brewster Fisher

Miss Letitia's Trousseau.

LETITIA HOUGHTON was going to be married; consequently many of her dear feminine friends said it was a shame, a scandal, for Letitia to think of such folly at her time of life. These same authorities declared she was fifty-five years old, adding there was no fool like an old one.

Letitia was on the sunny side of forty-five, but did not look as if she were forty, being handsome, with a pretty home, a tidy income, a kind heart, and a sound head.

The beneficiaries of her bounty had become accustomed to consider her a spinster, too confirmed a devotee to single blessedness to change her state. What right had that old thing to be taken in by an impecunious adventurer, when she had friends of her lifetime who naturally expected—she had no kinspeople—to be remembered in her will; not that they were mercenary, but that they had a sort of claim upon her.

Remarks of this kind were freely indulged in when the invitations were received. Twenty-five or thirty women talking at once is rather confusing, and as the speakers became excited the comments became more personal and assumed an ill-natured turn. It was at a church sewing circle, and tongues were flying faster than needles.

An exceedingly pretty and richly dressed woman, a guest of the society, now took up the cudgels in defence of the absent.

"Ladies, ladies, is this a modern school for scandal, or a church society held in the basement of a sacred edifice? You all have cause to be grateful to Letitia; why should you speak of her so bitterly now, because she exercises the right we have all claimed?"

Mrs. Alyn Alden was a leader of society, whose dictum made or unmade a newcomer entering the charmed circle. Mrs. Jennie, as Mrs. Alden was generally called, was a power, and with promptitude they proceeded to eat their words with marvellous celerity.

Mrs. Jennie smiled and bade them good morning. On the way to Miss Letitia's she made a gesture as if she had touched an ill-smelling weed.

"What a power of harm such women can do at times! I do not pose as a reformer, but I really would like to recall the ducking-stool for their benefit. Poor Letitia! I hope she has not chosen unwisely."

Her musings ceased as the coachman drew rein before the pretty, old-fashioned garden of the Houghtons. Mrs. Jennie was met in the yard by the bride-elect, whose fresh and fair complexion had defied the ravages of time. With her bright hazel eyes and wavy light brown hair she might have passed for thirty-five at most.

"Come into the house, Jennie; it's lovely out here amongst the flowers, but I have some things I wish to show you; the dress has come; I am too old to be married in white satin, so I selected a pink brocade trimmed with lace. I have never had so many pretty clothes made at one time in my life, for I never needed to. I don't think I'm envious, but when I saw all my friends' handsome outfits it occurred to me that it would be an inducement to marry. Do you not like it?"

"But where did you meet the man you expect to marry, Letitia? I would not give my life into the keeping of an utter stranger."

"You needn't be uneasy about me; he's a very pleasant man, and I'm positive we will get on well together; as for love, we are not young people, and have said nothing about that, but we will do well enough as friends. Do you notice that black and gold visiting silk, Jennie?"

Mrs. Jennie perceived that the bride-to-be preferred to talk about her clothes instead of the man she had promised to marry, and made no other effort to drag him into the conversation. Miss Letitia brought every article for Mrs. Jennie's inspection.

"Do stay to lunch; I've so much to tell you yet! I want it understood that I meant what I said when I wrote on the cards I didn't want any presents; please make your friends understand that, will you? I know that they will want to give me presents; you can't know how glad I am that I am liked, Jennie."

Mrs. Alden would not shake Miss Letitia's faith in the professions of friendship she believed sincere, but when their spiteful comments were recalled it angered her afresh with them.

For that purpose, Mrs. Jennie drove back by the church, where she found the society dispersing. She did not alight, but told them of Miss Letitia's wish.

She of the sharp tongue gave a shrill little cackle and said:

"That means we must give them without fail. She's afraid we won't give anything, and takes that means to make sure."

"Was that the reason you had 'No flowers' on the cards when your daughter graduated? Letitia's bouquet was weighted with a jewelled butterfly. So glad you enlightened me. I have wondered why that clause was inserted, but had no idea it meant exactly opposite to what it said. It is never too late to learn—wisdom. Good-morning; I must go home."

Mrs. Ponsonby gazed after the carriage, and said to her dear familiar friend:

"Mrs. Alden does have the knack of taking one by surprise; she confuses a person so. Of course, I didn't mean—that is, I didn't intend to own——"

"That you look that way of assuring Sophy a number of bouquets and presents? I thought you didn't mean to say that, dear, did you?" suggested the friend sweetly.

* * * * *

Miss Letitia's wedding day had arrived. She was looking extremely handsome and accepted the effusive compliments of her friends in apparently good faith; they declared she did not look a day over forty.

As yet the groom had not made his appearance; Miss Letitia had excused herself a moment or two, but as the minutes lengthened into an hour without her returning, significant glances were exchanged and the buzz of many voices was heard.

It is astonishing how much pleasure some people derive from the distress or mortification of their friends. Mrs. Ponsonby and her coterie were insinuating that something was wrong, voicing pity which their eyes and countenances belied.

Thoroughly exasperated, Mrs. Jennie was about to give a crushing retort, when Miss Letitia reappeared.

She was slightly pale, her demeanour a mixture of regret and dignity, while a blending of defiance was depicted in her erect attitude.

"I've had a telegram from Mr. Langworthy; business of a family nature, which I shall not be at liberty to divulge indiscriminately, compels him to start for Europe as he sent the message off; consequently there will be no wedding to-night. That need not interfere with our enjoyment of the supper; the presents will be returned to their donors to-morrow. Mr. Alden, will you see me to the table? The minister will take you, Jennie."

Her astounding revelations called forth a chorus of "Ohs!" and "Ahs!" and a dozen excited women began to ply her with questions, protesting against her returning the presents, but she waived them aside.

She gave her guests no time to discuss her affairs in groups, but marched them into the dining-room, some wearing, from the undiminished pangs of curiosity, an expression as if they were being led to instant execution.

Miss Letitia was the life of the party, and the theory that she had been jilted did not gain ground; her explanation was accepted as true—as far as it went. More than one face became blank when Miss Letitia said:

"Jennie, be sure to come round to-morrow and help me to pack those presents; some are so—valuable I will not be satisfied until they are returned; fortunately all are labelled."

"I will come with pleasure, Letitia," replied Mrs. Alden, while Mrs. Ponsonby whispered dolefully: "If she would ask me!"

Early next morning Mrs. Jennie accordingly put in her appearance, finding her friend in exceedingly good spirits.

While tying up a gaudy plated cake-stand, a gift from Mrs. Ponsonby, Mrs. Alden said:

"Letitia, why return the presents? Were you in earnest when you said there was not much likelihood of there being a marriage?"

Miss Letitia was bending over the bed, replacing a handsome silver ladle in its velvet box.

The constrained position may have been the cause of her heightened colour. Her face, as she turned towards Mrs. Alden, wore conflicting expressions; triumph, shame, and over all a half-sad, half-defiant look. Her first words were apparently irrelevant:

"I've learned much, Jennie," she said, as she folded a dozen fine thread-cambric handkerchiefs, and placed them with lingering regret in the costly box they came in; "how exquisite these are, and like the donor! Oh, yes, I was saying how much I had learned since I had sent out those tickets. I've always had a too-confiding disposition, and, while I'm not now a cynic, I've had eye-openers, plenty of them.

"Going about to different stores, riding windy days, veiled, on the cars, have given me an insight into people's character that has been both painful and profitable; I needn't tell you whom I mean, for I see you know. I'm not a sentimental fool; the only regret is self-contempt that I've been taken in by them so long, but I've never outgrown a girlish pleasure in being liked.

"You had your husband and children, and I never begrudged wives and mothers their happiness, for my life had been a healthy, happy one, and so completely am I a spinster that I believe I was born one; I've never seen the man I have ever imagined I could fancy, but there was one thing I did want."

Mrs. Alden had listened sympathetically; as Miss Letitia paused for breath she ventured to speak.

"What was that, Letitia?"

"You may laugh, Jennie, if you wish, but that was no more nor less than a trousseau!"

"What? Do you mean that——"

"I mean, and I know it will go no further, that I couldn't have a trousseau without a marriage, and that was why I sent out cards. Don't you understand, Jennie? The marriage could not take place—because there was no bridegroom at all; now it's out."

For once Mrs. Alden was surprised beyond the power of expression, but when she did recover, her merry laughter was delightful to hear and was joined by Letitia.

"What a good joke!" gasped Mrs. Jennie. "Wouldn't it make the Richmond dames open their eyes? It shall go no further, though I would like Alyn to know, if you have no objection. What would Mrs. Ponsonby say?"

"Embellish it until we wouldn't know it; but there's one thing she won't enjoy any more—expectations of sharing my fortune. I shall leave my money as a fund for old maids' trousseaux."

Hazel Harlow will be in Newcastle next week.

The Golden Dwarf

A Sensational Romance of To-Day.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "A Keeper of Secrets," "Hate, the Destroyer,"
"A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS OF "GOLDEN DWARF."

"IT is the body of Sir Christopher Dering!"

The words are spoken by a pretty girl—fair-haired, blue-eyed. She stands, horrified, by a grass-grown ditch in a country lane, out of which a great mastiff is climbing. The ditch contains the corpse of a stalwart man—a handkerchief bound over his mouth and nostrils.

Close to there is a strange figure, graceful, well-dressed, even handsome, but with the stature of a boy and the face of an adult. He carries a heavy dog-whip, and stares, fixedly, at the dead body just discovered by his mastiff, Cerberus.

The girl is Esther Carew; the dwarf, Otto Hare, the richest landowner in Derbyshire, and the mystery of Wyresdale, a village in that county. For the first time in fifteen years he has set foot in a public thoroughfare, to attract the attention of Esther, whom he has watched from his park.

Sir Christopher Dering was alive at seven o'clock the preceding day. He and his nephew, Felix, had quarrelled over the latter's love for Esther. Sir Christopher wanted Felix to make a good marriage—the birth of his little cousin Brian has put him out of the succession to the baronetcy. Felix is faithful to the penniless Esther Carew.

Much turns on the whereabouts of Felix on the night before. It appears that he was in Duchester, some miles off, whither he went on business, and spent a night at the theatre. Could he have killed the squire?

Felix in vain protests his innocence.

But the cloud of suspicion gathers around him. Meantime, the child Brian has been kidnapped, and Felix is suspected of this too. He discovers a riding whip with some peculiar marks upon it.

One day an old sailor named Foley is attacked by Otto Hare's dogs.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

MR. GEDDES DRESSES A WOUND.

"I AM sorry I offended you, Miss Connie, but, after all, there's reason in the way I look at it. If Brasher is the man, you are being unjust to me; if Brasher is not the man, you are being cruel to him."

The firm tones of Archibald Geddes trembled a little, but he twisted his thick moustache with a dauntless air, and his brown eyes surveyed reprovingly the flushed countenance of Constance Forester as she stood on the short flight of steps that descended from the parlour to the shop at the end of the counter. The pharmacy was aglow with its half-dozen of incandescent gas-jets—a radiant blot on the cool summer night that shadowed the High Street.

Connie tossed her head—it was a favourite gesture. The Scotchman ignored this sign of wilfulness. Connie bit her lip.

"Mr. Geddes," she murmured, plucking at the neat cuff of her blouse; "you are not a bit kind. As though I hadn't to think of father!"

Geddes frowned. "And I ask, Miss Connie," he retorted, "what I asked the other evening; how far is your anxiety for Mr. Forester to take you? I am aware you don't love the Inspector, but that doesn't guarantee you won't make up your mind to become Mrs. Brasher."

"Oh," cried Constance Forester; "you are horrid, Mr. Geddes. I suppose you mean I could marry someone I didn't care for."

The chemist's assistant put out his hand, clasped the fingers of the indignant speaker and drew her from her elevated position to the shelter of the screen that hid the dispensing-table.

"You've a stout heart and an unselfish spirit, Miss Connie," he said, gazing at her ardently, "and you're afraid Brasher might bring your father into this eternal murder case of his. To protect Mr. Forester by retaining your influence over the Inspector you'd grant him privilege after privilege till he'd have cause to consider you his property before you woke up to your danger."

Connie stifled a sob. "Father and Mr. Brasher were together for quite a while yesterday," she faltered, "and father was in a terrible state when the Inspector went. I—I mustn't offend Mr. Brasher; I daren't—he called to warn me that night, but you'd been so cross with me I wouldn't explain."

"Warn you about what?" inquired Geddes, and coughed to disguise the repentance in his voice.

"About letting father go to the 'Wheatsheaf,'" answered Connie; "he—he will talk so much, and Mr. Brasher says it will get us into trouble. Mr. Brasher owned he had no business to tell me—but—but he said even police-officers had their weaknesses and I was his."

Archibald Geddes whistled. "By jove!" commented the Scotchman; "he's sentimental—a thing I shouldn't have given him credit for. My poor Connie—pardon the liberty, Miss Forester, the word just slipped out, not but what it tasted better without the Miss—I am a brute, and you have a difficult game to play. Yet if—if I could but be certain you liked me a trifle more than Brasher, I would contrive to endure his visits."

Connie blushed to her pretty brows and sought, not too determinedly, to release herself. "Mr. Geddes," she whispered, "please, please, don't be foolish!"

Geddes sighed and dropped the small fingers. "I'm a great ass, that's true!" he muttered.

Constance Forester retreated a few paces and smiled bewitchingly. "How absurd" she said, "to wonder if I care for you more than for the Inspector! I wouldn't object if he never entered the shop again. And I'm sure I'm perpetually out here talking to you. So you must be very stupid or very jealous."

"I—I am!" cried the Scotchman; "I'm jealous of the ground you walk on, the air you breathe. And all the time I know I'm an idiot."

"Then you must be stupid," decided Connie, as she escaped up the adjacent stair; "awfully stupid—for you've no need to be—to be jealous."

Archibald Geddes started—the expression on Connie's bright features made him spring to her; his pulses hammering, and his tongue hugging the roof of his mouth.

Hazel Harlow will travel from town to town.

"Connie!" he began—and stopped; there was a heavy footfall in the shop behind him. He choked down a sulphurous observation and turned, while Constance Forester darted through the swing door that led to the house.

Propped against the counter and swaying unsteadily, his sunburned visage wan, his hands crimsoned, his throat bound with a rough-spotted bandanna, was Nicholas Foley. At sight of Nicholas he reeled forward and staggered into the recess at the back of the dispensary screen.

"'Scuse my running for harbour, messmate," gasped the sailor, "but I'm under a flag of distress, and I thought it was you in charge. I don't savvy a regular doctor—he'd be a heap too curious. But you can caulk this hole and rig a bit of regulation canvas over it, can't you?"

With this nautical preface he unwrapped the bandanna from his neck. Geddes recoiled; Foley's throat was well-nigh hidden by dried blood, his shirt-neck and wisp of tie clotted into a gory mass, and united to his coat-collar.

"A nip from a piratical land-shark of a prowling cur done that," added Nicholas, "set on it was—by a misbegotten imp as I'd pay out if his walls cleared the main-top of a four-master, and had a mongrel to every yard of wall. The brute's teeth missed my weasand and my big pipes, I reckon, or I'd have been a dead 'un by now. The tyke was healthy, so I won't hurt if you stop out the dust."

The Scotchman, studying the sailor in a quiet, characteristic fashion, reached to a glass jar, filled it with water from a tap at his elbow, measured into it a quantity of carbolic acid, and got a sponge out of a drawer.

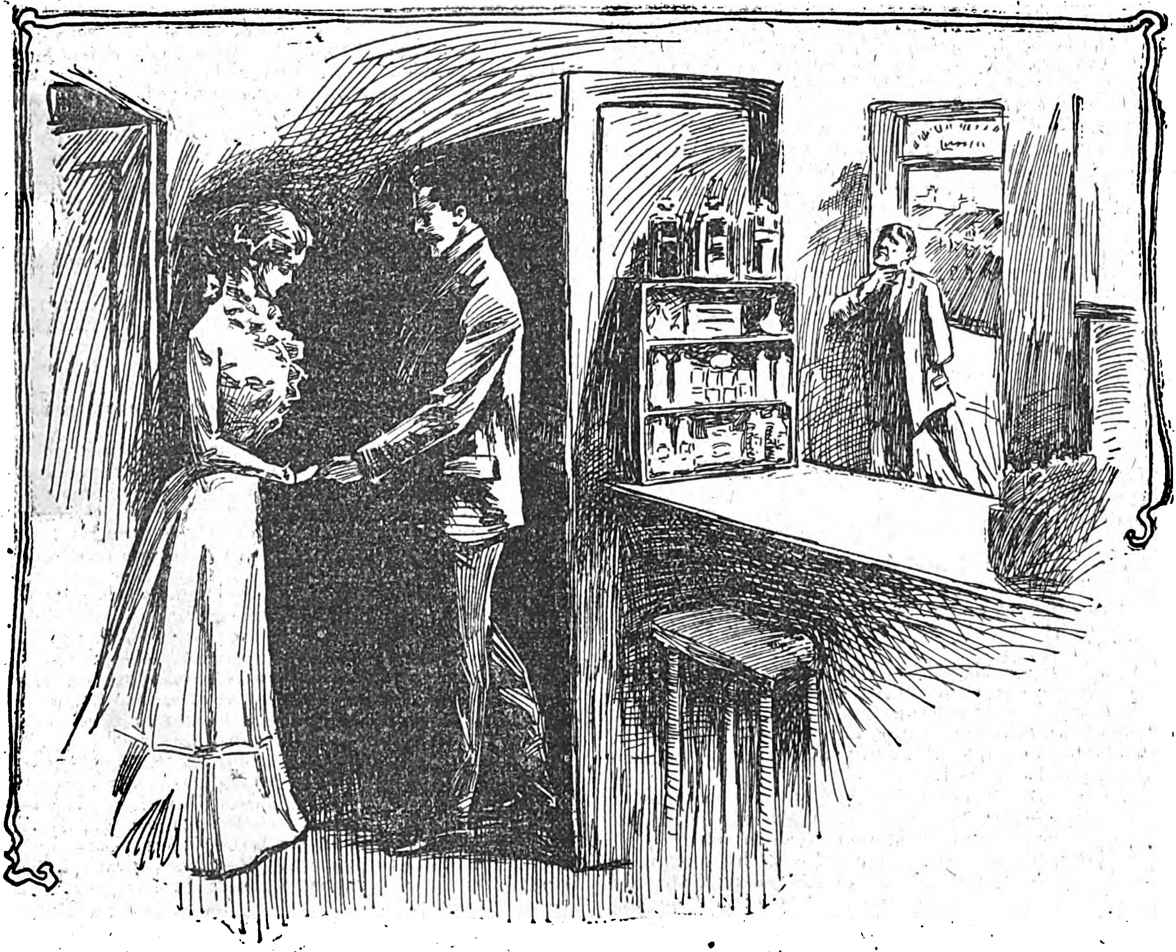
"I expect you're safe enough," he allowed, "but you ought to get a doctor as soon as possible. However, I'll wash it clean and bandage it."

"Finish the job, messmate," instructed the sailor, "I'm not going to be patched by nobody but you, you settled my malary when I first struck this cursed village, and you'll take a telling about an ill-convenient question. No, fix me up and charge me what's fair."

Thoughtfully Geddes proceeded to do as he was bidden. He sponged off the clotted blood, showing the lacerated wounds on right and left, between the tcarotid arteries and the pharynx.

"You had a narrow shave," observed the operator.

"I'll bet he fancies me stiff before this," snarled Foley, leaning back in the chair the Scotchman had placed, "he made sure the throat was torn out of me, and strolled away so's I could die at my leisure—the lily-livered ape."



"Connie," he began—and stopped; there was a heavy footfall in the shop behind him.

Tell your friends about Hazel Harlow

"Who—who was the blackguard?" queried Geddes casually.

Nicholas winked. "Keep her large, mate," he advised, as the Scotchman plied the sponge, "that's my affair. Push on with the swabbing."

Geddes shrugged his shoulders, rinsed out the sponge and laid it by. Emptying some colourless fluid into a compounding-glass, he added, by weight, a proportion of a yellow powder and mixed them.

"What's that?" desired the sailor, "smells like grog."

"Collodion," said the chemist's assistant—"gun-cotton dissolved in ether and iodoform. To skin the wounds and help them to heal quickly."

"You're the skipper for my money," remarked Nicholas, "clap it on."

Geddes selected a camel's-hair brush from his stock and painted the lotion over the lacerated surfaces of his client's tanned neck.

"Smarts a trifle," decided Nicholas, "but give me a medicine as grips. Does that finish me?"

"Not yet," answered the Scotchman, "you must be bandaged."

He slipped behind the counter, pulled out a drawer, and selected several rolls of a stout woven material, varying in width. Returning with these, he prepared and applied a couple of scientific wrappings. The sailor rose from his seat a much more comfortable person than he had entered it.

"And the price?" said Nicholas briefly, resuming his coat.

"Three and six," answered Geddes, with equal curtness.

His customer thanked him, paid, and strode to the exit, but only to halt and recross to the counter.

"Give me a hail in the morning," he said, "I'll go on the sick list for a day or two and mine's a lonely tack. And, harkee, you can bring me a doctor, Dr. Joseph Kraft, the Dutch beggar, at Mr.—Otto—Hare's."

He lent the Golden Dwarf's name a tremendous but peculiar emphasis.

"Come along with him to-morrow," pursued Foley, as he filled and lighted his briar; "be certain to come with him, messmate. Drop round about eight bells of the first dog-watch—four o'clock in the afternoon."

The sailor lowered his harsh bass to a confidential undertone.

"If you weren't there," he admitted, "I'd as lief not see him. As for the doctor, he'll toddle round when he knows who's in the sick bay—oh, yes, he make all sail for my moorings, you bet."

And with a complicated twitch of his mahogany visage, Nicholas lurched out of the Wyresdale Pharmacy.

Archibald Geddes began to dispose of his apparatus. He was absorbed by a multitude of singular reflections.

CHAPTER XXIX.

"Your Mother Confides You to Me."

"Well, any news of the fool? Don't grin at me in that confounded fashion, but come to the point. Is he dead or alive?"

Joseph Kraft laid his soft straw hat upon the writing-table in his private room at Wyresdale Park, set down near the cage of tropical birds, and contemplated the fretful pose of the Golden Dwarf. Otto Hare wore a frock coat of dark grey, and a gleaming silk. In the costume he looked more like a miniature than ever.

"My dear Hare," said the German; "you were once puzzled to decide if I were your familiar demon or your fairy godfather. You seem unable to dispense with me in either role."

Otto Hare winced. "Have your say out," he retorted, as he flung himself into the leather-covered lounge hard by; "yet please recollect that my guests will be missing me, and that I must get back to the garden."

Kraft surveyed his patron with a bland tolerance. "So far," said the German, "there is no word of Foley. If he is in his cottage, he refuses to answer, or is incapable of doing it, for I called at the wretched place about noon. I have since communicated with the police, not, of course, telling them we know who is the victim. But our conduct must be scrupulous to a degree, or we shall suffer for it."

"You will allow them to poke about there!" gasped the Golden Dwarf.

"They can overhaul the locality to their heart's content," responded Kraft; "there is nothing to suggest that the occurrence was other than an unfortunate accident. As a matter of fact, the fellow was hot on a dangerous scent, but I have rendered all safe, and, with a snare or two artistically disposed at the spot, it will seem as if Foley had been attacked when exercising the privilege you were imprudent enough to grant him. Still, if he is killed, and a coroner should cross-examine you, my poor friend, you may be much worried."

"I'll take my chance of that," answered Otto Hare; "in my case, I trust I have revenged Cerberus."

Joseph Kraft pushed a huge finger at the bars of the neighbouring cage and chirruped to his favourites.

"You are an odd person, Hare," he decided; "for the sake of a defunct mongrel you jeopardise—what do you not jeopardise; yourself, myself, the work of two years. I confess to you, when I discovered that crimson trail last night, and ascertained to what it led, I had thoughts of taking to my heels as I was. But a certain native courage prevented me, as you know."

The German faced about and linked his hands behind his back. "To be frank," he added, "your vindictiveness has not served us badly. Had Foley completed his—his terrestrial explorations, the worst might have happened. Yet it would have been cleverer to see that the job was thoroughly done."

"I haven't your cold blood, Kraft," said the Golden Dwarf, rising; "we must hope the work finished itself. Are you coming down to be agreeable? The snobs of half a county are collected on my lawn; you should not miss studying them."

Kraft settled to his writing-table, in his plump fingers a fat note-book he had produced from a safe between the windows of the apartment.

"I want to make some memoranda," he explained; "by the way, you are doing as I recommended and showing them round the——"

Hare paused irresolutely. "Is it as wise as you imagine it to be?" he queried. His small hands fidgeted with a jewelled repeater; the costly timepiece struck the second quarter after four—a faint, musical chime.

"It would be madness to neglect the chance," asserted the German; "they believe you to be an enigma and the possessor of enigmas. You must teach them to circulate commonplace explanations of your secrets. I am positive any other plan would be sheer idiocy. You would choose to open Wyresdale Park to the vulgar herd. You can but balance recklessness by audacity."

The Golden Dwarf flicked the dust from his patent-leather boots. "As you will," was his answer, and pushing the door ajar, he stepped through it. A glance backward showed him that the German had commenced to scribble—long lines of a firm black cipher fell from his pen as it travelled over the pages of the note-book. With a petulant gesture, Otto Hare went on downstairs into the sunshine and sweet air of the great lawns which girdled his splendid mansion.

Disrespectfully as he had spoken of them, the Golden Dwarf had prepared a royal reception for the guests at the garden-party, in connection with which Mrs. Carew's services had been requisitioned. A blue and white marquee fluttered its scallopped canvas just before the house; there was the usual bevy of nondescript seats about it—garden chairs, wicker lounges, and bamboo settees, screened by fixed umbrellas, like vast mushrooms.

Round these hovered a little throng of smartly-dressed women and politely bored men, engaged in the consumption of ices, exotic fruits and French sweetmeats, with champagne and claret "cups" in delicate glass, or tea and coffee in egg-shell china.

Hazel Harlow is in Sheffield this week.

In sight of the classic portico, under which the Golden Dwarf stood, an artificial lake spread out a picturesque sheet of water, and on it there plied luxurious barges, rowed by attendants in livery and freighted by trim figures in summer toilettes, or weary masculine forms in scrupulously correct attire. The music of a Hungarian band floated towards Otto Hare from an unseen angle of the lawn; it was playing a melodious Strauss waltz. He hummed the romantic theme as he took stock of his unconscious visitors.

Suddenly his gaze rested upon the object of his search—the figure of Esther Carew, slender, graceful, shy, in a sweeping gown of tucked and snowy chiffon. Her fair tresses were coiled high on her head, beneath a big white hat—all white tulle and blush roses. But her blue eyes were downcast, her sensitive mouth grave and tremulous. She comprehended but too well the significance of the glances that played about her; she was on exhibition to half a county as the probable wife of Otto Hare, the famous Golden Dwarf, the lord of Wyresdale Park and seventy thousand a year.

Otto Hare regarded the despondent expression of her young countenance for a moment or two. Then he crossed the yielding turf to her side.

"I trust, Miss Carew," he observed softly, "you are finding your afternoon in my domains a pleasant one?"

Esther shivered. The sound of his voice, thin and rather harsh, never failed to produce in her a spasm of revulsion.

"It is very beautiful, Mr. Hare," she answered, studying the rich prospect presented by the fine mansion, with its double terrace, symmetrical wings, and lush green frame of lawns and woodlands.

"I am glad you feel it so," murmured her companion, "and now, will you allow me to give you the first glimpse at something not exactly beautiful, but interesting. I told you when we met in the road that I had seen you from my watch-tower. Dr. Kraft has advised me to throw it open today; let me take you to it? Stay, I will ask your mother's permission to carry you off."

He stepped over the sward towards the active form of Mrs. Carew, who, clad in purple and black lace, was discharging her function of hostess with much diplomacy. Returning, an ill-disguised but well-bred sneer on his handsome face—for he read the ambitious widow like a book—the Golden Dwarf bowed in his graceful, foreign style.

"Your mother confides you to me, Miss Carew," he said; "I assure you I appreciate the compliment."

He moved on in the direction of the plantations at the right of the house. Reluctantly, Esther walked by him.

"Some people, I daresay," declared her escort, "have heard of my watch-tower. No doubt it is regarded as one of my mysteries. You will find the explanation of its enigma quite simple."

The sentences were casual enough, yet they seemed to be spoken with an odd amount of hesitation and anxiety. Otto Hare had interlaced his small fingers and was striding along beside the figure in the white frock. Soon there sprang to view, above a copse of low shrubs, the rounded hill, supporting, on a green slope, the fort-like structure and its taller appendage.

The Golden Dwarf did not approach the squat portal in the base of the tower, but led the way up an inclined plane of concrete to a much larger and more pretentious entrance.

This he unlocked, and, leaving it wide, as if to afford admission to any wandering member of the garden-party, motioned Esther to pass in.

She obeyed, and threading a narrow corridor and a second entrance, discovered herself under the lofty, dome-shaped roof of the tower. In the curious tapering erection there was swung, from a powerful cross-bar and girders, a huge telescope.

"You see," said Otto Hare, with a shrill, awkward laugh, "my watch-tower is nothing but an observatory. To prove the instrument genuine I will venture to show you the sun—the orb of day is hardly so fascinating as the moon, but no other object is visible at four o'clock in summer. Zorn!"

At the call a man of middle age, lean and stooping, advanced to them with a noiseless tread. His complexion was ashen-grey, his pupils dull and yet alert, his stiff hair, diversified by silver threads, was cut brush-fashion, and rose rigidly from his skull.

Prefixing an apology to Esther, the Golden Dwarf addressed the new-comer in German. He answered by a shrewd nod and a quiet salutation. Reaching to a couple of pivoted wheels, he began to adjust the great tube and the sliding roof.

This proceeding finished, Otto Hare stooped to peer through the eye-piece. Esther watched him languidly.

Suddenly she started and glanced about her. A look of amazement sprang into her face, and she strained every sense in an acute attention. An unlikely—it seemed, in that place, an impossible!—sound had fallen upon her ears.

CHAPTER XXX.

INSPECTOR BRASHER IS SURPRISED.

"PROFESSOR KRAFT, sir? I fancy he is in the garden with Mr. Hare, but I'll make sure."

"Thank you," said Archibald Geddes, and stepped into the ornate reception hall of Wryesdale Park. It was the first time the Scotchman had entered so magnificent a private dwelling. Pillars of yellow marble flanked the door-way and carried the splendid staircase, covered with inch-thick Afghan carpet, worthy of a palace.

A great window, filled by curiously-frosted glass, lighted the hall and sent long rays of afternoon sunshine to rest on huge rainbow vases and pieces of exquisite bronze. Swinging-lamps of verd-antique depended from finely-wrought brackets of metal—electric, by their sealed globes and delicate cords.

The chemist's assistant followed the liveried attendant into a small ante-chamber, no less princely in its treatment than the hall without. Here he was left alone. Costly rugs—to relieve the polished parquetry under foot—antique but luxurious furniture, rare pictures, and unique curios surrounded the observant Geddes. At length a sharp inspiration escaped his lips.

"No wonder Mr. Hare is called the Golden Dwarf," muttered the critic; "a king might be proud of a house like this."

As he spoke the words a vague impulse made the Scotchman turn—Joseph Kraft had stepped noiselessly into the apartment—his saffron pupils gleaming behind his spectacles, his perpetual smile upon his thin mouth.

"Well, my dear Mr. Geddes," he murmured, "and what can I do for you?"

Archibald Geddes coughed. "I ought to apologise, Professor," said the Scotchman, "for calling you away from the festivities I notice are in progress."

"Not at all, not at all," answered Kraft, with smooth politeness; "I was at work in my room—I do not take kindly to social pleasures. But I am quite at your service, Mr. Geddes."

Geddes acknowledged the compliment. "I am much obliged," he conceded; "but it isn't myself I represent. I have come on behalf of an odd acquaintance of mine, one Foley, who has been injured—by the bite of a dog."

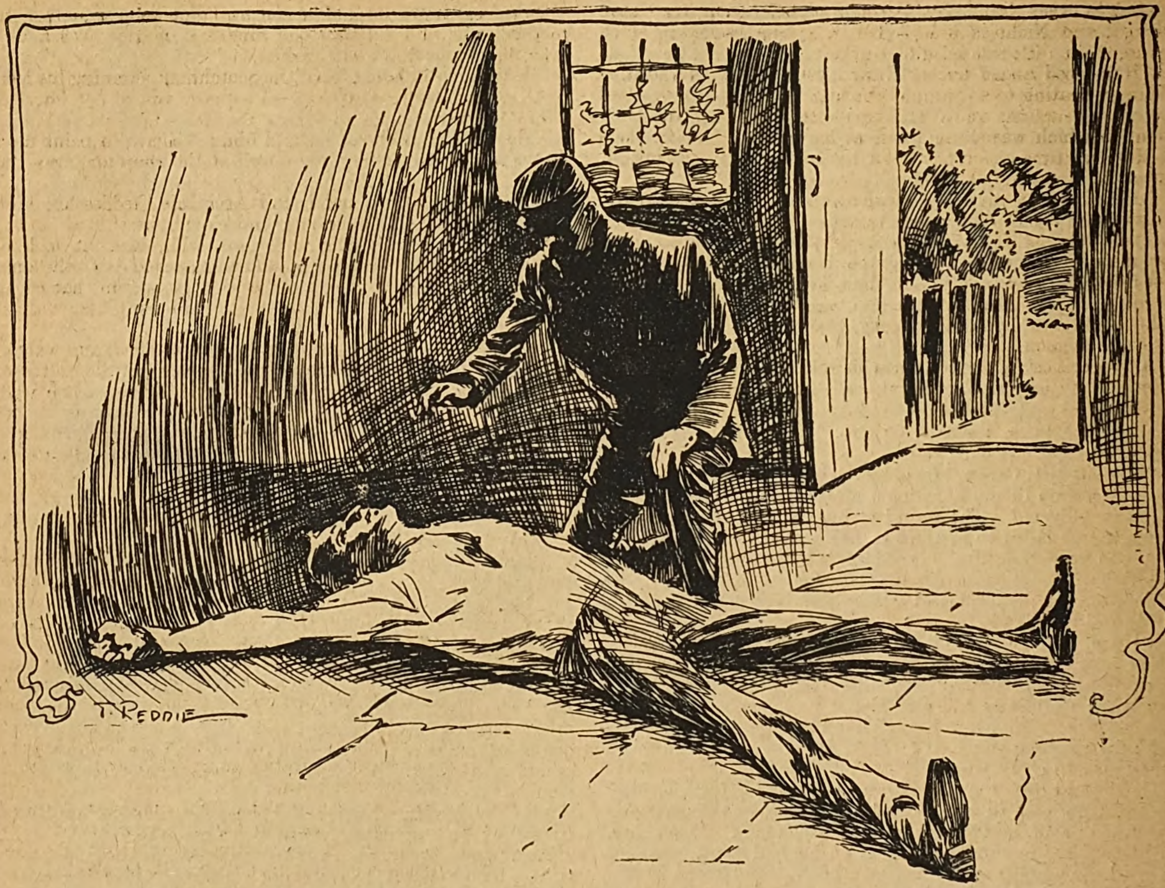
The glances of both Kraft and Geddes met, but neither flinched. Yet the deep-seated glow in the former's glittering orbs seemed to brighten and scintillate.

"He called at our shop last night," went on the Scotchman, "much lacerated about the throat, but with none of the principal arteries cut. I bandaged him, providing against septic inflammation, and advised him to consult a doctor. He replied by a request to bring you round this afternoon—he was sure you would accede to his wish for a visit when you learned who your patient was."

Joseph Kraft nodded, his air heavily sympathetic. "The poor fellow was right," he said; "I met him years ago and found him a rough diamond. I will see him by all means, in—in an hour or two."

Geddes twisted his moustache. "Foley expressed a desire that I should accompany you, Professor," he observed—"I believe I promised to do so."

Hazel Harlow will be in Newcastle next week.



The figure of Nicholas Foley lay prone upon the floor motionless.

The German looked down over the lenses of the glittering spectacles he wore, and his brows twitched. "In that case," he decided, "we will go there at once, to save your time, Mr. Geddes—the shop will need you, no doubt. Allow me just to get my hat."

He smiled amiably, withdrew, and mounted the great stair to the storey where was situated his private room. Sitting at his table, he wrote a short prescription, folded, and laid it by. Then he stalked to his safe, and produced, from an inner drawer, a sealed coffer of some foreign wood. Out of it he lifted a rude earthenware pot, containing a whitish paste.

With the tip of a chemical spoon he took a pellet of the paste, dropped it into a small phial, and poured half a dozen drops of water on it. The pellet dissolved, and the fluid became clear. The German washed the spoon, restored the pot and the wooden casket to their place, and secreted the phial in a pocket of his vest. Satisfied with this procedure, he picked up the prescription he had written, locked his room, and descended to the chamber where Archibald Geddes awaited him.

Together they walked out, traversed a corner of the lawn towards the head of the avenue, and strolled down it to the drowsy lane which opened on to the cross-roads almost opposite the by-way on whose grassy margin was perched the ruinous cottage of Nicholas Foley.

At this point Joseph Kraft paused, and brought out the slip of paper he had fetched from his room.

"I know something of Foley's constitution," said the German, "he was subject to malaria when we encountered years back. That must be taken count of. You might get this made up and join me at his place."

Geddes frowned. "I think I told you, Professor," he demurred, "that I promised Foley I'd accompany you. He appeared, if I may be so frank, to entertain a sort of reluctance to interview you without a witness."

Kraft indulged in a humorous grimace. "Doubtless," he said, "the poor fellow has lost too much blood and was fanciful. But I respect your fidelity to an agreement, Mr. Geddes. We will go to Master Foley by the High Street, and I will remain at the shop till you have compounded my prescription."

The chemist's assistant fell in with the proposition, and in silence the couple gained the threshold of the Wyresdale Pharmacy. Archibald Geddes strode to his dispensary corner—a few moments later he had put up the required mixture—in a ten-ounce bottle of the usual type.

Carrying it himself, he joined the stalwart form of the Professor, and they completed the journey to the roadside cottage.

Geddes knocked at the tarred plank entrance and observed, a second afterwards, that a dingy print curtain at one of the casements stirred—the sailor was on his guard, no doubt against a visit from the German alone. Soon the latch clicked, and Nicholas Foley, clad in a blue bedgown, stood before them. He saluted with a grin.

Hazel Harlow will travel from town to town.

"Half-speed ahead and starboard your helm," he adjured them, retreating to a cramped sleeping-chamber. They acted on his instructions and found themselves entering an apartment in which was slung a canvas hammock. On the slack of this maritime couch the sailor took his seat, motioning his guests to a bench by the wall.

"Heard about my—my accident, Doctor?" he queried; "I was sure you'd want to look me up. Not that I needed you to caulk the leak I sprung, my friend there has done as much for me. But I'm wondering about what'll become of me, not being able to do odd jobs in the village for an honest living. I think I ought to bring an action against the lubber whose tyke fouled me. What do you say, Doctor; I set a lot of store by your opinion."

A hypocritical whine stole into his voice—it arrested Geddes' attention by its palpable hypocrisy. The chemist's assistant studied the two; Kraft preserved his amiable expression, but there were beads of moisture on his pink brow and cheeks. Nicholas Foley was radiant with suppressed malice. The Scotchman felt that some mysterious duel was in progress under his eyes.

"It occurred locally then?" asked Kraft, putting his plump finger-tips together.

Foley assented. "Close to your show," he said, rubbing an unshaven jaw. Kraft affected to consider the matter.

"I should approach him for compensation," agreed the German; "but not in a hostile spirit."

"Think I'd get decent treatment?" pursued the sailor. "He'd have to fight me if he didn't. Some Duchester lawyer might help me with the case, when I'd had a chance to explain what a dashed queer case it was."

"I should have recourse to personal negotiations first," said Joseph Kraft, biting his nails; "I would lend you all possible assistance, and—and mention your difficulty to Mr. Hare—he is rich and has, in addition, local influence."

"Right you are," cried Nicholas, as he rolled into his hammock; "it's a bargain—hullo, matey, what's that?" He was looking at the bottle held by Archibald Geddes.

"A mixture Professor Kraft advises," said the chemist's assistant.

"I gave Mr. Geddes a trifling prescription," added the German, "which he made up and brought. You will require a little care if you are not to be troubled by the bite Mr. Geddes has bandaged so cleverly."

The sailor made a motion to the package. "Put it up yourself at the shop?" he demanded.

Geddes answered in the affirmative. "You'll be none the worse for it, if I may offer an opinion," said the Scotchman.

Kraft took the bottle, stripped the wrapping, uncorked it clumsily, and tasted the contents on his thumb. "It wouldn't hurt a baby," he announced; "and it's rather pleasant than otherwise. Here, Mr. Geddes, give him a dose."

He turned away, smiling, and Archibald Geddes obeyed the request. The chemist's assistant did not see that he was pocketing a minute phial—empty. When that phial had been brought from Wyresdale Park it had been full.

"Au revoir," said Joseph Kraft, as he stepped towards the threshold of the cottage; "I will look you up in a day or two, and we can discuss your prospects of compensation, Foley. Meanwhile, consider yourself under my care. To our next meeting, Mr. Geddes."

With this farewell the German parted; the saffron pupils behind his spectacles twinkled keenly—he might almost have been amused.

The sailor chuckled. "Much obliged to you, Mr. Geddes," he observed; "since that's your name—you've saved me handsome, and I'm your humble for it. Stay and have some grog."

Geddes dissented. "I must get back to the shop," was his objection. "I'll run round this evening for a chat. But I can't stop now."

Foley composed himself to sleep. "You'll be welcome," he responded; "and I'll pass the time in a snooze. When do I tipple some more of that medicine?"

"In a couple of hours," said the Scotchman, donning his hat; "expect me about ten o'clock—I suppose you're not short of grub?"

"Not much," Nicholas assured him; "barrin' it pains me a bit to eat. Don't miss your watch at the shop for me—I'm O.K."

He waved a brown hand, and Archibald Geddes left him. Foley got out of his hammock and closed the shutter at the casement—the slant beams of the westering sun annoyed him.

Some while after the Scotchman had hastened down the lane, a woman approached the wicket of the cottage and passed up the walk. Her dark hair, proud features, and smart dress were those of Judith Garland.

She raised the latch, found the door unfastened, and walked in. The kitchen was not tenanted, she peeped at the bedroom. The powerful form of the sailor, his blanket thrown to the floor, tossed in his hammock. He sat up suddenly, blinking at her.

Judith entered. "You will be surprised to see me, Mr. Foley," she began, "but I wanted to speak to you privately—about—about Mr. Dering and my brother."

Foley nodded—a dazed, uncertain gesture, as though the words she used were familiar enough but imperfectly comprehended. His visitor drew nearer.

"You arranged with my brother," she said, "to keep silence on the matter of Mr. Dering's presence in Wyresdale the night of his uncle's death. Well," she added, with a restrained excitement, "I wish you to speak out, do you hear?—to speak out and ruin him. I will give you five pounds to go to Inspector Brasher and say all you know. You won't betray me, of course, or Neal, but be sure you convince him about Mr. Dering. Be cautious and crafty, and you need say very little."

Foley slipped to the floor, showing his teeth in a horrible grin, just as Judith, her eager adjuration completed, produced from her purse a crisp new five-pound note.

"Kraft," he cried, snatching at half of a suggestive word in her sentence; "Kraft! Yes, you Dutch beggar, what have you got in them boxes? I see you moseying about the forehold last night; it was my watch on deck. Be reasonable, you fool, and I won't split."

Judith sprang to the door of the bedroom, alarmed by his demeanour. He made a vicious dash at her.

"Come from Kraft, do you?" he yelled, with a rapid change in his delirium. "Then make all sail back and tell him he's to pay up double. Think I'll be gnawed cheap by his infernal imp's mongrels? Not by a durned sight—not for every Kraft in Christendom! Pay, you Dutch swab, pay!"

The sailor's speech ceased abruptly, and he gasped, clutching at his throat.

Terrified, Judith darted from the apartment and fled, by way of the meadows and the adjacent footpath, in the direction of Dering House. Her plan to avenge herself upon Felix Dering had encountered a strange and unexpected check.

Had she glanced back when she reached the knoll at the top of the footpath, she would have perceived the tall outline of Inspector Brasher—far off, yet deliberately approaching the cottage she had left in so precipitate a fashion.

Some minutes later, Michael Brasher threaded the garden walk and knocked at the plank door. It swung before him, and the Inspector mounted the step. As Judith had done, he peered into the kitchen, then into the sleeping-chamber.

An exclamation broke from him—the figure of Nicholas Foley lay prone upon the floor, contorted yet motionless. Mr. Brasher hurried to lean over it. The sailor was warm, but no breath stirred his deep chest—death had seized him in an almost frightfully sudden grasp.

A footfall on the threshold of the chamber made the Inspector face about. The new arrival was Felix Dering!

John Gile, Monomaniac.

By SCOTT L. LITCHFIELD.

The incident I am about to relate came to my knowledge when I was first taken on as a partner in the then flourishing law firm of Routledge, Kerr and Co. Since that time the then once great firm has outlived its prosperity, and has been pushed into the background by younger and more enterprising houses.

We had offices in Leadenhall Street, in a tall, gaunt old building, whose windows looked out on the busy street with a stare of superiority. Long, dusty rooms and sparsely furnished offices presented an uninviting aspect to those who had no particular business with us; but we were of considerable importance in those days, and our pigeon-holes were stuffed full of the secrets of people of quality.

Mr. Routledge had been very good to me, and partly to my attention to business and partly to his indulgence, I owed my advancement until at last I was acknowledged as one on the firm.

John Gile had long been a client of Routledge Kerr and Co., and we younger ones knew much about him, from the stories which went through the office.

John Gile was the son of an enormously wealthy manufacturer of Leeds. He had been educated to that extent which wealth can educate, and at last had inherited his father's enormous fortune. His education, like that of the majority of wealthy men's only sons, had not been in any particular direction, and he had grown up as he chose, imbibing that which pleased him best, until at last, now that he was a middle-aged man, whose "future" was already on the wane, he had earned the nickname of "monomaniac," on account of certain idiosyncrasies which I shall describe later. He had been a wanderer, long years elapsing between the short scraps of news which would come from him—now in Egypt, now in India or Australia, or from some equally far-away foreign country. Sometimes queries were made concerning his whereabouts, but not often, for he had few acquaintances, and no friends apparently, unless the firm could be called his friend. He had been here and there, but mostly in places famous for their artistic past and the examples of unexcelled art which still existed in them—some of it placed on exhibition for the benefit of everyone, and some of it buried in the country villages undiscovered by the connoisseur. For John Gile was a collector, a searcher, a finder, and a buyer all in one. Those who knew him said his opinions on matters of artistic merit were second to none, and spoke of his own private collection in tones of awe, as something of great value and beauty. He was, in short, a peculiar old man, whose heart was cold with the frost of years, and whose mind was wrapped up in admiration of his own hobby. He collected all sorts of rare and beautiful things, but cameos were his idols. Let him hear of a rare or curious specimen, be it ever so far away, and he was never at peace until he held it in his hand; and if it was a gem, never satisfied until he could call it his own. The history of cameos was to him as the A B C is to a schoolboy, and when the cockles of his heart were warm he would discourse learnedly on the beautiful tints of this specimen or the delicate workmanship of that. It was he who purchased at a fabulous price a part of the famous Gonzaga collection, and it was said his home in Warwickshire was a veritable museum of art; so you may imagine my satisfaction when one morning Mr. Routledge called me into his private office and said:

"Mr. Burgoyne, there are some matters of importance concerning the property of John Gile on which we must have his opinion immediately; and as he has at last returned to his home, for good I hope, Mr. Kerr, I think it would be best for you to run down and see him about it."

"All right, sir," I said, and immediately made myself ready for the long journey. As the business which brought about my acquaintance with John Gile does not in any respect concern this story, I will not enlarge upon it. Suffice it to say, after a long and tiresome journey, covered with dust and wearied by the jolting of the cars, and the jostling of the crowd, I arrived at the little town of M——. I procured a conveyance, and in the dusk of a late October afternoon was driven to the door of Gile's house.

The house, viewed from the outside, was an unpretentious affair, and gave little evidence of the wealth of the occupant; a low, rambling old structure, betokening some age, and composed of all sorts of architecture, ancient and modern, and covered at the front by creeping vines whose leaves had begun to change in colour as the evenings of autumn had crept upon them. I made my way up to the massive door, and, ringing the bell, stood waiting upon the stoop. A motherly-looking substantial woman, who afterwards proved to be the housekeeper, opened the door, and upon reading my card, said:

"Oh, yes, Mr. Burgoyne, Mr. Gile is expecting you, and has given orders that you should be shown to you room immediately. We dine in half an hour."

And bustling along before me she led the way up a broad carven flight of stairs to a wide and spacious chamber, and leaving me with a cheery admonition that dinner would be served shortly, hurried away to attend to her household duties. Finishing my toilet, I made the best of my way to the lower floor, and opening a door on the right of the hallway, found myself in a lofty room, the walls of which were covered with pictures and the niches and corners were filled with cabinets and bits of statuary. Before a blazing fire on one side of the room sat the man whose personality we at the office had often wondered over. He glanced up at my entrance, and, rising, advanced to meet me. John Gile had been a handsome man, and the inroads of age had not sufficed to eliminate all the attractions from his person. A clear, dark eye, a firm mouth, and the wide and heavy nose so common to lovers of art, were the most prominent features. He greeted me cordially.

"Mr. Burgoyne, I am pleased that Routledge, Kerr and Co. have respected my inclination for agreeable people, and sent you to see me."

He said this with so much earnestness that I was forced to believe that he meant what he said.

We dined, and after dinner, at which he proved a most agreeable and entertaining companion, we went back to the big room in which I had first met him. We lighted our pipes, and settled ourselves before the blazing fire, when he said

"Judging from your conversation at dinner, I should say you are a man who is somewhat interested in matters of art, and know something about them."

Thanking him for the implied compliment I acquiesced.

"If that is the case," he continued, "I will show you some of my cameos."

At the voicing of the word his whole manner changed: he enthused from the plain commonplace man of travel to a devotee of a goddess whose worship always is complete,

"Mr. Gile," I said, "I shall consider myself extremely favoured if I may see even a part of the famous collection I have heard so much about, for I am, as you have guessed, an ardent though uneducated admirer of the beautiful."

"Say no more," he returned; "I shall be delighted to show you my treasures."

Reaching a little steel-bound chest from the table which stood at his elbow, he opened it with a key of intricate workmanship, and commenced to lay out tray after tray of unique and wonderful gems. Onyx and pietra dura, lapis luzuli and shell, the sardonyx red of the Bull's Mouth, and the delicate pink of the Queen's Conch, exquisite and varied in detail and beauty.

"This," he said, "is an excellent Saolini, the lines of which are finer than a hair." He laid it down, and, picking up another, continued: "And here we have a Girometti of the first water, while this Giovanni Dies, with its wonderful colouring, is especially worthy of notice."

"I suppose you have your favourite, Mr. Gile?" I questioned.

His eyes lit up as he said:

"Oh, yes, to be sure, and I will show it to you;" and reaching carefully into the bottommost tray, he drew forth a specimen, the possession of which I envy him to this day. It was of Chaldean onyx, the background of a heavy delft blue, and the upper strata of pure and creamy white. The stone itself was a gem, but the carving—oh! the carving!—shall I ever forget it?

A face of power, infinite, yet hampered by a touch of sensuality, looked out at me from the delicate sculpture; clear cut, and every linament standing out in an individuality whose likeness I had never witnessed. Oh! the beauty, the strength of it, and such a little thing, scarce an inch in diameter, and half as much in thickness, yet all the passions and ambitions of human life gathered together within its outlines.

I sighed as I handed it back to the man who, all the time I had held it, had watched me with jealousy in his every expression.

"You are fortunate," I said; "it must have cost you an enormous sum."

"Well," he said, "it cost me these," and he held up his right hand, which was minus the first and second fingers. I suppose my face expressed my curiosity, for he said:

"I see you are interested, and if you care to hear how I came by this stone, I will tell you the story.

"In the year 1855, shortly after the death of Belline, il Passatore, who had been the scourge of Naples for years, his wife, Ysa, a most remarkable woman, by the way, had been driven into Sicily; there, at the head of a band of Cammora, which had degenerated into a herd of bloodthirsty banditti, she was terrorising the city of Syracuse and its environs. I happened to be in that locality, searching as usual for what could be found in the way of cameos.

"Sicily, you know, is the home of shell work, and some of my most beautiful and valued specimens I have come across in the cabins of the country folk of that beautiful country. No doubt my name and condition were well known to the people thereabout, although I was not aware of the fact.

"One afternoon my landlady came to me as I sat beneath the great lime tree in the courtyard, and, bowing low, said:

"'A gentleman to see you, Excellency.'

"'Who is he?' I asked.

"For answer she handed me a card on which was written, 'Guiseppe Felozzi.'

"'Show him in,' I said.

"The woman bowed, withdrew, and shortly returned, ushering in a tall, dark stranger, whose attire convinced me he was a man of the world. His face was Italian, his eyes black as sloes, the eyebrows meeting above, and his speech suave and correct.

"Saluting me, he said:

"'Signor Gile, I have heard of your penchant for old-time gems, as who has not, and have that to tell which may prove of interest to you.'

"He said it so nicely, I was convinced of his good-nature, and asked him to sit down and smoke. This he did, and after lighting his cigarette, which he preferred to roll himself after the usual Italian fashion, he said:

"'I am an admirer of these beautiful things myself, but alas! my means are not equal to my desires, so——' and he shrugged his shoulders expressively.

Hazel Harlow will be in Newcastle next week.

"'There is a certain signora,' said my visitor, 'living in the suburb of L——, the sole surviving member of a once powerful family, who has been reduced to the disposal of her personal jewels. This delicate task she has confided to me as a trusted friend. Among the jewels is an onyx of Chaldea, carved by the hand of Meldhor, the Babylonian, bearing the head of Baaltis. This treasure came into her possession through a long line of succession dating from the time of the Medici, whose people brought it from Egypt. It is superb, it is unique, magnifique! Alas! that I may not own it myself; but my entire possessions are not one half of its value, so, signor, I offer you this opportunity.'

"I did not hesitate. Madmanlike, I leaped to my feet and breathlessly said: 'Let us go to it. Come, show me the way.'

"The Italian smiled.

"'You are enthusiastic, signor; but come, it is not so far.'

"He arose, and leading the way, we passed through the house. In the hall I picked up a blackthorn which I carried more from habit than from need.

"Conversing pleasantly, Signor Felozzi led the way up out of the village into the hills which surround it; but I must have proved a sorry companion, for my mind was full of the wonder which I was to see; yet I had time to think, as we left the town, that Thomas Hurd, the only man I know in all Europe, was expected to arrive in Syracuse that afternoon, and I should not be there to receive him. But that did not bear a penny-weight against the fact that I was to see the dream of my lifetime—a genuine Babylonian cameo—and besides I would return shortly.

"For an hour we journeyed, and I was beginning to be impatient when my conductor said:

"'Ah! we have arrived,' and almost before I was aware we had turned a corner, and, standing in a cleft of the hill I perceived a substantial house, whose portals were open, but which seemed to be deserted. It had evidently been a villa of some importance in its time, for over the door was emblazoned a coat of arms, though time and countless storms had nearly obliterated it. We reached the threshold.

"'Enter,' said Felozzi.

"I stepped through the doorway, and found myself in a hall of goodly dimensions. The door closed behind me and Felozzi stepping in front of me, said:

"'Signor, you were an easy victim!'

"Like a flash the memory of Ysa and her band of robbers swept through my mind, and I realised that I had been trapped. Feeling that resistance was hopeless, for Guiseppe had already placed a silver whistle to his lips, and had blown a summons to his minions, still, I backed up against the wall, and holding my cudgel at tiercel, awaited developments. There was a sound of opening doors, and a hurry a feet, and I was surrounded by a crowd of dark-browed ruffians, each carrying in his belt a weapon of some sort.

"'Signor,' said Felozzi, 'do not be foolish. Submit quietly, and no harm shall come to you.'

"'I believed you once and I will not again. You are a liar, Guiseppe!' I cried, lost in a fury of rage.

"His face darkened, and the sinister brows contracted until his face was wrinkled and distraught.

"'Seize him, Antinne!' he cried, 'here you, Luigi, Bartholomew, quick, disarm him, that he may no longer taunt you.'

"They rushed, and I met them (I had learned the quarter-staff at Rugby), point down, then, with a quick one, two, three, so many of them sprawled on the paved floor.

"That made them ugly, and those still standing drew long wicked knives at their belts and rushed again. I guess it would have fared badly with me if something hadn't happened which, so far as I was concerned, was entirely unexpected. I had my back against the wall, my club aloft, the ruffians grouped about me looking for an opening. Guiseppe was crying them on, and things looked bad for me, when a side door was thrown open, and a tall woman with flowing hair rushed into the hall with a two-handed sword in her hands. She came to a full stop when her eyes fell on us, and cried:

"'Guiseppe, what means this? Must I be forced to take the brand to preserve quiet about my own apartments? Get thee hence!'

"No answer, no movement!

"Quick as a thought the great sword went up. I would not have thought that she could do it, and darting forward, she brought it down upon the outstretched arm of the foremost bandit, so that his severed arm fell with a thud to the pavement, and the man stood a full minute before he spun round and dropped beside his arm.

"Again the sword went up, but I stood alone before her, for all the rest had vanished; then I said a hasty prayer, for I thought my time had come, I having no chance with so formidable a weapon.

"'Who are you to disturb me, Ysa Cammorista?' and not waiting for an answer, down came the mighty blade; but I leaped aside, and the sword, catching on my blackthorn, shore it into two pieces.

"'Now,' said I, 'is the time,' but she did not strike again. Looking up at her I saw her mood had changed.

"'Follow me,' she said; and turning her back to me, she went through the still open doorway. Meekly I obeyed.

"She was still walking away from me when I entered the door behind her, and did not pause until she had returned the sword to its place on the wall whence she had snatched it in her fury; then, seating herself in an immense carved chair, at the farther end of the room, she gazed at me where I stood by the door.

"She beckoned to me and I advanced; but the room was a long one, and before I stood at the foot of the throne I had a chance to scrutinise this strange woman. She was beautiful beyond a doubt—I, as a connoisseur in art, felt sure of it—but—there was no soul in her face; her eyes looked forth from their portals speculatively calm, notwithstanding the outbreak of a moment since.

"'John Gile,' she said, 'you were very near to death, do you know it?'

"I bowed.

"'Ransom, John Gile, ransom,' she continued. 'What say you? Ten thousand pounds is the figure, and perchance your friends neglect to send it, so then will I send them a remembrance of you in the shape of an ear, a nose, or a finger.'

"I stared; I had not anticipated anything like that.

"You called Guiseppe a liar. You did him an injustice, signor, for that which he told you is true; and neither am I a liar, as you will find. See, here is the gem,' and loosening her bodice, she drew forth and handed me the cameo, still warm with its contact with her bosom.

"Guiseppe had not lied; and I could have clasped him to my bosom in thankfulness, evil plight as I was in, at the sight out. I fondled it, I caressed it; I carried it to my lips, little dreaming its evil secret, while that inexorable woman gazed at me, a smile of scorn at my enthusiasm wreathing her lips.

"'And yet,' she said, 'if your friends prove faithful, and send your ransom, then will I give it to you!'

"I stood in amazement. Who could have imagined such a proposition? Ten thousand pounds! The Baaltis cameo! What could I do?

"'I will tell you what I will do. I will write a note to Thomas Hurd, Syracuse. He surely must have arrived. I will tell him to send the money. The paltry money! How can it compare with so priceless a treasure?'

"I did it. They locked me in a strong-walled room where I had nought to do but feed my mind on the memory of that one look at the beautiful gem. I waited a week. No word from Syracuse! I waited another week. Still no word. What could it mean?

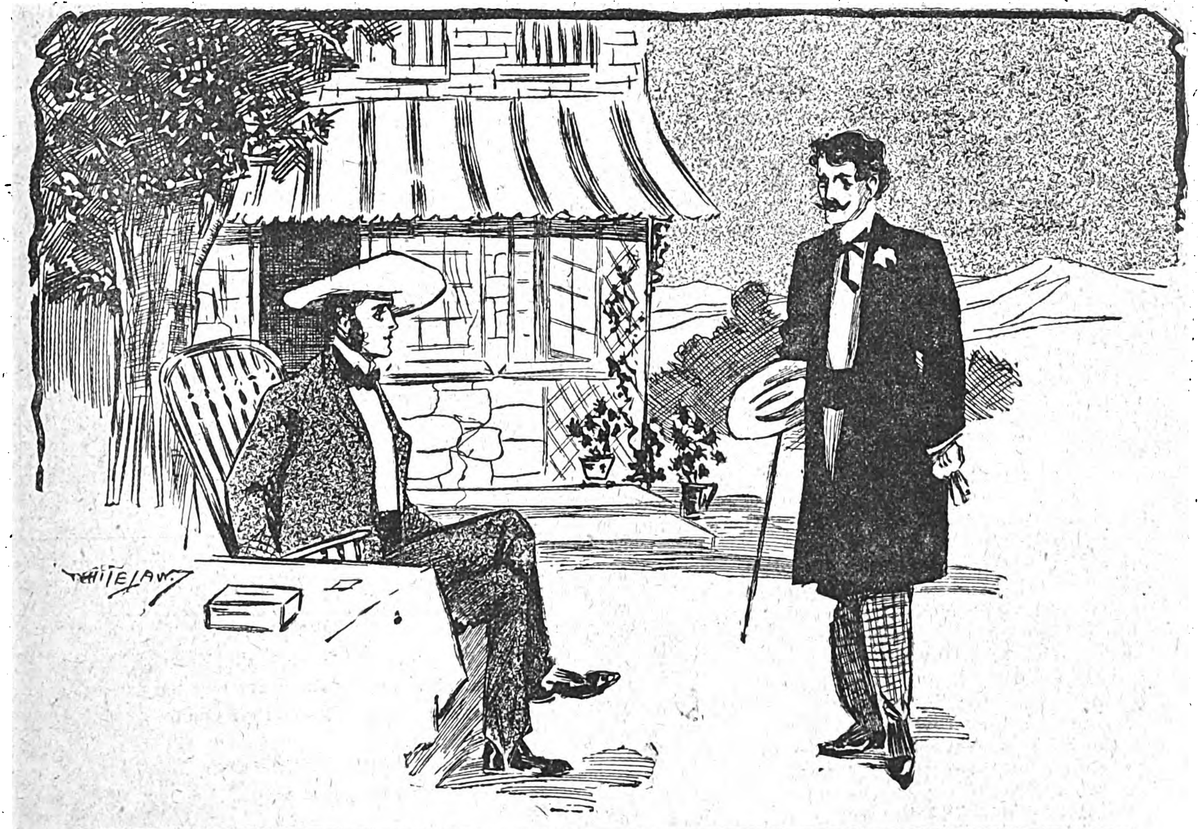
"Then they cut off the index finger of my right hand," he held up his hand, "and sent it to the city.

"Gods above! how I longed to get at the cowardly curs; but in their superiority of numbers they held me over the block while the butcher did his work. Another week, and silence; then they took the next finger and sent it. Curses on them! The power which strengthens man in times of adversity alone knows how I endured it! And still the time fled by, and the third week was almost at an end, when one night—it rained that night in Sicily—I heard my door unlocked, and, rising from my couch in the corner, stood face to face with Ysa. Her beautiful figure was draped in black, and she held her light aloft; her features were troubled, I thought. That thought maybe the indulgence which comes from the contemplation of beauty. Be it as it may, she stood before me, and around her neck was the chain which held my idol.

"'Signor Gile,' she said, 'another week is almost gone, and as we have had no word from your friend, it marks the loping off of another of your members. Still, I am much inclined to save you this further humiliation. How easy for me to give you freedom! My heart has been touched by your courage and fortitude. Will you accept freedom, and pledge your word to secrecy concerning my whereabouts? Will you?'

"Freedom was before me.

"'Let me look at the cameo, Cammorista.' Quietly she drew out the bauble, and as its beauty broke upon my vision, its glorious workmanship, its subtle lines, its exquisite colours, my mind was made up



"Signor Gile, I have heard of your penchant for old time gems."

Tell your friends about Hazel Harlow.

"'May I take the cameo, Ysa Cammorista?' I asked boldly, for I felt she was in a gentle mood, and perhaps might sell it to me. For a moment she gazed at me, and then came her answer:

"'Nay!'

"'Then I will wait,' I said quietly.

"'Thou art a fool!' she said, 'and still it is well worth waiting for a long time.' She held it close to her eyes, turning it over and over in her hand, when suddenly she exclaimed:

"'Corpo di Bacco! What is this?' I looked up, but none too quick to see the terrible thing which followed.

"As she held it close before her face she touched the delicate spring which old Melchior had concealed so cleverly among its dainty convolutions, hundreds of years before, the head of Baaltis flew back, a red consuming flame poured forth; she uttered a hideous cry, and clutching her eyes fell to the floor. The room was filled with phosphoric fumes, the atmosphere was horrible. I groped and stumbled to the door, and threw it open; a flood of fresh air poured in and dissipated the racuous vapours, and the opening of the door showed the way to liberty. But I paused. Ysa still lay prone upon she floor. From her grasp I wrenched the cameo, still reeking with the foul fumes of phosphorus. I stepped acoss my prison's threshold and listened. All was silent. I stepped out entirely, and tiptoed along the hallway, pausing here and there to see if I had been discovered, forward again until I reached the door. Then carefully a couple of hundred paces—they must have slept the sleep of the stones that night—until at last I drew a breath of relief and broke into a run. How I ran through the darkness and rain, over rocks and through ditches, now up, now down, until the welcome lights of Syracuse rewarded my straining eye. Hurrying through the city, I entered my house. The good old housekeeper, with many pious ejaculations and thanks to the saints for my return, stared at me as one who sees a ghost.

"'The Signor Hurd!' she exclaimed, in answer to my impatient question, 'why he but arrived to-day, and was so fatigued he went immediately to bed. He did not even look at his mail.'

"'The mail? Oh, yes, give it to me. Donna Marie, I will hand it to him.'

"'Ah! thank you,' she said, as she passed me the numerous packages and letters.

"I only gave him part of them before leaving Syracuse the next morning, carrying with me the Baaltis cameo, whose secret cavity was thoroughly cleansed of the substance which no one knows who had put it there, or how many years ago."

"How about the flame, Mr. Gile?" I asked.

"Well," he said, handing me the cameo again, "you will find that besides the cavity beneath the white head of Baaltis, the golden setting which surrounds the entire stone is hollow. This tiny canal had an opening into the larger cavity, and was filled with oxygen. The spring which opens the top cover also opens the canal, and the pure oxygen rushing forth, instantaneously ignited the piece of phosphorus, thus generating the horrid vapour whose agency led me to freedom."

He paused and re-lit his pipe, then continued

"In the spring I was at Rome during the carnival. A woman, bent and drawn and blind, stopped and asked for alms. It was Ysa Cammorista."

TOM THE HOOLIGAN.

TOM THE HOOLIGAN was a terror to the neighbourhood which he honoured with his presence.

Accompanied by choice spirits of his own calibre, he nightly paraded the streets in the slum which he called home. It was not a promising looking vicinity; but the inhabitants, despite their deadly poverty, were peaceful souls enough; and Tom and his gang created a nightly panic amongst them.

Old people and young girls were special prey of the Hooligans. They were nightly treated to rough horseplay, which usually ended in a street fray of more or less severe description, wherein respectable working men of the district confronted the Hooligans, and were more often than not, defeated by them.

Tom was a born leader. In another class of life and in more favourable circumstances he might have arrived at considerable fame. As it was, his gang adored him, and would have followed him with confidence and courage wherever he might choose to lead them. He led them into divers strange paths, and the terror in the neighbourhood grew apace.

The police were on the alert; but Tom had been accustomed from his cradle to eluding even that astute body, and though members of his gang had at one time and another fallen into the clutches of the law, Tom remained at large.

He was a gaunt, lean young fellow, of shambling gait, and shabby appearance, with, on the other hand, certain keenness of his eyes, and alertness in his bearing, which perhaps accounted for his undisputed leadership.

Tom the Hooligan was a masterful individual. It was a misfortune for the community that his energies were so unfortunately misdirected.

The doings of his gang came to a climax on a certain afternoon when London went mad over some of its returning troops. The occasion was the Hooligans' opportunity, and they made the most of it—with the result that many heads were broken, and other more or less serious injuries inflicted upon harmless citizens.

But the harmless citizens were not alone in their affliction; Tom himself was knocked down in one of the rushes which he had ordered, and when he was with difficulty extricated from the trampling of the mob he was found to be in no condition for the police-station. There was nothing for it, but to put him into an ambulance and trundle him off to the nearest hospital, the burly policeman who accompanied him relieving his feelings by making many incisive remarks to his victim as the they went on their way.

At the hospital gates some of the gang who had walked disconsolately beside him were turned back, but not before Tom had called to them:

"Come and see me in this 'ere bloomin' 'orspital. We'll make the coves wot's 'ere sit up a bit. They won't want none of us agin!"

Tom's tone was defiant, and the policeman thought it advisable to drop a whispered hint to the house surgeon as to the ungovernable nature of the patient he was admitting.

"Nobody can't do nothing with them 'Ooligans," he said despondingly. "I'm sorry to a' brought 'im in, sir—he'll give you a deal o' trouble; but there warn't nothing for it."

"Oh, it's all right," the surgeon answered cheerily. "Ward discipline will be a little experience for the young gentleman," and he glanced across at Tom, who lay scowling on the ambulance, aware that he was being discussed, but unable to catch the words.

Tom's head was dressed, his other wounds attended to in the surgery, the storm of bad language, groans, and cries he hurled at the house surgeon making that young gentleman say pleasantly: "Look here, my fine fellow, you'll have to curb your tongue a bit in the ward. Sister doesn't allow that sort of thing."

"Sister!" Tom snorted. "'Oo's Sister? I ain't goin' to do nothin' to please a bloomin' lot o' wimmen—not me! Don't you make no mistake about that!"

The house surgeon smiled pleasantly again, but said nothing.

"I ain't one as can be easy made to do what I don't choose," Tom muttered sulkily, as he was lifted on the stretcher. "There will be some in the ward sorry as ever they see me afore I'm done," he added darkly. "No bally wimmen don't manage Tom the Hooligan, not much!"

The end of this speech was lost upon his hearers, as the stretcher was hoisted up and carried across the courtyard into the big accident ward.

The lights of the ward as he was borne into it dazzled Tom's eyes. He caught a glimpse of lines of beds, and heard a clear voice say:

"No. 17 bed, please," and his next impression was of being laid upon something singularly soft and pleasant, and covered with a blanket. Tom had never in the course of his life lain upon a bed of this description before, his customary resting-place was a bundle of shavings and straw; and his aching limbs sank gratefully into the comfortable mattress. Screens stood round the bed, and after a few moments somebody came round the screens and stood beside him, a small lady, in a dark blue dress, with spotless cap and apron, and a pair of quiet grey eyes which twinkled a little as they met Tom's defiant glance.

She held a paper in her hand, and a pen.

"Will you tell me your name and address, please?" she said.

Tom's first instinct was to snort and decline. It was really to his own intense surprise that he found himself meekly giving the information wanted.

"Nurse is coming now to wash you," she said next. "After that, I daresay you will get a nice sleep."

"Wash me!" Tom jerked himself up in bed, thereby giving himself excruciating pain. "I don't want no washing. I——" he was about to launch forth on a stream of profanity, but the grey eyes that watched him seemed, as he afterwards expressed it, "ter take all the bloomin' sperrit out of a chap;" and he fell silent.

The small lady smiled at him. Her smile was very charming.

"Oh," she said, "you will feel ever so much more comfortable after nurse has washed you. It is a rule here, you know; and I am sure you will understand that we have to do what our leaders tell us."

The stress on the you appealed to Tom. She knew, at any rate, that he was accustomed to lead people. An answering smile stole over his sulky visage.

Tell your friends about Hazel Harlow.

"Well," he said loftily, "I don't mind letting her have a go at me."

Perhaps Nurse Blake did not altogether enjoy the operation of washing the redoubtable Hooligan. His remonstrances were many; his language at times more forcible than polite; and when she had finished her thankless task and removed the screens, she said:

"Well, Seventeen, I don't know what Sister will say to you."

"'Oo cares what Sister says?" he shouted after her "'Oo is Sister?"

The man in the next bed looked at him and grinned.

"You'll soon find that out, my man. Sister's the boss o' this ward, and she don't stand no nonsense—you make no mistakes about it."

Tom laughed ironically and loudly.

"Not quite so much noise, here," said a soft voice, beside him—a voice that was very soft, and yet—and yet—Tom felt most unaccountably like a naughty little boy. He glanced up angrily. His eyes met again those cool grey ones with their twinkle of humour.

"I like everybody to be as cheerful and jolly as possible," the soft voice went on, "but I am sure you will understand, Seventeen, that we must not have noisy laughing and talking. One or two people are very bad in here, you see. I am sure you will give us no trouble."

Her eyes were full of faith in him, which surprised Tom. Nobody had ever believed anything good of him as far as he could remember in the whole course of his life. He had always lived up to the reputation of being a dog with a bad name.

"I don't want to give no trouble," he muttered—which was odd, considering his dark threats of upsetting the ward. "I only wants ter be left in peace."

"Yes; you must have a good sleep now. Only," all at once a masterful ring came into that soft voice, "remember, Seventeen, there must never be any more bad language whilst you are in here. No manly man ever swears at a woman, or before a woman."

Tom gasped. His eyes fell before the grey eyes that watched him. He squirmed uneasily. A hand that seemed to him marvellously soft was laid upon his hand.

"I know I can trust you," she said, and her voice had lost the masterfulness, and was very gentle again. Her smile stirred a chord in Tom's heart that had never before vibrated. Something in his throat choked him. He shut his eyes—well, because they suddenly stung with an unaccustomed sensation. Perhaps Sister saw and understood. She moved quietly away.

Tom opened his eyes cautiously and watched her. She was so very small, that he could have knocked her down easily with one of his great hands. A hot flush flamed over his face; he looked thoughtfully at his big red fist on the white sheet, and then back at the small figure walking down the ward.

"Well, you might have knocked me down with a feather!" he articulated aloud. "Ain't she a fair treat?"

"You're right there, mate," the man in 18 bed said. "She's a rare 'un, she is. See 'er manage this 'ere great Ward o' men. It makes you fair sit up, don't it—and such a little 'un, as she is, too?"

"That's what takes me," Tom answered slowly. "She ain't got a commandin' presence, in a manner o' speakin'—she've only got something in 'er eye, ain't she?"

"She's a real lady, she is," Eighteen said warmly. "She've a feelin' 'eart, and a understandin' one as well. She ain't one as will stand any nonsense."

That fact soon became patent to Tom; yet it remained a mystery to him why he gave in to her, as he expressed it. The extraordinary thing was that he, who was accustomed to sprinkle every sentence he spoke with language of a lurid and sanguinary description, now pulled himself up instantly if the mildest oath came to his lips.

"Most funny thing, ain't it?" he confided to his neighbour. "Seems as if something rose up inside of yer and stopped yer sayin' things when she's about. Funny thing, too—fer she's only a little bit of a thing, as yer might say."

Yes, she was only a little bit of a thing—that was true enough; but she knew how to manage a ward of thirty-two men. Something in its peaceful atmosphere kept them good, she averred; but whether it was really that, or whether it was the presence of soft-voiced, gentle-handed women always about them, or whether it was Sister's own personality, is impossible to say. The fact remained. No bad language was ever heard in Accident Ward at St. Chad, and even that outrageous young person, Tom the Hooligan, was becoming subdued.

On his first Sunday in the hospital several members of his gang rollicked up to the gates, with a pleasurable expectation of "making a rare old shine" within the walls. Only three of them were admitted by the big porter, whose word of advice as to behaviour they passed by in scorn and with protruding tongues. They talked loudly as they crossed the courtyard, and they were heard to boast that they "warn't goin' out of the bally orspital without giving it a taste o' the rough side o' their fists."

Still talking loudly, they jostled other visitors through the door of the ward, and were proceeding between the rows of beds, with their hats on their heads and a general air of jauntiness, when their progress was suddenly stopped.

Sister, coming from the other end of the ward, met them and blocked their path, standing still and surveying them quietly from head to foot. Her gaze lingered longest on their hats. They grew restive under it, and their hands went instinctively to their heads.

"Thank you," she said, her eyes twinkling; "yes, that is what I meant. No man comes in here with his hat on."

The Hooligans' hats were off before she had finished speaking. Silent awe held them dumb.

"And I must ask you to go quietly to the patient you want to see, please," she went on. "I expect it is No. 17 bed you are looking for. Will you kindly talk and laugh with as little noise as possible. Some of these sick are very ill, you know."

The Hooligans were still speechless. They moved on, limply and on tiptoe. The impertinences they had planned outside the gates slipped away from them; their swagger was transferred into a nervous shuffle.

Tom greeted them with effusion, doing the honours of the ward like the oldest inhabitant; but when his friends, recovering from their speechlessness, began to swear softly, he frowned.

"Look 'ere," he said, "don't you let me 'ear none o' that in 'ere. Sister don't 'low it."

His boon companions gazed at him openmouthed.

"Sister? 'Oo's Sister? And 'oo is it 'lows you to do things, and not to do 'em?" They sniggered feebly.

"Sister's the boss o' this 'ere ward," Tom asserted firmly, "and them as comes 'ere does what she says; and if you're a-comin' to see me, you've got to do the same."

The faithful three gazed at Tom. They had a dim notion that he might be a bit dotty.

"Ain't yer made 'em all sit up—like you said yer would?" one of the party ventured to say feebly.

"It ain't no manner o' use your tryin' to talk o' things yer don't understand," Tom answered loftily. "There's some folks as you can get at, and some as you can't. Sister's one o' them as gets at you if you was to try it on—which you don't never do," he added reflectively.

"She ain't very big, neither," murmured one of the three.

"It ain't bigness as does it," Tom said. "It's something inside o' 'er, what comes out and 'its yer. It's through 'er being a real lidy, that's where it is. She've got a somethin' in 'er what yer can't 'elp obeyin'."

The three, remembering the awe that had stolen over them when she confronted them, did not dispute Tom's words.

They talked in whispers whilst still in the ward, and stole away like mice afterwards!

Sister's interest in Tom, roused at first by the very fact of his attempted defiance, grew each day that he was in the hospital. Being a woman of insight, she saw what fine possibilities lay beneath that gaunt and awkward exterior.

"Tom," she said to him one day, "do you know that, if you liked, you could be a very fine man?"

"Me? Now yer gettin' at me, Sister!" he ejaculated, grinning sheepishly, and flushing to the roots of his lank hair.

"No, I am not. I mean it. You never will be a fine man, of course, whilst you spend your time in loafing round and leading a gang of idle young vagabonds into mischief. But I don't believe you will really go on doing anything so silly."

Tom glared at her, but her cool glance made him wince.

"Well, if yer ain't got nothing to amuse yer, it don't seem silly to be the leader of a gang. We've been a fair terror down our way," pride showed in his voice.

"I daresay—though I don't see much to boast of in that. Now, I should have thought that anybody with your gift for leading," Tom flushed with pleasure, "would have wanted to lead something better than a party of stupid boys. Why don't you be a soldier, Tom?"

"Why don't you be a soldier, Tom?" The words swung to and fro in Tom's brain all through the days that followed, and Sister missed no opportunity of urging her advice upon him. She was a soldier's daughter herself, she told Tom, and it would make her feel very proud if she could persuade him to serve with the Colours.

When he talked it over with his gang on Sunday they told him frankly they thought he was "a bit balmy in the crumpet"—which, being interpreted, signified off his head. But Tom did not heed them. Sister's words had gone home.

Perhaps it was only want of occupation and love of excitement that had made Tom into a Hooligan; for, certain it is that even the wearisome process of being turned into a soldier did not dishearten him. And though his old gang still describe him as "a bit gone in the upper storey," for submitting to drills and other regulations, they have a sneaking admiration for his smart appearance and upright bearing.

And Sister prizes, as she prizes few things, a photograph on her mantelpiece that represents a young, tall soldier, with an alert face, and bears under it, in scrawling characters, the words "Tom the Hooligan."

THE COST OF CORPULENCY AND THE COST OF ITS CURE.

The mortality tables published from time to time demonstrate, amongst other alarming facts, that deaths from heart disease are as numerous as ever; but those dry official statistics do not show what an appalling proportion of these deaths from cardiac disease are due to more or less excessive corpulency. Nevertheless, it is an established fact that obesity is one of the most fatal causes of heart and liver affections. Listen to this significant pronouncement by an eminent authority: "An excess of fat not only becomes burdensome and unsightly, but a positive evil, and frequently an absolute danger. An accumulation of it may occur between the muscles upon the heart, causing embarrassed respiration, or around the kidneys, and persons in this condition are extremely liable to disease in the vital organs." Again, our authority says: "Those suffering from an accumulation of abdominal subcutaneous fat, sometimes several inches in depth, carry also an enormous weight of fat around the internal organs, and are prone to the diseases known as fatty degeneration of the heart and liver."

This, then, is the cost of corpulency, not to speak of the extreme discomfort, and even suffering, which it causes in the oppressively hot weather—the weakness and exhaustion, the feverishness, the loss of appetite, the utter prostration and entire loss of energy, physical and mental.

As to the cost of its cure we cannot do better than refer our interested readers to the source of the remarks we have quoted above. We allude to the exhaustive treatise entitled "Corpulency and the Cure" (256 pages), by the eminent specialist, Mr. F. Cecil Russell, who has made this subject peculiarly his own, and has succeeded in effecting thousands of cures in cases where all other systems have proved abortive. Mr. Russell's lifelong researches have been directed to the discovery of a permanent and radical cure of obesity, and how far he has been successful may be gathered from the many hundreds of cases personally vouched for by the patients themselves, extracts from whose grateful letters are given in the book, together with copious excerpts from the press. In order to prove the absolutely harmless nature of the compound which forms the basis of his treatment, Mr. Russell also gives the recipe. This it will be seen, is of purely innocuous vegetable ingredients. Moreover, the treatment is pleasant and easy, does not interfere with the ordinary avocations, and entails no irrational limitations as to food and drink. Our readers, by sending two penny stamps to Mr. F. Cecil Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., may obtain a copy of this remarkable treatise under plain sealed envelope, when they will find out for themselves that the cost of the cure is as a drop in the ocean compared to what the cost of neglect may be.

SPECIAL OFFER.

TEST TRIAL CASES

For Stout People who have not tried the Russell Treatment.

By arrangement a limited number of specially prepared 6/- cases of the compound which forms the basis of the "Russell" treatment, have been reserved for distribution amongst interested readers of Short Stories at the nominal price of 2/6, including carriage throughout Great Britain, as a conclusive test of its wonderful efficacy.

Full directions for following the treatment will accompany each test case, also F. C. Russell's well-known book, "Corpulency and the Cure," 256 pp.

This offer remains open for 21 days from date of this publication or until such time as the number reserved is exhausted, in which case applicants will have their remittances returned forthwith.

Send remittance, under envelope, marked "reserved," to address given below, and mention this publication.

The packet is devoid of any mark denoting contents.

Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a Stereoscope to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, September 2nd. Postcards only, please. The prize of £1 1s. has been awarded this week to Mr. C. F. Salmon, of 86 Claybrook Road, Hammersmith, whose contribution is denoted by a star thus.*

If some men were half as big as they think they are, the world would have to be enlarged.

Prospective Litigant: "You give legal advice here, don't you?" Lawyer (absent-mindedly): "No, we sell it."

Anxious Mother: "I don't understand how it is, Bertie, that you are at the bottom of your class." Bertie: "I don't understand it myself; but I know it's dreadful easy."

Mother: "Johnny, I see your little brother has the smaller apple. Did you give him his choice, as I suggested?" Johnny: "Yes'm. I told him he could have his choice, the little one or none, and he took the little one."

Mistress: "Not going to marry that sweep after all, Jane? Why, I thought it was all settled." Jane: "So it was, mum; but the fact is, I saw him with a clean face for the first time last night, and I can't marry him! You've no idea how ugly he is when he's washed, mum."

A lawyer addressed the Court as "Gentlemen" instead of "Your honours." After he had concluded, a brother of the Bar reminded him of his error. He immediately rose to apologise thus: "May it please the Court, in the heat of the debate I called your honours gentlemen. I make a mistake, and beg pardon."

Notwithstanding this age of School Boards and Free Education it is surprising and ludicrous to read the excuses sent by parents for the absence of their children. Here is one: "Please excuse Johnnie for being absent, he had the tooth*ake* to oblige his mother who was whitewashing his father." Punctuation is of no account here.

*He was a naughty little brother; but little brothers are always naughty on such occasions. His sister's young man was sitting in the drawing-room patiently waiting when Tommy opened fire with: "Are you going to propose to my sister to-night?" "Why I—er—er—er—er—what do you mean?" stammered the young man. "Oh, nothing! Only if you are, you ain't going to surprise her. At dinner just now, she bribed me an' me brother to go to bed at half-past seven. She has hung four Cupid or stupid pictures on the parlour wall, moved the sofa into the darkest corner, got ma and pa to go calling next door, shut the dog in the cellar, and been practisin', 'Because I Love You' on the pianner all the afternoon. You'll get her all right, only if she tells you 'bout its being sudden, tell her it's all bunkum!"

The man who believes only half he hears generally gets along pretty well if he selects the right half.

"I would not recall the passed," sang the fellow who had successfully disposed of a counterfeit sovereign.

"At last I have reached the turning point of my life," remarked the convict when they put him on the treadmill.

Tag: "They say that old Growler is a man who will stop at nothing." Wag: "Old habits, I suppose. I hear he used to be a hansom-cab driver."

Busybody: "Hallo! old fellow, how came you so dreadfully hoarse?" Korfer: "Adswerigg the fools that asked me how I caught this cold. Good bordigg!"

Footelightes: "Gussie, of course, will insist upon being included in the theatricals. What part shall we assign to him?" Foster: "Well, eh—I should say he'd be available as—as—first walking-stick."

Budding Dramatist: "Have you been able to make use of my new play?" Callous Manager: "We have already used it. We found it available for the snow-storm scene in the second act of our great melodrama."

He: "What has become of that pretty Miss Barclay who was visiting you last summer?" She: "She's joined the great majority." He: "You don't mean to say she's dead?" She: "Oh, no! She married a man named Smith."

Clerk of the Court: "Remember, my good woman, you are on your oath, and must speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." Mrs. M'Carthy: "Well, thin, out av politeness I'd have kept it to mesilf, but if I must spake the whole truth—sure, then, ye're the ugliest man I've ivvor sot eyes on."

Jack: "My darling, I want to tell you something. I have deceived you. I am not rich, but utterly penniless. Will it make any difference to you?" Ethel: "Not the slightest." Jack: "I am so glad, dearest. Are you quite sure it will make no difference to you?" Ethel: "Quite sure. I can marry old Moneybags."

Mrs. Smith (thoughtfully): "I'm afraid I shall have to stop giving Bobby that tonic the doctor left for him." Mr. Smith (anxiously): "Why, isn't he any better?" Mrs. Smith: "Oh, yes! But he has slid down the banisters six times this morning, broken the hall lamp, two vases, a pitcher, and a looking-glass, and I don't feel as if I could stand much more."

Traveller: "I've got some notices that I'm selling to shopkeepers everywhere. Everybody buys 'em. Here's one—'If You Don't See What You Want, Ask For It!'" Country Tradesman: "Think I want to be bothered with people asking for things I haven't got? Give me one reading—'If You Don't See What You Want, Ask for Something Else!'"

The gas was turned low. Scarcely a glimmer gleamed. Young Camera clasped in his arms the slender form of the beautiful heiress, and her roseate cheek pressed the waistcoat button nearest his heart. Her dulcet "Yes!" to the momentous question which concerned the life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness of these two loving hearts still trembled upon the enraptured air. "And yet," exclaimed young Camera, exultantly, through the circumambient, impassioned darkness, "and yet they say negatives are developed in a dark room."

Hazel Harlow will be in Newcastle next week.

Startling Words from the Committee Appointed to Investigate Hypnotism for the Benefit of Journal Readers.

REV. PAUL WELLER,
Gorham, N.Y.

G. S. LINCOLN, M.D.,
101 Crutchfield Street,
Dallas, Tex.

F. H. STOUFER,
Sec. & Treas. of Railway
Conductors, Pueblo, Col.

JUDGE HENRY SCHAFER,
Flemington, N.J.

Hypnotism is no longer a myth, a fanciful creation of the mind, but a reality, a most potent power, capable of producing infinite good. For the purpose of ascertaining the exact value of this much-talked-of power, a committee, composed of a physician, a well-known jurist, a prominent minister, and a leading railroad man, was appointed to investigate Hypnotism.

The committee carried on a series of investigations in regard to the power of Hypnotism to influence the actions and deeds of people in the everyday walks of life.

The first step taken by the members of the committee was to master the science in every detail, so that they might state from personal experience the good or evil this strange power might produce. They wrote the New York Institute of science, of Rochester, N.Y., the greatest school of Hypnotism and Occult Sciences in the world, and received full and complete instructions in regard to how hypnotism may be used to influence people in business, how to use it in treating diseases, etc., etc. In a few days they mastered these instructions and were full-fledged hypnotists.

It was clearly demonstrated that hypnotism may be employed so that the person operated upon is entirely unconscious of the fact that he is being influenced; and, all things considered, the committee regard it as the most valuable discovery of modern times. A knowledge of it is essential to one's success in life and well being in society.

Dr. Lincoln says, after a thorough investigation, that he considers it the most marvellous therapeutic or curative agent of modern times.

Judge Schafer, although a legal light, turned his attention to healing the sick, and in a few treatments he completely cured John E. Myers, of Flemington, N.J., of a strange malady that had kept him bedfast for nine years, and which the doctors said must surely kill him. Judge Schafer's fame spread for miles around, and hundreds of people applied to him for treatment.

Mr. Stoufer performed the astonishing feat of hypnotising Mr. Cunningham, of Pueblo, Col., at a distance of several blocks. He also hypnotised an aged gentleman and had him run through the streets shouting "Redhot peanuts for sale." Mr. Stoufer says it is indispensable to one's business success.

Rev. Paul Weller says that every minister and every mother should understand hypnotism for the benefit they can be to those with whom they are brought in daily contact.

In speaking of this marvellous power, President Eliot, of Harvard College, said to the graduates: "Young gentlemen, there is a subtle power lying latent in each of you, which few of you have developed, but which, when developed, might make a man irresistible. It is called Personal Magnetism or Hypnotism. I advise you to master it."

The New York Institute of Science has just issued 10,000 copies of a book which fully explains all the secrets of this marvellous power, and gives explicit directions for becoming a practical hypnotist, so that you can employ the force without the knowledge of any one. Anybody can learn. Success is guaranteed.

The book also contains a full report of the members of the committee. It will be sent absolutely free to anyone who is interested. A penny postal card will bring it. Write to-day. Address:

THOSE who are reading "Adventures of an Actress" will see that Hazel Harlow is this week in Sheffield, next week she will be in Newcastle. These thrilling stories are attracting a great deal of attention, and their influence on the circulation of Short Stories is very marked. But although this is so I do not wish you to relax your efforts on behalf of the paper. This time of the year is an exceptionally good one for obtaining new readers, and a word of recommendation to an acquaintance in the train or on the beach is calculated to do an immense amount of good.

ADVICE ON LOVE AND OTHER MATTERS.

(Replies to Correspondents.)

"ALICE" writes to ask me how shall she break off her engagement with her lover. "When I first met him," she says, "I thought he was just the man for a suitable husband. He was a teetotaler, a non-smoker, and had recently become a member of the church; he was apparently kind and pleasant to everyone he met and most charming in his manner to me. But since then I have discovered that all this must be put on for the purpose of winning me. He treats his widowed mother in a way which no gentleman would do, he is always in debt, although I know he earns good money, he has taken to drinking and smoking and seldom goes to church now. I feel sure that we shall never be happy, but as I have given my promise to marry him, I don't know how to break off the engagement. And I feel certain that he will try to hold me to my promise."

I dare say he will try, "Alice," but you must act with decision and courage. Why should you tie yourself up to a man who will make you miserable for life? The only way to deal with him is to tell him plainly and firmly, but, of course, politely, that you feel the marriage would not be a happy one, and that you decline to continue the engagement. Never mind his bluster or his threats to tell everyone that you are fickle or anything of that kind. You have your future happiness to consider, and that is the great thing. A man who will ill-treat his widowed mother will certainly try to bully you into keeping your engagement, but you must not be frightened, and your friends will soon understand why you are acting thus. Don't forget to write to me again to tell me how you are getting on. I am only too pleased to help my readers.

"GOURMOND" has the best little wife in the world; but she is an awfully bad manager. She has £2 10s. a week, just for the current expenses, and never manages to make two ends meet. They live at Brighton in a nice little house, and keep a pony and trap, two servants, and "Gourmond" considers she ought to do better than she does.

It certainly depends, "Gourmond," upon what you mean by "current expenses." If your wife has to pay for coals, gas or oil, servants' wages, and food for the pony, I consider you are very unreasonable to expect her to make two ends meet. Write again, more definitely, and I will give you a rough sketch of what your household expenses ought to come to.

"UNKNOWN ONE" writes to know if there is any harm in a girl of seventeen allowing any man she has the least liking for to kiss and flirt with her. She does not think there are many girls now-a-days, who do not enjoy kissing and flirting. And for her part, she sees no harm in it.

I am afraid your knowledge of girls is very limited, "Unknown One," for very few nice girls could behave in so unladylike a manner. There are girls who find pleasure in flirting, but for the most part, it is the men who set girls a bad example in this respect.

"WORRIED DORIS" writes to ask me to give her advice on the following point. A man she does not know in the least, except by sight, and has never spoken to, has written to her, asking her to meet him secretly.

Take no notice whatever of his letter, "Worried Doris." Tell your parents all about it, and if you have any further annoyance from him, get your father to write and threaten him with the police if ever he troubles you again.

"RUNAWAY DICK" fell in love with a young man ten months ago. He left home and went into a situation and they had to part. She then heard that all his friends were against him going out with her, and it made her feel so miserable that she sat down and wrote him a heart-broken letter. Since then she has been very sorry, and three weeks before Easter she wrote and asked him to forgive her for writing such a letter to him, and told him she could never love another like she did him. He did not answer her, and she has only seen him once since, when he bowed and smiled; she lives in hopes they shall meet again, and asks if it will be wise if she goes out for a holiday, for her to call on him and ask him to meet her.

Yes, "Runaway Dick," I see no harm in your doing so. Hasty letters are always a mistake, but as you have written and explained that you did not mean what you wrote, I am sure you will find that he is willing to take no further notice of it.

TO CONTRIBUTORS.

I AM open to consider original stories of any length from 1,500 to 6,000 words. The character of stories required may be best ascertained by a careful reading of the contents of the paper. All MSS. are dealt with promptly, and every effort is made to return rejected stories which are accompanied by stamped addressed envelopes. At the same time, I cannot hold myself responsible for MSS. accidentally lost. Called by him "TATCHO."

(Romany: "Genuine," "Good," "True.")

And why, pray, is the successful poet, playwright, and journalist an eminent authority on hair restorer? Eager for an explanation, a Daily Mail representative sought out Mr. Sims. . . .

Now Mr. G. R. Sims, as many people know, is one of the busiest men in the kingdom, but hastily affixing his signature to a letter, he looked up and extended a characteristically cordial welcome. Then he said: "I will explain. I found that I was rapidly going bald. Not seriously, you understand, but the thinning out was sufficiently marked to set me thinking out a remedy. I went to two specialists, both of whom cheerfully assured me that I should be absolutely bald in two years.

"Then I discovered the preparation which is now placed upon the market. I found that I had hit upon a remedy capable of working wonders. Look at my hair now, isn't that convincing evidence of the value of my preparation.

"Ladies confirm my good opinion of it as a dressing for daily use. Mrs. Brown Potter, whose beautiful hair is the admiration of the entire lady world, writes that she uses nothing but 'Tatcho.' There is nothing to prevent every woman from making her hair silken in texture and bountiful in volume, for she can obtain a bottle of 'Tatcho' now in every town or even village."

In order that the public may be able to test the superlative value of Mr. Geo. R. Sims' discovery, the Company is issuing large 4/6 size test bottles post free for 1/10, under plain cover, one of which may be had on application. WRIST MACHINE

Physicians and Athletes have generally concurred that the wrist is the weakest portion of the human frame. It is the portion of the anatomy where strength is measured.

A person with weak wrists is a weak person constitutionally. When the wrists are strengthened the entire muscular system is made stronger.

There is no point in a man's anatomy where lack of strength is felt so much as in the wrist, nor where great strength is so useful, often seriously affecting his bread-winning power. With a systematic use of this machine only ten minutes twice a day you can double the strength of your hand in one month, and increase the size of your forearm very materially.

Purchasing and using a pair of Wrist Machines—one in each hand—saves half the time occupied in exercising both hands with one machine, and also ensures a more equal development of strength in the two hands.

STARTLING REVELATIONS OF THE STAGE.

THE ADVENTURES OF AN ACTRESS.

V.—Back from the Grave.

By DONOVAN MART.

CHAPTER I.

It was Sunday afternoon. The special train containing the members of The Good Samaritan company on tour, drew up in Newcastle station.

Politeness is usually at a discount on such occasions. It is too often the rule for the male members of a company, unless they happen to number wives or sweethearts amongst the ladies of the "show," to lose no time in hurrying off to secure good lodgings for themselves, leaving their female colleagues to shift as best they can for themselves.

On this hot September afternoon, however, the unusual sight could have been seen of the gentlemen of the company all crowding round one of their ladies, all eager to proffer help and assistance, the reason for which was apparent from one glance at the lady in question.

For she was beyond doubt one of the most beautiful women it would be possible to imagine. A woman, too, who looked all the more lovely by reason of her contrast with those standing around her, upon whose faces was plainly stamped the seal of "the profession."

"Isn't it sickening?" said one of the ladies, who rejoiced in the fine-sounding name of Miss Templeton Fane, "how the boys all fawn round Miss Harlow? She's a jolly sight too haughty to please me."

"Yes," answered the other, known to fame (!) as Miss Julia Montague, "and the worst of it is, Jenny Lovelace has chummed in with her. I should like to pay her a trick somehow."

"So should I," answered the other. "But come on, we must go and hunt for digs."

In the meanwhile, Hazel Harlow, the unconscious object of this venom, and her friend Jenny, had got rid of the, to Hazel, unwelcome attentions of Messrs. Clive Pendennis, Hayward Lindsay, Ralph Garden and Percy Carruthers, to say nothing of the manager, Raymond Venables, whose infatuation for Hazel was quite a topic of conversation in the company.

This was another reason why such ladies as Mesdames Fane and Montague were sore with Hazel. Had the handsome manager only deigned to pay his addresses to them, they would not, like Hazel, have been so backward in accepting them. Miss Harlow was so "straight." She even objected to supper-parties with "Johnnies!" She openly avowed her intention of keeping all men at arm's length until she had found the one man whom she would honour with her heart and hand! Was ever such a thing heard of on the stage?

Jenny Lovelace, who was an old stager "on the road," took Hazel under her wing.

"Tra-la-la, boys," she said merrily. "I'll take Miss Harlow with me."

There was one man in The Good Samaritan company, who played a minor part in the piece, who was somewhat different to the usual run of travelling actors.

This was Percy Carruthers, a man of good education and family, who had drifted into theatrical life, lured thither by the same bait that has proved so effective over and over again—the belief that it is in everyone's power to become an Irving or a Wyndham.

Now Carruthers, though originally good-hearted and clever enough, had contracted a habit that is, perhaps, more prevalent on the stage than anywhere else—the habit of secret drinking. Disappointment, coupled with the unending monotony of his existence—for nothing is more monotonous that the life of a strolling player—had introduced him to alcohol as a soother. And now the habit had become a fixed one.

To add to his trials, the actor had fallen madly in love with Hazel Harlow, the beautiful "lead" of the company. And alcohol and his passion, hopeless he knew, were combining to drive Percy Carruthers to the dreadful sea of insanity from which there is rarely a return.

Yet his fellow actors suspected nothing. "He's queer, Carruthers is," they would say carelessly, "but a decent chap, always ready to stand a drink or lend a fellow five bob. Oh, yes, he's all right, is old Percy."

To Hazel Harlow herself the actor was always studiously polite. He never, as the others did, paid her fulsome compliments, or made love to her. Yet sometimes she would notice, during rehearsals, or upon the stage while the piece was in progress, that his eyes were fixed upon her face with a burning intensity that was almost uncanny. His whole soul seemed to be in his eyes.

Hazel Harlow had renounced the nom de plume she had adopted, Hilda Hatherleigh, and was now upon the playbills under her own name.

"I won't sail under false colours," she said. "I've done nothing to be ashamed of. It was my father's unkindness that drove me from home. So let me be known as Hazel Harlow."

£1 a week for six months. See the prize in this week's BIG BUDGET, 1d.

But to return to Carruthers. An old hand, such as he was "on the road," was never at a loss for rooms in the towns visited by the company. He accordingly departed at once to discover whether the apartments he usually occupied were vacant.

To his satisfaction they were. He lost no time in settling his few "traps" in their place for the ensuing week, and then, sitting down quietly in his apartment, he produced a brandy bottle, and, with the aid of a pipe, gave himself up to a lengthy "think."

His eyes were supernaturally bright. There was a far-away look in them. Suddenly he drew a photograph from his breast-pocket and began to study it attentively. It was a portrait of Hazel Harlow in her character of Ruth in The Good Samaritan, and fine presentment of the actress though it was, it failed to do justice to the radiant beauty of the original.

"How lovely you are, my little Hazel," murmured Carruthers, fervently pressing the portrait to his lips, "and I'll win you yet. If only I could possess you for my own! Can I think of no plan whereby I can call you mine?" He rose to his feet and began pacing up and down the narrow room like a tiger in a cage, his eyes shining with the light of a sudden access of delirium.

His lips moved quickly as he walked to and fro. "It can be done," he muttered, "we have a week here. Thank heaven, I know the theatre as well as I know my own hand. Hazel's dressing-room is cut off from the rest. The window opens out on to a broad roof. Danger! Of course there's danger! Yet a man can only die once. And if only I can call Hazel mine for a few short hours what matters it? Life has no more to give me. It can be done. There is much to be thought out. Yet I'll do it—I'll do it!"

He took another draught of the fiery potion, whose slave he was, and that had already set his fevered brain still more awhirl. If only his brother actors could have seen Percy Carruthers at that moment—Carruthers the quiet, the irreproachable! Perhaps they might then have realised the true state of affairs—might have averted the perpetration of a madman's scheme.

The diabolical cunning of the mentally diseased is proverbial. The scheme that Percy Carruthers had set afoot in his brain would have been impossible to a sane being. Even had it been conceived, it would have been dismissed with a shudder as too terrible for attempt even by the most hardened of criminals.

Yet Carruthers was no criminal. He was worse—a madman of the most terrible kind, so mad that he could hide his insanity beneath a cloak of reason, so mad that no scheme could seem too outrageous to serve the achievement of his own desires.

Till late into the night he sat solitarily planning and plotting, working out the details of the fiendish scheme he had conceived so suddenly, and that now seemed to possess every fibre of his brain.

CHAPTER II.

THE first few days in Newcastle went uneventfully enough for The Good Samaritan company. Hazel Harlow, already the victim of such thrilling experiences in her first venture as an actress, was now beginning to hope that her troubles were over. Horace Caldecott, the villain who had already made two dastardly attempts to abduct her from her career, had assuredly shot his last bolt the week before at Sheffield. Valerie Bellairs, the woman who had done her best to wreck Hazel's young life, had also apparently passed out of her life. Among her fellow actors and actresses Hazel felt that assuredly she was safe. And then there was Eric Monteith, her noble-minded young lover, who was willing to give up his life to guard her from wrong.

Eric had written to her from London to say that he hoped to be able to come to Newcastle to witness her triumph in that city before the expiration of the company's week there. He begged her to be on her guard against treachery, as he was convinced that Horace Caldecott would yet leave no stone unturned to trap her.

But little did Eric dream of the new danger that menaced Hazel. And it was the girl's own rare beauty and purity that constituted so terrible a menace to her safety in the profession she had chosen to adopt.

Newcastle went mad, as Sheffield had done, over the beautiful young actress, whose personality and charms were so far superior to the usual run of ladies of the stage.

And Raymond Venables, actor manager, rubbed his hands, metaphorically, as the boards "House full" went up outside the Theatre Royal every night.

"Well, if I can't marry Hazel Harlow," he said to himself, "I can at least make money out of her"—which somewhat sordid remark covered a genuine passion that the manager took scanty pains to conceal.

All the young "bloods" of Newcastle tried in vain to break down the barriers of Hazel's maiden modesty. They besieged her with invitations to supper-parties, aye, even with offers of marriage. A well-known sprig of the nobility would have made her a duchess and run the gauntlet of the abuse that would have fallen upon his somewhat shallow young head, only—Hazel declined the honour.

Naturally, such homage paid to an ingénue fluttered the feminine dovecots of the company, with the exception of Jenny Lovelace, who worshipped the very ground Hazel trod on, and who had, as we have seen already, proved her loyal-heartedness by saving her friend from a terrible danger in Sheffield.

"I do hope we shall get away from Newcastle without any mishap," said Hazel, almost jestingly, to her friend, as together they set out one morning to see the old castle, the Tyne bridge, the shipping on the river, and all the sights of busy old Newcastle.

"So do I," echoed Jenny fervently, glancing almost apprehensively at her friend's lovely face. "Do you know," she went on, "I'm glad I'm not beautiful. I don't say so because of sour grapes, but because if I were a man and in love with you, Hazel, I don't think I'd let anything come in the way of my winning you."

Hazel smiled rather sadly.

"I'm glad you're not a man, Jenny," she said. "If you were, I couldn't walk with you so peaceably and securely. What a nuisance it is that men can't be friendly with you without making love. At least, Mr. Monteith is friendly and gallant, and courteous, but——" a rosy flush overspread her face.

"He's in love with you, too," cried her companion. "There's an ideal husband for you, Hazel."

"Yes, but I don't want a husband yet. I want to be a great actress, to live in peace. Perhaps some day I'll fall in love."

This was a typical conversation, carried on by the two girls, showing how perfect was the accord that existed between them. The very dissimilarity in their several characters and appearance was only a greater bond between them.

And so four days passed away, and nothing happened to mar the uneventfulness of the visit to Newcastle. And every day saw fuller self-confidence for Hazel Harlow. Every day she began to feel more certain that she had in her the elements that go to make a great actress, a strong vein of romance, extreme beauty, health, youth, impersonality and a steadfast resolve to keep herself pure and unspotted from the world. If with these attributes she could not win her way upon the stage, then surely the theatrical profession was one that no woman should embark upon, for there could not be such a thing as justice.

And visions of herself in London, the Mecca of all true artists, acclaimed by press and public as the greatest actress since Bracegirdle or Siddons, would obtrude themselves upon Hazel's brain. The love of her art had taken possession of the young girl. She had no room in her heart for human passion.

Thus some men called her cold, adamant, passionless, women vain and self-opinionated. Yet Hazel's heart beat warm and true within her. There was, assuredly, never a more womanly woman than this country farmer's daughter, never one more ready to listen to the appeals of the needy or distressed. She only lacked one thing, the touch of that magician's wand called Love. And as yet love had passed her by unheeding.

It was four o'clock on Thursday afternoon. Hazel was alone in the little sitting-room of her apartments reading. Suddenly there came a knock at the door.

"Come in," cried Hazel.

A maid-servant entered with a note. Hazel looked carefully at the address on the envelope. The handwriting was familiar to her, though she could not for a moment recall the writer. It was evidently an educated hand. The note was as follows:

"Dear Miss Harlow,

"I am venturing to write and ask you a very great favour. I am in trouble and want your help. You are the only woman I know who is the embodiment of all that is good and tender, as a woman should be. Will you, therefore, meet me in the theatre at five o'clock this afternoon. And might I suggest that your dressing-room would be the best place for a private interview. It is secluded, and what I have to say to you I should not care for others to hear. If you could comply with my request you would be conferring an inestimable boon upon an unhappy man. Do not trouble to answer this. I shall go to the theatre and wait for you.

"Yours very sincerely,

"Percy Carruthers."

Now, as anyone will admit, there was nothing at all in this note to arouse any suspicions of danger in Hazel's breast. The missive was perfectly straightforward. Carruthers said he was in trouble, and wanted a confidante who would offer him advice. The matter, whatever it was, evidently touched him very deeply, so much that he desired above all things privacy in unburdening himself. So reasoned Hazel, and so would nine women out of ten reason, whose susceptibilities are inclined to all that is good and tender in life.

"Poor Mr. Carruthers," mused Hazel, letting the note fall idly from her hand. "So that accounts for his having been so quiet these last few days. He has something on his mind. I wonder what it can be. Ah, well, I suppose I must accede to his request. If it had been Mr. Pendennis or Mr. Hayward Lindsay I should never have consented to a tete-à-tete, because I know that they would have tried to make love to me. But Mr. Carruthers has always been polite and courteous. He's a gentleman, one can see that, although I've sometimes thought he takes rather too much to drink. Though that's a fault that a good many actors and actresses seem to have. How sad it is! Why can't we be on the stage and yet live in one's private life as other people do? Ah, well, it's no good my moralising. The question is, shall I go and see Mr. Carruthers? I'll go and ask Jenny. But no, I'd better not do that. Mr. Carruthers wouldn't like to think that I had betrayed his confidence. I'll just go and see what he wants without telling a soul. If only I can be of any assistance to him I shall be very happy."

Hazel looked at her watch. It was just four o'clock. She determined to have a cup of tea and then walk to the theatre, which was barely ten minutes away.

In the meantime Carruthers was already making his way to the theatre. At the stage-door was the doorkeeper, alone and looking particularly sleepy. He brightened up as Carruthers approached.

"Hullo, Bill," said the actor. "You look thirsty."

"I am that," answered Bill.

Carruthers drew a flask from his pocket. "Have a drink?" he said carelessly.

Bill's eyes glistened. He took the flask and had a long pull.

"Thank you, sir," he said, handing the silver "refresher" back to its owner.

Carruthers nodded. "Right O!" he said. "I'm just going up to my dressing-room for something," he continued.

Bill relapsed into his seat in the little box just inside the stage-door portals. The drink had made him sleepy. He felt an absolutely irresistible longing for sleep come over him. Curious, he had never felt like that before. Why—the next moment his head fell forward on his chest and he was sleeping like the dead.

Carruthers looked curiously at the recumbent doorkeeper. A smile played about his thin lips. An ominous glitter came into his dark eyes.

"When you awake, friend Bill," he muttered, "Hazel Harlow will be mine, and you—well, you will be wondering what has happened to you. Did you enjoy your drink? You didn't taste the sleeping draught, did you? Ah, well, good-bye, my friend, sleep on," and with a curious little laugh the madman, for such he undoubtedly was, passed inside the deserted theatre.

A flight of stairs led up to the dressing-rooms at the back of the stage. The staircase was gloomy. Carruthers hurried to his own dressing-room.

In a moment he issued forth from the room bearing something in his arms, that appeared rather weighty. Five times he made the journey to his dressing-room and out again, on each occasion bearing a mysterious parcel. These packages he deposited carefully in two doorways, one on either side of the staircase. Hazel's dressing-room lay at the top of the stairs, to reach which would necessitate her passing the doorways in question.

This done Carruthers looked at his watch. It was a quarter to five. He hurried back to his dressing-room. She must get to her room first, he muttered.

At five o'clock to the minute Hazel presented herself at the stage-door of the theatre. Bill was still sleeping soundly. The girl looked at him curiously. "It's a shame to wake him," she said to herself with a smile, "he's tired from doing nothing."

She entered the quiet theatre, and hurried up the stairs that led to her dressing-room. To her surprise Carruthers was not there, as he had said he would be. Ah, well, he would assuredly be there before long.

Hardly had the thought crossed her mind before there came a knock at the door.

"Come in," cried Hazel, and Carruthers at once entered.

He was very pale, and his eyes shone with intense brightness. So much Hazel noted at once.

"Good afternoon, Mr. Carruthers," she said sweetly, "you see I've come. I'm so sorry to hear you're in trouble. If I can help you, believe me I shall be only too pleased."

The actor fixed his burning eyes upon the beautiful face before him. For a moment or so he seemed to be struggling to find his voice.

"Miss Harlow," he blurted out at last, his voice sounding harsh and strained. "I have sent for you, because—because I love you with a passion that is consuming my very being. I cannot sleep, I cannot eat, for love of you. To look upon you is joy unspeakable, to hear your voice is heaven, to be with you is a torturing madness that I can hardly bear."

A cold wave of horror seemed to pass over Hazel's frame. She shuddered visibly, and shrank back before the madman's frenzied outburst.

"Ah, you shudder," cried Carruthers, his eyes more wildly glaring than ever. "You shrink from me! No matter, you are mine, mine! you cannot escape me!"

He made a step forward. A wild scream broke from Hazel's lips. "Let me go!" she cried. "How could you bring me here by such a base trick!" A faint smell of burning assailed her nostrils.

A low laugh answered her, a laugh in which there was no vestige of sanity, that suddenly conveyed to her the terrible truth. The next instant Carruthers threw open the door. A cloud of pungent smoke, mingled with the crackling of burning wood drove inward. The theatre was on fire! The maniac laughed again.

"See, my Hazel, my queen," he cried. "You cannot escape me. A sea of fire stretches between you and the street. And I did it, I, Percy Carruthers, did it so that you should be mine, mine, MINE!"

His voice rose to a scream. Hazel's blood ran cold within her veins. A few moments before she had been so calm, so happy, so trustful in Providence. And now a horrible death stared her in the face, look where she would; like an animal at bay she looked around her. Was there no escape? The roaring sound of the fire as it encircled the theatre with its devouring arms rose higher every minute.

Carruthers leapt towards her with a cry. "I will save you, my queen," he said exultingly. "I will save you, that you may share my throne, may live with me, and learn all the wonderful ways of love! Come to me, Hazel, my darling!"

The poor, distraught girl, gave a loud cry. Then her senses reeled. A black darkness grew over her brain. She fell forward, senseless, into the arms of the maniac. In a moment he had swung her off her feet, and pressing a kiss upon her cold forehead, dandled her in his arms as though she had been a child, endowed as he was with all the new-born strength that madness had given him.

And outside the room the roar of the flames grew louder and louder.

CHAPTER III.

Hazel had scarcely left her lodgings, and proceeded to the theatre to keep the appointment with Carruthers, when Jenny Lovelace called to see her friend.

She was vexed to hear that Hazel had gone out. The landlady did not know where her lodger had gone, but she did not think that Miss Harlow would be long. Would Miss Lovelace step up stairs and wait a bit?

Miss Lovelace assented to this proposal and made her way to her friend's room. The first thing that caught her eye as she entered the apartment was a piece of notepaper lying upon the floor, Carruther's note in fact, that Hazel had left when it had dropped from her hand.

Jenny picked it up, and recognising the handwriting in a moment as Carruthers' read it without any hesitation, curiosity, to find out what reason the actor could be writing to Hazel for, overcoming her scruples as regards the honourableness of her action.

The note only mystified her. "What a funny thing," she mused, "Carruthers making Hazel a confidante. I wonder what on earth he wants to tell her. It's past five now. I think I'll stroll round to the theatre and fetch Hazel away."

She hurried downstairs and out of the house. When she got near the theatre she found a crowd of people hurrying in the same direction.

"What is it?" she asked a man who passed her.

"Theatre a-fire!" came the astounding answer.

Jenny's heart seemed suddenly to stop beating. The theatre was on fire! And Hazel had gone to the place only a few minutes before. Surely she must be out of the building, though, by now. Jenny hurried on, a prey to the most sickening doubts and fears.

Arrived outside the theatre itself she found that already a large concourse of people had assembled, and the first fire-engine had dashed upon the scene.

Jenny forced her way round to the stage-door. It was there that the fire seemed to rage the fiercest. Tongues of flame were already shooting out of the windows. The police and firemen were forcing the people back.

"Thank God it was in the daytime," said a man's voice. "There was no one in the place but the stage door-keeper, and he's out by this time."

"No one there," cried Jenny agonizedly. "There is someone there! Miss Hazel Harlow is there!"

In a moment Jenny found herself the centre of an excited crowd, from whose faces all the colour had faded.

"The doorkeeper was so fast asleep they could not wake him." A man's voice cried out hoarsely. "A doctor said he must have been drugged, so of course he couldn't tell whether any one was inside."

"Miss Harlow, the beautiful actress inside the theatre," the cry went round on every side.

A man forced his way through the crowd, a tall, handsome, well-dressed man.

"Who says Miss Harlow's inside?" he cried in a stentorian voice.

"Mr. Monteith!" cried Jenny, recognising the man at once. "Save Miss Harlow!" she cried, helplessly.

Eric Monteith ground his teeth together.

"Then it is true!" he said hoarsely.

The next moment he had cleft a way through the crowd like magic, and stood beside the firemen and guarding cordon of police.

"Stand back there!" cried a policeman roughly.

"There's a woman inside the blazing theatre!" cried Eric. "I'm willing to volunteer to enter the place."

"A woman!"

"Miss Harlow."

"Miss Harlow!" Twenty voices seemed to echo the name. As if by magic an escape was run up alongside the building, now blazing away with fearful intensity.

Eric sprang up the steps of the long red structure. In his agony of mind he did not feel the angry tongues of fire that leapt out at him, took no heed of the pungent, acrid smoke that filled eyes and mouth and nostrils, heard not the shouts of the firemen.

One of the latter swung up the escape and practically hauled Eric down.

Monteith, almost mad with rage at being thus thwarted turned upon the helmeted fire-fighter, with something akin to murder in his eyes.

"How dare you, fellow," he said.

"Do you want to go to certain death?" retorted the other quickly. Then in a softer tone he went on: "It would be absolute madness to go inside the building now, sir, aye, absolute death. The fire's got hold of the place now."

The man spoke nothing more than the truth. Even where they stood the heat was terrific. So much so that the captain of the fire-brigade hurried forward and commanded Eric and the firemen to retire back.

Half-a-dozen steamers were at work now flinging huge streams of water over the blazing pile. Yet the conflagration was only an insatiable demon, whose thirst could not be quenched by such pigmy efforts.

"If anyone is inside that building," murmured one of the firemen in a low voice, "they are cinders by now."

The man did not speak unfeelingly. Eric heard him, and a great groan left his lips.

"Can nothing be done?" he cried.

"Nothing, sir. We could all sacrifice our lives uselessly, of course, but what use would that be?"

Eric turned away. His heart seemed to have died within him. It could not be true. Heaven could never have allowed Hazel to die. And yet Jenny Lovelace had positively asserted that the beautiful young actress, the woman whom Eric had learnt to love with all his heart and soul, was within the theatre.

Where was Miss Lovelace? Eric shouldered his way back through the crowd, that sympathetically made place for him.

"Her sweetheart!" sobbed a woman.

"Her sweetheart!" echoed the men.

Yet the words fell unmeaningly, unheedingly on Eric's deadened faculties.

"Mr. Monteith!" It was Jenny's voice again. Eric looked up. Jenny was standing in the middle of a little knot of people, all members of the Good Samaritan company.

Raymond Venables was there, his face white as death, Pendennis, Lindsay, the other ladies of the company. Horror was on every countenance. "I can't believe it true," Venables was muttering.

Eric made straight for Jenny's side. "I must speak with you alone, Miss Lovelace," he said.

They drew apart. In a moment Jenny began hurriedly: "Oh, Mr. Monteith, I was in Hazel's room only a few minutes ago. I found a note upon the floor, that she must have dropped. It was from Carruthers, asking him to meet her in her dressing-room at five o'clock. At a quarter past five the theatre was well ablaze."

"Carruthers! The quiet young actor! what does it mean? Why did he ask her to meet him?"

For answer Jenny thrust the note in question into Monteith's hand. "I've shown it to no one else," she said. "I haven't dared."

Monteith read the missive carefully. Then an expression of horror left his lips.

"This Carruthers," he said quickly, "had he any grudge against Hazel?"

"No, no. I'm sure he had none. But—" Jenny looked round fearfully, though her apprehensions lest she should be overheard were groundless, as the fire held everyone's attention. "I know he used to give way a good deal to drink."

"Then you think——"

"Oh, I don't know what to think. But I'm a woman, Mr. Monteith, and women take strange fancies. The stage-door keeper was drugged. Why? Can it be that Carruthers has set fire to the theatre, to make believe that he and Hazel have been burnt while really—"

"He has spirited her away somewhere! By heaven there may be something in that."

Jenny's words had suddenly put new life into Eric's heart. The girl's quick perception had hit upon the only possible shred of hope that Hazel was still alive. The only question was, what motive could Carruthers have had? At once the name of Horace Caldecott flashed across Eric's brain. Could this be another scheme of that arch-villain? The young man's blood ran cold at the thought. If so, perhaps at that very moment Hazel was in her greatest enemy's power. Either that or her charred corpse lay among the ruins of the blazing theatre. Each alternative was horrible. And yet if only she were alive! Anything would be preferable to a horrible death. For while there's life there's hope. So Eric's thoughts flew like shuttlecocks across his mind.

CHAPTER IV.

In the meantime how had it fared with the hapless Hazel. It will be remembered that we left her senseless and helpless in the arms of the maniac Carruthers, with the horrid fire-fiend already beating with his flaming hands against the door of the dressing-room.

At one end of this room was a window opening on to some narrow leads, that formed a path, as it were, between the roofs of two rows of somewhat squalid houses.

In a moment Carruthers had swept the toilet things off the table that stood beneath the window. Then he leapt upon the table in question, and having deposited the still unconscious body of his victim upon the floor, battered out the glass and woodwork of the window with a poker, that he had found in the fireplace.

This done, he jumped lightly down upon the ground, smiling all the while, and again seized Hazel in his arms.

Without any apparent effort he surmounted the table once again, and clambered out on to the leads, a feat that would have been absolutely impossible to him, had he been in a normal condition, taking into consideration his own somewhat puny frame and the lifeless burden in his arms.

Yet his madness had endowed him for the time being with supernatural strength. Once out upon the leads, and the task before him was comparatively easy. The roofs on either side of him cut off the leads from view, save from the theatre itself, for at the extreme end the blank wall of a factory towered. It was an ideal spot for the successful consummation of the madman's scheme.

With the air of a man who thoroughly knew his ground, Carruthers staggered on with his burden. His false strength was failing him. The dead weight in his arms was telling upon his overtaxed muscles.

At last he came to a pause before a window set in the slates. He had already passed three such, each one grimier, if possible, than the other.

With great care he deposited Hazel upon the leads. Then he opened the window and peered cautiously inside the room with which it communicated.

The window was only a few feet above the floor of the attic, for such the chamber was. It was thus a comparatively easy matter to lower Hazel into the room. Carruthers swung lightly down after her and closed the window.

It was a narrow, bare apartment, the only furniture it could boast being a truckle bed in one corner, a pitcher of water, and two crazy chairs. Dust lay thick on every hand, from the corners hung great, matted cobwebs, the close smell that a long-uninhabited room always has permeated the miserable garret.

With almost grotesque tenderness Carruthers deposited his fair burden upon the bed. Then he sprinkled some water in her face. In a few minutes Hazel's eyes opened languidly.

"Where am I?" she murmured, as though waking from a dream.

"Safe, my darling," answered Carruthers ecstatically, "safe with your own Percy, who will never leave you again."

Hazel shuddered. The madman's words had brought everything back to her—the terrible scene in the dressing-room, the realisation that she was in the clutches of a lunatic, the fearful knowledge that she was alone in the burning theatre with such a being.

But the blank that followed all she knew for certain—what had happened since then? Where was she? How had she come there? How could she escape? Carruthers was bending over her, his eyes drinking in every detail of her face.

£1 a week for six months. See the prize in this week's BIG BUDGET, 1d.

Half-frenzied with terror though she was, Hazel managed to keep her presence of mind. She must humour the madman. She was absolutely in his power. Speculation as to her present position must for the time cease. She would want all her faculties for the ordeal that lay before her now, the keeping of the enamoured madman at arm's length.

"Oh, Mr. Carruthers," she murmured. "I'm so hungry and thirsty. Can you give me something to eat and drink? I should be so grateful to you if you would."

"Hungry and thirsty! My Hazel hungry and thirsty! Then of course I will go and get my queen food and drink," answered the maniac, in a voice that was as tender as a mother's. Then his expression changed. "But first we must secure our little Hazel," he said. The next instant he had slipped a pair of handcuffs over Hazel's wrists, securing the irons firmly to the bed by a slender piece of strong chain. "Now I'll go and get food and drink," he muttered.

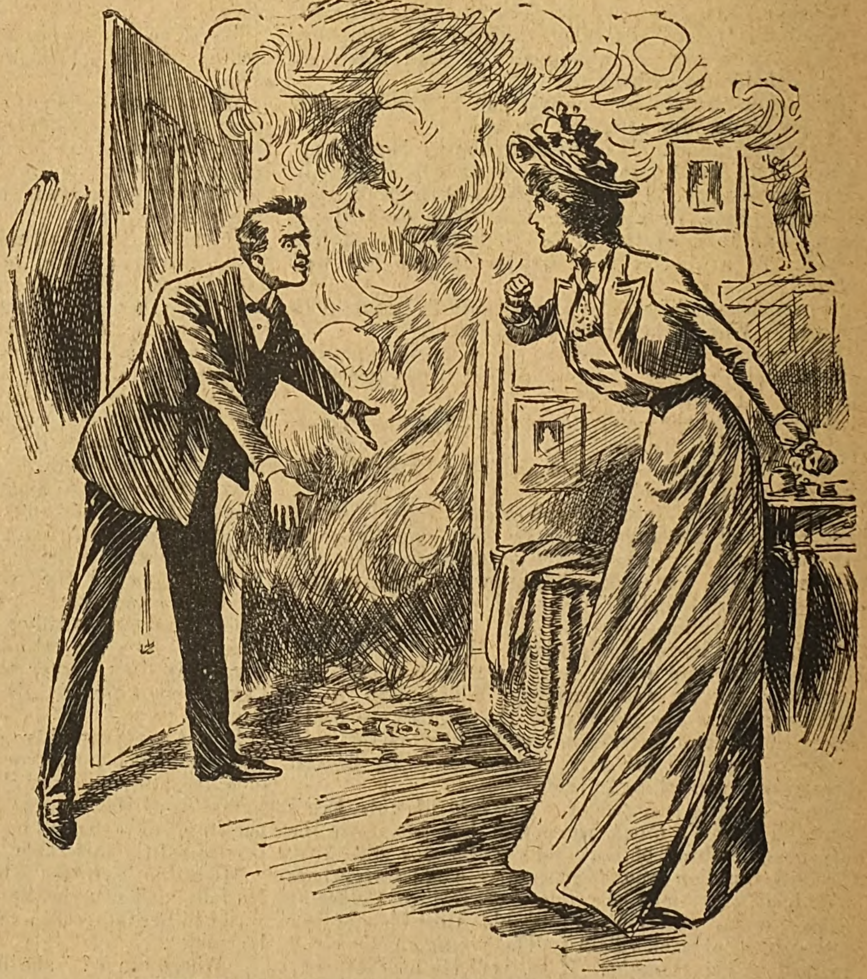
The next instant he had left the room. The sound of a bolt flying back into its socket told Hazel that she was indeed a prisoner.

She rose into a sitting posture, and endeavoured to break loose from her bonds. But Carruthers had done his work well. She was powerless to break free. A blank despair filled her heart. How could she hope to escape! She was in Carruthers' power—that is to say, in the grip of a madman who was capable of anything when once the last barrier of his reason was broken down.

His present attitude towards his captive seemed one of abject adoration, tempered, it is true, by his obvious determination to give her no opportunity to escape; yet no one could say how long such a state of mind might last. Once let passion break down the last remnants of his reason, and Hazel knew that she was doomed. Nothing but death could be her portion then.

The time dragged on with leaden limbs. Hazel had her watch. It was now past six o'clock. Why did not Carruthers return? Another hour passed away, and still there was no sign of the maniac.

Hazel had had plenty of time for reflection. What puzzled her most was where she was and how she had come there. Beyond the fact that she was in the attic of a deserted house, she had no clue to guide her as to how she had come there. But, she reflected, it would have been impossible for Carruthers to have carried her out by the street and away to this place. This train of thought once set in motion, she speedily came to the only feasible explanation, and as we know the correct one, that Carruthers had conveyed her over the roof.



"I did it, I, Percy Carruthers, did it so that you should be mine, mine, mine!"

Again she made a frantic effort to break loose from the handcuffs. But Carruthers had done his work well. She could not escape.

The shadows began to deepen in the gloomy garret as the September day drew to a close. A faint scratching in the wainscotting of the room betokened the presence of mice or rats. And still of Carruthers' return there was no sign. Hazel began to feel faint for want of food and drink. With the exception of a cup of tea she had had nothing in the way of refreshment since midday. A fervent prayer went up to Heaven for strength and guidance in her terrible trial.

The time stole remorselessly on. The darkness grew deeper. A silence, broken only by the scratching of the rats in the mouldering walls, as of the grave reigned on every hand. Gradually the idea grew on Hazel that Carruthers had deserted her wilfully. He had left her alone to die.

She determined to cry for help. A scream left her lips. Then another. Then another. And still no sound fell on her ears to tell her that her cries were heard.

CHAPTER V.

Percy Carruthers crept down the crazy stairs of the deserted house in which Hazel was incarcerated. His footsteps, stealthy though they were, awoke strange, eerie echoes. At the street door he paused and listened intently. All seemed still, and he crept out, failing in his haste to secure the door behind him again.

The street he found himself in was a deserted one. For the purpose the madman had in view, the incarceration of Hazel Harlow, he could have found no better place. The alley was condemned, and was indeed about to come into the hands of the housebreakers. Another reason that militated against the probability of anyone being about, was that all Newcastle had been attracted to the blazing theatre.

As he reached the street into which the alley debouched the sound of the commotion round the theatre—ay, and the roaring of the flames, became visible. A wild light came into Carruthers' eyes. The next moment he had darted forward, and was speeding away in the direction of his own terrible handiwork.

An enormous crowd surged in front of the burning building. Carruthers rubbed his hands together in devilish glee. He had suddenly quite forgotten about Hazel. It was plain that the firemen were slowly mastering the blaze. The theatre was already practically gutted. Yet they had prevented the fire from spreading beyond the theatre. For a time Carruthers stood on the outskirts of the crowd. The dusk of evening drew over the scene, and still he remained gloating over the scene.

"I did it!" he muttered at last. "It's all my work!"

At that instant a voice sounded in his ears that acted like a cold douche. For one brief moment it gave him back his reason.

"Mr. Carruthers," said the voice agonisedly, "what have you done with Hazel Harlow?"

Carruthers looked up, his face bloodless, to confront Jenny Lovelace, by whose side was a tall, handsome, well-dressed man.

"Hazel Harlow!" he echoed faintly.

"Yes," cried the man. "Speak, or I'll shake the life out of you."

With a snarl like that of a wild beast Carruthers sprang forward. A thousand wheels seemed turning in his brain. Letters of fire danced before his eyes! Kill! kill! kill! was what he read.

He hurled himself at Eric Monteith's—Jenny's companion—throat. The impetuosity of the madman's unexpected attack threw him backwards. Carruthers' fingers were at his throat—terrible, sinuous, wire-like fingers they seemed. He tried to beat his assailant off. He felt unconsciousness seizing hold of him. He was being throttled to death.

Suddenly the fingers relaxed. A terrible cry broke from the madman's lips. "Through the dressing-room window!" he muttered hoarsely, as though in answer to some unspoken question. The next moment he grew stiff and rigid. A few fierce convulsions shook his limbs And so Percy Carruthers died—smitten down suddenly by the hand of God.

For a few moments Eric could not believe that the man was dead. A policeman raised up the body, and placed his hand over his heart. The bystanders pressed round in horror.

"Do you know this—dead man?" he asked.

"No," answered Monteith truthfully.

"I did," put in Jenny hysterically, yet striving to keep calm. "His name was Carruthers. He was a member of The Good Samaritan company, to which I also belong." Then she looked piteously at Monteith. "I can't tell all I know here," she said.

"Come along to the station, Miss," said the constable sympathetically. "And you, too, sir," to Eric. He sent a boy for a cab.

When the vehicle came up the body of the hapless Carruthers was placed in it.

"You drive on," said Monteith to the constable. "This lady and I will follow you."

As they proceeded towards the station, Eric suddenly turned to his comrade.

"Miss Lovelace," he said, "can you describe to me what Miss Harlow's dressing-room at the theatre is like?"

Jenny looked at him with a puzzled expression. "Why, yes," she said. "It was a small room, with a window at one end opening on to some leads. Her make-up table was set beneath the window, and had a looking-glass on it. There was a fireplace in the room. That's all."

"But the window—could one get out by it?"

Jenny thought for a moment. "I should think so," she said finally. "But why do you ask?"

"Because poor Carruthers' dying words were: 'Through the dressing-room window.' I could only just catch them; but he seemed to be answering your question in some sort of way: 'What have you done with Hazel Harlow?' It is in the bounds of possibility that he escaped through the window. And if he escaped, then why not Miss Harlow?"

"But where can she be now?"

Eric shook his head. "I don't know," he said; "but I'm going round to the back of the theatre to see if I can find out any houses upon which the dressing-room window opened. Can you tell me which way the window faces."

Jenny thought for a minute. "It has a gleam of late afternoon sun," she said thoughtfully, "so it would face west."

"Good. Then will you go to the police-station and tell them there I'll report myself later?" And without more ado Eric hurried off, his heart beating high with hope renewed.

There was still a great crowd round the theatre, though the fire had been got under hand by now. Gaunt and grim the blackened ruin looked, with its bare smoke-grimed walls and gaping casements silhouetted darkly against the darker sky beyond.

For night had set in now. The hum of many voices rose up round the still smouldering structure.

"Poor Miss Harlow," Eric heard a voice mutter. "To think that that beautiful young lady has perished in the flames."

£1 a week for six months. See the prize in this week's BIG BUDGET, 1d.

"Ay, and there was another there, too," put in the voice of a man, evidently better posted than his neighbour. "The doorkeeper has recovered from his fit of sleep, or call it what you will. He says that a Mr. Carruthers, one of the actors, went in before Miss Harlow. This same Carruthers gave him a drink of doctored spirits. Looks like foul play, says I."

Eric drew a long breath. So the whole story was public property now. He hurried on, intent on tracing the mystery of Hazel's fate to its end.

He took his bearings as well as he could. If the dressing-room window faced west, he must trace his steps westwards. And thus a natural sequence of deduction led him into the narrow deserted alley, the street in which the very house was where Carruthers had deposited the hapless Hazel.

Here Eric found himself brought to a check. He had no data to guide him in a further search. Should he enter one of the houses and investigate the roofs? That seemed the best plan.

Suddenly a faint cry fell on his ears. The blood rushed from his face. His pulses began to drum madly. Again the cry rang out.

He dashed down the gloomy alley. Ah! Again that scream. Then silence, save for the roar of the city's traffic close at hand.

Half frenzied between hope and fear, Eric began to try the doors of the houses. The first two were bolted. Mechanically he pushed on.

The third door flew open before his touch. Good heavens! The coincidence brought him back to his senses. Why should that one door be unlatched?

Without pausing to consider possible dangers, he stumbled up the rickety stairs. The top of the house, he knew instinctively, must be his goal.

A door facing the stair-head brought him up. It was locked. The key was in the door.

The bolt swung back from rusty wards. Another instant and he was in a room, dark as the grave, and almost as silent.

Fearfully, apprehensively, he struck a match. A low groan escaped his lips as the tiny flame showed him a grimy apartment with a truckle-bed in the corner, upon which was stretched the inanimate form of a woman.

He leapt forward. One glance at the deathly-white face told him that it was indeed the girl he loved better than all else in the world, Hazel Harlow, snatched miraculously out of the jaws of a fiery tomb.

Out of the tomb! Was she alive? A hasty examination revealed the blessed fact that she had swooned.

"Thank God!" muttered Eric. "Thank God!" And tears of heartfelt gratitude to Heaven gathered in his eyes—tears that were no womanly confession of weakness. He had not dared hope for this.

CHAPTER VI.

The astounding story of Hazel's escape soon got into the papers, and there was probably no manager in London who would not have offered Hazel an important rôle on the strengh of the incident

As for Hazel herself, it was with the utmost reluctance that she could be got to speak of the terrible adventure at all.

Only to Eric and Jenny, her saviours, did she supply the missing links of the story. The reporter from the Courier had perforce to draw on his own journalistic imagination.

As for Eric, he could not refrain from again urging on Hazel what he had before made insistent—that she should give up a life that had already brought her such terrible experiences.

But Hazel, like many another woman, weak about certain things, was on this point adamant. "I have put my hand to the plough," she said gently, "and there can be no turning back. Heaven knows that the adventures that have befallen me were none of my seeking. No, kindest and best of friends, don't urge me any more. My mind is made up."

The fire at the theatre meant a serious loss to Raymond Venables. The insurance of his company's effects did not cover all that had been lost. And the tour list must be gone on with. To break his future contracts spelt ruin.

They were due the next week at Rugby, and somehow or other fresh properties must be obtained. Then, again, the loss of the unhappy man Carruthers, apart from its own peculiar sadness, meant the finding of another man to fill the dead man's shoes.

Venables convened a meeting of his company. "I take it, ladies and gentlemen," he said, "you are all agreed, that we cannot abandon our tour. I will go to London at once and secure fresh properties. On Monday I will be at Rugby. Your time till then must be your own."

The company were unanimous in continuing the tour. Venables departed, somewhat cheered. On his way to the station he encountered Monteith.

"Mr. Venables," said Eric, "will you give me the part vacated by the unfortunate man who lost his life yesterday? I don't want any salary, and I think I can undertake the small part. I have seen the piece more than once. What do you say?"

Venables looked curiously at the young man.

"Has Miss Harlow's presence in the company anything to do with this whim of yours?" he said slowly.

Eric flushed. "I will not deny that you are right," he answered. "But you need not think that I want to become an actor solely to make love to Miss Harlow. In the first place, she doesn't care for me any more than for any other man. Secondly, I hope I am a gentleman."

Raymond Venables' face cleared, and he held out his hand.

"It's a fair field and no favour, then," he said somewhat mysteriously. "And as to salary, I must beg you to accept thirty shillings a week—what the poor fellow Carruthers was getting. We shall have to have a couple of rehearsals at Rugby. Please be word perfect. The part is a small one, but even small parts want good acting."

"Thank you," said Eric, "I will not fail you."

And so he parted from his new manager. A more tranquil feeling had taken possession of him. At any rate, should there be danger in Hazel's path in the future, he would be at hand to guard her. As to his histrionic abilities, he had not much fear about them.

Thus did Eric Monteith bind himself to be knight-errant for the girl whom he loved, and whose life he had twice saved.

But for Hazel Harlow there was not as yet the dawn of love.

[The next place on the tour-list of The Good Samaritan company was Rugby. In the Warwickshire town Hazel Harlow was to be confronted with yet another adventure of absorbing interest. Readers of Short Stories cannot afford to miss this thrilling narrative.]

My Strange Fellow Passenger.

By J. L. Hornibrook.

The man sitting opposite me in the corner of the smoking carriage was beginning to get on my nerves.

For the last hour or so he had been growing more restless and strange in his manner every minute. His long, thin, trowel-shaped face twitched at times in a curious spasmodic way that was rather calculated to make one jump; his eyes smouldered with sullen fire; and more than once he brought his clenched fist down upon his knee with a sounding thump. He took no more notice of me than if I was at the other end of the train; and as we were alone in the carriage, I confess that I did not feel altogether comfortable.

I consoled myself, however, with the reflection that Broxburn, where I had to alight in order to reach my uncle's place, was only two stations further on, when I would be rid of my strange fellow passenger once and for all.

At our next stoppage my attention was drawn away from him for the time being by catching sight of my old friend, Tom Richards, upon the platform. I sung out to him, and he came across towards the window at once.

"Hullo, Ashcroft!" he cried, in his breezy way. "Going down to the Grange, eh? They are expecting you, I know. I was over there yesterday, and—— Good Lord!" he exclaimed, under his breath, checking himself suddenly, and staring past me into the carriage as if he was quite flabbergasted.

I did not wonder at his astonishment. My unknown friend had moved away to the opposite window, and was staring out of it at the moment; but at the very mention of my name his head came round with a jerk, and his eyes fastened upon me in a curious devouring kind of way. The next second one of those strange facial contortions seized upon him, which was quite enough to startle anyone who happened to be unprepared for it.

Richards, with a very blank face, motioned me ot bring my head nearer.

"Who the dickens have you got in there?" he whispered.

"Haven't the least idea," I answered. "I've been treated to this sort of thing all the way down."

"Well, judging by that start he gave just now, he seems to know more about you than you do about him."

I thought it rather odd, for I had certainly never laid eyes upon the man before, and why my name should have aroused his interest was more than I could imagine.

"They are all well at the Grange, I suppose?" I said, changing the subject. "My uncle, and—and—"

"Miss Constance, eh?" chimed in Richards, with a mischievous twinkle in his eye. "Oh, yes; they are both tip-top. Take care of yourself, old boy," he called out, as the train began to move. "See you again in a day or two."

I settled back in my corner, trying to look unconscious of the fact that the stranger was still regarding me in the same fixed, searching manner. The tables were now turned with a vengeance! Instead of my staring at him, it was him who was staring at me, never once allowing his gaze to wander. I did not like it at all. The concentrated glare of his black glowing eyes gave me a most uncomfortable sensation, as if two burning rays were playing full upon me.

I took up a paper, held it in front of me, and made a pretence to read. But it was no use; I instinctively felt that the man's eyes were still upon me His gaze seemed to burn its way through the flimsy sheet, and transfix me as before. In despair, I tossed the paper aside, deliberately turned my back upon him, and fell to studying the view from the carriage window.

It was with a certain sense of relief that I stepped from the train at Broxburn, for I felt as if I were emerging from some oppressive atmosphere into the open air, and could breathe freely again. As I walked off down the platform, curiosity prompted me to glance back over my shoulder; and there, at the carriage window, I saw the stranger, staring after me in the most persistent manner. Whether he got out or not I cannot say, but he certainly made a movement as if to do so just as I turned away.

At the Grange I received a very cordial welcome from uncle Roger, whom I had not seen for six months, and—well, yes, from the Miss Constance whom Richards had alluded to.

Let me just say here that there was a tinge of romance, if not of mystery, connected with Constance Heathcote and the manner in which she first became an inmate of the Grange. Several years before—according to Mrs. Warne, the housekeeper, who was my informant—my uncle received a letter one morning which seemed to upset him greatly. Within an hour he was off somewhere in hot haste, leaving word that he might not be back for a week. At the end of that time he returned, leading by the hand a child—a pretty, winsome little thing—the very sight of whom captivated Mrs. Warne's motherly heart on the spot. My uncle handed the little one over to her, said that her name was Constance, and that she was to be treated in every respect as if she were his own daughter—and said no more.

And a daughter Constance became to him as she grew up, twining herself round his heart in a manner peculiar to her. On his part, he thought there was no one in the world like her—an opinion which was cordially endorsed by one other member of the family at least.

For the remainder of the day I was much too occupied with Constance to give a thought to the man in the train. The whole thing slipped from my memory, indeed, and was only recalled by an incident which occurred that same evening.

My uncle, who was of a studious turn of mind, was much given to chemical research, and usually took himself off to his laboratory soon after dinner. For myself, as Constance had left us some little time before, I sauntered out into the grounds to enjoy a quiet cigar.

I was strolling up and down on the velvety sward at the side of the house, indulging in the pleasing occupation of day-dreaming, when a dark, gliding figure passed quickly between me and the skyline, and disappeared into the shrubs at the other side of the tennis lawn. Though I had only a momentary glimpse of it, it instantly brought back to my mind the strange-looking being I had encountered in the train that morning. I could have sworn it was the same man.

I hurried across to the spot where I had seen him disappear; but though I hunted through the bushes for some little time, I failed to discover a trace of anyone lurking there.

Considerably puzzled, I returned to the house, thinking that I ought to make known the circumstance to my uncle. With this object in view I sought him out in his laboratory, where I found him pottering about amongst his jars and phials, up to his eyes in scientific research.

"By the way, uncle," I said, perching myself on a corner of the table, and picking up a queer-looking fossil which I found at hand, "I had a rather curious experience coming down in the train to-day."

"What was that?" he mumbled, sniffing thoughtfully at a bottle, the stopper of which he had just withdrawn.

I started to tell him, glancing down at the fossil meanwhile, but before I had got very far my account was cut short by a sudden crash of glass at the other end of the room. Looking up, quickly I was astounded to find my uncle staring at me in a kind of horrified, open-eyed stupor, that had something almost uncanny in it. The bottle had fallen from his nerveless fingers, and the brownish liquid it contained was slowly spreading itself out on the floor.

I was off the table and across the room in an instant. "What is it?" I cried. "What's the matter?"

For all the notice he took, I might just as well have addressed the empty air. He seemed stunned—stupified. The look in his eyes shocked and alarmed me, and I laid my hand hastily upon his arm.

"Uncle," I said, "do try and pull yourself together. If Constance should happen to come in——"

That one word, "Constance," seemed to electrify him into life. With a sudden, sharp cry, he shook me off, sprang towards the door, and dashed headlong from the room.

I was after him in an instant, but in his frantic haste he easily outstripped me.

"Constance! Constance!" I heard him cry, as he rushed wildly from one room to another.

But Constance was nowhere to be found!

In less than a minute the whole house was in a turmoil. The servants, attracted by my uncle's cries, came crowding into the hall with startled, questioning faces, but they could give no account of the girl. At last one of them declared that she must have strolled out into the grounds, as she had been seen to put on her hat some time before.

This information appeared to dismay uncle Roger, and he was through the door almost before one of us could move. I waited a moment to give directions to the servants, and then hurried out after him. By that time, however, he had disappeared, in what direction I could not tell.

Without an instant's delay I made for the shrubs at the other side of the tennis lawn, a strange, sinking fear in my heart. Though I could not imagine what had happened, I felt that the presence of the man I had seen a while ago boded no good.

My second search among the bushes was as futile as the first. Hot, palpitating, breathless, I paused to look around me. Where could the girl have gone?

I then remembered that some distance further on, hidden away among the trees, there was an old ivied ruin, which was a favourite resort of Constance's in the daytime. Thinking that she might possibly have wandered towards this spot, I bolted off in that direction at once.

I was rushing madly through the trees, when, just as I got within sight of the ruin, I almost tumbled headlong over a prostrate figure, and found to my horror that it was Constance!

She was lying there in a dead faint, her white, inanimate face upturned to the sky. Not far from the spot was a heavy cloak and a man's hat, which seemed to indicate that an attempt had been made to carry her off, but was fortunately frustrated in some way.

Just as I was bending over her a sound came from a little hollow on the right that thrilled me with a vague horror and alarm. It was something that resembled a fierce, worrying snarl, followed almost immediately by a kind of choking gurgle.

I sprang towards the spot, and down there I saw my unfortunate uncle lying on the ground, a man kneeling upon his chest and gripping him by the throat with both hands. One glance was enough to show me that his assailant was the stranger I had met in the train.

I hurled myself upon the wretch, but it was only after a desperate struggle that I was able to tear him off. Then he suddenly collapsed, falling at my feet in a kind of fit.

I hastened to get my uncle on his feet, and assisted him to the spot where Constance was lying. Taking her up in my arms, I bore her back to the house, uncle Roger staggering along after us with feeble, uncertain steps.

When I had seen them both in good hands, I called to the groom and gardener, and we hurried off again towards the ruin. The cloak and hat were still lying on the same spot, but the man himself had disappeared.

* * * * *

It was not until the following day that my uncle was in a condition to afford any explanation of this singular affair, which had so very nearly ended fatally for him. When he summoned me to his room, I was shocked to see the livid finger-marks still on his throat.

"Who was that man, uncle?" was the first question I asked.

"His name is Robert Harding," he answered; "and he is——" he paused, and looked at me with a pained expression upon his kindly face.

"What?" I asked.

"Constance's father!"

"Her father!" I gasped; for the announcement quite staggered me.

"Alas! it is so," he replied. "Listen, my boy; I will tell you the whole sad story. If I have kept it from you hitherto, it was only because I dreaded lest any word of it should come to our dear girl's ears.

"You must know," he went on, "that there has been a little romance in my early life, the memory of which has remained with me ever since. Long years ago I was deeply attached to Constance's mother, Isabella Heathcote. I believe that my love was returned; but unfortunately her parents forced her into a marriage with this man Harding.

"It proved a most unhappy, a miserable union. From the first Harding treated his wife with harshness and neglect, squandered her money, and was often brutally violent in his temper. Even when their little daughter was born, it wrought no change in him. He was a man of the most vicious tendencies, and he gave free rein to his passions at all times.

"I need not go through the whole wretched story. It is enough to say that he went from bad to worse, until he finally deserted his wife and child altogether.

"They were left utterly penniless, poor things; and only that I was able, through an indirect channel, to keep them from want, I tremble to think how they would have fared.

"One night, several months after he had disappeared, Harding turned up again, looking wild and desperate. He told his wife that he had got into trouble, and that he must have two hundred pounds by the next day in order to settle the matter and prevent prosecution.

"Whether or not he had discovered the source from which their supplies had come during his absence I cannot say. At any rate, he ordered her to apply to me at once for the money. She refused point blank to do anything of the kind.

"He was a man of ungovernable temper at all times; and now, as nothing he could say would induce her to consent, he flew into a frenzy of passion. Seizing her by the throat, he flung her from him so forcibly that she never recovered the effects of the fall. Then he fled, but was captured soon afterwards and sentenced to penal servitude.

"I knew nothing of all this at the time; but on her death-bed his poor wife sent for me, told me the whole miserable story, and committed little Constance to my care. I brought the child home here, vowing that never again should she fall into the hands of her brutal father. I called her by her mother's name, which was always dear to me.

"I have lived in constant dread that when Harding regained his liberty he would seek to claim her from me, and you can understand my dismay last night when I heard from you that he was in this neighbourhood. Knowing that he would encounter opposition, it must have occurred to him to lay in wait and carry her off by force. Though that attempt failed, it is still open to him to set the law in motion, which no doubt is his intention. As her legal guardian, he can compel me to give her up in the end. And now, how are we to prevent it?"

I was silent for a long time, turning the whole thing over in my mind; and then I thought I saw a way out of the difficulty.

"No doubt he could claim her under present circumstances," I said. "But he could not do so if——"

"If what?" he asked.

"If she had a husband, for instance."

He brightened up at once.

"And the proposed husband?" he said, looking straight at me.

"Is not very far off," I answered.

"My dear boy!" he said, cordially wringing my hand, "it is what I have wished for all along. And if I know anything," he added, with conviction, "Constance herself will raise no great obstacles to this solution of the difficulty."

And she did not.

"Claribel, when we are wed, your pathway shall be eternally strewn with roses." "Pathway? Then you expect me to foot it everywhere, I suppose?"

The Golden Dwarf

A Sensational Romance of To-Day.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "A Keeper of Secrets," "Hate, the Destroyer," "A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS OF "GOLDEN DWARF."

"It is the body of Sir Christopher Dering!"

The words are spoken by a pretty girl—fair-haired, blue-eyed. She stands, horrified, by a grass-grown ditch in a country lane, out of which a great mastiff is climbing. The ditch contains the corpse of a stalwart man—a handkerchief bound over his mouth and nostrils.

Close to there is a strange figure, graceful, well-dressed, even handsome, but with the stature of a boy and the face of an adult. He carries a heavy dog-whip, and stares, fixedly, at the dead body just discovered by his mastiff, Cerberus.

The girl is Esther Carew; the dwarf, Otto Hare, the richest landowner in Derbyshire, and the mystery of Wyresdale, a village in that county. For the first time in fifteen years he has set foot in a public thoroughfare, to attract the attention of Esther, whom he has watched from his park.

Sir Christopher Dering was alive at seven o'clock the preceding day. He and his nephew, Felix, had quarrelled over the latter's love for Esther. Sir Christopher wanted Felix to make a good marriage—the birth of his little cousin Brian has put him out of the succession to the baronetcy. Felix is faithful to the penniless Esther Carew.

Much turns on the whereabouts of Felix on the night before. It appears that he was in Duchester, some miles off, whither he went on business, and spent a night at the theatre. Could he have killed the squire?

Felix in vain protests his innocence.

But the cloud of suspicion gathers around him. Meantime, the child Brian has been kidnapped, and Felix is suspected of this too. He discovers a riding whip with some peculiar marks upon it.

One day an old sailor named Foley is attacked by Otto Hare's dogs.

Kraft is summoned to dress the wound, and gives Foley a draught.

CHAPTER XXXI.

"She Worships Felix Dering."

"There, Miss Carew, that is as much as I can show you—not very exciting, I fear, but worth a glimpse, nevertheless."

Otto Hare abandoned the lens of the great telescope, and, descending from the species of moveable platform which served as a seat, left it to his young companion.

Esther roused—she had been absorbed in listening for a recurrence of the sound that, reaching her ears in so unlikely a quarter, had startled her into conjecture. She climbed to the position vacated by the Golden Dwarf and peeped through the large instrument.

A moment she gazed—then withdrew her eyes from the lens. "I can see little or nothing, Mr. Hare," she confessed; "only a huge pink ball and a blot or two in the middle of it."

She was answered by a tolerant smile. "The sun is of slight interest to any but experts," admitted Otto Hare, leaning on the observer's carriage; "it is at this end of the telescope, for instance, that I find my favourite star."

He glanced about him—the German, Zorn, had taken his lean figure and dull orbs away; the Golden Dwarf, save for Esther Carew, was alone in the singular building which apparently did duty for such a simple scientific purpose. Otto Hare pointed to a thin spiral staircase, running up the interior of the taper edifice.

"That leads to the dome," he said; "or rather to a gallery round the dome. It was the gallery made me call this my watch-tower. From it, by a rift in the foliage of the park, I was able to notice you as you came and went to the Rosery. Thus I knew you—or seemed to—before I learned your name by frightening you so terribly with my poor Cerberus."

Esther shuddered. "Cerberus was the big dog which—which discovered Sir Christopher's body?" she murmured, "it is horrible to think how close he was to us all the time and we never dreamed of it. What—what happened to it?" she added; "Cerberus, I mean."

Otto Hare glanced at his repeater. "Oh," he explained uneasily; "it met with an accident and died. But let us forget Cerberus and everything he stands for. He was part of my isolation, the hermit existence I have put behind me."

He laid a tiny hand on the padded end of the carriage in which she sat; Esther marked the size and splendour of the diamond he wore.

"Can you not guess," he queried, looking into her flushed and downcast face, "why I have flung myself out into the world as I have done, after fifteen years' solitude? Will you not comprehend that it is you who have drawn me forth and made me pant to live the life of my fellows. I am rich—you have rendered my wealth valueless but to give you pleasure: I am powerful—you have reduced my ambitions to this, the desire to execute your wishes."

"Please, Mr. Hare," begged Esther, trying to rise, "please do not speak to me like that—it is no use. Oh, I am very, very sorry for you, but, as I have told you, I love someone else."

The Golden Dwarf set his white teeth; his small, aristocratic features contracted savagely.

"You hate me because I am what I am," he snarled; "yes, you do, Miss Carew, and I will be revenged on you—on you and on Felix Dering, the man you love for his strength and his inches."

Esther shrank from the fierce gaze of the Golden Dwarf and the malignant attitude of his athletic, though diminutive frame. But his attack upon Felix stung her.

"I love Mr. Dering because he is noble and generous," she cried; "if he were poor, as—indeed, he is—and a cripple into the bargain, I would love him for himself."

Otto Hare's countenance relaxed into a ghastly smile. "There is a peculiar kind of crippling, Miss Carew," he retorted, "that your love would find it difficult to survive. It is the injury inflicted by the rope and the scaffold of the common executioner—a broken neck."

With this frightful jest, the Golden Dwarf caught her soft palms and grasped them as a vice might have done.

"Repulse me," he hissed, "and I will have Felix Dering hanged as high as Haaman—hanged for the murder of his uncle. I have a witness who could doom him to the gallows as surely as a judge in the black cap."

Otto Hare threw himself on his knees by the paralysed girl, and covered her fingers with burning kisses. She felt helpless before his diabolical threat; the contact of his lips scorched her like hot iron. Rallying her courage, she snatched her wrists out of his clutch.

"Mr. Dering is innocent," she declared; "I do not believe you could even make him seem guilty."

The Golden Dwarf struggled for self-control; his dark skin was purple and his brow knotted with swoollen veins.

"You challenge me?" he muttered; "I accept the challenge—I will satisfy you both of Dering's guilt and my power to prove it. In two days you may still loathe, but you shall fear me."

Half fainting, Esther tottered from the light carriage under the lens of the telescope, and gained the floor of the tower. As she did so the sound that she had heard already floated to her once more, far-off, indistinct, but unmistakably significant. This time it evidently reached the Golden Dwarf.

A look of embarrassment, almost of terror, crossed his face, and he touched, hastily, the button of a bell. The German responded to the imperative peal—a gaunt, pale form, the antithesis of his compatriot, Kraft.

"Zorn," said Otto Hare, and he spoke now in English, "the machines downstairs are running noisily—see to them." He added a rapid sentence in a foreign tongue.

The German bowed—the German fashion; feet together, arms in front, knees stiff. He was not over middle-age, and might have been much more youthful than he appeared. The bow finished, he turned about in a military manner and vanished through an opening that continued the spiral staircase into the basement of the tower.

The Golden Dwarf followed Esther's glance. "There is an electric installation on a lower level," he supplemented—"it feeds the house lamps, and some ventilators. But the vibrations interfere with the instruments; I am thinking of having it removed. You can hear at a considerable distance the throb of the gas-engine that turns the dynamos."

Esther listened—the muffled palpitations of machinery could indeed be perceived. Yet the sound was not that which had so forcibly attracted her attention.

Otto Hare watched her; he was nervous and agitated. "Pardon my little outburst of temper a moment ago, Miss Carew," he murmured. "But you distract me when you insist on espousing the cause of that rascal Dering; I will certainly fulfil my promise to convince you of his worthlessness. Permit me at present, however, to take you back to your mother."

He thrust wide the double exit of the tower, and escorted Esther towards the lawn, still melodious with the dance-music of the Hungarian band and bright with the gay costumes of his feminine guests.

Not a few curious glances were fixed on them as they joined the group about Mrs Carew—Esther, fragile and drooping as a lily, Otto Hare stern and upright. Most of those who scrutinised the couple hazarded a guess that the Golden Dwarf had been proposing to the girl at his side, and that she, doubtless well-schooled by her mother, had accepted him. "A strange bridegroom," thought all, yet there were few women among his visitors who would not have grasped, themselves, at the offer of Otto Hare's heart and fortune.

Mrs. Carew was not so satisfied as to the success of her darling scheme. Her penetration revealed to her the weariness in her daughter's bearing, the sullen discontent in the Golden Dwarf's demeanour. There was not even between them the polite if cold understanding of a mercenary betrothal. Mrs. Carew's victory was yet to win, and she was aware of it.

When she could steal a moment from the departing guests (Otto Hare's return had been seized upon as an opportunity for a score of effusive farewells) she glided to Esther.

"What has Mr. Hare been doing or saying that you look so doleful?" she inquired, affecting an indifference she did not feel. Her daughter looked away into the quiet blue of the August sky.

"He has threatened and insulted me," answered Esther, slowly; "here, in his own grounds. My hands tingle with the kisses he forced on me. He wishes me to marry him, though I do not love him, though he knows I love another man."

"Pshaw!" whispered her mother, "you exaggerate, Esther, absurdly; Mr. Hare is fond of you to distraction. If he has been a trifle ardent it is a compliment any girl would be proud of from so handsome and distinguished a suitor."

Esther shivered. "Mamma," she said; "you make me ashamed—ashamed of being your child."

Mrs. Carew pinched her cheek. "You are the least bit impertinent, dear," she retorted; "but I forgive you—you are unnerved. And now to get rid of the nobodies; the smart people have gone in a flock—our own sex to discuss you, my dear, the men to envy Mr. Hare."

She moved off, laughing, and began to distribute adieux to the nonentities of the garden-party. The Golden Dwarf waited till she was disengaged and the last wheel had rolled down the avenue. Then he paused by her, knitting his brows.

"I have no pretty news for you, Mrs. Carew," he said, sneeringly, "and yet I venture to believe I have produced a strong impression on your daughter's mind."

The widow sighed. "You are very kind and patient, Mr. Hare," she assured him; "Esther is so wilful. But I, too, have hopes. There, go, and let me have a brougham immediately. I want to whisk her home before she has a nervous breakdown."

Mrs. Carew tapped him maternally with her fan. "Your wooing, Mr. Hare," she said, "does not err in the matter of restraint. With Esther that is imprudent. Appeal to her head rather than to her emotions."

The Golden Dwarf muttered an indistinguishable apology, and went to order the vehicle desired by the widow. On its arrival at the white stone portico he handed them into it, scarcely speaking to Esther. Yet as he took leave of her he contrived to whisper, "In two days, remember." Esther did not raise her glance to his—she was numbed by anxiety for Felix Dering.

Their diminutive host surveyed the retreating brougham, almost lost in a cloud of dust, yet growing smaller and smaller in the vista of the avenue.

"She shall be mine," murmured Otto Hare; "if I die for it, she shall be mine."

He played with his jewelled repeater and watched the avenue—a familiar shape had emerged from the dust thrown up by the brougham; it was that of Joseph Kraft. The Golden Dwarf hastened to meet him.

"Where have you been?" the big German was asked; "have you struck Foley's trail?"

Kraft stroked his pink chin and smiled. "He will not trouble us again," vouchsafed his thin, humorous lips; "he is past cure, if he be not actually defunct."

The Golden Dwarf grew livid, then red. "So Cerberus is avenged," he rejoined.

"Cerberus be—anathematised," growled Kraft; "I have completed your bungling attempt, and delivered us out of the clutches of an obstinate and clumsy blackmailer."

"You have delivered us!" exclaimed Otto Hare; "he has not died from the bite Mahmud gave him?"

"Not he," said the other; "he died, if he be yet dead, of a rare South African poison—the sap of an obscure Brazilian herb. But enough of Foley—how have you progressed with Miss Carew?"

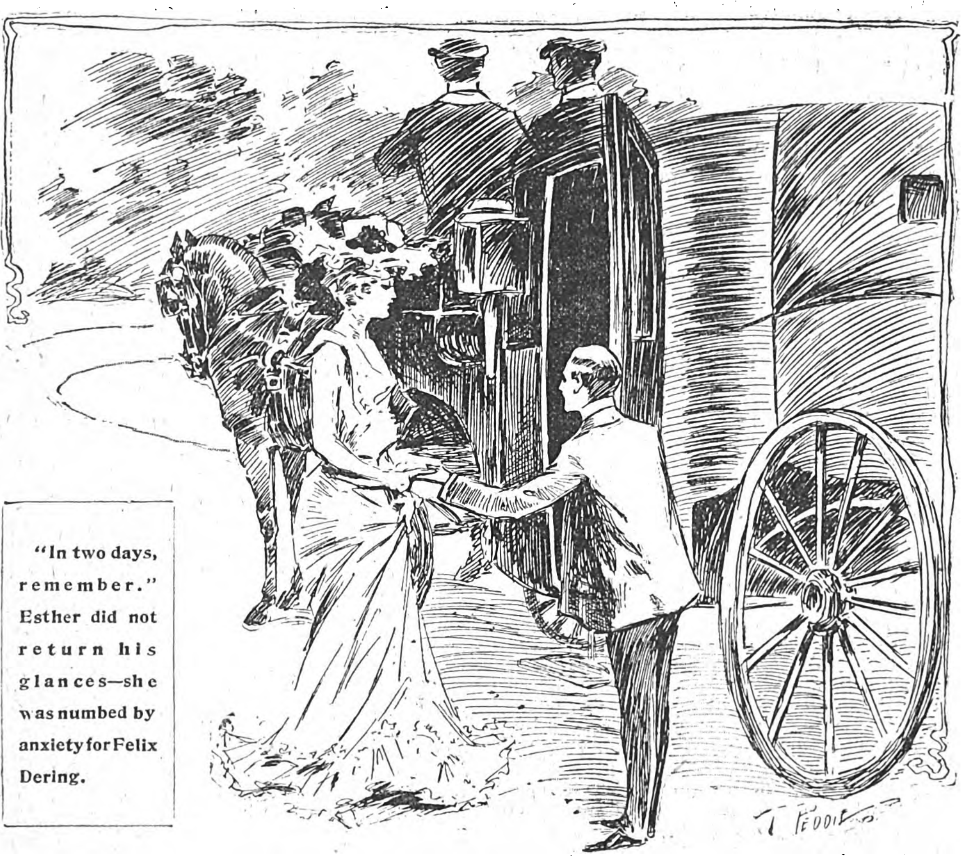
The Golden Dwarf spat out an awful oath. "She worships Felix Dering," was his vicious response; "we must terrify her into surrender. Bring down your honest Londoner, Kraft—your boasted Neal Garland: we shall have need of all his—honesty."

Joseph Kraft tossed away a half-smoked cigar. "So that is the plan," he said; "well, I suggested it myself, and I suppose we shall have to go through with it. But to be frank, Hare, I feel an instinct that it will prove unlucky."

"Rubbish!" ejaculated Otto Hare; "I see no alternative, and I will not relinquish her, Kraft, for fifty Felix Derings. Write to Garland to-night."

They turned back to the portico, the German pondering as he walked. In the hall, he snapped his fingers.

"A fig for instinct," he cried, with the air of one who arrives at a decision; "Mr. Garland shall revisit Wyresdale."



"In two days, remember." Esther did not return his glances—she was numbed by anxiety for Felix Dering.

CHAPTER XXXII.

"Give Me Back My Child."

"Lift him up gently, sir; oh, if we had only a drop of spirits! It's a piece of hard luck for me if he's gone."

Inspector Brasher was stooping over the prostrate form of Nicholas Foley. He took the sailor's head and shoulders into his own strong arms and raised them to the level of his knee.

Felix Dering obeyed the command, and together the two men deposited the third upon the unsteady hammock that hung in a corner of the bare room. Foley's neck was limp and a red stain on the bandages about the sailor's throat had spread.

"What's in yonder bottle?" queried Michael Brasher. His share of the movement just executed had brought him face to face with a low chimney-piece; on it was perched a fat flask bearing a suggestive label, and half full of a colourless fluid. By it stood a tin cup and a pannikin of the same metal.

Felix went and investigated these articles—the bottle contained whisky, the pannikin water; the cup had been emptied to the last drain.

Hastily he poured some of the spirit into the smaller receptacle, and diluting it to a nominal extent, poured it between the sailor's lips. The liquor overflowed the irresponsive mouth—Nicholas Foley could not swallow. Mr. Brasher tore open the breast of the blue bed-gown and laid a palm upon the tattooed skin—not a tremor disturbed the powerful muscles and lean flanks of the mariner; the sailor was dead.

With a profound sigh the Inspector set aside the tin cup and straightened his tall frame. "Slipped through my fingers, by Jupiter!" he exclaimed.

Felix Dering gazed thoughtfully at the police-officer, whose exact attitude towards himself he would have given so much to ascertain. Mr. Brasher was puzzled by the glance, it seemed fearless and intelligent. Felix had shaken off the despondence and melancholy that had hung about him since the murder of Sir Christopher Dering.

"You talk in riddles, Mr. Brasher," he observed, studying the swarthy corpse before them; "had you some reason to take a professional interest in Foley?"

Brasher stroked his trim black beard. "Of a sort, yes," Felix was told: "pardon me, Mr. Dering, if I ask you what you happened to know of the—the deceased?"

The Inspector bent, drew the flaps of the blue bed-gown to athwart the deep chest, and arranged an end of the sailor's blanket over the distorted visage. Felix hesitated to answer the question, so simply yet so directly put.

"I—I had grounds," he returned, after a moment's consideration, "for a belief that Foley was acquainted with some or all of the facts relating to my uncle's death. He—he had endeavoured to—to blackmail me on the strength of such an alleged knowledge. I treated him with contempt, and advised him to inform you of any secrets he had unearthed or was otherwise possessed of. But—on—reflection I decided to probe the matter—hence my visit. I may add, Mr. Brasher, that I share your chagrin at finding him as far from my demands as he is from your clutches."

Michael Brasher knitted his brows. "You speak frankly enough, Mr. Dering," he allowed, "but Foley is, as you see, dead, and I must accept your explanations, to a certain degree, on trust. However, if you will do the cause of law and order a service you might hurry to the police-station and ask the sergeant to send a constable and summon a doctor as quickly as possible: I dare not conclude too hastily that our friend here has shuffled off his mortal coil altogether. For the present, I will remain in charge myself."

Mr. Brasher's tone was stern and precise. Felix Dering regarded him for several seconds—a light in his eye which might almost have been that of suppressed amusement. But the Inspector's request was a practical command and he could serve no good purpose by demurring to it. Not that Felix had the slightest doubt of the sailor's decease—the clenched jaw, the glazed pupil, the awful inertia of the athletic figure, betrayed the unmistakable truth. With a cold assent, he passed out of the cottage, and, at a rapid pace, made for the small police depôt hard by. Arrived there, he gave the necessary instructions, saw one constable start for the nearest physician, another for the sailor's cottage, and turned his own footsteps in the direction of the High Street.

The afternoon was growing late as he went along the quiet thoroughfare, an elasticity in his stride to which it had been a stranger for weeks. At the establishment of Caleb Forester he paused and entered. The old chemist was behind the counter; he murmured a nervous good-evening.

"Is Mr. Geddes about?" inquired Felix, meeting Caleb's gaze with a species of embarrassment; their previous encounter had been the occasion of the chemist's singular warning against Inspector Brasher.

"He's indoors, sir," said Caleb Forester; "I will mention that you wish to see him. The chemist leaned over the counter and lowered his voice. "I'm glad to have this opportunity of speaking to you, sir," came in a whisper, to Felix's ear; "about what I recently took the liberty of mentioning, sir. You recollect I confessed I wouldn't guarantee myself if I got a trifle foolish any time. I must have been indiscreet, as I feared I might be, sir, for the other day Inspector Brasher tackled me on the very subject."

"And you replied——?" said Felix imperturbably.

"Put him on a wrong scent," chuckled Caleb; "I have evidently been bragging, in my drunken pride, sir—for drunk I was, sir, to be such a fool—about having done you a service of some kind. I meant, of course, my holding my tongue about your being in Wyresdale the night of the squire's murder. But I fobbed Brasher off by saying I had recommended you to see The Colleen Bawn, at the Duchester Theatre (you remember I did mention it to you, sir), and that if I hadn't sent you there you mightn't have been able to prove an alibi."

Felix assented; he was seeking, in memory, to analyse Michael Brasher's grave and non-committal demeanour towards him.

"That satisfied B.," proceeded Caleb, "more especially as he was on a new trail. He has suspicions of my brother-in-law, Nick Foley, a sailor, and a queer character at the best, who lives near your lodge-gates. Nick's lost an arm and couldn't have been the one to do away with the squire. But Brasher is as obstinate as a mule. Why won't you get off while he gives you the chance, sir?"

Felix was pondering. "Nicholas Foley your brother-in-law!" he said; "why, yes, I recollect the name as that of your wife's family. Mr. Forester, I called at Foley's place a quarter of an hour ago—and—and found him in a species of fit—or—or worse. Brasher was there, he was the first to discover Foley ill—or dying. Perhaps you had better go round."

Caleb Forester gasped. "Dear, dear," he murmured; "Nick dying! I never liked him, sir, he was a reckless, tricky sort, but poor Margaret was fond of him. I'll go immediately. And so Brasher was there; how odd, how very odd!" He began to put on his hat and coat—they hung in a cupboard by the stairs that led out of the shop.

Felix Dering produced a tissue-paper parcel. "At your leisure, Mr. Forester," he intimated, "you might deliver this to Mr. Geddes; it is a magnifying-glass I borrowed. Tell him it has been of the greatest value to me."

He laid a hand on the old chemist's withered palm. "As for your advice to fly, Mr. Forester," he added; "you mean well, but you do not understand. I am innocent, and I shall stay in Wyresdale. Let Geddes have his glass and my message. Good-evening." And Felix took a cheerful departure.

The chemist looked after him as he completed his preparations to set out for the sailor's cottage; his decision was expressed in a doleful shake of the head. Ignorant of his ominous gesture, Felix Dering returned, at the same quick and confident pace, to Dering House.

He sprang up the flight of oaken stairs to his rooms, more buoyant and eager than he had been for a month. Suddenly a thin and piercing wail penetrated to him—a wail that shaped itself into a familiar word, the name of his tiny cousin, the lost child baronet.

"Brian! Brian!" it repeated, in a woman's piteous tones. The call echoed through the ghostly twilight of Dering House, and chilled the warm blood in Felix Dering's veins. He halted, irresolute.

While he stood in the dusky corridor a rustle of skirts stole down it; he faced about, to behold Judith Garland. At sight of him she frowned and bit her red lips.

"Lady Dering is hysterical beyond her wont," said Judith, icily; "I am sending for Dr. Vavasour. He will hear something worth hearing," she supplemented menacingly, "when he comes to visit his patient."

She caught Felix by the shoulder. "Listen," she bade him; "listen!" They waited in the brooding shadows, Felix Dering and the woman whose love for him had turned to hate.

"Brian, Brian!" cried Lady Dering's mournful voice, penetrating the panels of an adjacent bedchamber; "what have you done with him, Felix? Give me back my husband, Felix, give me back my child."

The scream faded among the corridors of the rambling mansion. Judith laughed.

"Your time is short, Felix Dering," she remarked; "you made an enemy of me or I would have helped you to conceal even this. As it is I might yet relent—we women are so susceptible to the penitence of those we—we—love."

Felix freed himself from her grasp. "You humiliate yourself in vain, Miss Garland," he said, scornfully.

Judith snarled, as a cat does in its anger. "Your fate be on your own head," she hissed; "and when you mount the scaffold for your uncle's murder, remember it is I who have sent you there."

The man she had threatened smiled. "Neither you nor anyone else will send me there," he said; "not only am I innocent, but I know the guilty."

A cry broke from Judith Garland's heaving bosom. "You know the guilty!" she whispered.

Felix brushed by into the gloom of the narrow passage. But his words floated back to her.

"I know, and when the time comes I will prove it."

CHAPTER XXXIII.

In Which a Door Closes.

"Give me a pick-up of some kind—I've managed to run against a headache of the worst sort. Raised it coming down here on a rotten Parliamentary because the express didn't serve."

The person who made this explanation was a well-dressed fellow of about thirty, with bold dark eyes and a restless mouth. Under his carefully-groomed exterior it would have been difficult to recognise the former shabby respectability of Neal Garland. Neal had, to all appearance, had a stroke of luck.

He leaned on the counter of the Wyresdale Pharmacy and studied the keen, reserved features of Archibald Geddes. The chemist's assistant had acknowledged the querulous order, and reaching to a measuring-glass, began to get down bottle after bottle, as he compounded deliberately the required stimulant.

A certain uneasiness was evident in the restless motions of his customer's feet and hands; though Neal plainly sought to disguise the close attention with which he favoured the Scotchman. When the glass was delivered to him, it was three-parts full of a crimson fluid.

"I say," observed Archibald Geddes' patient; "you mightn't guess it, but I have been referred to you for a little information. Not but what my headache's genuine. As for my name, it's Neal Garland."

"I hope," answered Geddes, rubbing his chin, "you'll not be disappointed, but I don't fancy I'm acquainted with you at all, Mr.—Mr. Garland."

"No," admitted the other, coolly, "but you were with an old pal of mine—a sailor called Foley. At least, so I gather from local gossip. I'm staying at the Wheatsheaf Hotel, where I find your boss consumes a good deal of useless breath and a large quantity of inferior whiskey. I understand, thanks to him, that you were in, so to speak, at Foley's queer death. How did it happen—a dog-bite, I am told."

"Humph!" said the Scotchman; "he was bitten, and badly, while visiting Wyresdale Park, where Mr. Hare, the owner, had given him permission to set a few snares. Some big mastiffs run loose in the park at night—a whim of Mr. Hare's. The result was Foley came to me with a lacerated throat, which I bandaged, and advised him to call in a doctor. He asked me to get him a visit from Dr. Kraft, who lives at Wyresdale Park as a private friend of Mr. Hare's. Foley claimed a species of intimacy with him. He approved of my dressings, and prescribed a little anti-febrifuge."

"A little what!" exclaimed Neal, sharply.

"Something to reduce the risk of fever," said the chemist's assistant—"Foley had malaria in his blood. Dr. Kraft had met him years before and was aware of the fact."

Neal Garland snapped his fingers abruptly—Archibald Geddes made a mental note of the gesture.

"When Dr. Kraft and I saw Foley," pursued Geddes, "he was settling to sleep, fit enough, and in the best of tempers. An hour or two later, Inspector Brasher—of the county police—called at Foley's cottage and found him dead."

The listener frowned. "What had Foley been doing to get the police on his track?" he demanded.

"Brasher said," responded the Scotchman, drily, "he had struck up an acquaintance with Foley, and was just paying a friendly visit."

Neal relinquished the delicate glass, depositing it on the counter. He discharged the small fee out of a fist full of small change.

"I heard," he added, "a whisper about your professional accuracy being attacked—the bottle of medicine, the anti-febrifuge."

"It was analysed," said the chemist's assistant, "and found correct. Dr. Kraft swallowed publicly half the contents of the bottle at the coroner's inquest. Foley died, according to Dr. Kraft, from 'spasm of the glottis,' no doubt induced by the bite. The Doctor agreed that my dressing had been most suitable. And now I have answered your questions, Mr. Garland, may I inquire if you were intimate with Foley or had only met him haphazard."

The visitor abandoned his lounging position. "We were merely acquaintances," he returned; "I ran down to Wyresdale on other business and thought I should like to have a chat with the old shell-back. He was a bit of an oddity, you will allow. But it's of no importance, especially as he's gone under."

Lighting a cigarette, Neal Garland strolled out of the shop into the High Street. A fine rain was falling, and a stray leaf whirled down the pavement. August had yielded place to September—the early gloaming showed it.

Archibald Geddes put the coppers paid him into the till, and going behind the dispensing-screen, took from under the table a wooden box. Out of this he lifted a trap of wire; in it lay a mouse, stiff. The Scotchman contemplated the inert body, the wrinkles of deep thought chasing one another over his intelligent features.

A sound disturbed him and he peered round the polished mahogany. Michael Brasher stood at the counter. He caught sight of Geddes and went to the edge of the screen.

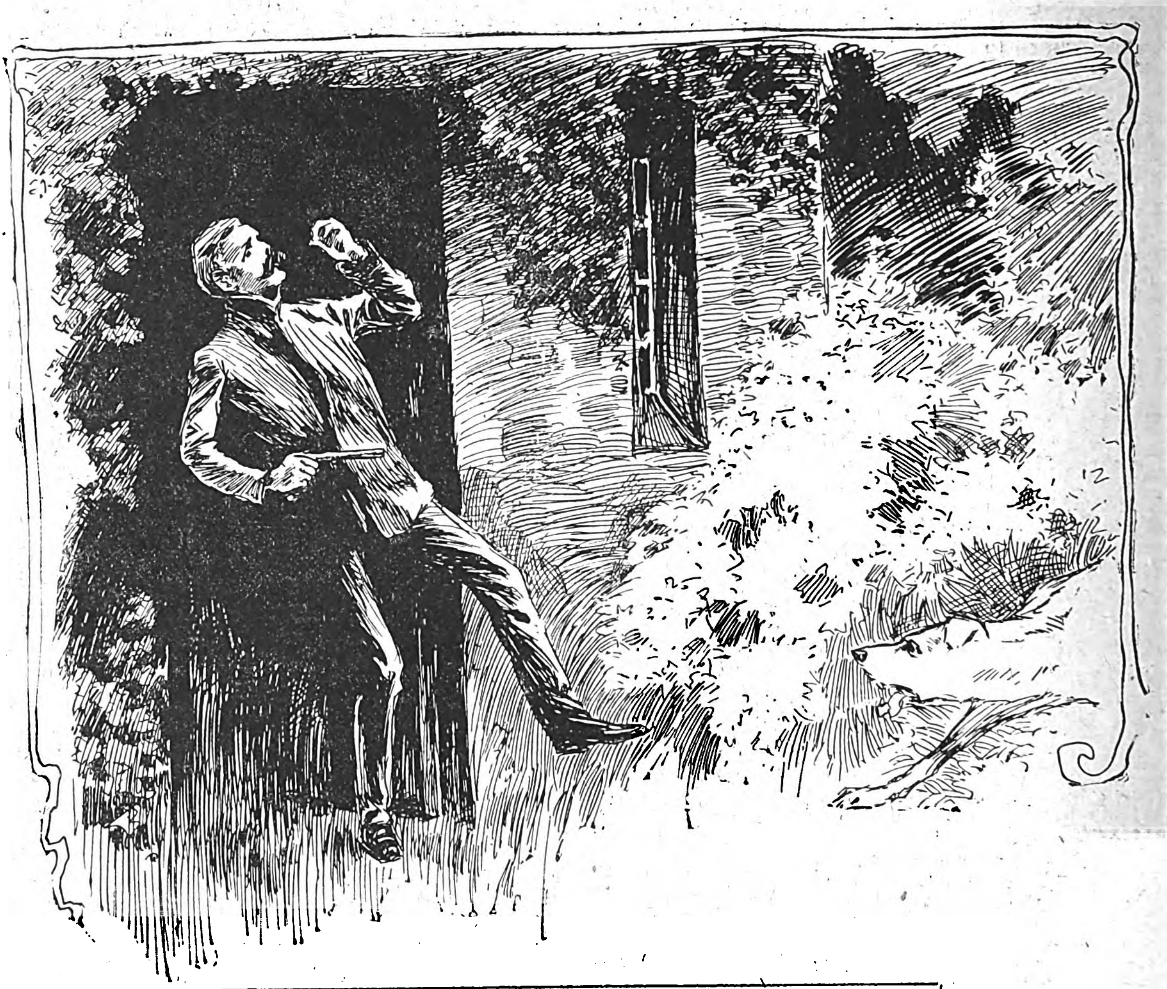
"Hullo," ejaculated the Inspector, taking in the probable significance of the article in Geddes' grasp; "troubled with mice?"

"Not over much," retorted the Scotchman; "I had a lot of bother to secure this—I wanted it for an experiment."

Brasher looked interestedly at the defunct rodent; Geddes stroked his full, strong jaw. Then he laid the mouse on a slab, opened it with a stroke of a scalpel, and examined the tiny viscera.

"That poor beast, Inspector," he said, "died from spasm of the glottis—have you ever heard the term before?"

£1 a week for six months. See the great offer in this week's BIG BUDGET, 1d.



Unexpectedly the portal behind him swung open, and he staggered in. . . . The Scotsman was a prisoner—the captive of unknown gaolers.

Michael Brasher shot a glance at him. "The thing which killed Foley, wasn't it?" he responded.

"Quite so," assented Geddes; "you dropped in fortunately, Mr. Brasher; I have completed a difficult analysis. You recollect the medicine I put up for Foley. I diddled you a trifle over it—I represented that I touched it twice—once to compound it, once to give Foley a dose. Actually, I touched it a third time—the morning after he died—to abstract a sample."

The Inspector folded his arms and his face darkened.

"I had been to the cottage the night previous," pursued Geddes, investigating (in my amateur fashion), Mr Brasher, and decided to make sure of my stuff. Early the next morning, and while the body was being prepared to lie at the Wheatsheaf, I nipped a sample. Ten drops of it on a piece of bacon killed a large rat—it died from spasm of the glottis."

"And half the whole bottle failed to kill Dr. Kraft," sneered the Inspector, "besides which, the mixture was analysed."

"Pshaw," said Geddes, "what I could do could be done by others—the bottle had been refilled subsequently to my appropriating a dose or two, with a pure version of the original prescription. My sample was from the hocussed stuff. I cannot tell you what it was that killed Foley—not the name nor the nature of the drug, though I ascertained its presence. There was more than quinine and nux vomica in the portion I took; there was a minute quantity of what, concentrated, formed a white powder. That powder I administered to this mouse on a lump of cheese—as you see, it is dead."

"And by doing so," commented Mr. Brasher, "you have destroyed the single proof of your statement."

"Have I?" queried the chemist's assistant; "there was no proof in the pinch of white dust I gave the beast. Who could prove that I got my sample out of the original bottle, that I am not a malicious liar, that I have not invented the whole thing? My researches, though suggestive, are fruitless, Inspector—hence I permit you to become a sharer in them."

"But why," began Michael Brasher, "investigate at all—what did you suspect?"

£1 a week for six months. See the great offer in this week's BIG BUDGET, 1d.

Archibald Geddes clapped him on the shoulder. "Think, my dear Brasher!" he cried; "think—it is a police-officer's first duty. But what can I do for you—have you called on business or pleasure?"

"Well," owned the Inspector, "I did wish to have a few words with Mr. Forester."

Geddes indulged in a grimace. "Good," he responded, "and I want to go out, so I'll retire and send Mr. F. through to you."

"Thanks," said Michael Brasher; "but see here, Mr. Geddes, are you joking about that medicine of Foley's?"

The Scotchman laughed as he tossed the eviscerated mouse into the waste-bucket. "Never was more serious in my life," he declared; "I have told you all there is to tell. Think, my dear Brasher, think."

And, chuckling, he disappeared into the back-parlour. He routed Caleb Forester from his doze over a belated tea, and sent him to interview Michael Brasher. After which, he himself set out by the side door through the windy fall of the day. The twilight grew as he strode on—evening was not far off.

Near the wicket in the brick circuit of Wyresdale Park he paused to survey his surroundings. The inquest upon Foley had drawn attention to the overhanging bough by which Inspector Brasher had observed the sailor scale the wall; it had been cut away and nothing but the iron transverses of the wicket offered the slightest purchase to a would-be climber. Yet to enter the prohibited demesne beyond the stout barrier was evidently the object of Archibald Geddes.

Strong in arms and chest, he mounted as Foley had done when he had tracked Professor Kraft from the High Street and the chemist's shop. Drawing himself to the top bar of the gate, Geddes thrust himself outward and upward by a lever-like action of his knee, gained the parapet of the wall, and alighted inside.

From his pocket he drew a short instrument, which glittered, save where it ended in a rubber bulb. It was an ammonia-gun, with a nickel barrel. Geddes was protected by a simple and noiseless weapon from the canine guardians of the place.

As the sailor had done, he stole across the turf between the trees to the base of the rounded hill, on whose slopes there stood the structure now accepted by Wyresdale as the luxurious observatory of the Golden Dwarf.

Soon Archibald Geddes became aware, as he scouted to and fro about the structure, of a monotonous throbbing sound, like the persistent coughing of some huge animal. He listened to it as he made a cautious tour of the observatory.

A deep bark broke the stillness of the autumn dusk, and a great dog leapt out of the increasing gloom. The chemist's assistant levelled his gun and a spurt of ammonia blinded the brute in its spring. It grovelled, howling piteously; another of Otto Hare's ferocious mongrels rushed to its cry. A third and fourth came, barking as if possessed.

Archibald Geddes was forced back against the low door. He kept the brutes at bay with his ammonia-projector, but the charges were giving out.

Unexpectedly, the portal behind swung wide, he staggered in, to darkness and the determined grasp of some invisible rescuers. There was a hollow clang and the bellowing of the dogs waxed fainter; the door had shut. The Scotchman was a prisoner—the captive of unknown gaolers.

A Gase of Gratitude.

Jerrold Manning had reached the period in life when mankind in general granted him the privileges commonly accorded old age—a sufficient number of years having chased over his head to render it well nigh bald, while his teeth, the monuments of youth, had fallen out one by one, to be replaced by age's artist, the dentist! Yet withal he would have gasped with horror at the idea of his having entered his dotage, but when an old man is ever astride a new hobby, one name for childishness serves as well as another. He had within the past twelve months exhausted several such whimsical beasts—mounted and ridden them until he or the hobby had declared "Enough!"

First, he had money to humour his fancies; secondly, he was temperate and healthy, and lastly, not unattractive in face and figure, and was always elegantly dressed. He had now arrived at the mature, if not ripe, age of sixty, and had withstood the wiles, smiles and graces of scores of charming women with whom he had come in contact within the past forty years, and it had just dawned upon him that since there were no natural heirs to his estate he might derive considerable satisfaction from a free expenditure of a reasonable amount in philanthropy. The evening he had reached this conclusion he had dropped into a first-class theatre and was attracted by the singing of a mere slip of a girl. Her voice was untutored, but pathetically sweet and plaintive, yet without a suggestion of weariness. She sang from the heart, and each note seemed to touch a responsive chord in his nature as no song had ever done before, and long after the last note had ceased to vibrate, and the singer forgotten by the audience, Jerrold Manning sat dreaming.

Ah, here was the young nightingale with the clipped wings! Here was a voice that needed but slight cultivation to thrill the hypercritical world of music as it had thrilled him! Perhaps she was poor—folly, he knew she was poor—little brothers and sisters and a widowed mother clinging to her for support—these were the tones in her life that inspired the plaintive note in her voice! Was she pretty? He did not know, scarcely cared, but he resolved to give her a helping hand, an honest fatherly hand, toward higher ideals, greater perfection and truer art.

A resolution on his part was easily shaped into action, and but a few days elapsed until he had ascertained the private name of the young singer, located her abode, and arranged an interview through a mutual acquaintance. Accordingly one afternoon he presented himself at the home of Miss Nellie Bridges, as the young lady was known. "You need not wait, Stuart," he had told his driver. "I'll take a car back," and the worthy old coachman had chuckled and immediately fallen into a reflective mood as to what "de guv'nor" was up to now! He had been in Mr. Manning's service for years, had seen him take home ragged urchins out of the street who were supposed to be "full of promise" and "out of their element," etc., and had known his master to spend days following up a case of cruelty to children or animals, until he was always prepared for anything, or, to use his own language, "was 'spectin' the most un'spected things."

Mr. Manning was somewhat fastidious, and the mixed scent of onions, cabbage, garlic and coffee that greeted his nostrils as he entered the tenement was hardly calculated to stimulate his theory of establishing higher ideals among the people he might find there! Mrs. Bridges was engaged in the praiseworthy, if not intellectual, occupation of washing, and after wiping the soapsuds from her big fat hands, came forward cordially, meanwhile using her apron to dispel the beads of perspiration that bedewed her brow.

"And so ye wishes to see Nellie, does ye? Well, sir, she'll be in presently," setting forward a chair, and again bringing the handy apron into utility as a dust-cloth. "If yez can wait a bit, sorr, as she has just gone to the sthore on an errant, and sure seems to me she's gone plenty long!"

"I heard your daughter sing, Mrs. Bridges, and I feel deeply——"

"Sure, now, Nellie has a pretty voice, sir—ivery one does say the same, but she isn't me own daughter, you understand. Sure, Oi found her on the sthreet when she was but a baby, and nivir, sir, to this day, have Oi learned where she did come from."

"Then she's alone in the world, and is——"

"No, sir, don't you be a-thinkin' of that—my Pat and Oi we loves Nellie, and though she sings loike an angel, she loves us, too—at least, we think she do," she added reflectively, "though yez can see, sir, she's a lady, and we are not of the gintry, to be sure."

To feel that his prospective protegee was not of this blood and bone, honest though it might be, proved no small relief to him, and he found his interest strengthening, and his heart unfolding with kindliness and goodwill.

Presently a quick step was heard from adown the bare hallway, and a sweet young voice softly singing the second verse of DeKoven's masterpiece:

> "O promise me that you will take my hand—
> The most unworthy in this lonely land—
> And let me sit beside you——"

She had reached the door, and, ceasing her song, she stopped, slightly confused, but with a dignity that was inborn, for certainly it was not the result of cultivation; then stood awaiting some form of introduction.

"Sure, Nellie, yez been a long time comin', and this gentleman here has been as patient as a lamb, and——"

"My name is Manning, and you are Miss Bridges, I believe," and the old gentleman gallantly rose and ended the embarrassing situation. Nellie acquiesced gracefully, seating herself and waiting expectantly. He was struck with the incongruity of her surroundings—here was the proverbial pearl cast before swine, kindly though they were—nevertheless swine, and his heart gave a throb of pity that nearly suffocated him, and it was some moments before he could lay before her his scheme for her deliverance, as he now regarded her rescue from sordid surroundings.

"Miss Bridges, as you see, I am an old man. Perhaps I'm fanatical, perhaps I'm foolish, but I am honest, and having heard you sing I became deeply interested in you, not only in you, but particularly am I concerned about your future—your voice, which I consider possesses one rare quality—that of fine feeling—and when blended with exquisite pathos renders it unusual in the extreme."

"You are very kind, sir, but I fear you overrate——"

"Not at all, my dear young lady," he used the term not flippantly, but naturally and seriously. "I have heard some music in my day, and, as I said before, I'm plain spoken, and will admit 'tis more your voice than your personality in which I am concerned, although the latter I find charming," he added simply. Then, as she ventured no response:

"I have means, and feel that in the interest of musical art you could be of much service should you accept at my hands the cultivation of your voice."

The offer was an unusual one, and so delicately had he clothed his charity in the habiliments of a request, a favour—a kindness on her part—that Nellie herself was puzzled for a definite conclusion regarding his object. As the prospect of possible culture of her voice dawned upon her—this, the dream of her life—her head had seemingly danced a jig of expectancy to the tune played by her throbbing heart!

Tender years and her ignorance of conventionalities in general perhaps saved her from the mortification which fear of a baser object would have inspired to the mind of one better versed in worldliness, yet to Nellie but one fear presented itself—that of her inability to meet his requirements or attain the height of perfection he might assign to her. She was silent some moments, and Jerrold Manning studied her face thoughtfully. "A glorious opportunity for evolution, science, and art!" was his resume of her condition.

"I am grateful, sir, but I fear I would be a disappointment to you. I know so little of music I hardly see how I ever had the courage to sing for money; but some way people liked my voice, and so I have kept on because —well, we needed the money, Pat, Mammy, and I."

It was quite an hour before the old gentleman left the garlic-scented tenement; but when he did, a tear glistened in his usually merry eye, and his big heart was tenderly nursing the new offspring of human and philanthropic love!

* * * * *

Three years had passed—passed swiftly, happily, gloriously, for Nellie, in one of the fashionable finishing schools for young ladies—fashionable, hence well patronised and expensive, where she received special training in music, with a smattering of general information. She had been a bright, winsome, ambitious pupil, and her teachers, who occasionally had such cases with which to deal, asked no questions regarding her previous education, but endeavoured only to fit her as best they could, in so short a time, for a successful musical career. Nellie was keenly alive to this rare opportunity, and applied herself assiduously to every task, and at the end of three years had accomplished more than one of indifferent nature could have mastered in double that period.

Mr. Manning had called frequently, and on each occasion noted with a thrill of something akin to ecstacy the improvement in the voice of his protegee. Ah! here was a tone once lacking in power, now beautifully modulated, superbly full and mellow, yet retaining all its original sweetness, and again the dashing staccato movement, piquant and gay, with occasional little trills like the gurgle of a mountain stream, and so delicately executed that he marvelled at her simplicity and lack of self-consciousness, for here indeed was true genius.

She had ever greeted this more than friend without affectation, yet never disguising her almost tender regard for him. Once in trying, as she ever did, to thank him for his repeated kindness, she exclaimed:

"Ah, my dear friend, how can I ever repay you for all you have done? No father was ever kinder." And raising his hand to her lips, she imprinted a kiss, while tears of gratitude filled her eyes.

"Do not speak of repaying me, Nellie. All I ask is that your name be spotless, and your songs heard by the whole world, and that in listening it may know that your voice is no less true than your life. Then I'll be repaid!"

But the days of study were over now, and Jerrold Manning was preparing for her professional debut, sparing neither pains nor money. Dreading lest her association with poor old Mrs. Bridges and Pat might contaminate her, or at least lessen her opportunities for a successful opening into the musical world, he had found temporary lodging for her with a widowed friend, who supplied in refinement what she lacked in wealth.

Riches, discreetly exhibited and distributed, are the magic words that open the treasure caskets of the all-desirable patronage of good society and professional deference. Nellie's debut was a success. Jerrold Manning's protegee (others said ward), from no one knew where, was to come out professionally. She was beautiful and a romantic, not-to-be-unearthed side of her life was referred to quite cunningly by the press, until all the city—at least the most desirable element—were agog over the affair. The house was packed to suffocation, the boxes were full of faultlessly attired men and beautiful women—as much of the latter being apparent as the semi-operatic occasion would warrant! Artificial perfumes, intermingled with those of rare orchids, and roses were wafted across the house, to be fanned again by the sweep of glittering fans held by jewelled hands.

There was a polite hush, and Nellie, arrayed in virgin white, came forth confidently and reassuringly. Jerrold Manning, watching her from his box, caught his breath as he looked at her—surely, just to see her like that was worth all the paltry sum he had spent in her behalf! He caught his breath again—she had begun to sing. 'Twas the mad song from Lucrezia Borgia, and as she touched each note with precision and grace, on through the difficult passages where dramatic force imbued each word, his pride was boundless. She ceased, and a perfect shower of flowers lay at her feet, and gracefully raising a large bouquet of roses from the floor, she sang a dainty little aria as an encore, that again showed the beauty of her voice, though in a lighter vein.

The programme was done, but the audience, now her friends, so responsive is humanity when sent to meet the nature of a trusting, winsome, and talented woman—yet clamoured for one more number, and she, in the midst of her triumph, remembered an incident of long ago, passed a word to her leader, and began singing her old-time favourite, "Oh, Promise Me." Jerrold Manning listened as he had never listened before to earthly song, and as she reached the words, "Oh, promise me that you will take my hand," there was a beating as of unseen hands on his breast, he clutched the railing for a moment, rose, donned hat and top coat, and left the theatre.

Cupid's ways are mysterious; but at sixty he had met his fate—he was in love!

All night in smoking jacket and slippers he had paced his chamber, again and again, but this last and crowning emotion of his soul, which naught before had stirred, refused to be subdued. He thought of honour—was this honour to ask a young woman, overwhelmed with gratitude, as he knew she was, to give her young heart into an old man's keeping! Bah! He was dreaming! Then hope whispered of the advantages to her of foreign travel—ah yes!—she couldn't go alone—she needed his protection! So he had at last yielded to the sweet temptation, and in the morning, at scarcely a conventional hour, presented himself before her. He seemed to see her anew—but how could he hope? He plunged boldly into the subject—unbosomed his heart, pictured the years of study abroad, wealth—and all he asked in return was her esteem, comradeship, friendship! She listened; duty, gratitude and respect arranged themselves on one side, and on the other, a new found love, the love of one she had for years previous deemed too exalted in the social world for her to dare confess, even to herself, the love she bore him; and now, through her old friend's benevolence, when she had reached a higher plane in life, she had been sought and wooed by her idol. Oh! unspeakable joy!—but must she cast aside this bliss, as yet scarcely realised—all for duty's sake? Yet did she not owe Jerrold Manning everything—more than she could ever repay? Her formal acceptance of Horace Maddox had not yet been given—cruel fate that it had not! She struggled as with a mighty foe—fought the battle of stern duty versus love, hope, bliss—to her womanly nature it was life itself—still her answer to Jerrold Manning was bravely spoken.

"You are the best friend I ever had, and the esteem respect, and honour you ask is yours, and more; and if my hand in marriage will repay the debt I owe, 'tis yours!"

The old man gazed long and lovingly, even solemnly, into the pretty downcast face.

"I do not want your gratitude, Nellie only the opportunity to make you happy;" and with the old-time courtesy and deference, but with his heart aflame, he stooped and kissed her trembling hands.

* * * * *

'Tis said that joy seldom kills, but it may produce perfect oblivion; and this was true in the case of Jerrold Manning, as he briskly walked back to his apartments that eventful morning.

Someone thrust a friendly hand through his arm, and then he heard a cheery voice:

"How are you, Manning—seem awfully absorbed!"

"Why, hello, Maddox! Yes, was rather busy with my own thoughts. Have——"

"Dreaming over Miss Nellie's success last night, eh? Well, that's pardonable, I'm sure. Simply magnificent, wasn't she? Not a bobble in her work—perfect, in fact, But now that I have a chance, I'll just speak to you on a very important matter, which in honour I think you should know. You see—that is, Mr. Manning, I want to marry Nellie, and, as her father by adoption, I want your consent. I love her—have for years—and know she reciprocates. Truth is, I asked her last night, but, womanlike, she is weighing her decision."

"I—oh—call a hack, Maddox. Vertigo, you know," as he was assisted into the carriage. "See you again about that little matter!"

A few hours later a note was handed Nellie, addressed in his familiar chirography, which read:

> "My Dear Little Girl,—'Twas but an old man's folly—an old man's dream—from which I have awakened, and I cannot accept such a sacrifice. The greatest happiness you can bestow on me is your hand in marriage with Horace Maddox
> "Forget my idle, foolish words, and let me still and always be simply your father.
>
> "Jerrold Manning."

"Do you love me?" she asked fondly. "Dearly," replied he. "Would you die for me?" "No, my precious one. Mine is an undying love." She had to make the best of this.

Aunt Dorothy: "How many commandments are there, Johnny?" Johnny (glibly): "Ten." Aunt Dorothy: "And now suppose you were to break one of them?" Johnny (tentatively): "Then there'd be nine."

Mrs. Hingso awoke suddenly. "John!" "Whadoyouwant?" sleepily. "There's burglars in the house." "Let 'em burgle." "You're a coward. They'll steal all the silver." "Um-um." "They'll take my jewels." "All right." Silence for a moment. "John." "Can't you let me sleep?" "They aren't in the dining-room," in an awful voice; "they are in the cellar, stealing the wine——" "What!" leaping out of bed. "The scoundrels! Where's my revolver?"

A BILL OF ACCEPTANCE.

Arthur Seymour sat down heavily in a chair and groaned. He had risen from his bed and begun to dress himself with the feeling that something was wrong; he had only half dressed when his efforts to discover the cause of this feeling were successful, and the memory of the events of the preceding night came back with a rush.

What demon had tempted him to play at cards with that fellow, Captain Vicars? He knew that the man had a reputation for always winning! But he had been fool enough to try his luck—goaded, probably, by the thought that he might in that way do something to retrieve his losses on the race yesterday afternoon—and he had lost £2,500.

Truly, his plight was a sorry one. It was useless to say hard things about his luck; he owed just £4,000 now to the bookmaker and Captain Vicars, and it must be paid by the morrow. How was it to be done?

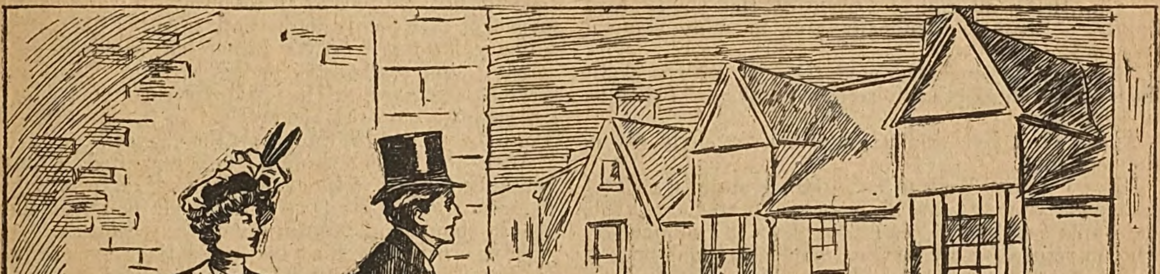
He could not apply to his sole relative and guardian, Sir Henry Seymour; the old gentleman was down upon extravagance, and would not advance a penny beyond the allowance which he had apportioned to his ward. Moreover, the sum was such a big one, that did the mere fact come to the old man's knowledge, Arthur would lose all chance of inheriting the fortune that lay snugly in the bank in the name of the old knight.

Well, sitting in the chair would not mend matters; he must be up and doing, or good-bye to future prosperity. He completed his toilet, and, after a scanty breakfast, went out to his club.

It was nearly twelve o'clock, he remembered, so that he was almost certain to find Jack Granger there. Jack was a man of expedients, and might be able to suggest some way out of the mess.

"He'll be very clever if he does," murmured Arthur despondently, "for the hole I've got myself into is a pretty big one; but I must try him."

He had been walking along without noticing where he was going. A cry for help near at hand aroused him, and he looked about him wonderingly. Where on earth had he strayed? He had turned a wrong corner,



He was soon lying groaning in the gutter.

seemingly, for he could not recognise the locality. He was in some narrow bye-street. But had he not heard a cry for help? Of course, and it had seemed to come from the corner.

He ran to the corner—only a few yards—and looked down the next street; there was a drunken rough trying to embrace the slight figure of a girl.

Not a bad-looking girl, either, thought Arthur, as he rushed to the rescue. Her face was distinctly pretty, although rather distorted by indignation and fear.

The rough was a burly fellow, but in his condition he was no match for the trained young athlete, and he was soon lying groaning in the gutter. Then Arthur turned to the still panting girl and asked her if she were hurt.

"No, thank you," she jerked out, her face becoming still more highly coloured with shame. "I came this way to get my errand done more quickly, and he set upon me and tried to——"

"Well, he won't be able to steal a kiss from anyone else this morning," remarked Arthur, surveying the form of the brute.

"He didn't kiss me. I prevented him," cried the girl indignantly. "But," she added more gently, "I owe you many thanks for your timely assistance. I am afraid I cannot show my gratitude in any more useful manner."

"Oh, that's all right!" returned the young man lightly. "Shall I accompany you to more civilised regions?"

"No, thank you," answered the girl with a slight flush on the cheeks that were now cooling. "I shall be all right now."

And with a bow and a grateful look, shyly given, she was gone.

"Now," mused Arthur, as he strode down the street in an endeavour to locate his position, "if this were a tale she would turn out to be the daughter of a millionaire, who, in return for my services, would lend me—or give me—£5,000 to set me on my legs again. But she isn't, so I must find Granger."

He did find Granger, and that gentleman looked blank when he heard of his friend's predicament.

"I'd lend it to you myself like a shot, my boy, if I could; but it's too large an order. Besides, I'm hard up myself, for I've just had to meet a loan and pay over £500 to old Smiley. I wonder where he got that name? It fits him, for he always has a grin on his face, which is more than can be said for his clients."

An idea flashed across Arthur's brain. He was ready to grasp at any straw.

"A bill!" he cried eagerly. "Couldn't I get old Smiley to advance the money—for a time?"

"Not on your own hand only," observed Granger drily. "Smiley isn't so simple as that. He knows very well that Sir Henry is not bound to leave his money to you—that you may lose it if you kick over the traces. It's his business to know that sort of thing, you see. Besides, you couldn't borrow the money indefinitely, and you don't know for certain when the inevitable will happen."

"I didn't mean that, exactly," returned Arthur shamefacedly. "My idea was to get a loan for a time. I might be able to tide over this mess in a few months."

"You'll have to try someone else, then, for you won't be able to do business with that old gentleman unless you can get your bill backed by a substantial person."

A long pause ensued. It was broken by a question from Granger.

"Can't you think of anyone who would oblige you?" he asked. "It is rather a heavy responsibility, but something might turn up in six months, you know. But it would cost you an awful lot for interest."

"I don't care what it would cost for interest or anything else, so long as I can tide over this trouble. In six months I might be able to pay it off, and the old gentleman would never hear of it. At the worst, I believe he would pay the money to save the family name, but my allowance and prospects would go, and he would take care to let it be known that he was not to be held responsible for my doings."

"Then you had better try to find someone willing to chance it. It will give you a respite for half a year, and that's a consideration. I would go to old Smiley and arrange the best terms for you. He knows me."

Another pause; then Seymour spoke slowly.

"I once did a good turn for Guy Stanton. I hear that his father has made a pile of money over stocks and company promotion, and that Guy is pretty flush. I wonder if he would risk it and back a bill for me?"

"It's worth trying, anyhow," returned Granger. "You can't afford to let any opportunity slip. I'll tell you how to get the right side of him—flatter him about his cricket playing. The beggar isn't half bad with the bat, but he is no good at all with the ball; and he has a suspicion that people don't think much of his performances at bowling. So you flatter him generally on his playing, and particularly on his batting. That and a discreet reference to the good turn you did him at college ought to work the oracle. In the meantime I'll work the thing with Smiley on the chance."

With this understanding they separated, Granger betaking himself to the money lenders' office, and Seymour starting off for Lord's, where he thought it likely that he should find Stanton among the spectators.

After a little searching his expectations were realised. He found his former friend much disgusted at the poor show made by one of the elevens, and Arthur, though he felt hot at the part he was playing, ludicrously led the conversation into the right groove. They left the ground, and went to a refreshment room, where, after having talked Stanton into a suitable frame of mind, Arthur broached the subject of the loan.

Stanton was not a business man—his father was disappointed at his lack of commercial acumen—but he looked grave at the suggestion that he should become responsible for such a sum of money.

"But, I say," he objected, "suppose you couldn't meet it at maturity? How then? That would be rough on me, and the governor would rave—and he might refuse to pay. He's pretty 'cute."

"Oh, I don't think you need worry about that," replied Arthur, in agony at the idea that Stanton would decline. "It's certain to be all right." In his own mind he was not at all certain, and he hated himself for trying to deceive the young cricketer, but he was desperate. A respite for six months must be obtained at any cost.

After a little further demur, Stanton agreed, and it was arranged that they should meet at noon on the following day at the office of Mr. Smiley to complete the transaction. Seymour went off to find his friend Granger in order to settle preliminaries.

The next morning Seymour and Granger went to the moneylender's office just before twelve o'clock. The outer door was opened by a young woman, Mr. Smiley's general clerk and secretary, who ushered them into a small waiting-room, with the intimation that they would have a minute or so, as Mr. Smiley was engaged, and they were a little before their time. Mr. Stanton had not arrived, she said in answer to Granger's inquiry.

"That's one of Smiley's little dodges, having a girl in the office; she is cheaper than a man would be, and he thinks that she is more attractive. Did you notice her?"

"No," was Arthur's reply. He was too preoccupied to notice anything. Perhaps Stanton might not turn up, after all.

"You ought to have gone for him and brought him here," was Granger's comment when Seymour gave expression to his fears. "Your game is up if he doesn't come. Perhaps he remembered that the interest was not included in the 4,000. That makes 1,600 more. Forty per cent.; it's stiff, but Smiley wouldn't do any better, and you wouldn't get it anywhere else."

"If he doesn't turn up I must say good-bye to Sir Henry's money and my present allowance. As it is, I may lose it, for, honestly, I don't see where the money is to come from in six months. If that bill matures and I don't meet it——"

"Hush!" warned the other. "This door is open, and the girl may hear. I don't think she has caught any of our talk, and I think she's right. But I must go and tell her that I don't want Stanton to see me."

He went out and had a moment's talk with the clerk, whom he had seen before. Then he returned to the waiting-room, while she answered her employer's bell and showed the other client out.

A minute later Seymour was ushered into the money-lender's private room by the lady clerk, Granger remaining in the waiting-room. Had Seymour been less preoccupied, he would have perceived that the girl kept her face averted as much as possible.

Shortly afterwards the outer bell rang, and Miss Allen ushered Stanton into the private room.

Mr. Smiley was all smiles. He felt that, though there was some risk, the chances of a good stroke of business were preponderant. Having once got hold of young Stanton, although in an indirect manner, he might be able to get him into the clutches into which so many young men had been inveigled. Smiley was not the man to stop short of anything that would bring money into his coffers—that is, except crime of too flagrant a nature. He was very careful to keep out of reach of the long arm of the law, but he went dangerously near it at times.

At Granger's suggestion the bill had been drawn already. Smiley fussed about, handing each of the two men a pen and pointing out where they had to sign. He kept his hand partly over the bill, so that they could not see the amount properly, and each signed it without knowing that it was for £5,800. Smiley had put a little on the amount to cover possible expenses. Stanton had the figure of £4,000 in his mind, and did not dream that he was backing the bill for more than that sum.

Arthur stifled a sigh of relief as he took the bank-notes. The moneylender tried to begin a conversation with Stanton, whom he regarded as a probable pigeon to be plucked; but that young man was not in a humour for a conversation. He was angry with himself for having agreed to do this for Arthur; and—although not a keen observer—he took a dislike to the smiling individual who had placed that bill so carefully in his safe. He did not even wait for Seymour, but, bidding both him and the money-lender a hasty good-day, he went out abruptly.

Time went on. At first Arthur thought very little of the loan. Six months is a long time to look forward to, and youth is always hopeful. The immediate danger had been averted, and that was sufficient.

Four months passed, and Seymour began to think that he must be doing something. His Micawber-like policy of waiting for something to turn up was not a success. On the day when he arrived at this conclusion, he heard a disagreeable piece of news. The desire for money had blunted the business acuteness of the elder Stanton, and a slump on the market had ruined him, or practically so. This would make Smiley inexorable in the matter of the bill; there was no earthly chance of grace or renewal on payment of the interest.

But the more Seymour thought over the affair, the more hopeless it appeared. Day after day he racked his brain for some way out, but nothing feasible came to his mind. He became haggard and ill, and even Granger's gaiety could not dispel the clouds. He tried gambling again on a small scale, but he was careful not to go too far. At the end of six weeks, however, he had not advanced his position in the least. In ten days more the bill would become due.

Granger and he had a long talk, the upshot of which was that they decided to pay a visit to Mr. Smiley and endeavour to effect a compromise. It was "dealing in futures," but it was the only chance.

Mr. Smiley received them very affably, but as soon as they stated their request he politely, but very firmly, declined to accede to it. It might be a good stroke of business to agree to postpone the presentation of the bill until the death of Sir Henry, who was an old man and not in the best state of health, but there was an equal chance of the transaction resulting in a bad debt. Sir Henry might live a long time—he took good care of himself—and he was just a little eccentric; he might leave the bulk of his money to some exploration fund, for he was an antiquarian. If the bill were presented at maturity, there was no doubt that Sir Henry Seymour would pay it, and it did not matter in the least to Smiley what the consequences would be for Arthur. No, Smiley was not to be got at; he was in a bad temper, having made some serious bad debts during the past three months, and having been very much worsted in a lawsuit only the day before.

The moneylender went to his safe, unlocked it with a key which he always kept on a bunch that passed into no other hands, and drew forth a paper from one of a set of miniature pigeon-holes.

"It is due on the 21st of this month, and the amount is £5,800," he said, reading from the bill as though he did not know the facts by heart.

"Six hundred," corrected Seymour and Granger simultaneously.

"Eight hundred," repeated Smiley drily.

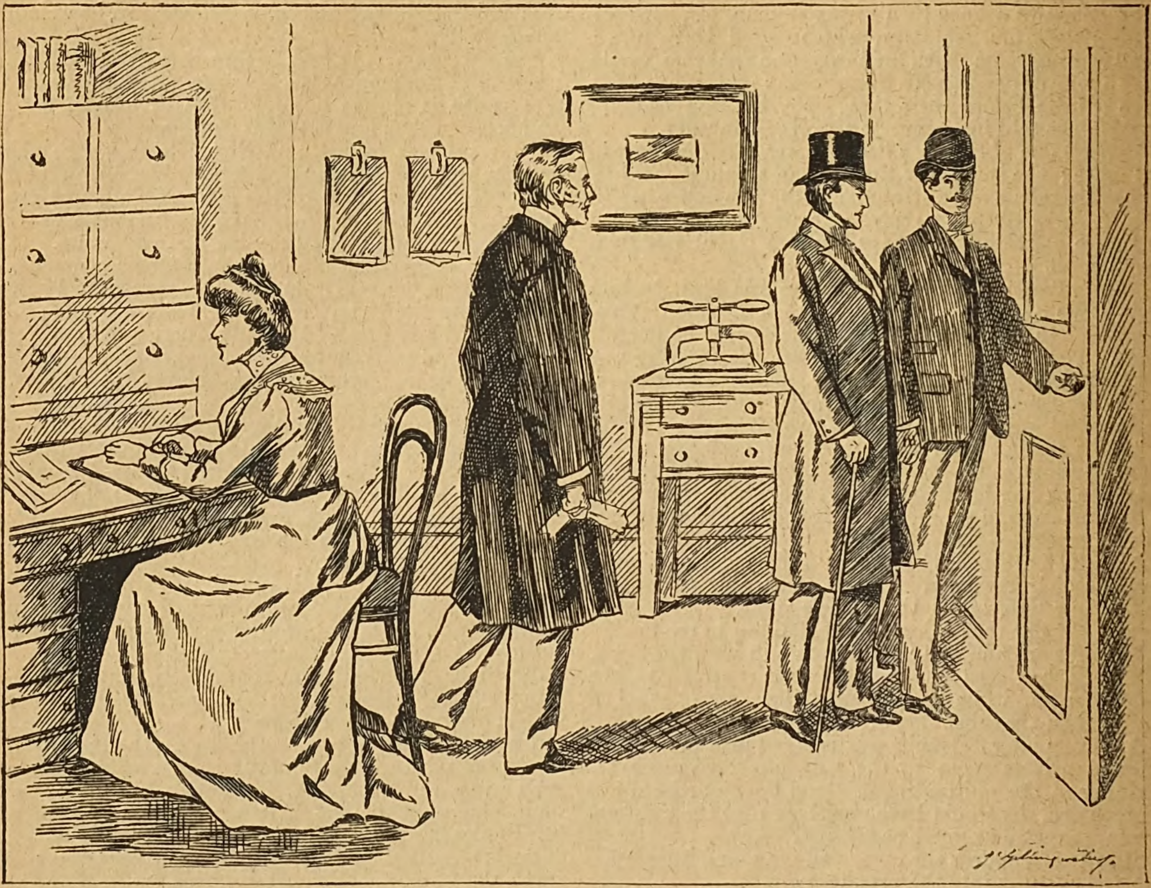
"But that's wrong," declared Granger stoutly. "The arrangement was forty per cent. and that——"

"I cannot spare time to argue the point," returned Smiley resolutely. "This is the bill, duly signed, and it is for the amount I have stated."

"You old thief!" cried Granger, rising angrily.

The moneylender had just deposited the bill in the pigeon-hole marked "S" when this remark was made. He slammed the door of the safe in an outburst of rage, and shouted to them to leave his office.

£1 a week for six months. See the great offer in this week's BIG BUDGET, 1d.



The money-lender had quite lost his temper. He followed them along the passage and half-way down the stairs.

“Oh, we'll go,” said Granger, more coolly. He opened the baize-covered door and walked into the general office, followed by Arthur, who was too dazed to utter a word.

“And if you are not here on the proper date to meet that bill,” screamed Smiley, quite beside himself, and forgetting the presence of Miss Allen and everything else, “I'll send a note to Sir Henry Seymour for payment.”

The moneylender had quite lost his temper. He followed them along the passage and halfway down the stairs (his office was on the first floor) muttering angrily. The slamming of the inner hall door informed him that his insulting visitor had departed, and he made his way slowly back to his own room.

Miss Allen was standing near the baize-covered door, which was shut. She looked frightened.

He pushed past her, entered the room, and flung himself into the chair at the table. Then he felt in his pocket for his keys, in order to open a drawer in the table, and, not finding them, turned mechanically to the safe at his back and took them from the lock where they were hanging. But he could not work; he was too much annoyed. He grasped his hat and coat savagely and strode out of the office, putting on his coat as he went.

That night Arthur Seymour fell ill of brain fever, and became powerless to do anything against the fate that was hanging over him.

Jack Granger was continually at his friend's bedside, listening to his ravings, of which the bill formed the most important part. Granger was inclined to heap maledictions on his own head for suggesting the loan from Smiley. It was not his fault that Arthur had got into the original trouble, and he had acted in Seymour's interests; but this reflection brought him little consolation. If he could only help Arthur!

Sir Henry Seymour was in India—he usually spent the winter in India—or Granger would have gone straight to him and pleaded for his friend, although the probability of being able to melt the old man's heart would have been small. His absence would entail a little waiting on Smiley's part, but the effect on Arthur's prospects would be exactly the same. Granger even thought of going to the moneylender and eating humble pie; but gave up the notion as futile.

He was seated by Arthur's bed two days later, when the patient's manservant entered softly, and said that a young lady was asking to see Mr. Seymour or Mr.

Granger on very urgent business. Wondering who it could be, he went into an adjoining room and found Miss Allen waiting.

"I hope you will excuse me," she began nervously. "I hear that Mr. Seymour is very ill."

"He is," rejoined Granger gravely. "I am afraid that he cannot attend to the matter of that bill just now. I suppose that's what you have come about. But it isn't due yet."

"I have come about the bill," said Miss Allen hesitatingly; "but I have not come on Mr. Smiley's account."

"Sit down," requested the surprised Granger. "What is it all about?"

"I overheard some of your conversation nearly six months ago," continued the girl, taking the proffered seat, "and I have learnt enough since then to convince me that Mr. Seymour cannot meet his liability, and that he will be ruined if he does not meet it." She stopped abruptly.

Granger nodded. What was the meaning of it?

"Mr. Seymour rendered me timely assistance once, when I was attacked by a ruffian. I don't think he knew me again, but I recognised him."

"Ah, indeed!" That was all he could say.

"I owe him a debt of gratitude, and I have come to pay it. Smiley cannot demand payment unless he produces the bill. Here it is."

And she handed him the paper. He looked at it in utter bewilderment; then the full force of possession flashed upon him, and he emitted a joyful whistle.

"That's the ticket, by Jove!" he exclaimed. "We'll hold it, and the old rascal is done."

"Oh!" cried Miss Allen, in dismay. "Oh! I forgot! You must not keep it—that would be robbery. I only thought of keeping it out of the way till Mr. Seymour was better and able to pay. Oh, give it me back! I shall be a thief!"

"No, you won't. We shall not rob him—only keep it safe till my friend is able to pay. It will serve the old scoundrel right for defrauding Seymour out of £200. Here, you may hold it yourself, to make sure. But how did you get it?"

"When you both came to him and Mr. Smiley got out of temper, and spoke of telling Sir Henry Seymour, I knew what was meant. I was seized with a mad desire to help your friend in return for what he had done for me. I saw the keys hanging in the safe lock. A thought seized me. While he was following you I ran into the room, pulled open the door of the safe and took out the bill. I had just time to stuff it in my dress pocket and get into my own office when he came back. But, oh dear! what have I done? I can't go back to him. I feel like a traitor—and I hate the place. I had to take it, because I was in great straits, and couldn't get another situation." And the girl, quite unstrung, burst into tears.

Granger soothed her, and told her to go home and fear nothing, as he would get her a situation. But she must say nothing about the bill.

Granger sat down and gave himself up to thought. The game was in his hands now, and he must work out the best way to play it. That did not take him long, and he went back to Arthur's room in a happier frame of mind.

On the morning of the day on which the bill was due, Granger went to Smiley's office and said he had come to meet it. His friend was too ill to attend to the matter, and he had come with his own cheque to liquidate the liability. Smiley sneered, and said he should require proof that the cheque would be honoured before he parted with his security, to which Granger answered that they would walk round to the bank together and there make the exchange.

There could be no objection to this course, so Smiley went to the safe—and found the pigeon-hole empty! With an angry exclamation he said that he must have mixed it with some other papers. Granger agreed to wait while he searched for it, but the document was nowhere to be found.

The perspiration stood on the moneylender's brow. Where was it? No one but he ever had the key of the safe. He turned to Granger and said that as he was unable to find the paper just then, he would give him a receipt in full, and forward the bill when found. But to this Granger demurred.

"How do I know whether you have parted with it to someone else, and are not trying to swindle me?" he asked. "No; let me know when the paper is found, and you shall have the cash."

But the bill was not to be found. Smiley made one or two applications for payment, the response to which was that it would be better to wait a little longer. Seymour recovered, his recovery being accelerated by the information that Smiley had agreed to wait. The two friends went abroad, leaving Miss Allen in a good post in the City; and thus the matter rested for greater part of a year.

Then came the sudden death of Sir Henry Seymour. Arthur hated himself whenever he remembered that he had speculated on the old man's death. The whole business was a thing to be ashamed of, and it was a lesson that lasted him a lifetime.

It was then that he agreed to accept Smiley's receipt in full, as the security could not be found. When Granger showed this receipt to Miss Allen, she handed over the bill, which was destroyed.

Seymour rewarded Stanton—now in rather needy circumstances—for his timely assistance. There was another person who had helped him, and, according to the latest rumours, her reward will soon follow. But both of them take care to let the old matter slumber; it is not pleasant to recall it.

Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a Stereoscope to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, September 9th. Post-cards only, please. The prize of £1 1s. has been awarded this week to Mr. W. M. Barlow, Spring Bank, Cheadle, Staffs., whose contribution is denoted by a star thus.*

"HALLO, sir! How is it I catch you kissing my daughter?" "By sneaking in upon us, sir!"

"THIS is a hard world," murmured the young man. "Yes," replied she. "One doesn't realise how hard it is till one falls off a bicycle once or twice a week."

A SHORT time ago a publisher brought out a book entitled, "Advice to Plain Women." Only one copy has yet been disposed of, and that was taken by the office boy to his mother for curl-paper.

"LOOK here," he said indignantly to the man with the hungry cow, "don't you see that 'keep off the grass' sign?" "Yes." "Well, yer cow's on the grass." "I know it, mister," was the placid answer, "I know jest as well as you do. You see, that cow can't read."

IT was evident the moment she entered the room that he was angry. "What do you mean by suing me for breach of promise?" he demanded. "I never proposed to you in my life." "Why, of course you didn't," she answered in a conciliatory tone. "And I wouldn't have accepted you if you had. But you know I am going on the stage, and I must make some preparation."

THERE are some people who cannot keep a servant for more than a month, and Mrs. Myldue is one of them. She is in constant communication with the registry office. One morning Mrs. Myldue found herself without assistance in the house, the new maid not having arrived. She answered a knock at the door and found the butcher's boy, with the meat. Imagine her feelings when the youth gave vent to a prolonged whistle, and ejaculated: "What! Another fresh un! You won't stay long here, I'll bet. She's a rum un, she is."

* A MOST amusing slip was made the other day by an attorney at the Stafford Court, who was retained to defend a farmer whom a late servant-man sued for wages alleged to be owing to him by defendant, who refused to pay on account of the said servant leaving his employ without proper notice. The attorney wound up a grandiloquent speech by informing his worship that the plaintiff had left his client in a fix by absenting himself from his duties when there were forty-one cows to milk, thus requiring "all hands to the pump." At this announcement the risibility of the spectators was infectious, the court itself being unable to repress a good laugh. As the attorney resumed his seat the fact dawned upon him that to all intents and purposes he had perpetrated an egregious blunder.

GLADYS: "So Charlie has at last popped the question, eh?" Gwendolin: "'Popped' is hardly the word. I had to draw it out."

YOUNG MOTHER: "Horrors! Here's an account in the paper of a woman who sold her baby for tenpence." Young Farmer (wearily): "Perhaps it was teething."

"THE most wonderful thing about a baby," says a cynic, "is his ability to refrain from blushing when his mother is in his presence, and describes his good points to his visitors."

NEIGHBOB: "It is very kind of you to take an interest in my daughter." Gotrox: "Such was not my purpose." Neighbob: "What was your purpose?" Gotrox: "To take her entirely."

THE sufferer slowly raised his eyelids. "Where am I?" he asked. "You were run into by another cyclist," answered the nurse. Later, as he was about to breathe his last, he asked in a touching manner: "What make was his machine?"

VISITOR: "Is your father at home?" Little Daughter: "What is your name, please?" Visitor: "Just tell him it is his old friend, Bill Johnson." Little Daughter: "Then he isn't in. I heard him tell mamma if any bills came he wasn't at home."

MRS. SMITHERS: "What an elegant gown Mrs. Bilson has! I do believe I never saw anything lovelier. There she goes now; isn't it a perfect dream? I——" Mrs. Smashum: "Hush, that's a ready-made." "Dear me, but my eyes do trouble me so; of course it is; beastly, isn't it?"

"MAMMA," said small Willie, "when sister Mary had the toothache you took her to the dentist and had it filled, didn't you?" "Yes, Willie," she replied. "Well," continued the little diplomat, "I've got the stomach-ache; don't you think you had better take me to the sweet-shop and get it filled?"

"COME right in the kitchen, Tommy," said Mrs. Brown, "and get your supper. Don't make the least noise, and as soon as you are through you must go right upstairs to bed." "What's the matter, ma?" cried little Tommy, putting his finger in his eye. "Hush, dear," she replied. "Your father has been hanging pictures this afternoon."

CATARRH OF THE EARS A CAUSE OF DEAFNESS.

It is a well recognised fact that catarrhal diseases of the middle ear are the cause of the majority of cases of deafness. This in itself is unfortunate, because so many people, even of the present day, have little more than a dim idea of what constitutes a catarrhal ailment, and so neglect treatment until the pathological changes have attacked the deeply-seated structures, and the disease becomes chronic and complicated.

Briefly stated, catarrh is an inflammation of a mucous membrane, and may therefore affect any cavity of the body lined by such membrane. When this inflammation attacks the middle ear it causes swelling of the membranes, with consequent pressure upon all of the delicate structures which it covers. The tympanum or ear drum becomes thickened; the swelling interferes with the movements of the minute chain of bones which convey the impressions of wave sounds from the tympanum to the auditory nerve, and the sense of hearing becomes less and less acute in proportion as the thickening of the membrane increases with the advance of the pathological catarrhal changes.

The history of the treatment of catarrhal deafness shows a great want of success, which at first glance seems remarkable in face of the advance in the knowledge of the anatomy, physiology, and pathology of the ear. But on further consideration it will be noted that almost the only resources of specialists were the ingenious instruments used in their attempts to treat deafness by forcing vapours and medicaments into the middle ear through the Eustachian tube, which can only be reached by way of the nose and throat. Decided success was not known until about twelve years ago, when Dr. Drouet began a series of experiments intended to demonstrate the possibility of conveying medicaments to the membrane of the middle ear by utilising the absorbent properties of the skin.

So great, indeed, has been the success of the Drouet specialised treatment that the entire August number of the Journal for the Deaf is devoted to a description of about two hundred cases cured by this process of medicating the middle ear. Those of our readers who are interested in the subject can obtain a free copy of this publication by addressing the Secretary, 72 Regent's Park Road, London, N.W.

We have permission to publish a few of the most recent cures. The case of Mrs. I. R. Maynard is an instance of catarrh of the middle ear uncomplicated by any suppurative conditions. Mrs. Maynard submitted her ailment for treatment by correspondence with the consulting physician of the Drouet Institute, reporting that deafness had affected both her ears for several years, and that of late it had grown much worse. In fact, the hearing was so bad that she could not hear a watch tick unless it was pressed close against the ear on each side. There were occasional noises in the ears like the ringing of bells. Mrs. Maynard previously had treatment by an aural specialist without benefit.

Appropriate treatment for catarrh of the middle ear and tinnitus, according to the Drouet Method, was prescribed and begun April 4th, 1901, with the result that in a few weeks' time Mrs. Maynard described herself as having recovered her hearing, and later, in response to an inquiry from the Institute as to whether the cure was complete, she wrote:

Melville House, Alfred Place,
Worthing, July 8th, 1901.

I have the greatest pleasure in writing to tell you of my complete recovery from deafness. About the middle of April I placed myself under your treatment, and after twenty days' treatment I was completely cured.

I was very deaf, could not hear the ticking of a watch, except when pressed close to my ear, but can now hear it from any part of the room in which I am sitting. I have not had any return of the deafness, but should I have any relapse (which I think unlikely) I shall certainly write to you again.

Thanking you very much for the great good you have done me.—Believe me, yours sincerely,

I. R. MAYNARD.

The case of Miss M. Gregson is an instance of chronic catarrh of the middle ear, complicated by discharges from the ears. In the latter part of May Miss Gregson obtained from the Drouet Institute a Patient's Report Form, which she filled up with particulars of her symptoms and returned for the consideration of the consulting physician. It was found that she had suffered for years from deafness in both ears, and there were most distressing noises in the head. The discharge from the ears was also very troublesome. As an additional complication, there was great irritation of the throat. The appropriate Drouet Treatment was begun at once, and faithfully carried out at home by Miss Gregson, under the supervision of the consulting physician by correspondence.

On June 15th the change for the better was very marked, and from that time the hearing improved so rapidly that early in July the following communication was received:

3 Radcliffe Street, Preston, July 8th, 1901.

I received your letter, and I am happy to inform you that my hearing is all right now. If I keep as I am now I shall be perfectly satisfied, as the discharges and noises have ceased entirely. Thanking you for your kind attention, and the interest you have taken in my ailment, I am, yours faithfully, M. GREGSON.

About a fortnight later Miss Gregson wrote again:

3 Radcliffe Street, Preston, July 17th.

I am only too pleased you should include my name among the reports of cures of deafness, for I am sure I am perfectly satisfied and happy to say that after so short a time I am entirely cured of my deafness and ear trouble. I want to add that I have not had so clear a throat as I have now for a long time. Before I began the Drouet Treatment the least bit of cold I got affected my throat. Thanking you again for your kind attention, I am, yours faithfully, MARY GREGSON.

The original letter, with all the others of which extracts have been given above, may be seen in the Autograph Room of the Drouet Institute, where hundreds of letters emanating from grateful patients are kept. The Autograph Room is open to the public every day, except Sunday, from ten a.m. to six p.m.

To prevent misunderstanding, it should be stated that the Drouet Institute does not profess to cure all cases submitted. It is unfortunately too true that in some cases the complaint is incurable, generally owing to anatomical changes that have taken place in the structure of the organs of hearing. But we must add the Drouet Institute never prescribes treatment in cases deemed incurable. Those who suffer from any affection of the hearing, or ailment of the throat or nose, need therefore have no hesitation in submitting their cases to the Institute. Whatever the serious nature of the case may be, or of whatever long-standing, and, though previous treatment has been unsuccesful, all hope is not lost, for the Drouet system of treatment is essentially different from all others, and in cases where other systems have failed, it has almost always been successful, thus repeatedly effecting the seeming miracle of radically curing patients who had been on several occasions pronounced hopelessly incurable.

Let us state again that the Journal for the Deaf is forwarded free of charge to all who apply for it to the SECRETARY of the DROUET INSTITUTE, 72 Regent's Park Road, N.W. Let us add that free consultations are given by correspondence, by means of a special report form, to those unable to leave home. The Consultation Room is open every day, except Sunday, from two till four. A charge is made for personal consultations given at the Institute. Special personal consultations may also be had at any time by previous arrangement.

More and more thrilling grow the "Adventures of an Actress." In this number we find beautiful Hazel Harlow in Newcastle. Next week we shall have a vivid story of her sojourn in Rugby. Residents in these towns could do me a great service if they chose. With the scene of these stories laid in their own neighbourhoods, they have only to mention the fact to their neighbours to ensure their immediate interest. Will Newcastle-ites and Rugby-ans kindly help me in this matter?

Don't despair, "Leonard." Remember you are young yet—only thirty, and if you haven't done anything to distinguish yourself, there is heaps of time. By way of cheering you, my most erudite assistant has compiled the following:

Sir Walter Scott was thirty-four when he made his first draft of "Waverley," and was forty-four when he re-wrote and published it.

Nearly every one of those tales which conferred immortality upon him was composed after he had reached the age of forty-six.

Carlyle was forty-two when he published the "French Revolution," the first work to which he formally put his name. His "Cromwell" was published when he was fifty.

Swift was fifty-nine when he published "Gulliver's Travels."

Tennyson was fifty when his idylls, "Elaine," "Vivien," and "Guinevere" were published, and was about sixty-two when he completed the series with "Gareth and Lynette."

Macaulay was forty-eight when he issued the first and second volumes of his "History of England," and the third and fourth did not appear until he was fifty-five. Good as are the essays of his early manhood, they pale when compared with the work of his maturer years.

John Stuart Mill was fifty-three when his essay of "Liberty" was published, and fifty-six when he gave us that on "Utilitarianism."

Milton was certainly more than fifty-four when he began to compose his "Paradise Lost"; he was fifty-nine when he sold it to Simmons, the bookseller.

George Eliot composed "Middlemarch" between the ages of forty-six and fifty-one, and, after that, "Daniel Deronda."

Bacon was fifty-nine before he published his great work, "The Novum Organum."

Cowper was over fifty when he published "John Gilpin" and "The Task."

Defoe was fifty-eight when he published "Robinson Crusoe."

Darwin published his "Origin of Species" when fifty, and his "Descent of Man" when sixty-two.

Grote wrote the larger part of the "History of Greece" between the ages of fifty-two and sixty-two, and Hallam occupied nearly the same period of life with his "Introduction to the Literature of Europe."

The two works by which Thomas Hood has survived the grave, "The Bridge of Sighs" and "The Song of the Shirt," were composed when he was forty-six, and from a sick bed, from which he never rose.

Longfellow gave us "Hiawatha" when forty-eight, "Tales of a Wayside Inn" when fifty-eight.

"The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table" was published when Holmes was forty-eight, and "Songs in Many Keys" when he was fifty-five.

A series of articles, entitled, "The Schools of My Childhood," has just commenced in M. A. P., and will be continued for some weeks. These articles, in addition to good pictures of the Irish Schools of the "Fifties" and the "Sixties," will contain several chapters of the biography of Mr. T. P. O'Connor.

Advice on Love and other Matters.

(Replies to Correspondents.)

I am afraid, "Strawberry," that you are distressing yourself too much because your face becomes red after washing. I am sure it is nothing to be ashamed of, and a face with plenty of colour certainly looks a great deal nicer than one without any colour at all. I think, however, you might lessen the colour a little by washing in lukewarm water and wiping your face quite dry with a very soft towel. This redness is very often caused by indigestion, so you should be very careful to eat your meals slowly.

Well, "Flora," the young man you have kept company with for many years has been very cool in his behaviour to you for the last eight months, and as he is the only man you have ever loved, you want to know what you can do. What a pity to let a coolness arise that has lasted so long! The best thing for you to do is to ask him frankly if there is anything to account for his coolness, and if so, will he tell you what it is. Very likely you have only imagined it, and he loves you as much as ever he did.

"Cupid" has fallen in love with a girl who is very shy. She has no friends, and does not know that he loves her; and he wants to know how he can begin to woo her. Under the circumstances, "Cupid," I see no reason why you should not write and tell her how matters stand. You can judge by the way she receives your letter what her feelings towards you are.

CHARLES FORDE'S

Bile—Beans for Biliousness.

AUSTRALIA'S GREATEST DISCOVERY.

AUSTRALIA, the land of gold, has given to the world a great number of marvellous things, but the discovery in that wonderful country made by a chemist and scientist, Mr. C. Charles Forde, perhaps will do more good to the world generally than all the gold Australia ever has, or ever will, produce. This discovery is of a natural vegetable substance that has the peculiar properties of acting in the process of digestion the same as Nature's own animal Bile. Mr. Forde, realising the great value of this discovery and the boon it would be to the millions of digestion sufferers who (according to the regular medical science to date) were martyrs to pepsin, bismuth, starving, and purging, decided to spare no expense to perfect this remedy to make it a cure for all digestion troubles and their attendant ailments. The result of this experimenting was the addition of some eight other ingredients, the whole being called Bile Beans, a title given to express exactly what the preparation is, "A Bean for the Bile." The expense and care in perfecting and compressing this preparation to the size of a small bean was very great, but the result is a small oval bean that the youngest child can take with ease, and a medicine the consumption of which last year reached some thirty million doses in Australia alone, the rich and poor alike being the friends of this marvellous specific. The consumption to date has nearly baffled the best efforts of the Proprietors, their laboratories working night and day to meet the demand.

Bile Beans have been found an undoubted cure for Headache, Biliousness, Costiveness, Piles, Liver Trouble, Bad Breath, Rheumatism, Indigestion, Dizziness, Anæmia, Buzzing in the Head, Fulness after Eating, Lack of Ambition, Debility, Influenza, Female Ailments, Pimples, and a host of other ailments that owe their origin to defective bile flow, assimilation, and digestion. They will also be of great service in Nervous Disorders, Loss of Appetite, Shortness of Breath, Blotches on the Skin, Insomnia, and Troubled Sleep. They act quickly in restoring females to health, and for a general aperient and tonic remedy they are unequalled. These Beans are placed on the market in a form that anyone can take them without medical supervision; and, as the price is so very low, there are few homes that cannot afford to always have a box on the shelf for emergency.

Depôts and Laboratories have been opened in England, and if you are unwell and a sufferer, and have doubts whether it is digestion or not, the manufacturers invite you to write in to their London Office, giving a full description of ailment, and free of charge you will be honestly answered whether Bile Beans will cure in your case or not. Address: The Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., 119 London Wall, London, and mark your letter Special. You can also send to London if your dealer does not stock Bile Beans, and a box will be sent post paid and packed free on receipt of price 1/1½, and 2/9 for large box. Please mention this paper when writing.

IMPORTANT WARNING.

Bile Beans are not sold loose, being put up in sealed boxes only, bearing the name of the inventor, CHARLES FORDE. All others are fraudulent imitations, and you are warned not to accept any but the genuine.

A THRILLING INSTALMENT.

THE ADVENTURES OF AN ACTRESS.

VI.—Within an Ace.

By DONOVAN MART.

CHAPTER I.

Fresh from the ter ible experience at Newcastle, the Good Samaritan Company arrived duly at Rugby in accordance with the programme that had already been worked out for their tour. It was Monday morning; the actors and actresses were already assembled on the stage of the Theatre Royal in the town. At the wings were standing Raymond Venables, the manager; Hazel Harlow, his leading lady; and Eric Monteith, the new recruit, who thus found himself preparing for his first rehearsal.

"I hope you are word-perfect, Monteith," said the manager. "Without any disparagement, it's a good thing for you that poor Carruthers had such a small part. One doesn't pick up the tricks of the trade all at once, unless you happen to be a genius like Miss Harlow here."

Hazel bowed with a laugh.

"Thank you for the compliment, Mr. Venables," she said. And so they proceeded to rehearse.

To Eric's relief the play proceeded comparatively smoothly. Nevertheless, he was somewhat nervous when the evening came and it was seen that the house was full. This was undoubtedly due to Hazel Harlow's beautiful personality, together with the desire evinced by the citizens of Rugby to see the heroine of the Newcastle Theatre fire.

The young actress received a tremendous ovation on her first appearance, and it was some minutes before she was able to utter her opening sentences.

Venables was jubilant. "It seems rather a heartless thing to say," he muttered to Monteith, who was standing in the wings waiting for his cue, "but that affair at Newcastle seems likely to prove a godsend to us."

Eric made no answer. He could not forget how the girl whom he loved with all his heart and soul, who was at that moment receiving the vociferous plaudits of the audience, had been within an ace of a fearful death, and he knew that of which Venables could have no inkling, how this same girl, who had never wronged a human being in her life, was beset by perils and difficulties that were all the more poignant by reason of their very subtlety.

"If only I could get her to give up the stage," ran Eric's thoughts, "to become my wife, to give me and me alone the privilege of guarding all evil from her head. If only I could awake in her an answering chord to my own love; perhaps in time she will come to care for me. I have one consolation, that she is at least heart-whole; and yet therein lies perhaps the greatest danger to my hopes. She may suddenly fall in love with somebody who is better looking and more attractive than I am, and then good-bye to all hope of happiness for Eric Monteith."

It was not long before Eric discovered that there was nothing more likely to jar all the finer susceptibilities of a man of refinement than life in a travelling company. His brother actors, chief among whom were men who hid their real identity under the names of Clive Pendennis, Ralph Garden, and Hayward Lindsay, were good-hearted Bohemians enough, but it was their very Bohemianism that seemed most offensive to Eric, steeped in the traditions of Eton and Oxford. They were continually pressing him to come and have a drink, always dilating on the charms of this or that maiden, chaffing him with being so "mashed" on Hazel Harlow, and when he showed resentment at such familiarity their surprise was unbounded, and in consequence he became a topic of contemptuous conversation among them.

The ladies of the company, with the exception of Jenny Lovelace, made love to him and tried to blacken Hazel's reputation in his eyes. Needless to say he would hear no word against her, neither did he reciprocate their amatory advances made to him. With Raymond Venables, the manager, he was on a somewhat different footing; he knew that Venables had power to dismiss him, he knew also that the manager, despite his cynical attitude, was madly in love with Hazel, and looked upon himself as a friendly rival. Thus he knew it was all-important for the furtherance of his object in keeping a protecting eye over Hazel to remain on good terms with Venables.

One morning he was sitting in his lodgings smoking somewhat gloomily and musing the while over his present life and the "might-have-been" could Hazel Harlow have been persuaded to abandon her career as an actress and become his wife. Suddenly there came a knock at the door. "Come in," cried Eric. His landlady entered with a card in her hand, which she laid down upon the table with the remark, "There's a young man downstairs what would like to see you; there's his name on the card."

Eric took up the little piece of pasteboard with languid curiosity: "Mr. Geoffrey Phelps," he read.

Hazel Harlow is in Rugby this week.

"Geoffrey Phelps," he repeated. "I don't know the name." Then to the landlady: "Ask him to come up, will you?"

The landlady retired, and going to the head of the stairs bawled in a voice loud enough to be heard all over the house, "You're to come up." It was evident that the woman didn't believe in showing undue civility to such a person as a travelling actor.

The sound of quick, lithe footsteps coming up the stairs showed that the invitation had been accepted.

The next moment a man stood inside the room—a brown-moustached, well set-up young fellow, with shrewd, rather deep-set dark eyes, evidently a gentleman.

Eric rose as his visitor entered. "To what must I owe the honour of this visit?" he said courteously.

The young man hesitated for a few seconds. "You are Mr. Eric Monteith, I believe?" he then said. Monteith nodded.

"And you are at present a member of Raymond Venables' theatrical company now performing in this town?" Again Monteith responded with a nod. "And you are a friend and well-wisher of Miss Hazel Harlow, who is playing the lead?"

In a moment all Eric's faculties leapt up to renewed alertness. The mention of Hazel's name acted like magic. The stranger's keen eyes were fixed upon him intently. "And if I am?" demanded Eric incisively, "what then?"

"It is rather a peculiar business," continued the other, picking his words with great deliberation. "We are both strangers to one another, and I am a stranger to Miss Harlow, except, of course, that I know what all the world knows, that she is a beautiful and accomplished young actress, and that but for you she might have lost her life at Newcastle last week. You must know, then, that I happened last night to stop at a little wayside public-house just outside Rugby. The landlord of the inn was a curious, nervous sort of man, who evidently had something on his mind that he wanted to get rid of. I was the only occupant of the bar at the time, and at last the fellow leant across his counter and said to me: 'Look here, sir, you seem a gentleman, I'm in a bit of a hole, and I want you to help me. An hour or so back an elderly man, a farmer by the look of him, came in here looking ghastly white. He asked for some brandy, which I gave him, and he then asked if I had a room where he could stay the night. I said yes, showed him to a bedroom, and left him. In an hour or so my servant came to me and said that the gentleman upstairs was making a great noise.'

"I went up and found the man lying on his bed fast asleep as it seemed, and talking quickly to himself. I listened to what he was saying, and after a bit I began to realise that he was ill, in a fever or something, and more than that, that I had hit upon a mystery that might have serious consequences to more people than one."

The young man paused. Eric had listened to him with growing interest. He was a good raconteur, and his story came so glibly and readily from his lips that it had a ring of verisimilitude that left no room but to believe that he spoke the truth.

"As far as I can remember," went on the young man, "the ravings from the delirious farmer as repeated to me by the inn-keeper were as follows: 'I have got within sight of her at last; I'll teach her to run away from home; I'll teach her to make the name of Harlow sound in everyone's mouth as a brazen actress woman; if she won't listen to me I'll kill her, aye, even though she be my own daughter; and if I can't settle her, well Squire Caldecott can!' This the fellow said, and a lot more beside. I saw him myself; he's a grizzle-haired, truculent looking old man, and he's at present lying low in that solitary inn concocting Heaven knows what plans.

"Well, I said to myself, it's no good my going and frightening Miss Hazel Harlow with this yarn. I'd better find out someone who she trusts and who can be trusted to do what's best for her. Of course I don't know the ins and outs of the story; perhaps you can supply the details."

As can be well imagined the effect of this story on Eric Monteith was electrifying. "It's perfectly true," he said eagerly, "Miss Harlow is the daughter of a reprobate old farmer. From what I know of him I think he would leave no stone unturned to do his daughter an injury. It's very good of you, sir, a stranger"—he went on impulsively—"to take so much trouble on her behalf. The question is, what's to be done now?"

The other made a deprecating gesture. "It's not a question of trouble," he answered. "Anyone else would have done the same in my place, and if I might make a suggestion it would be that you came back to the inn with me and interviewed the old fellow yourself. You could then take him unawares before he has time to make himself nasty. Personally, I think he was suffering from nothing more nor less than an overdose of alcohol. That would account for his feverish ravings."

There was truth in every word that the young man uttered. Eric felt this. No suspicion of anything wrong crossed his mind; the frankness with which Mr. Geoffrey Phelps had unburdened his mind of his story disarmed any initiatory suspicion that Monteith might have had.

He seized his hat, and said with alacrity: "Let us go at once; I am quite of your opinion that it would be as well to strike while the iron is hot."

"Then come along," said the other. "We shall walk there in half-an-hour. I think if you show the old reprobate that any attack on Miss Harlow will mean prompt action on the part of the police, he will have to lower his colours, and you can count on me to back you up in any way you like."

CHAPTER II.

The "Jolly Waggoners" is a small hostelry just outside Rugby. It is off the main road, and is usually only a house of call for the farm hands and pedestrians that happen to pass along that way. It is a pretty old-fashioned place, covered with climbing roses and clematis, and it looked particularly pretty on that bright September morning when Eric and his unknown companion came within sight of it.

"I wonder how Harlow came to find his way to such an out-of-the-world place?" queried Monteith. "I should have thought that he would have made his way to the 'Royal George,' or some place in the town itself."

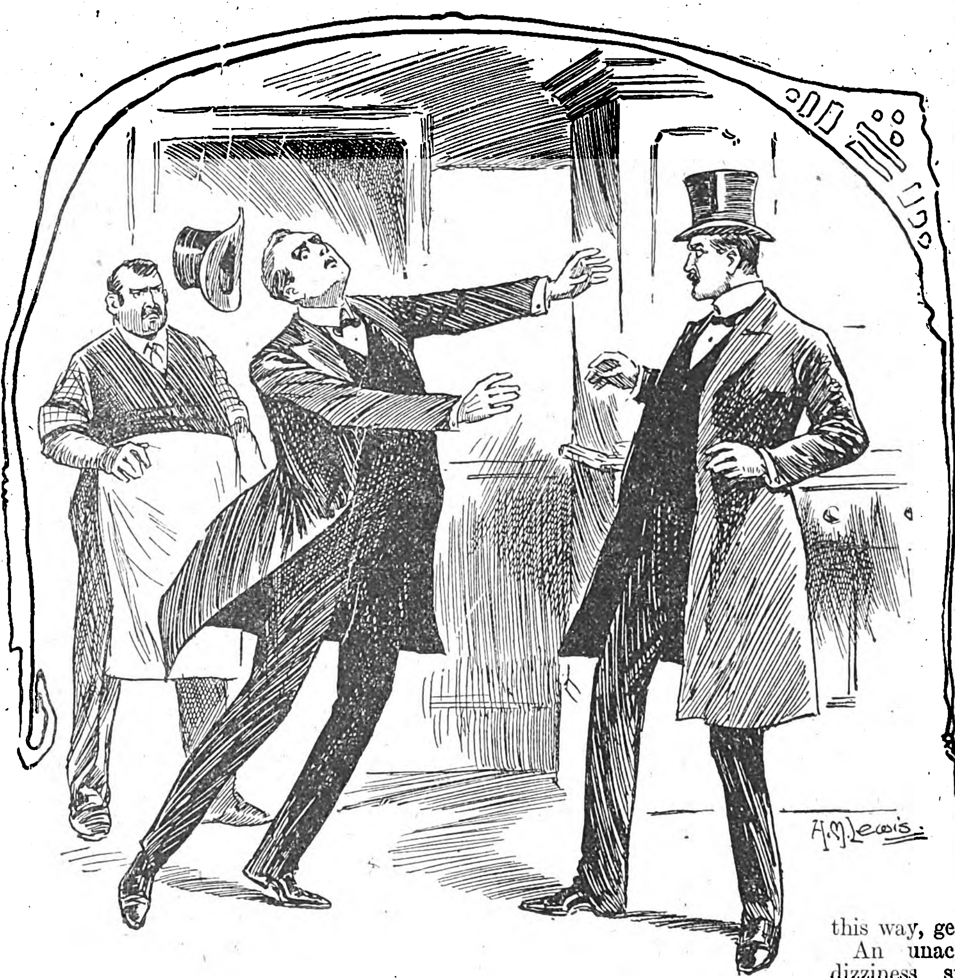
"It strikes me that's another proof of his artfulness," replied the other; "he knew that no one would be likely to look for him in such an out-of-the-way place as this."

"True," said Eric, "and as he has lived in the Midlands all his life, perhaps he knows this part of the world pretty well."

Further conversation between the pair was cut short by their arrival at the door of the inn. Phelps strolled inside the bar with the air of a man conversant with his surroundings. There were one or two labourers drinking home-brewed, but beyond them no one save the landlord, who was leaning bare-armed across the counter. To him Phelps nodded significantly.

"You'll have a glass of ale with me," he said to Monteith; and then, in a lower voice, "we'd better wait till these country louts have cleared out before coming to business."

There was nothing in this proposal which struck Eric as being in any way extraordinary. The landlord drew them two glasses of beer, and set them down on the counter.



"Drugged, by Heavens!" he gurgled despairingly.

Suddenly high words took place between the countrymen, and Eric, wheeling round, saw that there was every prospect of a free fight. As he turned he did not notice that Phelps had taken stealthily from his pocket a tiny phial containing a white powder, the contents of which he deftly emptied into his companion's liquor. The landlord in the meanwhile was so anxious to quell the disturbance that had started before it reached serious dimensions, that he ordered the originators of it to leave the inn. This, with much scuffling and many oaths they did, apparently to continue their quarrel outside.

Eric laughed and turned round. "A storm in a teacup," he said, "I suppose fighting's in the blood with these fellows."

Phelps smiled. "That's it," he said; "and now let's drink our beer and get to business. Is the old chap still upstairs?" he said to the landlord. He nodded. "Yes, and pretty quiet now," he said. Phelps raised his tankard. "I'll give you a toast," he said in a low voice, "let us drain our pewters to Miss Hazel Harlow, and a speedy confounding of all her enemies."

Eric raised his mug in silence, his eyes spoke for him; the next moment he had drunk the beer at a draught. He set the vessel down with a wry face. "I don't think much of your beer, landlord," he said.

"Don't you, sir?" came the answer. "It comes from Burton. It ought to be good."

Phelps tapped Eric lightly on the sleeve. "We'd better get upstairs," he said.

The landlord lifted the flap of the bar counter. "Come this way, gentlemen," he said.

An unaccountable feeling of dizziness suddenly made Eric put out his hand and grip the side of the bar with feverish energy. A parched, dry feeling was in his mouth, the tendons of his knee-joints seemed to become lax and flabby, a cold perspiration broke out upon his forehead.

"I—I—feel awfully queer," he mumbled. Then his eyes went almost despairingly to Phelps's face, and in the countenance of the latter saw a look that transformed his features entirely, a look of devilish malignity that suddenly gave Eric the knowledge, when it was too late, that he had been tricked.

He made a desperate clutch at Phelps's throat. "Drugged, by Heavens!" he gurgled despairingly, and then he fell forward senseless into the traitor's arms.

Tell your friends about Hazel Harlow.

When he came to himself it was to experience the utmost weakness and nausea, as though he had been through some terrible illness. His deadened senses refused for a few moments to give him cognisance of where he was or what had happened. A man's face gazing down into his own as he lay bound and helpless upon a bed, brought back realisation with almost soul-sickening directness. There was no mistaking the lineaments of the countenance before him; they were those of Horace Caldecott, the one man in all the world that Eric had reason to hate.

"Good morning, Mr. Monteith," said Caldecott sneeringly, "you didn't bargain to see me, but I think you will confess that it's my innings now. How do you like stage life? How proud Miss Hazel Harlow must be to think that you have given up the attractions of life in London to join a fifth-rate touring company!"

Eric made no answer. A wild fury was seething in his brain. He knew full well the character of the villain who had entrapped him to the inn with so plausible a story and so clever an aide as the man who had called himself Geoffrey Phelps. If looks could have killed, Horace Caldecott's last hour had indeed come. Caldecott was not slow to remark the loathing that flashed forth from his captive's eyes.

"Looks don't kill, my friend," he said, "so it's not a bit of good your glaring at me like that. You've got to face the music with myself as leader of the orchestra, and the sooner you realise that the better it will be. You've baulked me twice of Hazel Harlow"—a horrible expression came over his face—"but, by Heaven, you won't do it a third time."

"If you think," said Eric suddenly, "because you have got me into your power by means of such a coward's trick as the one that has just been perpetrated, that you can get me to be the means of bringing Miss Harlow into your clutches, you're mightily mistaken. You can add murder to all your numerous crimes if you will, but I don't see that you will gain much except a halter round your neck by such a course."

"Strange though it may seem," retorted the other carelessly, "I don't care to have all my eggs in one basket. Life is sweet, Mr. Eric Monteith, and I'll admit that I should have but little compunction in putting you out of the way if I thought you were fool enough to try the game of bravado. Now, I'll give you my first proposition. It is that you write a letter to Miss Hazel Harlow, which I shall dictate, asking her to come here. That is the price I put upon your life."

"You need not waste further words," cried Monteith, "I would sooner die a hundred times than be the means of putting Miss Harlow into your clutches. Is that plain enough for you?"

"That is what I expected," came the cool answer; "then I may play the rest of my trumps. Just come here, Geoffrey, will you?"—this to the man Phelps, who had been sitting quietly observant in a far corner of the room.

The other approached the bedside. "Just show Mr. Monteith what you have got," said Caldecott blandly.

Phelps held up a signet ring and a pocket-book, which Eric recognised at once as his own, and which must have been extracted from his person when he was unconscious. "You recognise those?" said Caldecott. "Now I'll tell you what we are going to do, as you won't write a letter. You have already had an opportunity of judging Mr. Phelps power as an actor, you must be moreover acquainted with the soft heart possessed by Miss Hazel Harlow. Well, by the simple process of putting two and two together, you may now be able to guess my plan of campaign. Mr. Phelps will go to Miss Harlow with your signet ring and your pocket-book to back him up, and will say that you have met with a most grievous accident, as token of which behold your personal effects. Now, according to her own view of the case, Miss Harlow owes you a good deal. Her soft heart will prompt her to at once fly to the aid of the man who has given up so much for her. Now, Mr. Monteith, will you write that letter or will you not?"

"No, a thousand times no," cried Eric, half beside himself with impotent rage. "It shall never be said that I moved a hand of my own accord to help you in the furtherance of your diabolical plans. Do your worst, blackhearted villain that you are!"

Caldecott made a step forward as though he would have struck the defenceless man before him; then his raised hand fell to his side.

"Words don't hurt," he said with a terrible laugh, "and you're not out of the wood yet, not by a long way. You shall have the satisfaction, I promise you, of seeing Miss Harlow here. You shall also have the satisfaction in spite of what you have just said, of knowing that you have been the instrument of giving me what should have been my own long ago. Well, Geoffrey"—turning to his accomplice—"I don't see any reason why we shouldn't go and carry out the rest of the programme."

Eric Monteith's heart seemed to turn to lead within him. He could do nothing—nothing, save look on, a silent and unwilling witness of a base conspiracy. He determined to make one last effort to save Hazel Harlow. Drawing in a long breath he suddenly emitted a piercing scream. In a moment Caldecott had flung himself upon his victim, a gag was thrust in Eric's mouth, and so his last attempt to gain help had been frustrated. Nothing remained now but to watch and wait, to pray that somehow, though in what way Monteith could in no wise speculate, Providence would interpose and prevent the consummation of Caldecott's foul plot.

CHAPTER III.

Hazel Harlow and Jenny Lovelace were sitting in their lodgings, which they had taken together, drinking tea.

"I do hope, Hazel," Jenny was saying, "that we shall get away from Rugby without anything terrible happening. Somehow there seems to be an evil destiny hanging round this company."

"Yes," said Hazel sadly, "and I can't help feeling that I am the Jonah who ought to have been thrown overboard; and yet it's through no fault of my own, that I can see." Tears gathered in her beautiful eyes.

Jenny put her arms round her companion's neck. "Of course it isn't your fault, dear Hazel," she said impulsively. "You can't help being sweet and good and beautiful, you can't help all the men fluttering round you like moths round a candle. I'm sure if I were a man I wouldn't rest a minute until you promised to marry me."

Hazel smiled through her tears. "I'm sure I wish you were a man," she said, "because I expect I'd marry you then; and yet I don't know. If you were a man I should never have had such a dear friend as Jenny Lovelace."

For "dear friends" the two actresses had indeed become; the contrast between them was sufficient to account for their friendship. Jenny impulsive, hare-brained, petite; Hazel of a quieter nature, gentle, almost statuesque; and, though she knew it not, Hazel had been the means of redeeming Jenny from becoming what is, alas, too common among members of the dramatic profession, lax as regards the finer feelings that are the safeguard of women whose paths do not lie amidst the glare and glitter of the footlights.

At that moment a visitor was announced. It was, in fact, Mr. Geoffrey Phelps, "desirous of seeing Miss Harlow alone, on very important business." The two girls exchanged glances at this message. "Do you know this Mr. Phelps, Hazel?" whispered Jenny eagerly.

"No," answered the other, "I never heard of him in my life."

"Then don't see him alone; let me stay here and hear what he has to say." And so when Mr. Phelps was ushered up into Hazel's apartment, it was to be confronted by two maidens instead of one.

"Have I the honour of addressing Miss Hazel Harlow?" he began blandly.

"I am Miss Harlow," answered Hazel coldly "May I ask what you want with me?"

Phelps hesitated. He had not bargained for the presence of a third party; and yet he felt that to withhold the bogus message he was bound to deliver, would create suspicion as to its bonâ fides, for if Eric Monteith were lying stricken and wounded there could be no possible reason for making a mystery of the occurrence. He began to wish that Caldecott had hit upon some other plan. All this passed through his mind at lightning speed; his hesitation was only momentary. There was no help for it, the third person must hear what he had to say. He looked inquiringly at Jenny to cover his hesitation.

"This is Miss Lovelace," said Hazel, "you need have no hesitation in saying what you have to say before her."

Phelps bowed. He determined to rush hot-foot into his tale.

"I come from a Mr. Eric Monteith," he said quickly, "a gentleman whose acquaintance I had not the pleasure of knowing until an hour or so ago. I happened to be passing a little wayside inn just outside Rugby when I became the witness of a most unfortunate accident; a gentleman was knocked down by a runaway horse and injured rather severely, particularly about the head and right hand. I helped to carry him into the inn. When he recovered consciousness he told me that his name was Mr. Monteith, and that he was a member of the Good Samaritan Company, at present playing in Rugby. He gave me your address, and asked me if I would come to you and ask you to go to him in his hour of need. As voucher for his identity—he could not write by reason of his hand being injured—he gave me this signet ring and pocket-book that he said he believed you would recognise as his property."

The two girls listened to the plausible villain's story with breathless interest. The signet ring and the pocket-book were beyond all doubt and question Monteith's. To clinch his story Phelps spoke again.

"Mr. Monteith informed me," he said in a low voice, "that you were some time ago the victim of a letter purporting to be written by himself, but in which he had no hand. He told me this to reassure you."

This put the finishing touch to Hazel's credence in the story. Even Jenny, more worldly-minded and sophisticated than her comrade, ready moreover to see danger in the most ordinary things where Hazel was concerned, had to confess to herself that she could find no flaw in the tissue of Phelps's narrative.

Hazel sprang to her feet. "Let us go at once," she cried impetuously. "Poor Mr. Monteith, he must be terribly hurt."

"I think it only wise," put in Phelps sympathetically, "to prepare you for the seriousness of Mr. Monteith's condition. He is undoubtedly in a bad way." This last remark was uncompromisingly true, though the two women could not see into Phelps's brain, and appreciate the subtle villainy that made him make this statement. It only added to Hazel's desire to go to the aid of the man to whom she indeed owed her life.

Phelps looked once more at Miss Lovelace. He seemed about to make a remark, but Jenny was too quick for him. She read the unspoken words that were on his lips. "Where Miss Harlow goes I go," she answered decisively. Phelps hid his deep-rooted chagrin with a polite little bow. After all, she was only a woman. What could she do to stem the torrent that was driving Hazel and Eric towards misery unspeakable?

The two girls put on their hats and prepared at once to follow the bringer of evil tidings.

"Let us go quickly," said Hazel, "every moment is precious." They hurried downstairs and out into the street. Here a conveyance was waiting. "I had the forethought to get a vehicle," said Phelps, "as it would take us three-quarters of an hour to walk there." He helped the two ladies inside the cab and got in himself.

He did not notice that against the kerb was lounging a somewhat seedy-looking individual, who looked fixedly at him; neither did he notice that when the carriage set off this same mysterious person followed after it, every now and then running so as to at least keep the vehicle in view.

But few words passed between the trio on their way to the inn. In due course the cab drew up outside the Jolly Waggoners and Phelps got out, assisting the two ladies to alight with conspicuous gallantry. At the door of the hostelry stood the rascally landlord, who had been well paid by Caldecott to back him up in his schemes, and who had no scruples in accepting a £50 note as the price of his acquiescence.

"How is the poor gentleman?" asked Phelps in a low voice, yet loud enough for his two fair companions to hear what he said.

The landlord shook his head ominously. "I am afraid it's a bad business," he muttered.

Everything dovetailed with such nice accuracy that neither Hazel nor her companion could find anything to allow their suspicions to be awakened; neither was this to be wondered at. They had to deal with scoundrels versed in all the arts of criminality, for Caldecott, although his position as a country gentleman and a man of wealth hid his real nature, was a roué of the worst order, a man moreover who consorted freely with criminals and blacklegs in the numerous by-paths where such birds of ill-omen are to be found. All was quiet in the little inn; the bar was empty; it was too early as yet for the returning labourers to drop in and have their glass at the conclusion of their day's labour. The inn was too much off the main road to command the patronage of its more favoured and pretentious rivals.

The landlord threw open a door that had access to a flight of wooden stairs. "The gentleman is in the room at the end of those stairs, lady," he said in a low voice.

Hazel went first, now all impatience to see the man whom she pictured as lying wounded, perhaps dying, in the lonely chamber at the top of the staircase. After her came Jenny. Phelps brought up the rear. The latter had realised that the presence of Miss Lovelace might prove a serious obstruction to the success of Caldecott's scheme. While they had been driving towards the inn his brain had been actively employed in devising a way whereby Miss Lovelace might be prevented from becoming a thorn in Caldecott's side when the real state of affairs became known. He determined accordingly upon a particularly daring act of villainy.

When the three found themselves upon the staircase Phelps hastily closed the communicating door behind him, with the result that the whole staircase became enveloped in darkness; then with wonderful deftness he whipped a handkerchief from his pocket, over which he emptied some chloroform already prepared for his purpose.

To fling the handkerchief over Jenny's head from the back was the work of a moment; a faint gurgling cry, and the girl fell back unconscious into his arms. Hazel stumbling on in the darkness ahead turned round at the sound. "What's the matter?" she said. "It's all right, Miss Harlow," answered Phelps, "I knocked my hand against the wall. Open the door at the top and we shall be all right."

Absolutely unprepared for what awaited her Hazel did as she was bidden; she threw open the door and hurriedly entered the chamber.

The sight that met her eyes froze the blood within her veins, for there, standing in the centre of the room, confronting her with a diabolical expression on his face, stood Horace Caldecott.

She had no eyes for anything else; no eyes for the pallet in the corner, upon which, bound, gagged, and absolutely helpless, with white face and staring eyeballs, lay Eric Monteith; no eyes for the man who had entered the room behind her, with the unconscious body of Jenny in his arms; her every faculty was centred upon the face and figure of the hated Caldecott.

"So you have come, sweetheart," said Caldecott mockingly, "your tender soul couldn't bear to think that your lover was lying helpless and wounded in a country inn. Lover, did I say? Look at him. There he lies, like a trussed fowl. How is he going to help you now, think you? You should never have run away frow Harlow Farm and the man who claims you now as a loving husband to be."

Hazel Harlow will be in Belfast next week.

The tones of his low mocking voice fell on Hazel's ears like a whip. She quivered as though with physical pain. All her faculties seemed numbed and deadened. Her eyes, which seemed to have a vacant, almost meaningless look in them, went to where Eric lay straining with impotent fury at his bonds. Then they turned to the senseless body of Jenny Lovelace. It was like some horrid scene in an Adelphi drama—villain, hero and heroine had met in the culminating scene of the play.

"What do you want with me?" said Hazel. Her voice seemed far away. She could say nothing else, yet felt she must say something.

"That is soon told," said Caldecott. "I have been baulked of you long enough. I tried fair means, they failed; then I swore to myself that if that didn't answer I'd have you by foul ones, and I think you will admit that this time I have not played my cards badly. You ask me what I want with you. Listen. I want you for my wife; either you promise to marry me here, aye, this very day, or"—his voice dropped to a hoarse whisper, "I'll torture Eric Monteith before your very eyes! The price of your resistance shall be paid by your lover."

For a few seconds Hazel's brain refused to take in the real meaning of Caldecott's speech. It could not be true. She knew that the man before her was wicked and cruel, but he could not stoop to such villainy as that. The mediæval expedient to which he had alluded was surely impossible in the enlightened days of the twentieth century. In the small world in which Hazel had hitherto moved, such ideas had no real significance; they were only things to be read about, to be shuddered over, to be forgotten.

She looked helplessly at Caldecott. "Mr. Monteith is not my lover," she said in a low voice. "I have none, I want none. You must surely be jesting, you could not, nobody could be so terribly wicked as to torture an innocent man because a girl, who has no love for you, who wants only to live quietly and at peace with her fellows, has the misfortune to be unable to reciprocate the feeling that you call love."

Caldecott made a step forward. His dark eyes blazed with suppressed passion; he seemed for the moment to forget his position; to forget where he was, and that there were other persons in the room besides himself and Hazel. He remembered only that the woman for whom he was ready to sell his life, his soul, his honour, stood before him.

"What I call love," he muttered hoarsely. "This is no time for casuistries. I should have thought that by this time you would have realised that nothing in Heaven or Hell would keep me from possessing you." And then his voice grew almost tender. "Ah, Hazel," he said, "is it so much that I ask? I can give you wealth, a position, comfort for all your life. It is but one little word that you have to say. Think of all it means; on the one hand, wealth, happiness, Mr. Monteith's safety, your own immunity from any cares; on the other, you will still be mine at the cost of——" he broke off abruptly with a significant gesture towards the spot where Eric lay.

A thousand doubts and fears beset Hazel's brain. Was ever girl in a more awful position than she was at that moment? She looked wildly round her as though seeking for some means of escape from the horrible fate that hemmed her in so remorselessly. In her trouble she hardly seemed to realise that Jenny, her own dear friend, lay still and motionless in a corner of the room, beside her the man Phelps, who had been the ready tool in his employers hands.

"I cannot marry you," she moaned. "It would be a sin to give my hand to you without my heart, and how can I love you after all that has passed between us?" She broke off abruptly, and covered her face with her hands.

An exclamation of baffled rage fell from Caldecott's lips. "I will give you three minutes, Hazel," he said, "to make your choice. If at the end of that time you still refuse to accede to my request, I shall have to put into execution what I have already hinted at. A mediæval form of coercion perhaps, but one that even to-day is drastic and efficacious, and if you should entertain any idea of using your fair lungs let me remind you that we are in a lonely inn, the landlord of which is friendly to my interests."

He took out his watch with the air of a man who had fully made up his mind. "Three minutes, and then you know what awaits Mr. Monteith if you are still obdurate."

Hazel flung herself down on her knees before her tormentor. "If you have any spark of manhood left in you," she cried piteously, "if you have a heart, as other men have, you cannot be serious in proposing this awful crime. You must know that I cannot see an innocent and noble man suffer slow agonies before my eyes if I can do anything to save him. If there is no other alternative I will become your wife, but I tell you so surely as there is a Heaven above, I will take my own life rather than become the partner of a man who can stoop to such low depths."

And if the situation was terrible for Hazel it can be well imagined how frightful it was for the hapless Eric.

A witness of all that transpired, of the terrible fate that menaced the woman he loved with a pure and tender devotion, he lay straining at his bonds in impotent agony and rage, powerless to move hand or foot to save Hazel from her fate.

"Two and a half minutes," said Caldecott in a terrible voice as though he had not heard one word of Hazel's impassioned appeal, "you have half a minute in which to decide."

All the colour faded out of Hazel's face. She looked agonizingly around, her eyes fell on Eric's ghastly face, beaded with the sweat of agony. "For your sake," she murmured brokenly, her eyes upon Monteith. Then in a low, almost inaudible voice, she whispered, "I consent and may Heaven forgive you."

CHAPTER IV.

It will be remembered that when the self-styled "Mr. Geoffrey Phelps" piloted Hazel and Jenny Lovelace to the vehicle in readiness to bear them to the Jolly Waggoners, a seedy-looking individual had started off in pursuit of the cab. He kept the conveyance in sight through the streets of Rugby, but when it left the town he found that he was unable to do more than keep it in sight along the country road. At last, thoroughly blown, he came to a halt and stopped for a few moments to wipe the perspiration from his face and to recover somewhat his spent breath.

Tell your friends about Hazel Harlow.

"Phew," he ejaculated, "you're out of training, Kempton Bond, the pace has been too hot for you." He drew a photograph from his pocket, the portrait of a clean-shaven man with dark, crisp hair and well-cut features. "It's the same," he muttered, "in spite of a moustache and hair dyed. Now I wonder what on earth his game is, driving off in a cab with two young ladies, one of them Miss Hazel Harlow, the beautiful star of the Good Samaritan Company. I tracked him to Rugby all right, though I don't think he knew I was on his track. He's a smart man, but like a good many smart men, he's a bit foolhardy. If he'd laid low in London the chances are he wouldn't have run his head into the noose. But hold on, I haven't got him yet, and he's such a slippery customer, there's no knowing what may happen."

He put the photograph back into his pocket and set off at a brisk walk along the road. He had not gone more more than half a mile when he suddenly saw the carriage coming back. In a moment he was all alertness. When the vehicle came up with him he saw that it was empty. Taking a purse from his pocket he held it aloft and cried out to the driver: "Hi, there! what have you done with your fare? He dropped his purse on the pavement in Rugby, and I've been sprinting after that thoroughbred of yours to try and catch up with him."

The man on the box-seat grinned. "Let's go halves," he said.

Mr. Kempton Bond shook his head. "No," he answered, "but he's sure to give me five bob or so for taking it back, and I'll give you half a crown on spec."

"Right you are," said the other. "You'll probably find him and his lady friends at the Jolly Waggoners, about three-quarters of a mile on down the second turning to the left. I reckon they're actresses, those two. I expect there's another 'mash' of theirs waiting for them at the public. That'll make a nice little party of four, and one of the girls is a perfect stunner." This with a suggestive wink.

Bond laughed and threw up the half-crown as promised. The man bit it and then transferred it to his pocket. "Good luck, mate," he said, and drove on.

"That was a half crown well spent," said the mysterious Mr. Bond to himself as he struck out with renewed briskness along the lonely road. Then he felt in his pockets. "Shooting iron and darbies all handy. I shall have to spring a mine on him before he tumbles to what's up. It would be a feather in my cap if I could nab him. Wouldn't they look blue at the Yard?" And he chuckled softly to himself in anticipation of the coming triumph.

As he drew opposite the Jolly Waggoners he was at once struck by the remarkable absence of life there seemed round the inn. The house had the appearance of being shut up. It was a two-storied building and the blinds of the upper windows were drawn down. The front door, instead of yawning hospitably open as is usually the case with country inns on a fine summer evening, was closed. All this Kempton Bond's quick eyes took in in a moment. He went to the door and tried the handle. The door was locked. He determined on a bold course of action. He went round to the back of the house through the little garden to the back door. This, as he had half expected would be the case, was still open. From the room above came the suppressed sound of voices. He could hear it was a woman speaking, and from the low tones in which she spoke, he could tell that she was addressing someone as a suppliant, but could not hear what she said.

He boldly entered the house, and found himself in a low stone flagged passage, with doors right and left, and the bar visible straight ahead. With quiet tread he made direct for the latter place. The next instant he was on the landlord's side of the bar counter, and confronting a man placidly snoring in a chair behind the bar. It was the landlord of the Jolly Waggoners.

Bond smote him on the shoulder. "Hey, man," he said, "it isn't Sunday, wake up! I'm dying for a drink. What do you mean by locking your front door? Have you made so much money that you don't care whether customers come or not?"

The landlord had leapt to his feet; there was fear upon his face, that and something more. Bond's eagle eyes read this at a glance.

"Who are you?" muttered the fellow hoarsely. "How do you come here? What do you want?"

Bond laughed in his face. "Upon my sam," he said, "you're the rummiest sort of drink-purveyor I've come across for a long time! Is it the custom for inn-keepers in this part of the world to shut up shop before it begins to get dark, and then when a man comes in to have a drink to ask him what he wants?" Then his voice changed. "Look here," he said sternly, "It strikes me you've got some ugly game ahead. There's something jolly suspicious about all this. I'm not a man to be fooled with. What's your game?"

The landlord went white to his lips. If ever terror was painted upon a man's countenance it was upon his. Bond's eyes never left his face.

"I'll give you drink," muttered the fellow, "anything you like, and you needn't trouble about settling for it. The fact is I was feeling a bit queer to-day. I'm alone in the house, the missus has gone to Rugby, and really I have such a small business that I thought I'd shut up shop and have forty winks."

The man was lying, and Bond knew it.

"Oh, that's it," he said in a low voice, "then perhaps you will kindly explain to me what you have done with your two gentlemen and their lady actress friends."

The man was struck speechless. He tried to find words to falter out some pitiable excuse, but, like many other rascals, he was an abject coward at heart. He dimly realised that this strange, shabbily dressed individual was not what he represented himself to be. Suddenly Kempton Bond's hand went to his breast-pocket; the next moment the inn-keeper found himself gazing down the ugly looking barrel of a handy little Smith and Weeson. In a moment he dropped on his knees.

"Now see here," said Bond, "you tell me the truth or I'll blow your brains out. Who have you got in the house? What villainy's afoot? If you can serve desperate men serve me now—the truth, mind you, for you're nearer eternity at this moment than you ever have been or ever will be in all your miserable existence."

Bond threw all the intensity of scorn into his voice of which he was capable. He knew the man before him, knew exactly how to deal with such as he. His words produced the desired effect. The inn-keeper was clay in his hands, clay to be moulded into whatsoever shape Bond might desire.

"I'll tell you," muttered the miserable man, "if only you will spare my life. There are five of them upstairs, three men and two women. One of the men is bound; the other two have got some game on which I don't know."

The fellow was not lying now, Bond could see that. Into what hornets' nest had he dropped? What villainy was being enacted in the room above him? Then the sound of the pleading voice came back to him.

"Where are they?" he said to the landlord. With a trembling finger the miserable wretch pointed to the door behind where he was sitting, that led to the upper chamber. "They're up there," he muttered hoarsely.

Bond stole across and opened the door noiselessly. The sound of a woman's voice came down the dark staircase.

"I consent, and may Heaven forgive you," were the words he heard, but never in all his life had he heard a voice in which was bound up such a world of concentrated agony.

He looked swiftly round; it was well he did so; behind him with a long butcher's knife in his hand the villainous landlord was creeping stealthily towards him. Like lightning Kempton Bond seized a pewter mug that stood on the zinc counter at his side and dashed it full into the cowardly scoundrel's face.

With a low cry the man fell over senseless, a thin line of red on his forehead marking where the unusual weapon had found its billet.

"That's settled him for the time," muttered Bond. The next instant he had bounded up the dark staircase and flung open the door of the room above. The sight that met his gaze transcended everything that he had expected.

In one corner was Eric helpless, in the centre of the room stood Caldecott with Hazel fainting at his feet, at the other side stood Geoffrey Phelps beside the motionless form of Jenny Lovelace.

Kempton Bond's six-shooter was levelled straight at Phelps' head. "Henry Lester," he thundered, "I arrest you in the King's name. Throw up your hands!"

With a low snarl like that of a wild beast, Phelps flung himself forward.

Kempton Bond's revolver rang out. Phelps fell heavily, but it was not the bullet that had caused his fall. Jenny Lovelace, who had been lying apparently unconscious, had in reality for some considerable time partially shaken off the effects of the anæsthetic administered to her. As Kempton Bond entered the room, and as the man Phelps or Lester, or whatever his name might be, flung himself forward, her right hand shot out and grasped his ankle.

The tug at his foot threw him to the ground, his head caught the boards with a dull thud. Like lightning Kempton Bond fell upon him and had slipped a pair of shining handcuffs over his wrists.

In the meanwhile Caldecott, realising dimly that even now at the very moment of victory defeat stared him in the face, stooped down and swung Hazel off her feet. Bond had left the door open. If he could once get out upon the stairs with his burden he felt that he could lock the door and perhaps make good his escape. But Bond was too quick for him.

"No, you don't," he muttered, and turning from the unconscious Phelps, who had been stunned by his heavy contact with the floor, he gripped Caldecott by the waist.

Caldecott loosened his hold on Hazel with a fierce oath. There was a revolver in his pocket, but he had no time to use it. His right hand swung out and he caught Bond full on the point of the chin. He was a powerful man, and the blow was a telling one. Bond staggered back and fell to the floor. In the midst of all this indescribable confusion Jenny had managed to get to her feet.

Like a bird she skimmed across the room to where Eric lay, and with a pocket-knife had begun hacking at the bonds that confined him to the bed. Another instant and he was free, just as Caldecott lusting for vengeance, had turned to wreak his baffled rage against his defenceless enemy.

Seeing, however, that Monteith was free, and noticing a look upon Eric's face so terrible in its expression of righteous anger, he shrank back. He was no coward, despite his villain's heart, and yet he dared not face the awful resentment that blazed from Eric's eyes. He cast one look round the apartment. Bond was slowly struggling to his feet, his confederate lay helpless, the next moment Eric would have been at his throat.

He leapt for the door and dashed down the wooden staircase with indescribable speed. Slamming the door at the bottom of the stairs, he shot back the bolt on the other side.

Without pausing to notice the landlord who lay unconscious beneath his bar, he sped out of the back door and away.

CHAPTER V.

How they got through their performance at the theatre that night Hazel, Jenny, and Eric never knew. Indeed, in the middle of the second act Hazel, absolutely overwrought by the terrible events of a few hours ago, broke down completely. For a moment a vast hush fell on the whole audience, absolutely at a loss to understand the meaning of such a contretemps. At once Raymond Venables ordered the curtain to be rung down. The manager had always a great eye for effect. He went round to the front of the curtain and in a grave, impressive voice, said:

"Ladies and gentlemen, I am sure you will all sympathise with Miss Harlow when I tell you that she is acting to-night notwithstanding the fact that she has recently passed through a great domestic sorrow. In a few minutes I hope with your kind indulgence, Miss Harlow will be fit again to resume her part. Miss Harlow begs me to ask for your indulgence."

In a moment a mighty cheer rent the auditorium, and when the curtain went up again it was some few minutes before the storm of cheering subsided. The rest of the play was gone through without a perceptible hitch.

After the performance Kempton Bond, at Eric's invitation, came round to the latter's rooms to supper. Bond had promised to relate to Eric the history of how he had happened to come to the rescue so opportunely.

"I am a detective," began Kempton Bond. "You will perhaps remember that a year ago a daring bank robbery was perpetrated in London which resulted in the thieves or thief getting clear away without leaving any definite clue behind them. Scotland Yard was baffled, and I took up the job. A great many times the scent grew hot, but I was never able to put my finger exactly on the right spot. At last, however, by a long series of circumstances that it would be needless to relate, I managed to bring the crime home to one man, the man Lester, alias Phelps, alias a hundred names, one of the most daring and successful criminals that the annals of crime have disclosed. What his connection exactly with this man Caldecott was I cannot tell you. My own theory is that Squire Horace Caldecott, landowner and wealthy man as he is, has a knowledge of the seamy side of life that even Charles Peace would have envied. But he's a deep customer, you won't find any records against him at Scotland Yard, and besides, he has money that was left him by a wealthy father, so that he has no need to break into banks or commit such felonies. But I should be greatly honoured if you would tell me, Mr. Monteith, the history of Miss Harlow as connected with this man Caldecott. Who knows, I may be able to do you a good turn some day? I've got Lester, but the other's given us the slip."

Eric readily complied with the detective's desire. He told him all; how that Caldecott had set his soul upon becoming possessed of Hazel Harlow; how he had sworn that he would let nothing stand in his path that might keep him from the consummation of his purpose.

Kempton Bond heard him out in silence. When he had finished the detective looked somewhat grave.

"There's always a woman in the case," he said sententiously, "and I'm afraid there's still trouble ahead for Miss Harlow. Her purity and beauty are the two great factors that must always militate against her, especially as she has entered the thorny path of stage life. Can you not persuade her to leave a profession that has so many snares and dangers for such as she?"

Eric sighed. "That is just what I cannot do," he said moodily. "I will not disguise from you the fact that I would make Miss Harlow my wife to-morrow if she would let me, but——" he stopped abruptly, as though his his heart was too full for words.

The detective looked at him shrewdly. "You have my sympathy, Mr. Monteith," he said feelingly. "My advice to you is what may perhaps seem trite and commonplace, but I think it is nevertheless sound, 'Faint heart never won fair lady.'"

* * * * *

As can be well imagined, the terrible experience they had gone through had left its traces upon both Hazel and Jenny. At breakfast the next morning they could talk about nothing but the adventure of the day before. They were half way through breakfast when the landlady entered with a letter that bore the Rugby postmark, and had evidently been posted the night before. One glance at the writing and Hazel uttered a low cry.

"Oh, Jenny," she said, "it's from him. I daren't see what is inside; there must be no secrets between us now; open it and tell me what's there."

Jenny opened the letter with a feeling almost of fear. She read it through carefully.

"Shall I read it to you, Hazel?" she asked.

Hazel nodded.

There was no date, no heading.

"If you think," the letter began, "that I am the sort of man who can bear without any pangs seeing that which I have sworn to possess continually being snatched from my grasp, you little know the sort of man you have to deal with. I have sworn that, even if I have to sacrifice every penny that I possess, if I must sell my soul for the attainment of my object, I will do so rather than lose you. As for the man who has constituted himself your protector—though other folks might give him another name—this letter will serve for him as well as for you. Tell him that I will be even with him yet, and there are more ways than one of procuring that revenge which shall assuredly be mine. I have money. I have power, and I have cause for vengeance. Tell him this, that he shall never know when the blow shall fall; he shall never be safe sleeping or waking, by day or by night. He shall feel what it is to have thwarted the desires of a desperate man."

Here the letter ended without a signature. The two girls stared mutely in one another's faces.

"What will you do, Hazel?" asked Jenny.

"Do?" cried Hazel, her face aglow with new resolve, "do, I shall give the letter to Mr. Monteith, and take no more notice of it. What can Horace Caldecott do? We are not in the Dark Ages. Can he employ hired assassins to dog Mr. Monteith's footsteps? That letter is the letter of a bully and a coward."

Yet although she spoke bravely, Hazel knew full well that in Caldecott both she and Eric had a terrible and implacable foe. The man was delirious with passion, he had become a monomaniac where Hazel was concerned. They could only keep watch and be ever on their guard against this snake in the grass, who always struck at them with poisoned fangs when least they expected it.

Synopsis No. 7.

The next place on the tour list of the "Good Samaritan" Company was Belfast, the inauguration of a fortnight's stay in the Emerald Isle. The adventure that was to befal Hazel Harlow there was one to which was added the terrors of the sea. It was one that nearly cost the beautiful actress her life. Readers of "Short Stories" should certainly not fail to follow Miss Harlow on her journey.

THE STORY OF A SEASIDE ADVENTURE AND ITS ROMANTIC SEQUEL.

CHAPTER I.

One Day at Dirriecomb.

"If you get out as far as Gull Island, sir, you'll mind that a pretty strong current sets to the nor'ard of it. We've had more than two or three accidents with folks getting carried away."

Allan Curtis laughed as he stepped into the broad, shallow pair-oar, so different from the smart, slender craft to be seen on inland waters.

"Thanks for the tip," he said, sitting down on the central thwart and picking up the gaily-painted sculls; "but I have known Dirriecomb Bay from boyhood. Push her bow well round for me, will you, there's quite a swell on this morning."

The grizzled, elderly boatman at the hiring-station obeyed and thrust the prow of the dinghy off the massive concrete stair that descended to the beach from the fine esplanade which occupied the greater part of the Dirriecomb sea-front. The full, strong waves of the high tide were dashing against it with considerable force.

For the rest, Dirriecomb Bay was bright and peaceful. The scorching rays of a summer sun beat upon its expanse of blue, flecked with gusts of snowy foam, upon the staring stucco hotels and the long promenade of the new town, upon the red brick and mossy tiles of the old town—nestling in a hollow of the uneven coast—upon the grey shingle, the merry children, the lounging holiday-makers, the rank of bathing machines, the little harbour with its plantation of masts, and the half-submerged islet in the middle of the bay.

Allan Curtis, rowing lazily towards this last, drew breath after breath of air as stimulating as champagne, and contemplated, with a regretful pleasure, the animated picture before him.

A few more hours and he would be in a very different place. London, whose smoke, whose dust and roar, whose sweltering pavements, he dreaded to think of, would claim him—he would go back to the huge hospital, to its grim, bare wards, its operating-room, its arduous duties, its tragedies of life and death. The young house surgeon, broken down by overwork in a torrid June, had rapidly regained his health beside the invigorating sea, and now, his vacation ended, he must return to relieve his substitute, to take up once again the practice of his profession.

Truth to tell, that profession—for all Allan Curtis loved it ardently—proved sometimes just a trifle unsatisfactory to the youthful medico's romantic heart. Good looking, athletic, a general favourite, of growing reputation, he was as fancy free as a girl in her teens. Yet even a heart that is fancy-free may occasionally remind its owner of its existence, and, at the present moment, something—whether it was his approaching departure, the beauty of the scene about him, or the intoxicating freshness of the sea-breeze, gave the brilliant young house surgeon of St. Luke's an unmistakable twinge of melancholy. He felt—though he would have been puzzled to say why—both lonely and sentimental.

As his active muscles propelled the small craft nearer and nearer to the low reef in the centre of the bay—where the gulls hovered shriekingly over the banks of weed—he noticed, between him and the islet, a blot of bright yellow upon the surface of the water, rising and falling with the waves.

A keener scrutiny proved it to be a smart bathing-cap frilled and tucked like a dainty Tam o' Shanter; beneath it was a pretty flushed countenance. He could perceive that the swimmer, no mean one, as was testified by her distance from the beach—was striking out desperately in the direction of the coast. Yet her progress was rather sea than shorewards.

Hastily Allan Curtis took his bearings, to discover that he had shot across the powerful current which set past the island. It lay astern of him, and the swimmer was in it, finding it too strong for her, and drifting momentarily further from the beach.

Slewing the pair-oar with a vicious manipulation of the sculls, the young surgeon rowed in pursuit. The yellow cap was slipping out to sea by slow instalments which told how bravely its wearer was fighting.

Curtis snatched the dinghy over the low rollers as if it had been a racing skiff; another moment and it ran in on the swimmer's lee, shielding her from the shimmering ocean which had seemed to be her goal. The oarsman marked admiringly the determined courage of the resolute features and the graceful swing of the white arms beneath the lapping water.

Allan Curtis put the handle of a scull under his knee and raised his straw hat. “You are in an awkward current,” he said cheerfully, “hadn't I better tow you free of it? Or would you prefer a lift home?”

The closely-compressed lips of the swimmer parted and her dark eyes smiled pathetically. “Thank you,” she gasped, laying a soft palm on the gunwale of the boat, “I—I fancy I was beginning to get a bit frightened. But I could swim back all right if only I could get out of the current.”

Her rescuer looked over his shoulder—there was an ample length of cord fastened to the painter-ring in the bow. He reached for it, and tossed an end overboard. The girl caught at it and he began to pull steadily athwart the bay, his attendant water-nymph swimming on her side with slow, yet expert strokes that carried her along at a considerable speed, and left her but little dependent on the assistance of Curtis's sculls, as soon as the dinghy cleared the rapid seaward current.

While he rowed Allan Curtis had time to study the piquant person that was so gallantly breasting the waves of Dirriecomb Bay. Her face, dipped with the salt spray of the chopping sea, there were patches of throbbing colour on either cheek and a mischievous light in the brown orbs. Not for five years had the young surgeon made so exhaustive an inspection of a woman's face. His sculls beat mechanically, and he stared at the fair features of the swimmer in an entire forgetfulness of himself and his whereabouts.

The girl herself aroused him from his ecstatic contemplation by flinging the rope in once more. “Thank you very much,” she said, “I feel as if I had awakened from some horrible nightmare. And yet I'm positive I should have been too proud to cry out if you hadn't offered to help me. I'll swim back to my machine now. Good-morning, and please believe that I am very grateful.”

“I—I trust we shall meet again,” stammered Curtis, “under more—more conventional circumstances.”

“I'm afraid,” retorted the unknown, “that it isn't very likely. Thank you all the same.” And while her preserver hesitated for an answer, she darted shorewards.

Allan Curtis watched the yellow cap thoughtfully as it approached the beach. It disappeared abruptly—the wearer had dived. Scan the shallows as he might, after that he could not see the distinctive head-dress. She must have whipped it off before coming up, so that he should not track her. Curtis heaved a profound sigh and muttered certain syllables that sounded suspiciously like strong language.

Ultimately he sculled to the landing stairs, paid for his boat, lit a cigar, and walked down the esplanade to the beach, where he devoted himself to observing feminine faces, as many an elegant figure, fresh from her morning dip, passed him, unconscious of his scrutiny. But the memorable countenance of his ocean-nymph did not dawn upon his vision. Allan Curtis fumed in an irritable discontent.

Having thus whiled away an hour, he strolled over to his hotel, which happened to command the shore-end of the esplanade, and ordered lunch on the terrace. He consumed the meal absent-mindedly, keeping his eyes fixed on the moving throng beneath. But no glimpse of the fair unknown rewarded him for his pertinacity.

He was sipping his coffee, with moody deliberation, when he saw that the loungers about the sunlit promenade had gathered into a circular crowd near the inland extremity of the pier. At the centre of the circle, upon portable folding-stools, sat three personages draped mysteriously in lengthy red garments, resembling a domino, and masked with short vizards of red satin.

Two of these were men, the third a woman, the latter tall and of singularly elegant carriage. One of the men was a harpist, the other bore a violin; the woman poised by its long bright ribbon a mandoline, decorated with the parti-coloured streamers inseparable from that instrument. Something about the mandolinist, cloaked and masked as she was, struck Allan Curtis as familiar.

He listened to a portion of their concert, popular fragments of melody, vocal and instrumental, floating up to his terrace lunch-table, and then, inexplicably interested by his review of the mandoline player, rose to pay his bill and descend.

"What's the meaning of that masquerade?" he asked the waiter, indicating the crowd at the pier-foot with a gesture of his wrist and cigar.

The waited shrugged his shoulders as he counted out the change of a half-sovereign. "The 'Red Musicians,' sir," he said, "they're all the rage in Dirriecomb. But if you do go in the ring, sir, have a care of your watch and purse. There's been any number of complaints about pocket-picking on the beach and esplanade while the Red Musicians are playing."

Allan Curtis left a shilling on the salver, put a match to another "Henry Clay"—he had choice tastes in tobacco—stalked down to the shingle, and, having buttoned his coat over his pockets, elbowed his way into the front rank of the circle.

The mandolinist had commenced to sing, accompanied by the harp and the violin. Her voice was a sweet contralto, not too penetrating but well-managed. She was singing a favourite air out of a recent light opera, most of her audience—Curtis among them—knew the words.

A hush had seized on the crowd—a hush in which the tremor of the tide on the shingle could be distinctly heard, as a sort of background to the sad poetry of the song.

> Love is a butterfly in the sun, hearts are the flowers that, one by one,
> Yield him their honey and whisper "Stay!"
> But he flies away, he flies away,
>
> Love is a star that falls to the earth, love is a sob that began in mirth—
> A golden glow in a sky of grey
> That fades away, that fades away.
>
> Love is a little wind from the west, hearts are the leaves by his breath caressed,
> But he sighs farewell at the end of the day
> And steals away, and steals away.

Curtis started. The curves of the singer's mouth and chin below the crimson silk vizard, the movement of the delicate lips as they shaped the words, marked the face as that of the woman he had rescued that morning in the bay. He told himself that he could see too small a portion of the masked countenance, that the effect of the picturesque bathing-cap and the nun-like hood were so different that a comparison between the wearers was impossible. Yet, in spite of his caution, he was sure of the singer's identity.

Slipping round the ring, he contrived to get nearer. She had finished her song and returned to her mandoline to play a duet with the harpist. The violinist laid his instrument upon his camp-stool, produced a green cloth bag, and went to collect the donations of the audience.

In due course he came to Allan Curtis. The young surgeon, as a result of his interest in the masked lady regarded her colleague critically. The features behind the violinist's vizard were obviously not those of a gentleman: they were vulgar, impudent, and bloated as if by drinking.

Curtis dropped a sixpence into the receptacle, noting, as he did so, a broad white scar on the back of the fellow's right hand. Then his eyes strayed back again to the masked and hooded head that he would have given so much to see without its provoking guards. It was bent over the chords of the mandoline, her fingers drawing a passionate waltz tune from the vibrating strings. But once he thought it was lifted and that a glance was shot in his direction. Yet he could not be certain that her gaze had actually rested upon him.

Suddenly there was a scuffle not far from where he stood, and the crowd, swaying violently, almost swept him off his feet. When he regained his balance it was to behold the violinist struggling in the grasp of a burly policeman. Astonished, he looked for the mandoline player. She was nowhere to be seen, but the harpist was surrendering, to a second constable, both himself and his instrument.

Allan Curtis, amazed by this novel development, was pushing towards the actual point of the commotion, when he felt a touch on his arm and spun about, to discover before him, in a neat black gown and flat toque the heroine of his adventure in the bay. She was flushed and excited and obviously striving to render her disturbed breathing even and regular.

"Forgive me," she murmured, "but you have done me one great service to-day, may I make that my excuse for asking another. If—if I am accosted by—by any body during the next few minutes will you—will you say you know me, and that my name is Watson, Miss Hilda Watson, of 15 Frobisher Place, Kensington, London? That is my real name and address; it is, indeed."

The dark orbs that peeped into his own were so pitiful the face in which they were framed so lovely, that Curtis, despite the promptings of his practical common-sense, could only bow. Miss Watson's request and his assent had been only just in time, a police-sergeant, who was moving about among the excited crowd, singled out the young surgeon and his companion. Curtis saw that the officer carried in his hand a mandoline and, slung over his wrist, a red domino that trailed upon the shingle as he walked.

"Beg pardon, sir," he remarked, halting by them, "but is this lady with you?"

Curtis was driven to action; he had made an imprudent promise and he must perform it. "Yes," he said coldly, "what is the trouble?"

The sergeant was taking a quiet survey of Miss Hilda Watson. "A gang of thieves," was his reply, "has been working in with that troupe of players there. The one as had the violin was Charlie Weldon, known as Clever Charlie, and he's marked on the hand with a scar that he received from his own knife in a fight with a 'tec.' he was trying to skewer; his speciality is musical fraud. We've got him and the other man, as well as their pickpocket accomplices in the mob. But we're after the girl that played the mandoline—she dropped her instrument and toggery and got off. But we have her description, and we'll nab her yet."

"Perhaps," rejoined Curtis, "as Miss Watson and I appear to have excited your suspicions, you will take my name and address. I am Allan Curtis, house-surgeon at St. Luke's Hospital, London. This lady resides at No. 15 Frobisher Place, Kensington, also London."

The police officer weakened under this show of dignity.

"Oh, not at all, sir," he faltered, "sorry to have inconvenienced you. But we are wanting a good-looking female with dark hair and brown eyes, and I noticed this lady standing, as I thought, alone. I apologise to you, sir, and to Miss—Miss Watson, for my error."

He saluted nervously, and went back to his subordinates, still solemnly carrying the mandoline and the domino. The girl at Allan Curtis' side glanced after him, with an irrepressible smile upon her lips.

The young surgeon stepped away from the crowd and directed his course to the open beach, Miss Watson's hand laid demurely on his arm. Further along the shore he felt that his companion had relinquished her hold.

"How can I thank you, Mr. Curtis?" she said, and her voice lingered upon her first utterance of his name.

"Do not try," advised Allan Curtis, with forced calmness, for he was fretting under the shock of the discovery that his fair unknown of the bay was the associate of criminals, possibly a criminal herself. "I had no option but to protect you, since you threw yourself on my mercy. I hoped, as I told you this morning, to meet you once more. But I did not, I confess, expect to have to deliver you from the clutches of the Law, as I did from those of the Gull Island current."

The other tossed her handsome head, though her black eyes were suspiciously moist.

"You are not complimentary, Mr. Curtis," she responded; "it would have been chivalrous to ask me for an explanation before condemning me unheard. But now, I shall admit nothing and explain nothing."

Curtis stared moodily at the expanse of dancing water. He was humiliated by the thought that he had been dreaming dreams over his solitary lunch, dreams in which the fascinating creature before him had played the most romantic of parts.

"Probably it is as well," he said drily; "however, do you feel sure that you will be safe from—from the further attentions of the—police. You should leave Dirriecomb as soon as you can contrive. Otherwise inquiries may be made into my right to vouch for your respectability."

He trifled nervously with his watch-chain. "I'm a bad hand at preaching," he murmured; "but I wouldn't go on as you've started, I wouldn't, honestly—it's a road that leads to misery and despair. I pulled you out of the current, don't make me wish—for your own sake—I'd left you there."

The girl moved away, smothering a sob. "You mean well," she glanced back to say, brokenly, "but you don't understand. Good-bye, and thank you again."

Curtis stepped after her, taking his sovereign-purse from his vest-pocket. "You can't communicate with—with your associates," he said; "they are in custody—have you the means to get free of Dirriecomb?"

Miss Hilda Watson flushed to her ears, and shrank from him. "Don't, don't!" she cried; "you're mismistaken, truly. Oh, I must go—I can't endure it any longer."

And turning her back upon him, she hurried up the shingle, crossed the promenade, and vanished among the strolling holiday-makers. Allan Curtis had recourse to a fresh cigar, and a saunter by the edge of the tide.

An hour later he flung the stump of his third "Henry Clay" into the wavelets, went to his hotel, packed his bag, and caught the next train to town. Dirriecomb had suddenly become unbearable.

When he unpacked the said bag in his room at the hospital that night his brain was still running on Miss Hilda Watson.

"Poor little woman!" he muttered, "I wonder what will happen to her in the end. She was as pretty as a picture and swam like a mermaid. Ugh, fancy a mermaid wanted by the police!"

With which grim reflection he dismissed the lady in question from his mind.

CHAPTER II.

A Walk Down Bond Street.

"A cup of coffee, please, and a biscuit."

Allan Curtis sat down rather wearily in a corner of the smart West-end tea-rooms. He had hurried from St. Luke's to Bond Street for a talk with a famous surgical instrument maker about a new thing in metal splints that the latter was perfecting for him, and this, with a couple of accidents earlier in the day, had effectively deprived him of his lunch. A glance at his watch had decided the young surgeon that he had time to snatch a little refreshment before hastening back to the hospital.

It was late in a dull September afternoon, two months since he had returned from Dirriecomb and his vacation. But it was not of Dirriecomb that Curtis was thinking as he sipped his coffee, his mind was absorbed by the problem of reducing in weight his otherwise satisfactory splint.

Suddenly there fell upon his ears the vibrating notes of a mandoline, playing to a piano and violoncello obligato, a lingering air. The melody seemed to speak the familiar words:

> Love is a little wind from the west, hearts are the leaves by > his breath caressed,
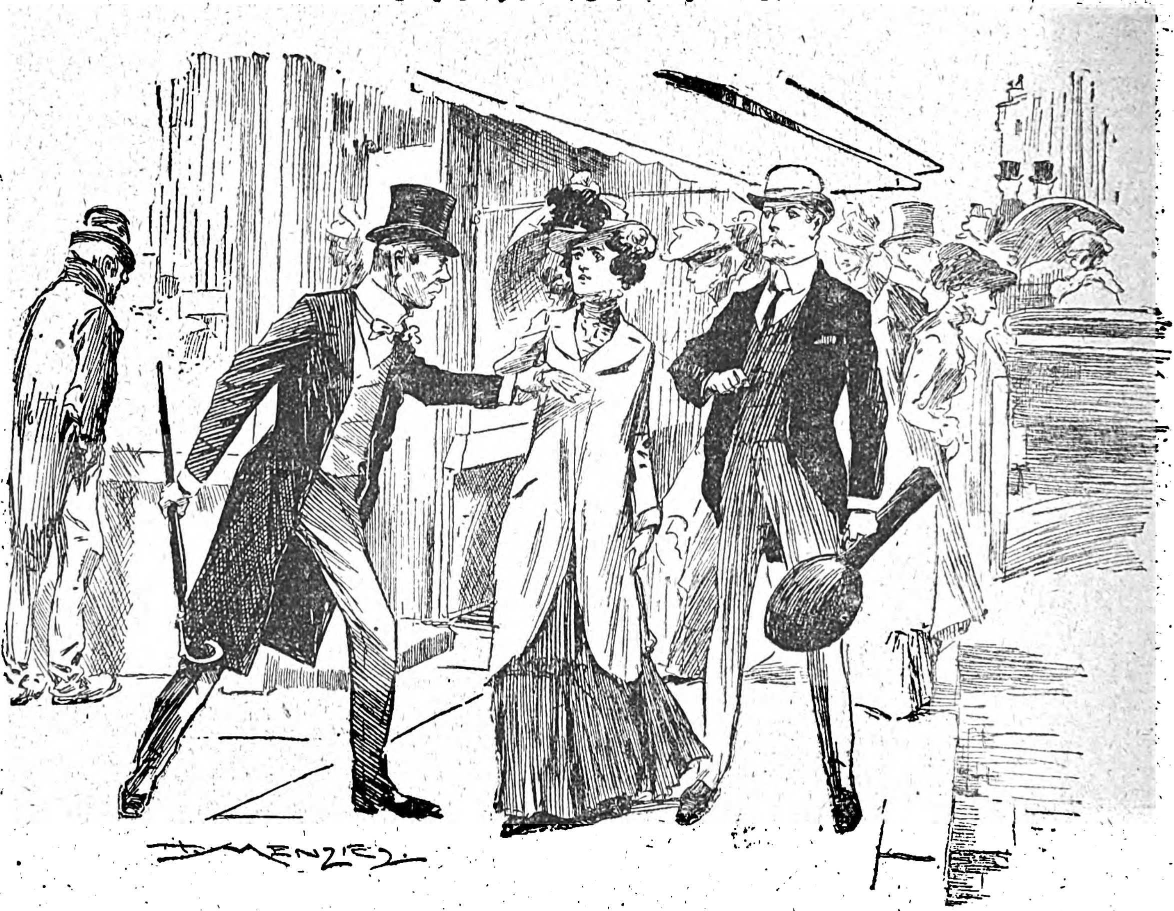
> But he sighs farewell at the end of the day
> And he steals away, he steals away.

Curtis spun round mechanically, at the extremity of the long room, but not ten feet from him was a trio of picturesque persons, clad in loose tea-gowns of amber "Liberty" silk and with artificial chrysanthemums of the same hue in their hair. Bent over the beribboned instrument, whose sound had arrested his reflections, he beheld a lovely face—the face of his singular acquaintance of Dirriecomb Bay.

His eyes rested upon her inquiringly; she was absorbed in her playing, and did not notice him. Her expression, he fancied, was graver, her features thinner, but still strikingly beautiful. As he contemplated them, Allan Curtis realised that he had never really forgotten her, that his last few hours at Dirriecomb had provided the most enduring of his life. Every motion of her graceful figure, every inflection of her clear, characteristic voice,

Hazel Harlow will be in Belfast next week.



Hilda Watson threw off the hand he had laid on her wrist had come back to him, in many a momentary reverie, in many a haunting dream.

Yet he had imagined her swept away by the currents of folly and crime, and here she was engaged in the pursuit of an honest calling. He recollected the confused sentences of appeal that had burst from him that day on Dirriecomb beach—was it possible that she had heeded them? that she had struggled back to an honourable existence? The idea moved him deeply.

He was gazing so earnestly at her that the musician wakened to the fact. She glanced up and saw him. A flood of burning colour mounted to the wandering curls on her forehead, and, stooping over the mandoline again, she devoted herself to her music.

Soon there came the crashing chords of the finale and the piece ended. As it did so there was a peal from an ornamental clock on the wall and the hour struck—it was six. The players rose and disappeared into the rear of the establishment.

Curtis looked after them thoughtfully, then he perceived that a programme stood on the table, and inspected it. "Music three to six," it intimated. The young surgeon picked up his check and strolled down the room, to pay it at the desk cash. Another customer was settling a similar account—a short man, with a vulgar and dissolute, yet obviously shrewd visage.

Allan Curtis studied him, hardly conscious that the other had so riveted his attention. Just then his neighbour gathered some silver off the rubber pad before him, and Curtis saw his hand. It was disfigured by a grey wheal or scar. In a flash the identity of the man broke upon him—he was the violinist who, masked and cloaked, had been arrested on Dirriecomb beach the preceding July.

While Curtis's brain grappled with the riddle of his presence there the fellow passed out. The young surgeon discharged his own trifling debt and followed. The ex-violinist had disappeared. Shrugging his shoulders over the enigma thus complicated, Curtis halted a pace or two from the entrance of the tea-rooms. He had only to chafe a moment before his expectations were crowned with fulfilment. Miss Hilda Watson stepped out into Bond Street bearing her mandoline-case and buttoning a plain black glove.

In her quiet, even severe costume, she declared herself undoubtedly a lady. Curtis bowed as she went by him and raised his hat. For an instant she faltered, then paused. A second more and Curtis had gained her side.

Tell your friends about Hazel Harlow.

"Good afternoon," he said; "so we meet again. Let me confess that I—I waited for you."

The mandolinist blushed and her brown eyes evaded his. Allan Curtis was infected with her embarrassment.

"I—I wanted to ask how the world has been treating you," he added. "You have often been in my thoughts—more often, perhaps, than I comprehended till I saw you just now. You were going down Bond Street when I stopped you, and I am bound for St. Luke's Hospital—I think you heard at Dirriecomb that I am house surgeon there—so our way lies in the same direction. May I—may I carry your case?"

Hilda Watson relinquished it, half unwillingly, and they walked on together. So far the mandoline player had not spoken. The first of the autumn evening was descending upon the West-end. As they passed the occasional openings of adjacent thoroughfares they could see that the sky was ablaze with a gorgeous sunset.

"When you left me that day on Dirriecomb beach," pursued Curtis, "you seemed hurt because I had offered you some slight pecuniary assistance. I am sorry you regarded the proposal as an insult; I honestly desired to serve you. However, I should like to apologise, if I may, for my clumsiness."

The mandolinist turned to him with an impulsive gesture. "Please don't dream of it!" she cried; "I was ungrateful—I know I was. And you—you were twice as kind to me as I deserved."

"Nonsense!" answered Curtis. "Any man would have done as much. And also he would have made sure that you had got safely out of the mess you were in. That is what I blamed myself for after. But I'm awfully glad you're running straight, I am indeed."

Miss Watson winced and bit her lip. They had reached the bottom of Bond Street, and were hesitating, instinctively, before crossing. Ere Curtis could continue his remark, or Hilda Watson respond to it, a voice broke in upon them, a voice at once smooth and insolent.

"Good evening, Miss W.," it said. "You've given me quite a chase. I popped in to buy some cigarettes and you slipped by, I suppose. Pleased you've had company—introduce me."

The speaker was the man Curtis had encountered at the cash-desk, in spite of his flashily correct attire and flaring jewellery, the vulgar violinist of the Dirricombe pocket-picking gang.

Curtis recoiled. His tone to Hilda Watson had been familiar, even intimate. The mandoline player perceived it and grew white. Then, in a tone that was strangely hard and cold, she complied with the newcomer's request.

"Mr. Curtis," she announced; "this is Mr. Charles Weldon, musician, thief and blackguard, and only a fortnight out of gaol, after serving two months for abetting larceny. I am past redemption, you see, since he is able to claim acquaintance with me."

The person thus brutally depicted spat out an oath. "Shut up, you jade!" he hissed; "or I'll pay you, curse me if I don't."

Hilda Watson flung off the hand he had laid on her wrist. "You shall persecute me no longer, Charles Weldon," she declared. "If you follow me I will have you arrested. As for Mr. Curtis, let him forget that ever we met or that he is responsible for saving my wretched life."

The young surgeon would have delayed her, but she caught her instrument from him and was gone before he could protest. He saw that she mounted a 'bus rolling towards Knightsbridge. With another oath, the ex-violinist faced in a similar direction and slouched down Piccadilly.

Pitiful, yet undecided, Allan Curtis hailed a hansom and was driven to St. Luke's Hospital. Duty is the best remedy for heartache. And he might truthfully have confessed to an attack of that extremely unprofessional malady.

CHAPTER III.

A Miracle of Cupid's.

"Will Mr. Curtis come to the accident ward at once, please. There's a serious case just in."

The message was received from the ear-piece of a short-distance telephone by a nurse in her neat print working costume. She threaded the aisle between the rows of beds and delivered the request to Allan Curtis, who was paying an early evening visit to an interesting patient. He nodded absently, gave her some instructions, and strode out of the tall and airy apartment into an adjoining one.

A ward nurse met him as he entered; it was she who had sent the summons. "A lady, sir," she said explanatorily, "quite young and pretty, poor thing. She's been stabbed in the right shoulder, high up, but the hæmorrhage is rather bad. They brought her in a cab from Kensington, and that hasn't done her any good. But she asked, they say, to be taken to St. Luke's, so they humoured her. She's in Number Six."

A shiver passed over Allan Curtis; a half-conscious thought flashed through his mind. He hurried to the side of the indicated bed. In it there lay a deathly white face and languid form—the face and form of Hilda Watson.

As he looked at her astounded in spite of his sudden premonition, she opened her eyes and smiled wanly. "I'm so glad you've come," she faltered; "you see—he—he did pay me out, as he said he would. He followed me in a cab, got ahead of me and caught me as I was going into my rooms. But—but he got away."

Curtis struggled for his self-possession and began to examine the wound through which so much of the mandoline player's life blood had ebbed. It was narrow but terribly deep—the lung had been undoubtedly pierced. The young surgeon plugged and bandaged it with infinite care and skill, but with a heavy heart. The injured girl's breath was short and broken, her pulse alarming. He motioned to the nurse, who fetched a screen to put about the bed. It hid the doctor and his patient from the inquisitive gaze of the other inmates of the ward.

Hilda Watson glanced at it. "That means I'm dying, doesn't it?" she murmured with difficulty. "I guessed I was when I fell down. So I asked to be bought here—I wanted to see you again."

"You mustn't talk," Curtis got out, "it's bad for you. Nor must you despair—there—there's a good chance yet for you." It was a kind falsehood, and yet it hurt him to lie to her.

The mandolinist made a vague gesture of dissent. "I don't want to get better," she said; "I'm all alone in the world—and—and very poor, and I've not been well lately. That—that thing at Dirriecomb; you didn't give me an opportunity to explain. I—I only answered an advertisement for a mandoline player in a seaside troupe. I didn't know they were thieves, at first. And then Weldon took a fancy to me, and—and wouldn't pay me all my salary, so's to keep a hold over me. I know I ought to have left them, but it was hard to lose my money I had worked for—and—and I liked Dirriecomb—and—and swimming. I was sorry though that you should see him with me this afternoon. He's been worrying me ever since he came out—to be fond of him. But there, you always thought badly of me."

"Forgive me," gasped the young surgeon. He was wrestling with something more than pity. He felt that he had loved this brave, solitary woman for the past two months—loved her as a memory, as a dream. Yet all that time she had been really unknown to him. And now she had revealed herself as she was—a simple, sensitive, honourable girl. She had vindicated herself—only to die!

Hilda smiled once more and groped for his fingers.

"I'm frightened a little," she whispered feebly, for her long explanation had weakened her. "You helped me in the current. May I hold your hand now?"

Curtis clasped her nerveless palm and turned away his head. He could not see her die. With his free hand he brushed away a tear. Hilda did not observe the action; her dark lashes had drooped over her large pupils. But the soft smile lingered round her mouth.

Moment after moment stole by. The quarter became half-an-hour, the hour a whole one. Yet Hilda Watson breathed, breathed faintly but smoothly. At last she sighed heavily. Allan Curtis looked at her. Her lips were parted and her bosom rose and fell. She was sleeping. There was even a rose-leaf flush upon her cheeks.

An iron band seemed to loosen about the surgeon's heart; for an instant he fancied he would faint, so overpowering was the revulsion of feeling. Then he collected his professional dignity, and, extricating his fingers from those of the slumbering girl, he rose and crossed to the nurse.

"She will do," he said coolly. "For a while it was touch and go. I will see her again after dinner. Keep the ward as quiet as you can. And—there's a good soul—don't gossip."

* * * * *

Gossip, however, there was in plenty, both then and thereafter. For that day three months Allan Curtis married Hilda Watson, and all the medical students and half the nursing staff of St. Luke's went to the wedding. The other half attended the reception, by special request.

Mr. Charles Weldon succeeded in making his escape from justice. Nor were Mr. and Mrs. Curtis sorry, since it saved them the annoyance of figuring in a newspaper sensation.

"My son," said the old gentleman who had been asked about his boy, "is deeply interested in law just now." "Ah! In a lawyer's office, I presume?" "No' in the criminal court."

"I ain't going to school any more," said a discouraged urchin. "Why?" tenderly inquired his mother. "'Cause it 'tain't any use. I can never learn to spell. The teacher keeps changing the words every day."

"I suppose you told her that she was the only girl you ever loved?" "Of course not. What kind of a fool do you take me for? Do you suppose I wanted to ruin my reputation for truth and veracity at the very outset?"

The Golden Dwarf

A Sensational Romance of To-Day.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "A Keeper of Secrets," "Hate, the Destroyer," "A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS OF "GOLDEN DWARF."

"It is the body of Sir Christopher Dering!"

The words are spoken by a pretty girl—fair-haired, blue-eyed. She stands, horrified, by a grass-grown ditch in a country lane, out of which a great mastiff is climbing. The ditch contains the corpse of a stalwart man—a handkerchief bound over his mouth and nostrils.

Close to there is a strange figure, graceful, well-dressed, even handsome, but with the stature of a boy and the face of an adult. He carries a heavy dog-whip, and stares, fixedly, at the dead body just discovered by his mastiff, Cerberus.

The girl is Esther Carew; the dwarf, Otto Hare, the richest landowner in Derbyshire, and the mystery of Wyresdale, a village in that county. For the first time in fifteen years he has set foot in a public thoroughfare, to attract the attention of Esther, whom he has watched from his park.

Sir Christopher Dering was alive at seven o'clock the preceding day. He and his nephew, Felix, had quarrelled over the latter's love for Esther. Sir Christopher wanted Felix to make a good marriage—the birth of his little cousin Brian has put him out of the succession to the baronetcy. Felix is faithful to the penniless Esther Carew.

Much turns on the whereabouts of Felix on the night before. It appears that he was in Duchester, some miles off, whither he went on business, and spent a night at the theatre. Could he have killed the squire?

Felix in vain protests his innocence.

But the cloud of suspicion gathers around him. Meantime, the child Brian has been kidnapped, and Felix is suspected of this too. He discovers a riding whip with some peculiar marks upon it.

One day an old sailor named Foley is attacked by Otto Hare's dogs.

Kraft is summoned to dress the wound, and gives Foley a draught, which results in his death.

Judith Garland resumes her threats against Dering, who replies by saying he knows the guilty parties. Geddes discovers from analysis that Kraft had poisoned Foley, but is trapped and captured by unknown gaolers.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

In Which a Chestnut Trots.

"What has brought you down here?—surely after all that happened during your last visit you might have seen the prudence of giving Wyresdale a wide berth."

Judith Garland had just closed the door of the library at Dering House, and advanced into the apartment. Against the large carved mantel-piece her brother was lounging—he answered her fretful question with a sneer.

"If you particularly want to know," he said, "the same influence that fetched me down once before—that of a German blackguard named Kraft, Dr. Joseph Kraft, to be polite. He is a retired medico, a friend of Mr. Otto Hare's, the Golden Dwarf, whose mongrels you warned me about that morning at the cross-roads."

His sister looked at him, and a characteristic disdain curled her lip. "Well, you are a fool, Neal," she retorted; "I wouldn't blame you for keeping a card up your sleeve if you understood how to play it. But you must be a born bungler to conceal from me your acquaintance with Dr. Kraft. He called on me a while ago and referred casually to you; I denied your existence."

Neal laughed. "Oh, I'm posted up in your little tarradiddle," he said; "I saw Kraft in London afterwards and the beggar sprang it on me. But don't talk of bungling; you were to get a hold on Dering and make his gooseship lay the valuable eggs we promised ourselves. You've registered precious small progress."

Judith took a seat near her critic. "I miscalculated Felix Dering's strength of mind," she murmured, biting her pink nails; "he comprehends to a nicety the power of passive resistance. He will do nothing; he challenges us to do our worst. Recently," she added, and her face darkened, "I have been studying to revenge myself upon him—his slights have galled me to desperation."

Her brother drew himself nearer. "Judith," said Neal Garland, "you spoke of my bungling the card I had kept in my sleeve. You accused me too soon—the card is not yet played. Yet the game in which it is a trump affects you. That game, my dear revengeful sister, concerns the love of Otto Hare for Esther Carew, Felix Dering's best girl. My friend Kraft is bent on getting Miss Carew for Hare—he is Hare's jackal and parasite in one. Now I—I am the ace of spades in Kraft's hand."

Judith Garland breathed heavily and her eyes glittered. "Go on," was her sole comment.

Neal rubbed his lean palms and chuckled. "Kraft," he proceeded, "not aware of the fact that I did see Dering in Wyresdale on the night of Sir Christopher's murder, has bribed me to say I did. He, of course, knows I was in the village then—I interviewed him very late the same evening. To be frank, I had come down the previous day in the hope of raising some cash out of him. The hope failed me and I wrote you for some, dating my letter from Pimlico—I wished to preserve my visit to Kraft a secret. I was in a fine rage when you twigged the post-mark."

The other was knitting her fingers indeterminately. "How," she demanded, "will your assertion, that you noticed Mr. Dering that night, affect Hare's chance of gaining Esther Carew?"

Neal grinned. "To save Dering from public scandal and possibly the gallows," he explained, "she is expected to marry Hare for the purpose of silencing him. I am merely introduced to convince her that they have a witness to the damning point in question. So, you perceive, Dering may yet require a fair comforter."

Judith abandoned herself to thought. "What is there between Kraft and you," she asked, "that warranted you in expecting to extract money from him? You confess he has bribed you at last; at first he refused you—you are disingenuous, as usual, I will have the whole truth."

Hazel Harlow will be in Belfast next week.

Her brother's jaw set. "You will, will you?" he snarled; "curse you, drop the word, I won't have it. My business is my business, except when it directly concerns you, and this doesn't. I've told you everything you need learn."

A pronounced yawn was Judith's answer. "You make me tired, Neal," she told him, rising, "with your stupid duplicity. If we are to work together, trust me—if not, conduct the affair yourself. But recollect, I have you by a strong cord; if Dering was in Wyresdale that night, so were you—and you are a trifle less respectable than Felix Dering. It was you who took away Brian, it was you who disposed of the child."

Neal started up, his fists clenched. "You threaten me, do you?" he cried; "Keturah Schwartz was right—you would round on me if it suited you, as soon as not."

"And so you would on me," said his sister; "therefore we are quits. But as you won't be candid about Kraft, you won't. If I require to fathom your pretty mystery I will. And be sure of this, Neal, Felix Dering is mine, to betray if I choose, to spare if I choose. Sometimes I am in the mood to ruin him, sometimes I would barter him his safety and his freedom for a moment's tenderness, a simple token of regard."

Her keen orbs moistened with irrepressible feeling, and her firm scarlet mouth quivered feverishly. Neal watched her.

"Give him his freedom and safety," repeated her brother; "which means owning who took the kid, destroying the blood-stained links of his chain, warning him against me, and letting him marry the Carew girl. 'Twon't do, Judith—I've got a stake in the matter. Not but what, if he'd any cash, I'd let him bribe me over Kraft's head. For a stiffish price, if he was on the virtuous lay, I'd sell him back the kid Brian."

There was a footfall in the room and both turned. Felix Dering, his movements deadened by the thick mat at the threshold, had entered the apartment. With a bow and a quiet apology, he passed to a book-rack, reached down a volume and left the library.

"Triple fool," muttered Judith; "what—what if he heard!"

"Not he," said Neal, abashed; "unless he was deliberately spying. But if he were he wouldn't have disturbed us at the mention of the kid's name. He'd have stayed to hear more. Not that his book mightn't have been an excuse."

Thus arguing, Neal approached the rack from which Felix had lifted a substantial tome.

"Volume four of Bruce's 'Evidence in Crimes and Misdemeanours,'" reported Neal; "bah! some magisterial job he's got charge of."

"Felix Dering is not a Justice of the Peace," demurred Judith, glancing shrewdly at the shelf; "see, it is the L to M volume that is missing. Dering's brain is still busy with one subject; the book he has carried off will contain a section on 'Murder.'"

As she spoke a clock on a bracket chimed the quarter after two. Neal started.

"By Jove!" he ejaculated; "I shall catch it if I don't skip—I have an appointment with Kraft at half-past. Ta-ta, Judith, keep a watch upon Dering, and write me if he tries any detective business on me. Its a bit thick, a common murderer posing as an amateur sleuth-hound. Luckily he doesn't know who I am, if he should have heard me mention the kid's name."

Judith pointed to the glass. "Look there," was all she said.

Neal did so. Both their faces were reflected in the polished crystal. There was no question as to the similarity; even an owl in broad sunshine could have discerned a kinship. The man winced. "Let the bounder guess," was his decision; "we can bring him to his knees, if he should suspect the truth. Not that he's likely to, if you don't blab." The speaker caught up his stiff felt hat and clapped it on his brow. "You love this Dering," he added, with a fierce deliberation, "and Keturah Schwartz says no woman in love is a really safe pal so long as her chap's not in the gang. Now you fling us, either for Dering's sake or to spite him in some cat's fashion, and I'll make you sit up. Yours is too pretty a throat to cut, so take a hint from your affectionate brother."

A shudder ran through Judith; for her own ends and in the pursuit of a subtle plot to intimidate Felix Dering and, at the same time, to retain his respect by enlisting his sympathy, she had blabbed. She shrank from Neal aghast, a horrible sensation checking her breath

Pleased by the effect of his "hint," Neal swaggered off, twisting his moustache, to thread the bye-lanes of Wyresdale on his way from Dering House to Wyresdale Park. He did not perceive that, as he went, a figure, on a chestnut gelding, kept pace with him by dexterous parallels and devious paths.

The expression of sinister content had not died from Neal's countenance when he rang at the massive portal of the Golden Dwarf's stately residence.

Tickled by his brutal empire over Judith, he was too absorbed to observe, in his usual acute manner, the smart dog-cart, that, harnessed to a fidgety bay mare of great size and strength, waited, under the charge of a trim groom, on the gravel terrace in front of the house.

The door swung wide, and Neal Garland, rousing, saw that in the splendid hall Joseph Kraft and Otto Hare were strolling side by side, one huge and meditative, the second diminutive and impatient.

While he entered, they turned, and the German strode forward, peering at his heavy chronometer as he came.

"Ah, there you are, my dear Mr. Garland," he cooed, softly; "punctuality is a virtue, for rogues as well as honest folk. We, on our part, are anxious not to waste your time; so, we anticipated your exactitude."

He motioned to the servant, who threw the doors wide.

"After you, Mr. Garland," observed Kraft, waving a plump palm in the direction of the dog-cart. Neal glanced inquisitively at the singular form of the Golden Dwarf, but climbed the vehicle, nevertheless. It had a double step—Otto Hare was compelled to use them both. Kraft followed and the groom completed the quartette.

Otto Hare caught up the whip and dashed off at a reckless pace, unconscious that, as the dog-cart whirled down the lower half of the avenue, a tall chestnut was walked out of a leafy by-path and cantered after it.

When the vehicle cleared the gates and swerved into the lane beyond, the chestnut had rounded the curve of the avenue; its rider noted the route selected by the Golden Dwarf. Some moments subsequently the former marked from the gates the turn taken by the bay mare at the top of the lane.

The Golden Dwarf drove with consummate skill but obvious impatience, Neal studied his handsome, delicate features and slender limbs. Otto Hare awakened to the scrutiny and frowned.

Near the Rosery he halted the bay mare, flung the reins to Kraft, and descended; Neal prepared to scramble down also. But the German laid a fat finger-tip on Neal's shoulder and arrested him.

"You are staying at the Wheatsheaf?" he said. Neal replied in the affirmative.

"Good," responded Joseph Kraft; "it is not far.

Tell your friends about Hazel Harlow.

When your task is over, Mr. Garland, I will accompany you to the Wheatsheaf for your bag, and then convey you to Duchester to catch the express. It leaves at four o'clock. You understand?"

"I suppose so," growled Neal, "and what about pay?"

Kraft patted a vest-pocket. "I have an envelope in reach," he said; "containing ten notes for twenty pounds each. We will transfer them as we go to Duchester. And now be off; Mr. Hare is waiting."

Joining the Golden Dwarf, Neal Garland went beside him through the Rosery garden. Once Otto Hare looked up.

"You have arranged everything with Dr. Kraft?" he queried, almost scornfully.

"Everything," admitted Neal, "but I don't like being hustled out of the place as though I couldn't be trusted."

Otto Hare shrugged his shoulders. "You should have told Dr. Kraft that," he retorted, and knocked at the neat entrance of the Rosery. Barbara opened to them and the Golden Dwarf led Neal Garland into Mrs. Carew's pleasant sitting-room. Its mistress was reading her inevitable novel; Esther was playing softly at the piano. Mrs. Carew started from her seat, and Esther, growing suddenly pale, abandoned the keys.

"My dear Mr. Hare," said her mother, with effusion, "what a delightful surprise!"

Otto Hare bowed. "May I introduce Mr. Garland?" he replied, "a friend of mine who I am anxious should make your daughter's acquaintance."

Mrs. Carew greeted Neal cordially, but Esther quailed as she encountered his insolent dark eyes. So much did she fear the Golden Dwarf that her terror extended itself even to his associates.

Otto Hare drew Mrs. Carew away, leaving Esther and Neal together. Neal leaned over the piano—Esther had sunk upon her music-stool.

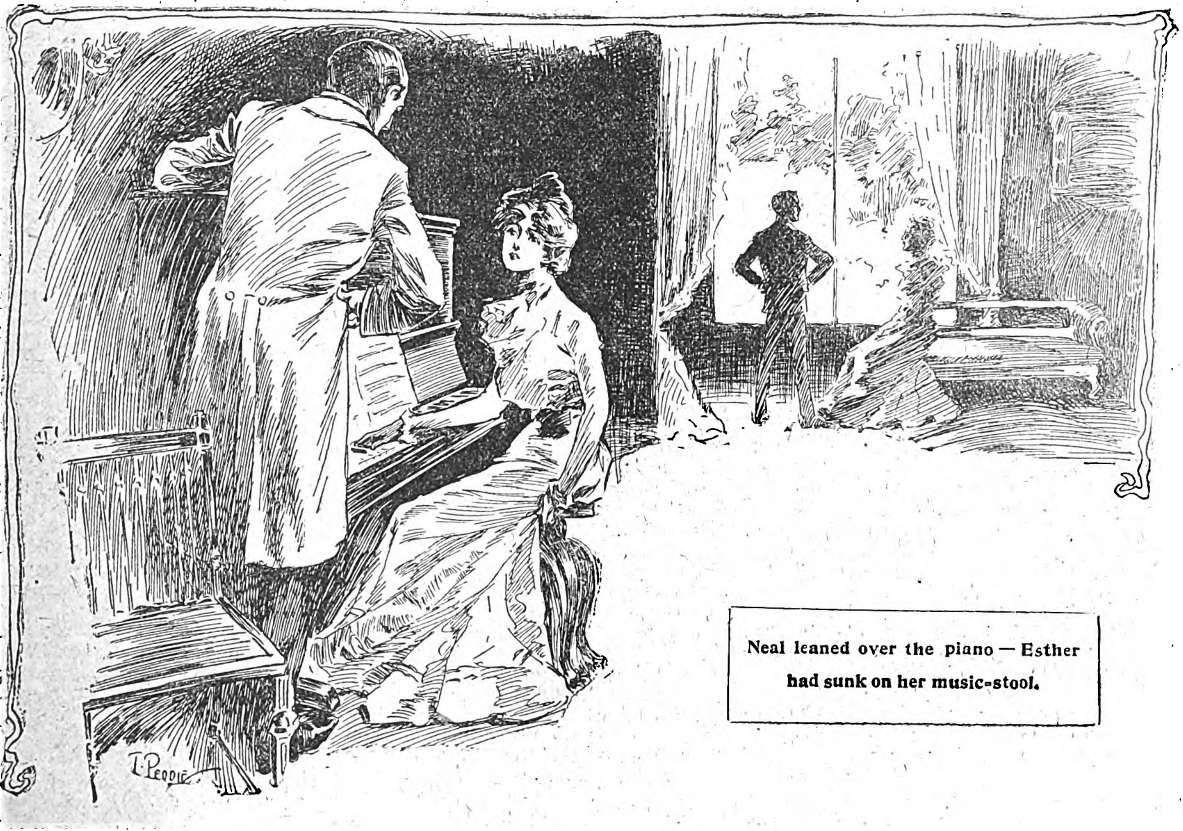
"I am here, ostensibly, Miss Carew," he began, "as a casual caller. In point of fact I have a duty to perform. I happen to be under considerable obligation to Mr. Hare and have travelled down from London at his request to make a short private statement to yourself."

At the mention of the Golden Dwarf Esther's cheeks had waxed deathly white; her wrist slipped from its resting-place on the rosewood cover and struck a shrill discord.

"In the night of Wednesday, the twenty-third of July last," added Neal, "I was coming from Wyresdale Park when I saw, purely by accident, a young fellow, in a tweed cap and suit, with tan riding-boots. He was walking, apparently seeking to evade observation by the cross-roads. I have been in Wyresdale now for a day or two and have seen him once more—I believe his name is Mr. Felix Dering."

Esther's blue orbs, wandering distressfully about the apartment, met those of Otto Hare. The Golden Dwarf smiled—a cruel, vindictive smile. Esther remembered his pledge at the garden-party, "In two days I will satisfy you of Dering's crime." This was the second day—and he had, indeed, revealed to her the depth of his power over the fate of her lover. There was a low moan and a fall, Esther, slipping from her seat, had swooned. Mrs. Carew hurried to her.

"Oh, these faints," she cried, supporting the girl upon her knee; "they grow more and more frequent.



Neal leaned over the piano — Esther had sunk on her music-stool.

Hazel Harlow will travel from town to town.

Mr. Hare, I—I fear I must ask you to run away; it is better for her to recover alone. If you would kindly ring, Mr. Garland."

Neal obeyed and Mrs. Carew shot a fretful whisper to Otto Hare. "You always agitate her in this fashion," she murmured; "I—I almost begin to despair."

The Golden Dwarf surveyed the pallid visage of the motionless girl. "I think you have commenced to despond in the hour of victory, Mrs. Carew," he answered. Then, Barbara responding to Neal's summons, Otto Hare took the latter's arm and led him away.

At the earthern kerb close by, the dog-cart waited—the groom had changed his position, and held the reins while Kraft dozed beside him. The German leaned from his place as they approached.

"Well?" he demanded. The Golden Dwarf laughed—an icy, pitiless merriment.

"Miss Carew fainted suddenly," replied Otto Hare; "hence our brief stay. Mr. Garland, we part here, the Doctor will accompany you to your hotel and then to Duchester. Good afternoon."

He bowed to Neal as that worthy climbed to the back-seat of the dog-cart. When it drove off he was still gazing at it, his features wrinkled by their cruel laughter.

As the vehicle diminished in the vista of the macadam thoroughfare, a chestnut gelding was spurred from an adjacent by-way and followed it at a swift trot. The rider was Felix Dering.

Half a mile further on, the dog-cart paused at the Wheatsheaf—a gaunt, brick-built public-house. Felix leapt the chestnut into a field and tarried behind a screening hedge. Its brief halt terminated, the dog-cart took the main road to Duchester. The gelding was spurred on to the macadam again, and cantered forwards, holding in sight the fast bay, the dog-cart, the groom, the fat German, and the figure of Neal Garland.

CHAPTER XXXV.

"MAD AS A MARCH HARE!"

"I'M afraid you must wait a little for this, Barbara. father is out just now, but he'll make it up and send it down immediately he comes in. We're—we're short-handed at present."

Barbara Preston, the trim maid-servant from the Rosery, gazed in astonishment at the pretty face of Connie Forester. It was tear-stained and pitiful, and the ripe nether lip trembled uncontrollably.

"Dear heart, Miss Connie," she said; "what is the trouble?—you do look wretched, worse than Miss Esther, poor soul, and she's miserable enough. It's her the prescription's for; Mrs. Carew called in Dr. Vavasour last night. Miss Esther was out of one faint into another."

Constance Forester wiped her eyes and sobbed. "I'm sorry about Esther," faltered the chemist's daughter, "but perhaps I'm a bit worse off than she is. I don't mind you knowing, Barbara: it's—it's Mr. Geddes. He went off yesterday afternoon and he hasn't been home since. We are afraid some—some accident has happened to him."

The other sighed. "Hope for the best, Miss Connie," she said; "I don't despair yet of hearing from my Ted, as was took out of the cell at the police-station six weeks ago, where he ought never to have been, for he wouldn't have hurt Sir Christopher to save his own life. Though I do dread harm's come to him, else he'd have written to me, sure."

Connie choked down her grief. "Of—of course I've no right to—to cry over Mr. Geddes," she declared, "and if I'd the least scrap of self-respect I shouldn't do it. But he was so kind and cheerful and—you understand what father is."

"I'd worse luck," rejoined Barbara; "but as for you're not crying over Mr. Geddes, I'll promise he's thinking about you wherever he is. Why, Miss Connie, there's not a woman in Wyresdale that doesn't realise how it's been with you and Mr. Geddes. And if you have taken your time to say 'Yes,' it's what we all have to do, or what would people think of us?"

"People might think anything they choose," gasped Connie, "if he'd only come back. I wouldn't feel so frightened, but Wyresdale hasn't seemed the same place lately, what with murders and deaths and disappearances, it's as bad as London must be."

"True, for you, miss," agreed the maid-servant: "well, I'll be getting off—you'll send Miss Esther's medicine—not that medicine'll do her much good as long as she can't see Mr. Dering without creeping out at the kitchen door like a thief. Mark my words, Miss Connie, if her mother marries her to Mr. Hare, who isn't more than half a man at the most, she'll die. And so I'd tell the old cat, if I lost my situation through it."

With which valorous assertion Barbara departed, and Connie, retiring to the corner behind the dispensing-screen, perched herself on the top of a wooden stool and dissolved into tears. Her fit of passionate despondency was at its crisis when Caleb Forester walked into the shop. Connie leapt up and ran to him.

The chemist glanced at her anxiously and shook his head. "No news yet, my dear," he murmured. "Brasher was not at the station, but the sergeant in charge said he would ask him to step round as soon as he arrived. You—you mustn't weep like this, Connie, what will the Inspector imagine?"

"I hate the Inspector," snapped his daughter, plying a damp handkerchief; "if it hadn't been for you wanting me to sweeten him, Archie—Mr. Geddes and I might have understood one another by now."

"Then, for his sake, you must not be reckless," retorted the chemist. "As you wish Mr. Brasher to restore Geddes to you, and, more particularly, to me and the shop, don't awaken the demon of jealousy in his bosom. The green-eyed monster plays curious tricks, even with police-officers, and it was only yesterday I gave him formal permission to sue for your young affections. Recollect there is no great occasion for alarm—Geddes may have sprained an ankle, or wandered too far afield to return conveniently over-night."

Connie threw off her father's palm, which he had laid persuasively on her wrist, and darted into the shelter of the screen; Michael Brasher—upright, military, correct, was crossing the road towards the Wyresdale Pharmacy. He saluted Caleb Forester as he entered the latter's establishment.

"Good-morning, Mr. Forester," he said: "I believe you were at the station five minutes back—sorry I was out. What's this I hear—something about Geddes having taken French leave."

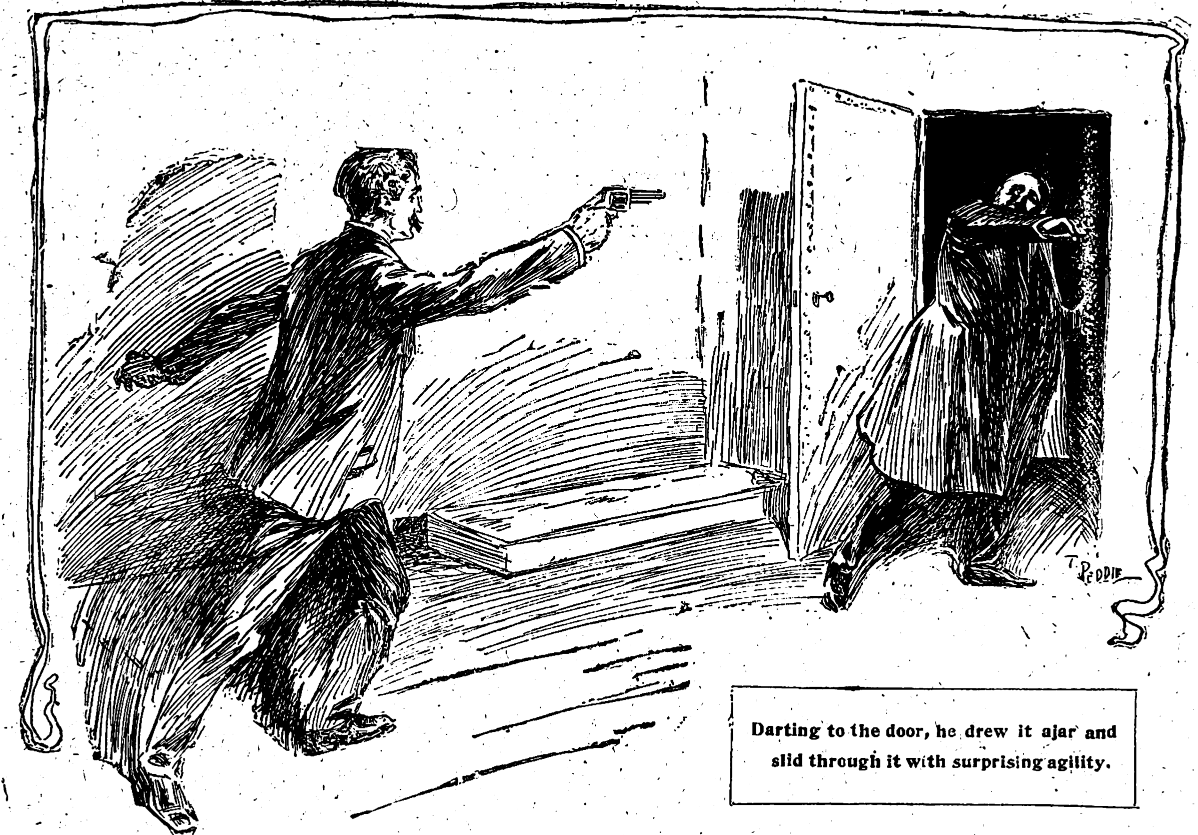
There was a stamp of a small foot behind the screen—Connie was dabbing her hot cheeks with her handkerchief, wetted under the dispensary tap, and had selected one means of expressing her view of the Inspector's observation.

"Not quite," responded Caleb, nervously, comprehending himself between two fires, Michael Brasher's jealousy and Connie's indignation; "Geddes went out yesterday afternoon, when he had summoned me to speak to you, in fact. Since then he has not been seen or heard of. As he was most regular in his habits, the thing is peculiar."

Mr. Brasher produced his pocket-book. "Any idea of his probable movements?" demanded the Inspector.

"None whatever," explained the chemist; "but my daughter may have gathered, by chance, some indication of his purpose in going out. Connie, my dear."

Hazel Harlow is in Rugby this week.



Darting to the door, he drew it ajar and slid through it with surprising agility.

At the signal Connie marched from behind the mahogany panels, calm and indifferent. Michael Brasher bowed deferentially.

"Did you happen to learn from Geddes, my dear," queried her father, "where he was bound yesterday?"

"No," said Constance Forester, biting her lip to conceal its still obstinate tremor.

"Thank you," answered the Inspector, "have you noticed anything exceptional about his bearing of late—any suggestion of personal worry or ill-health?"

"No," repeated Connie, and Caleb echoed the disclaimer. Michael Brasher recorded them both.

"How was he dressed?" pursued the Inspector, "usual brown serge suit, I suppose, and stiff felt hat, as usual—Geddes was a conservative type. I'll trouble you in a moment, Mr. Forester, for a memo. of his underclothing, so far as you know his wardrobe. Had he a stick or an umbrella?"

"He seldom carried either," said the chemist. Michael Brasher shrugged his shoulders.

"Ordinary costume, unknown destination," he summarised; "Not much to start on, is it? However, I'll do what I can, Mr. Forester. He may turn up on his own—he's been wrapping himself up a great deal in amateur detective work, with reference to Sir Christopher Dering's murder and the death of your brother-in-law, Mr. Forester—Foley, I mean, and I thought Geddes rather incoherent on the subject yesterday, I must admit—he had a dead mouse and talked of secret poisons."

Constance Forester stood pondering; when she roused it was to speak decisively. "Mr. Brasher," she said, with much coldness; "your sneers at Mr. Geddes are his business and not mine. But perhaps I ought to tell you this. He had a curious article in the shop a while before he left—a thing like a revolver, but with a rubber bulb instead of a butt. He was filling part of the tube with ammonia—he explained that it was arranged to discharge the stuff at—at tramps or—or dogs—for self-protection."

Michael Brasher wrote down the item of information. "Looks to me a case of temporary aberration," he commented, "if you'll pardon my voicing the opinion, Miss Forester. He wasn't a cyclist, I think?"

Caleb Forester responded in the negative.

"Exactly," responded the Inspector; "what value would an ammonia-pistol be to him—unless, indeed, he wanted it for his amateur detective proceedings."

Mr. Brasher paused to stroke his smartly-cropped Geddes' clothing," he said; "in the next half-hour, beard. "You can let me have a full inventory of Trot your boy round with it. Good-day, Mr. Forester," he added; "good-day, Miss Connie—I will communicate any clue I get upon."

Saluting deliberately, Michael Brasher strode into the High Street; he muttered to himself as he stalked down it.

"Mad, for a thousand!" he said; "mad as a March hare. That is what comes of trying to be cleverer than the practised brains of an intelligent police-force. Yes, my canny Scot, I shall find you in a ditch with straws in your curly brown locks. You'd better have stuck to your pills."

The Inspector was referring to no less a person than Archibald Geddes.

(To be continued.)

Hazel Harlow will be in Belfast next week.

CHECKMATED.

A Story of a Song.

When Matthew Stoneleigh set his mind on having a thing he usually got it in the end, no matter how impossible it seemed at the outset. But the less said about the means he employed the better. He was a music publisher by profession, and had built up a business of enormous proportions; one, moreover, which still continued to grow. What Stoneleigh had on his mind would have kept most men awake at nights, but he contrived to sleep like a top. Strange tales could have been told of certain business-like transactions in which he had had a hand. Struggling composers had received a few pounds for work which had afterwards yielded him the same figure in thousands. This fact did not prevent him from posing as their benefactor.

He was terribly ambitious and inordinately vain. His first ambition had been to get rich. Money, he told himself, was power. And now he was rich, but not satisfied. Certainly he had acquired power, but hardly the sort which suited his fancy. Society's doors, open to many composers of songs he published, were closed to him. Now, he was of the opinion that there was not half so much difficulty attached to composing a song as to selling the same. Still, that was neither here nor there. He wanted to get into Society. It was his supreme desire, as, indeed, it had been the ruling passion of many before him. By this time he was firmly convinced that money could not furnish the entree, but it occurred to him that ability might. What was he to do?

He made up his mind to become a composer. He was in possession of more than ordinary musical gifts, or he had not risen to the position he now occupied; but he lacked the creative faculty. However, a large number of manuscripts passed through his hands, and by these he profited. He composed songs, though how much of these productions traced their origin to his own head was a question. He chuckled to find that the composition of a single song had earned him more honour than the publication of a hundred and one had done.

One morning he was seated in his private office, on the best of terms with himself, when a clerk came to him with a lady's card. Close on the clerk's heels followed the owner of the card, no less a personage than Madame Carruthers, England's premier soprano.

Stoneleigh bowed low, as much to conceal a look of exultation as to express his homage.

"I want a song," said the lady, coming immediately to the point of her visit. "Not an old one, mind. I desire to know if it is in your power to furnish me with a new one which will exactly suit my voice. You are acquainted with my style. Really, I have not had a satisfactory ballad for ages."

"That is not surprising," said Stoneleigh, "since it is impossible to produce a melody worthy of your interpretation."

Madame laughed, but did not seem displeased.

"Just think of Constantine, the tenor," she continued. "The song he got from your house last autumn has turned the heads of half the musical world. Can you not serve me as you have served him? I declare that my stock of songs is growing quite stale."

Stoneleigh appeared to be turning something over in his mind.

"May I venture to offer you a song I myself have composed?" he asked presently.

"Oh! certainly. Charmed to try it, I am sure. Have you it with you?"

"No. The fact is, it happens to be in my head at present," he said, with a covert smile. "I have not yet committed it to paper."

"When can you let me have it?"

"In eight days, if that will be soon enough."

"Say five. To-day is Monday. Can you manage it by Friday night?"

"It shall be at your house by then," he replied.

She took her departure.

"The chance of a lifetime," murmured the publisher, the moment he was alone.

Presently the door reopened, and his clerk appeared a second time.

"Well, Johnson ?" he inquired, slightly raising his eyebrows.

"That fellow Macdonald is here again, sir," said the clerk. "Can't get rid of him anyway."

"What's his game this time ?"

"Can't guess. Says he wants to see you most particularly, and has almost gone on his knees for an interview. Poor beggar ! he looks as though he's got to the last straw."

"Starving ?"

"Not far from it."

"Hum ! Better show him up."

The clerk did so.

"Well, what do you want ?" demanded the publisher, when Macdonald and he were alone.

"I've brought a song to show you, sir," said the newcomer, in a husky voice ; "and I want you to consider it. Oh, sir, I beseech you to give it a trial. You will never regret it, I assure you."

"Hum ! I suppose it's similar stuff to the rot you've thrust on me before ?"

"No ; it is the best thing I have done in my life, and the only hope I have left. Oh, sir, I am starving, and I have not only myself to consider. There is my wife and my little lad. I beg you to help me for their sakes."

"Why don't you turn your hand to something else, instead of wasting your time composing songs that won't sell ? Why don't you get coals in, or clean windows, or sweep a crossing ? Either of these will prevent you from starving."

Macdonald was silent.

"I haven't time to bother with you," continued the publisher. "Take your precious song elsewhere and leave me alone."

"I have already been with it to eight publishers, and not one of them will see me."

"Hum ! You've failed elsewhere, and now your only chance is to fall back on me, eh ? This is what comes of me being tender-hearted."

"Mr. Stoneleigh !" said the man, with sudden passion, "If you send me away, do you know what I shall do ?"

"No idea."

"I shall tear my song up, and then I shall go to the dogs."

"Tut, tut. Empty words, my dear fellow. However, I suppose I shall have to look at your precious song." (He had intended to do so all along.) "What's it about ? Tennyson's 'Tears, Idle Tears !' Phew ! What a coincidence. I happen to be setting the same words to music myself. But leave your manuscript, and I will consider it."

"And when may I call for your decision ?"

"Oh, in about two days."

"I trust it may be favourable, sir."

"Anyhow, you will not be kept long in suspense. Good-day."

An hour's study convinced Stoneleigh that Macdonald's song was a veritable masterpiece.

"Good idea, that of mine, to say I was setting Tennyson's poem," he told himself. "Rather rough on Macdonald, I must confess, but it's entirely the beggar's own fault. Besides, he'll pull through all right, and if he turns his attention to a more lucrative employment I shall have simply done him a kindness. When will idiots learn sense ?"

Macdonald remained idle during the two following days, his state of mind putting any work of importance out of the question. He was passing through deep waters. Most of the time he sat staring into the fire, his elbows supported by his knees, his chin buried in his hands. At length the hour of his appointment with the publisher drew near.

"You will not be long away, Richard ?" said his wife, handing him his hat. "I shall count the moments till you return."

"If it is accepted I shall be back in half an hour," he said

"And if not ?" She just managed to whisper the words.

A look shot into his eyes which terrified her.

"I—I—don't know," he stammered, "what I shall do."

He walked out of the room. Her hand flew to her heart. Oh ! what—what would her husband do if his manuscript were rejected ? In the hour of her direst need her eyes rested upon her son (a lad of ten summers), who was carving quaint figures out of cork with a small pocket-knife. She darted to his side, caught his arm and cried :

"Quick, Charley ! Attend to what I say. Run after your father. Don't let him know you are following him. He must not be out of your sight a single instant. You understand ? Now run. Make no mistake."

A look of comprehension dawned in the boy's eyes, and, grasping his cap, he hastened out of the room.

Some time later Macdonald was ushered into Stoneleigh's private office.

"Oh ! take a seat," said the latter, without raising his head. He was writing a letter.

The composer did not sit.

Stoneleigh finished his letter, inclosed it in an envelope, and put his pen behind his ear.

"Well, I've tried over your song, Macdonald," he said, moistening the envelope flap with his tongue.

There was a blank pause. Stoneleigh was hoping there would not be a scene.

"And—er—I'm sorry to say it, you know, but there's absolutely no way out of it——"

He placed the envelope on his blotting pad, addressed it, and then tossed it aside.

"The fact is—er—your song is nothing whatever in our line. So I am reluctantly compelled to return it to you."

He opened a drawer at his right hand, took out the manuscript, and extended it to its author.

"I won't have it !" cried Macdonald, with a choke in his voice.

"My dear fellow ! You—Halloa !"

The door had opened a few inches, and a boy appeared in the aperture. It was Charley, who had somehow eluded the clerk's vigilance, and was bent on fulfilling his mother's injunction to the letter.

"Here's a queer pass," said the publisher. "Who are you, I should like to know ?"

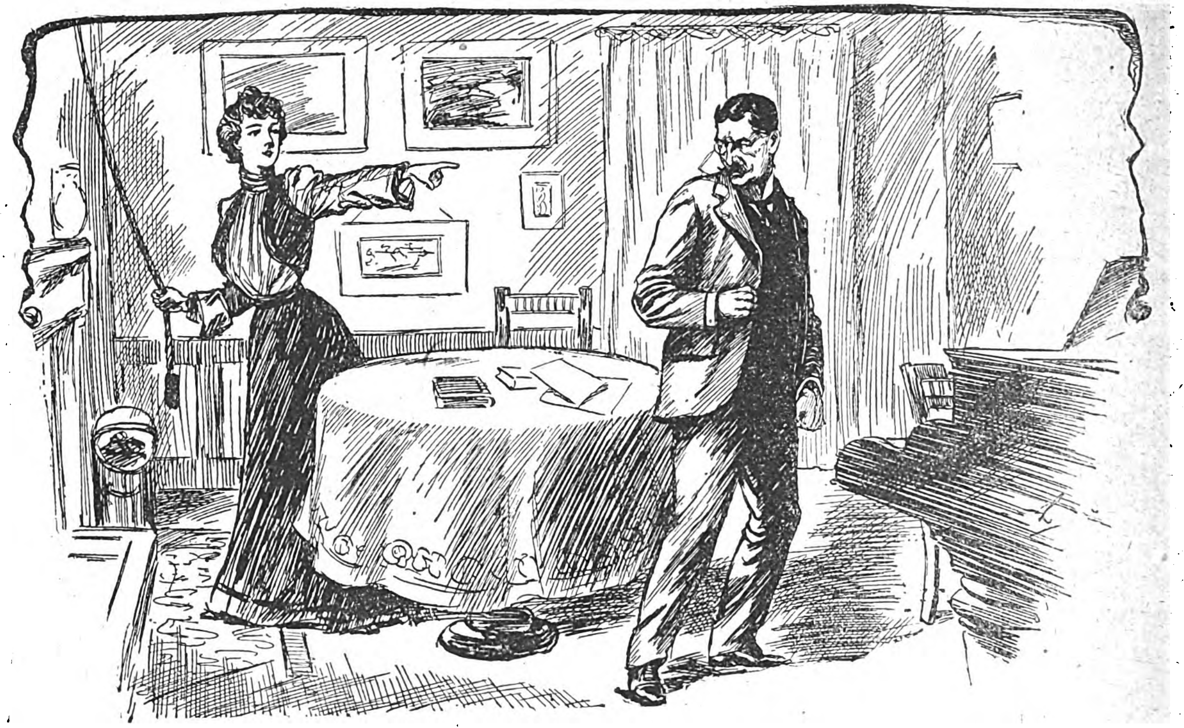
"Please, sir, this is my father," said the boy, utterly at a loss for another answer.

There was a moment's inaction, which afforded Stoneleigh an opportunity of gently, but firmly, forcing the song upon the unwilling Macdonald.

Then an unexpected circumstance happened. Macdonald, almost maddened by the torture he was enduring, dashed the manuscript to the floor and fled from the room.

"How confoundedly awkward," exclaimed Stoneleigh.

Hazel Harlow will travel from town to town.



Madame ran to the bell and placed her hand on it.

His eyes fell upon Charley, who was following in the wake of his distracted parent, and an idea was conceived.

"Hi! boy; half a minute. Take this song to your father, and here's a shilling for you. That's right; stuff it up your coat. Now cut."

This time the publisher's inward comment was: "How decidedly fortunate."

The same night, upon reaching home, he took a roll of manuscript from his desk. It was an exact copy of Macdonald's song, and the end he now had in view was to make many cunning alterations, write out a fresh copy, and then claim the composition as his own work. The fruit of his endeavours was a song similar to Macdonald's, yet not the same.

Did he feel any remorse by reason of having wronged Macdonald? Not he! Selfish to the heart's core, no thought of another's suffering crossed his mind, or had disturbed him, if it had done so. His only fear was lest Madame Carruthers should disapprove of the song he was taking her. Yet the more he thought of the song, the more he regarded as unlikely that she would be anything but charmed. This accounted for the confidence he manifested as he made his way to her house at the end of the allotted time, a confidence almost disdainful.

Yes, madame had given orders for him to be admitted to her presence. He followed the footman like one in a dream, seeing before him the attainment of his ambition. Presently he was bending over his patron's hand, voicing the gratitude he experienced on account of the signal honour she was conferring upon him. But she regarded him coldly. Something in her attitude should have warned him of impending calamity.

"You've brought the song, I suppose?" she said.

He handed her a case. This she unfastened and withdrew the inclosure. She opened the song and ran her eyes down the first page. What was that expression dawning on her face? Surprise? Nay, bewilderment. An adroit movement caused her to stand with her back to her companion. It was well he could not see her face.

The publisher had seated himself on the softest of chairs, and was gazing around the room appreciatively. A beautiful room, very large, and artistically appointed. In one corner, quite twelve yards away from him, was a grand piano and a piece of music open on it. He was curious to know the name of the song the distinguished soprano had been practising, but his eyes could not span the distance.

Madame still had the manuscript in her hand, but she was not studying it. Her busy brain was formulating a scheme whereby to compass a most desirable end.

Presently she approached the piano, removed the song, and in its place put the one the publisher had brought.

"Will you be so kind as to play it for me?" she requested.

He bowed and seated himself at the piano. The next moment the room was filled with melody, to which madame listened almost spellbound.

"Exquisite!" she murmured, when the last note had died away. "If it would not be trespassing on your generosity, there is another song I should like you to play for me."

"Delighted," he said, and she placed the song in question before him. It was Macdonald's manuscript!

Stoneleigh went white, and beads of perspiration stood on his forehead. He was a man difficult to rob of self-control, but there was a limit to his endurance.

"Why don't you play it?" inquired Madame Carruthers, with simulated surprise.

What could he say? What could he do? The lady's move was so powerful that nothing, absolutely nothing, could stand in face of it.

"Stoneleigh, the game's up," she said. "And now I know that reports which I refused to credit are true."

Stoneleigh saw a picture of himself thrust from the society of pure women and honourable men. He sprang to his feet, a bitter curse on his lips. Madame ran to a bell and placed her hand on it.

"If you move, I ring," she said calmly.

He did not move.

"Don't ring yet," he said hoarsely.

Her hand fell to her side.

"What shall you do?" he asked.

"Proclaim you to the world for what you are."

"Who will believe you?"

"Who will disbelieve me?"

He took a step forward. Her hand flew to the bell. He stopped.

"Have you a price?"

She shook her head.

"You have not spared others, and you shall not be spared. You have had your day, and the reckoning time has come. You felt sure that you had seen the last of Macdonald's manuscript, but Fate ruled otherwise."

"I could have believed anything but that he would come to you with it."

"He didn't come to me. Two days ago, as I was driving from the city, a block occurred, and upon lowering the glass I perceived a crowd and a policeman emerging from their midst bearing the unconscious form of a boy, who, it transpired, had been knocked down by a passing vehicle. I offered the use of my carriage to convey the sufferer to the nearest hospital. Upon being informed that the boy was not really hurt, but only stunned, I decided to take him to my house instead.

"Now comes the most curious part of the whole affair. When I removed my patient's coat I discovered the manuscript of a song. Need I say more? Perhaps a few words may not be out of place. I tried the song and was charmed by it, and that same night I dispatched a messenger to bring the father and mother of my patient to their son, having got their address from the song. Macdonald shall receive the recognition he deserves, and as for you, what I now know others shall know before many days are past. The wrong you have done shall be redressed."

The following night the newsboys were shouting: "Mysterious disappearance of Matthew Stoneleigh."

A POLICE INSPECTOR'S DAUGHTER

SAYS BILE BEANS SAVED HER LIFE.

ULCERATED STOMACH, INDIGESTION and DEBILITY CURED

SEVEN YEARS OF TORTURE ENDED.

From the brink of the grave to perfect health is a tremendous change. Yet this is the change which Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness have worked in Miss Jenny Newton, daughter of the late Police-Inspector Newton, of Grove Street, Wakefield. Here is her own story as a Wakefield Herald reporter had it from her lips: "I have been a martyr to indigestion and ulcerated stomach for nearly seven years. It would startle people were I to write down the list of so-called remedies that I have tried for my complaint. I went to the Clayton Hospital for two years, and the doctors at that institution did me some little good, but only for a very short time. Then I was treated by three well-known doctors in Wakefield, but none of them did me any real good; and I became very weary and downcast. Abandoning hopes of obtaining a cure by consulting medical men, I commenced with patent medicines, and on these my mother has spent a small fortune. It was all to no purpose, however. I became thin, weak and emaciated—a very wretched-looking object, I know, and no wonder, I could eat nothing for weeks. Nothing would stay on my stomach, and for a long time I lived on hot milk alone. My head was always aching, as was my body; I had terrible pains in the region of my stomach and heart; I lost flesh rapidly and I could not sleep, I felt always low-spirited, and I got so bad that I could not go upstairs without stopping once or twice to rest. I felt as though I didn't care whether I got better or not. My mother had given up all hopes of my recovery when one day she saw an advertisement about Charles Forde's Bile Beans, and what wonderful cures they had effected in some cases. She bought a box and I began to take them right off. In a few days I began to pick up splendidly. It was really marvellous! All the pains I had gradually disappeared. I commenced to sleep soundly, and got up refreshed; began to take solid food, and to be able to digest it. I kept on with the Beans, and as the result I was soon perfectly well again. I can now eat and digest any food. This I owe to Bile Beans entirely! They are worth their weight in gold! Nearly everyone who has seen me has asked what it is that has brought about the great change, and I have told them with the utmost possible pleasure." Miss Newton's mother, who was present, brought the interview to a close with the remark: "You may tell everybody if you like, that Bile Beans, and nothing else, have saved my daughter's life! She is now a bright and happy girl."

Charles Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness are without doubt superior to all known medicines for stomach disorders and diseases, indigestion, liver and kidney disorders, constipation, headache, debility, nervousness, anæmia, female ailments, chill, rheumatism, pimples, face sores, as a restorative after influenza, as well as for palpitation, pains in the chest, difficulty in breathing, and pains between the shoulders. All chemists stock Bile Beans, or you may obtain direct from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., 119 and 120, London Wall, London, E.C., by sending price, 1s. 1½d. or 2s. 9d. per box (2s. 9d. box contains three times 1s. 1½d).

THE SEA'S RESTITUTION.

The third day out from Havre a fog came up and made the world opaque. For two days it did not lift or thin, and it was difficult to believe, in spite of the log, that the ship was making any headway at all. It seemed almost as if the world had ceased to be, or as if it existed but in a state of flux, and as if we enchanted ones, accursed with an immunity from the common destruction, were left to contemplate the nothingness.

Then, to add to our sense of doom, a young baby was said to have died on shipboard. At first everyone took it for granted that its mother must have been a steerage or, at the least, a second cabin passenger. It seemed unlikely that death would be so impertinent as to enter the first cabin. But it was learned that the destroyer had been even more insolent than that—it had taken a child much favoured of fortune, the heir to great wealth.

I went to visit Mrs. Morell, the child's mother. She was tall and white, with wide eyes, which must have been beautiful when she was happy. Now a sort of blankness, like that of the air and the sea, had come into them.

I could not see her soul for her sorrow. She offered no confidence ; indeed, my sympathy could not reach to her dulled sense. Her grief was between us, impenetrable as the fog through which the ship crept cautiously.

"The captain asked me if I would be willing to have my baby buried at sea," she said to me in a voice which reminded me of a mournful bell, "and I told him I had no objection whatever."

"No !" I ejaculated in amazed surprise.

"Nothing is more peaceful than the depths of the sea," she responded, and it being night she asked me to walk upon the deck with her under cover of the darkness.

More in sympathy than from curiosity I inquired :

"Your husband is awaiting you in America ?"

"Yes," she replied, her voice strangely colourless. "He will be at the wharf. He will expect to see the baby in my arms. He has never seen the baby, you know. I have been with my mother, who lives in Paris, and the day that baby was three months old I started for home."

We paused by the bulwark and she looked down into the shadowy trough of the wave.

"It will make a soft cradle," she said. Her courage wrung my heart.

"Where do you find the strength to endure such a grief ?" I cried.

"Indeed," she responded, with the mournful shadow of a smile, "that I cannot tell. It does not seem as if it were really I who has met with this great misfortune. If it were I whose plans have been so altered and whose hopes have been so dashed, surely I would not be tearless like this. It is Adele, my nurse, who weeps."

The next morning the captain read the burial service with solemn accent, and into the colourless sea, through the white vacancy of the fog, the little one was lowered reverently. I stood beside the mother, and I would have sustained her with my arm but that she gently repulsed me. She swayed a little from side to side, but there were no tears on the face that looked out of the quaint pointed hood of her sea cloak. She stared ahead of her at the stupid fog — she looked baffled, into obscurity.

Suddenly, an hour after the funeral, the mist lifted. It rolled up as a curtain rolls up, and it was a saffron colour, gleaming and splendid. When it had lifted, a sparkling sea was revealed and a cloudless sky. The world became radiant. It seemed to exult in its beauty. Mrs. Morell cast a look of reproach at this vaunting of nature's youth and joy and went to her cabin.

Through the day messages were sent her, and delicate evidences of sympathy, but her maid alone returned thanks. The next morning found her still in seclusion. More than one of us thought of invading that sacred solitude, but at the last forbore.

It was the afternoon of that day that the man on the bridge espied an object upon the horizon at the south. It was a black speck, visible in a short time to all of us.

"It's a ship's longboat," was the verdict at last. "It is manned and flying a flag of distress."

The course of our ship was changed. We went racing through the green water, rejoicing in the zest of the hour, in the action, the event.

Presently we were standing off cautiously from a longboat manned with haggard men.

"Who are you ?" shouted the captain as the companion ladder was being lowered.

"All that are left of the crew and the passengers of the Nina Celeste, sir."

"How lost ?"

"By fire, sir, two nights ago. The first boat lowered capsized. The women—there were two—were lowered into it. But the men were frightened, the flames made such headway, so they jumped. We are all who remain. Three of us were picked up from the overturned boat, but the others were dragged down in the swirl of the boat ; it got to going round and round."

"Was the Nina Celeste a freighter ?"

"A freighter, sir, bound from Bermuda to New York, carrying a cargo of lilies and hemp. It was out of its course owing to a fog."

The boat's load came on board—fifteen pale men—and one of them carried something in his arms.

"What do you carry ?" asked the captain. "Is it a child ?"

"Yes, sir. It is the babe of one of the women who were lost. I was just about to hand it down to her."

There was a sharp cry from among the crowd of passengers. Mrs. Morell was coming forward, her arms outstretched. She was entirely unconscious of the crowd apparently. Someone whispered to the man who held the babe :

"Her little one was buried yesterday at sea."

The man shuffled his burden awkwardly in his arms and took his hat from his head. Mrs. Morell reached him, and her hands seemed to hover above the coverings of the child's face as an avid bee hovers above a flower.

"It is alive !" she half whispered, after she had bent above it, all trembling. "It is breathing !" It seemed as if she thought that fact a sort of miracle.

She lifted the babe eagerly from the man's arms, and, straining it close to her, walked with rapid, uncertain steps toward her cabin, and as she went she, who had hitherto shed no tear, sobbed aloud.

Mr. GEO. R. SIMS'
HAIR RENEWER.

Called by him "TATCHO."
(Romany: "GENUINE," "GOOD," "TRUE.")

And why, pray, is the successful poet, playwright, and journalist an eminent authority on hair restorer? Eager for an explanation, a Daily Mail representative sought out Mr. Sims. . . .

Now Mr. G. R. Sims, as many people know, is one of the busiest men in the kingdom, but hastily affixing his signature to a letter, he looked up and extended a characteristically cordial welcome. Then he said: "I will explain. I found that I was rapidly going bald. Not seriously, you understand, but the thinning out was sufficiently marked to set me thinking out a remedy. I went to two specialists, both of whom cheerfully assured me that I should be absolutely bald in two years.

"Then I discovered the preparation which is now placed upon the market. I found that I had hit upon a remedy capable of working wonders. Look at my hair now, isn't that convincing evidence of the value of my preparation.

"Ladies confirm my good opinion of it as a dressing for daily use. Mrs. Brown Potter, whose beautiful hair is the admiration of the entire lady world, writes that she uses nothing but 'Tatcho.' There is nothing to prevent every woman from making her hair silken in texture and bountiful in volume, for she can obtain a bottle of 'Tatcho' now in every town or even village."

In order that the public may be able to test the superlative value of Mr. Geo. R. Sims' discovery, the Company is issuing large 4/6 size test bottles post free for 1/10, under plain cover, one of which may be had on application. Please cut off the corner of this advertisement where marked, and send with name and address, legibly written, to the—

Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a Stereoscope to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, September 16th. Post-cards only, please. The prize of £1 1s. has been awarded this week to Mr. D. Magee, of 4 Lancaster Street, Belfast, whose contribution is denoted by a star thus.*

"WILLIE, do you and your brother ever fight?" "Yes, sir." "Who beats?" "Pa."

BELLA (coyly): "I have only seen twenty summers." Her Dear Friend (sarcastically): "Really? Why don't you consult an oculist?"

"THERE'S a lesson in that would-be epicure, who died after eating six pigs' feet." "What is it?" "That four feet are enough for any pig."

BOBBIE: "The lobster bites hard, but he must be very timid, mamma." Mamma: "Why so, Bobbie?" Bobbie: "Why, because he always wears his tail between his legs."

A NATIVE wrote this to an English missionary at Lagos, apologising for not coming to see him: "Had not distance preponderated, I should have approximated to see you."

MRS. NEURICH: "Why didn't you come when I rang the bell?" Servant: "Please, ma'am, I didn't hear the bell." Mrs. Neurich: "Well, hereafter, when you don't hear it, come and tell me at once."

"THERE is nothing like settling down," said the retired merchant confidently to his neighbour. "When I gave up business I settled down, and found I had quite a comfortable fortune. If I had settled up I should not have had much."

H.: "Is your boy fond of books?" D.: "Very. I gave him a copy of 'Robinson Crusoe' the other day and he got lots of fun out of it." H.: "I didn't know he could read." D.: "He can't read, but he tears the pages out and makes boats of them. Oh, yes, he's fond of books."

"DAD, were you ever a fish?" The individual thus addressed lowered his chin and gazed over his spectacles at the boy in speechless astonishment. "Oh, don't get mad at me, dad, for asking you," continued his inquisitive offspring. "Mrs. Cooly came in after you had gone yesterday, and asked ma what she would do if you were dead, and ma laughed and said she guessed there were just as good fish in the sea as you are."

*A NATIVE in Africa, who had been married by one of the missionaries, at the end of three weeks brought his wife back to the clergyman, and requested him to take her back. The clergyman asked what was the matter with her. "Why, sar, she no good. The book says she obey me. She no wash my clothes. She no do what I tole her." The Minister: "But the book says you were to take her for better or for worse." "Yes, sar, but she all worse, an' no better. She hab too much worse, an' no good 'tall."

MRS. WABASH: "Who is your favourite writer, Mrs. Ogden?" Mrs. Ogden: "My husband." Mrs. Wabash: "Your husband? Why, what did he ever write?" Mrs. Ogden: "Cheques."

PEDAGOGOS (severely): "Now, sir, for the last time, what is the hypotenuse of a right-angled triangle equivalent to?" Boy (desperately): "It's equivalent to a licking for me, sir."

"I SHOULD like to see a nice fat goose," said a customer entering a poultry shop in a hurry. "Yes, sir," replied the little boy who had been left in charge. "Father'll be downstairs directly."

YOUNG WIFE: "Oh, I'm so unhappy! I am more and more convinced that my husband married me only for my money." Friend: "Then you have at least the consolation that your husband isn't so stupid as he looks."

LITTLE GIRL (weeping): "Somebody has stolen my doll." Mother: "Your doll? Which one?" Little Girl: "The oldest and nicest one of all; the one that didn't have any legs, or arms, or hair, or eyes, or anything."

OLD MR. GOODFELLO (accosting child): "Ah, what a pretty little one! Will you tell me your name, Miss?" Miss Hautton (age seven): "Nurse, if you have one of mamma's cards with you, will you kindly hand it to the gentleman?"

GOODFELLOW: "So you think John Gotrox's will is a masterpiece of legal ingenuity and acumen, do you?" Lawyer Sharpley: "Sir, I drew it; and I will stake my reputation upon that will's lasting in the courts as long as the property does."

HE: "Suppose I should ask your father if I could marry you. Do you think I would stand any chance?" She: "No; your case would be hopeless." "Do you think he would really say no?" "Not that; but he would leave it to me."

MUTUAL FRIEND: "It really is shocking, dear, the way in which you and your husband quarrel and carry on. I wonder you don't separate from him." Injured Wife: "What! go away and leave him alone to do just as he likes? Not me."

PAPA: "You saw that big boy beating the little one, and you didn't interfere? Suppose you had been that little boy?" Bobbie: "I did think of that, an' was going to part 'em; but then I happened to think, s'pose I was the big boy? So I let 'em alone."

HE was quite newly married, and when he returned home one day to find his wife in tears he was sorely troubled. "What are you crying for, Mary?" he asked. "Oh, John, I simply cannot help it! How those poor men must have suffered! That Jessop is a brute!" "Great Scott! What's he been doing?" "Haven't you read it? Why, it says that when he came in he started punishing the bowlers severely. He cut Hirst twice in his first over, and he knocked Haigh all over the field. Wainwright interfered, but he didn't do much good, because Jessop drove him to the boundary out of the way. Next Rhodes came up to see what he could do; but Jessop ran out to him and knocked him over the pavilion. Brown came on, and what do you think Jessop did to him? Why, he skied him, and I think he would have been killed, but, fortunately, a man with square legs ran up and caught him."

C. ARTHUR PEARSON LIMITED

THE EDITOR'S PAGE.

When a young man's in love, he thinks of nothing else than his sweetheart. He wants to talk about her, and to extol her beauty. Likewise, when a young man has just had his firstborn presented to him, he tells all his friends about it, and generally makes himself a nuisance by recounting the child's latest achievements. This sort of thing may be annoying, but it's natural, and, therefore, excuses may be found for it.

Similarly, when an editor persists in talking about his paper, allowances ought to be made.

With these few prefatory words, I trust I may be pardoned for once more pointing out to you the fact that the "Adventures of an Actress" are becoming more popular than ever. Readers in all parts of the country testify to their popularity.

Next week Miss Hazel Harlow will appear in Belfast.

Advice on Love and other Matters.

(Replies to Correspondents.)

"Dilemma" tells me that a year or so back he made the acquaintance of a charming young lady with whom he became fast friends.

"After keeping company for about ten or eleven months, she suddenly changed her mind and left me for another fellow. It caused me a lot of pain at first, then I thought to myself. 'Well, I am sure it has been all for the best, perhaps.' Since then she has been twice instrumental in preventing me from having another young lady. She told a friend she did not want me and yet won't let me have another? What am I to do? I still love her and will always do so, but can't for the life of me find out her motive in treating me thus. I am great friends with her family, and we are constantly together, which makes it all the more unbearable for me."

If I were you, "Dilemma," I should have a very straight talk with her. If she tells you seriously that she does not desire your further acquaintance, then your only course is to part with her for good. As to her preventing you becoming friendly with another girl, such "dog-in-the-manger" policy is certainly strange. But surely if the other girl likes you she will take no notice of any words of your old sweetheart. In any case, have a correct understanding. You might let me know how you get on.

"Polly's" case is really one which needs great consideration. When fifteen years of age she made a vow to become a missionary. At that time the thought never entered her head that she might fall in love. That is precisely what has happened, however, and she is sure he cares for her, but she feels she would be doing wrong by breaking her vow. I do not think, "Polly," that a vow of that sort made at fifteen is really binding, as you are at that age scarcely old enough to understand it. Special qualifications are required to become a missionary, and from what you tell me about yourself, I think you are better fitted to look after a home of your own than some wider field in a far-away country.

"Mother of Seven" writes a pitiful letter. She cannot help feeling intensely jealous as she sees her girls growing up and gradually taking her place in society. What can she do to stamp it out? I know it seems hard, "Mother," but think for a moment. When you were a girl you had your day, and now they have theirs. Be proud of them, take an interest in their pleasures, and you will find that your feeling of jealousy will disappear once for all.

You are quite right, "Trixie," in supposing that you may write to your former sweetheart and ask him to send your letters back, as he does not do so when you ask him personally. If he does not send them at the first request, you should write again and appeal to his honour. Of course, if he does not send them then you cannot do otherwise than let the matter drop. If you have written nothing you are ashamed of, you can afford to smile at a man who shows such a lack of good taste.

"Jehu" is very miserable. For years he has secretly loved the daughter of his master. He knows that by rights he ought to leave the situation and try for another, but cannot bring himself to do so as he feels the parting would be more than he could stand. She has no idea of his feelings towards her, and is a very proud young lady.

You are quite right, "Jehu," in saying that you feel you ought to leave your situation; I see no other way out of the difficulty. Some day you will marry a nice girl in your own class of life, and forget all about this hopeless infatuation.

I certainly think, "Poppy," that your lover should write to you more often than he does, seeing that he is so many miles away. Only four letters in twelve months is indeed a very small number. I think he ought to write to you at least once a week. By-the-bye, you do not tell me how often you see each other. Next time you see him telll him how glad you would be if he would write more often. I shall be pleased to hear from you again.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Mrs. DARNLEV SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 21lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me.

"Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sistor of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mr. WALKER, 236 London Road, Hazelgrove, Stockport, says: "I have used one box and am 14lb. lighter. Send another soon as possible."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. E. ALEXANDER, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They have reduced me quite 2 stone, and I am now quite cured."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Mrs. TAYLOR-ROBINSON, of Tweed Green House, Whalley Range, Manchester, says: "I feel so much lighter and better since taking your Tablets, and am so much thinner that I hardly recognise myself."

Miss A. LONG, of 9 South Parade, Waterford, writes: "Your Tablets have reduced me 14lb."

Miss A. DAWSON, 62 Orchard Street, Weston-super-Mare, says: "Glad to say the Tablets have sufficiently reduced me. I shall always recommend them."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

Mrs. DREW, of 1 Bellevue Gardens, The Nursery, Devizes, writes: "I took Tablets some years ago; they soon reduced me and I have not got stout since. Send me a box for my mother."

CHAPTER I.

It was a dark night, and a suspicion of fog lent extra gloom to the obscurity that hung pall-like over the Irish Sea. The steamer Mystic, with The Good Samaritan Company on board en route for Belfast, was steaming along at half-speed. There were but a few passengers on deck. Leaning against the taffrail amidships were two female figures, known in their public capacity as actresses as Miss Templeton Fane and Miss Juliet Fitzgerald, the latter a new-comer in the ranks of the company.

"That Miss Harlow," the latter was saying in a low voice, "seems a stuck-up minx. It's sickening the way all the boys dangle round her."

"She's a cat," answered the other vindictively, "I just hate her. She's just like a Sunday-school miss, and gives herself airs as though she were a duchess."

"She seems to have had some stirring times, though," said Miss Fitzgerald, "what with the fire at Newcastle and the adventure at Rugby. I never quite heard what that was."

"Nor I," answered Miss Fane, "but I believe it was all for an 'ad.' And then there's that Mr. Eric Monteith, her tame sheep-dog. I hate him, too. What's the good of being an actress if you can't have a bit of fun? If a Johnny writes me a note and offers to take me out to supper, why shouldn't I have a good time? But, that Miss Harlow, why, if you'll believe me, when we were at Sheffield some lord or other sent her a lovely bouquet of hot-house flowers, and in the middle of them was a beautiful diamond ring. There was a note with the flowers, saying that if Miss Harlow would wear the ring during the performance the giver of the flowers would take it as a sign that his offering was accepted, and that she would give him the pleasure of having supper after the performance. And what did she do? Threw the flowers away, and gave the ring to the manager to be sold, the proceeds to go towards charity."

Miss Fitzgerald uttered a low whistle. "And she's an actress!" she said.

"Yes, and I'll tell you something else," went on the other. "Pendennis was talking to the Harlow about stage kissing. He maintained that a true artist forgot everything except his art, and in stage kissing it didn't matter whether the kiss was real or not. In love scenes, he said, you ought to be consistent, and do just as you would do in real life. Miss Harlow answered that the true actor could not only trust to his powers of simulation to make believe he was in love, but that he could also simulate a kiss so artfully that the sham should pass for the real thing. She said that she never had and never would allow any man, even on the stage, to put his lips to hers unless he happened to be the man she was going to marry."

The other laughed. "She ought to join the Salvation Army," she said.

Miss Fane looked out into the blackness of the night for a few seconds, and then said: "Well, I tell you frankly, I hate her. She's an underhand cat, and if I could only get her out of the company I would like a shot."

A low cough from behind them caused the two girls to wheel suddenly round in some alarm, to find themselves confronted by the cloaked figure of a man who had stolen up to them without their becoming aware of his presence, owing to the throbbing of the steamer's machinery.

"A dirty night, ladies," he said in a pleasant voice. "We shall be late getting into Belfast at this rate."

Neither of the girls saw any reason to answer the statement. The man drew a little closer. "If I'm not mistaken," he said, in a low voice, addressing Miss Templeton Fane, "you were talking about the leading lady of your company, and from what I overheard, you do not feel any particular love for her."

"And if I did," answered Miss Fane hotly, "do you think it is a very gentlemanly act to sneak up and play the eavesdropper as you evidently have done? I request you, sir, to mind your own business."

The man seemed not an atom put out by this sharp rebuke.

"Not so fast, madam," he said. "I'll own I overheard what you were saying, but it was quite accidental, and I shouldn't have said anything about it, only I think I can see my way to doing you a good turn. I know Miss Harlow, and I know, moreover, something of which you are in ignorance, that she has spoken to Mr. Raymond Venables about you and that he is going to give you notice for dismissal after the week at Belfast."

"How do you know that?" muttered the actress quickly.

"That's soon told," the man answered, "I was sitting aft, not a quarter of an hour ago, when I suddenly woke up—I suppose I must have dozed off—on hearing voices quite close to me. I was in shadow, and the other three, who were Miss Hazel Harlow, Mr. Eric Monteith, and Mr. Raymond Venables, had no idea of my close proximity. Miss Harlow was speaking; these were her words: 'Not only in my opinion is Miss Fane a poor actress, but she is also a girl who exercises a bad influence over the other ladies of the company. I don't want to be unchar table, but I think she ought to go.' Whereupon Venables answered: 'My dear Miss Harlow, you know perfectly well that your word is law. Miss Fane leaves us after Belfast.'"

It was too dark to see the expression of rage that suddenly transformed Miss Fane's face. "You'll swear that those were her words?" she hissed, forgetful in an instant of her former resentment of the stranger's intrusion.

"Why, certainly," came the calm answer.

"I know why she said it," went on the infuriated actress. "I had a mash note from a Johnny last week and the letter fell into Miss Harlow's hands by mistake. She gave it me and begged me not to go out to supper with strange men. I told her to mind her own business, and now she's taking this dirty, underhand way of getting her own back. What wouldn't I give to be able to pay her out?"

The man seemed to hesitate, then he looked at the other girl. "I take it this lady is a friend of yours, Miss Fane," he said. "I say that, because if you really do want to get even with Miss Harlow, I think I can show you a way to do it that has no danger and that will effectually 'queer her pitch,' if you will pardon the expression."

"Oh, you can trust Julie," answered the girl recklessly; then her voice changed, "I'm not in for murder or anything like that," she said.

The man laughed. "You needn't be afraid of that," he answered easily. "If you give me your word of honour to take what I am going to say in the strictest confidence, I'll tell you a little story that will throw some light on to my proposition."

"Oh, I've said you can trust us," said Miss Fane. "I can keep a secret, and after what you have just told me I am ready for a good deal as long as I can pay Miss Harlow out without any bother."

"Good," answered the stranger. "Then listen to me and I'll throw a little light on to the private life of the good and virtuous Miss Hazel Harlow. I daresay you will have thought it strange that a girl such as she is should have suddenly taken to theatrical life. Some time ago Miss Harlow fell in love, or gave out that she was in love, with a young gentleman named Caldecott. The marriage day was already fixed. Squire Caldecott had got everything in readiness for his beautiful young bride, when suddenly Mr. Eric Monteith appeared upon the scene. Miss Harlow discovered that this gentleman was possessed of a fortune far in excess of Squire Caldecott's. In a moment she put about on a new tack, chucked her first lover, and made the running for all she was worth with Master Eric. But Caldecott was not to be put off so easily. He ran the fair Hazel to earth; and she, determined to win Monteith, induced him to get her, by means of his money, a position in The Good Samaritan Company. There they thought she would be safe from Caldecott, and Mr. Monteith was to join the company himself at the first opportunity. Well, it was a pretty scheme, and it's worked out all right. But Miss Harlow is as deep as you make them. She wants to have her fling through the world before settling down in Park Lane or Belgravia as Mrs. Eric Monteith, so she keeps him tied to her apron strings and thinks that she can play fast and loose with her first lover to her heart's content."

Now this story, as those who have followed Hazel Harlow's career will recognise at once, was an absolute misrepresentation of the case. Not only had the villain Caldecott driven Hazel from her home by reason of his unwelcome attentions, but he had also pursued the girl with all the cunning of his black heart, and had only been thwarted by Eric Monteith's devotion and the girl's own steadfast purity and courage, from achieving his base ends.

But Miss Fane, who had already, previous to the meeting with the stranger, conceived a fierce jealousy and hatred for her noble-minded and more beautiful fellow-actress, was ready and indeed willing to believe any vile story that could detract from the blameless character of Hazel Harlow.

"Then if that's the case," she said, "it only strengthens me in my resolve to help you in any way I can to punish Miss Harlow for her duplicity."

"And in helping me to punish her," went on the man, "you will not only pay off old scores, but you will also probably save yourself from dismissal from the company. You will in addition help Mr. Caldecott, who has been so cruelly wronged, to gain the girl who should long ago have been his wife."

"Every word that you say is true," answered Templeton. "You can speak out quite frankly and tell me how I can help you."

"You must know then," went on the other, "that Mr. Caldecott has determined to accomplish by secret ways that which he cannot do openly. He has determined to spare no expense in the achievement of his object; he wishes to strike when Miss Harlow least expects it, and in the most unexpected way. The day before yesterday he went over to Port St. Mary, which as perhaps you may know, is a seaport at the southern extremity of the Isle of Man. He has there chartered a most compact and seaworthy steam yacht. In a short time we shall be skirting the island. He will have put out in his vessel to effect, with your aid, the capture of Hazel Harlow."

"Is this boat, then, armed with quick-firing guns and torpedoes? Does he mean to blow up the Mystic, to be a twentieth century pirate and carry off his lady-love by main force? I don't see what chance he has of success."

The other laughed. "Oh, dear no," he said, "he has a much better plan than that, and one which I have already said, will necessitate your co-operation. And if all goes well I am deputed by Mr. Caldecott to make you a present of something to show you his gratitude and thanks."

"You seem to have laid your plans pretty well," said the girl in an almost awestruck voice.

"They say love will do anything," answered the man with a touch of cynicism, "and I must say that poor Caldecott is about as lovelorn as anyone I have ever seen. There's no accounting for tastes. I don't care for your statuesque, soulless beauties. I like something more piquant and emotional. I can't bear your tall women.

Putting all flattery aside, I think it's a good thing for Mr. Caldecott's affections that he never happened to meet with Miss Templeton Fane."

The actress laughed with would-be carelessness, but it was evident that the stranger's subtle flattery had not fallen on barren ground.

"But I'm afraid there is no time to pay compliments," the fellow went on quickly, "though if I only had myself to think of, I'd rather stay here and talk to you than get to business. Now if you will give me your attention for just ten minutes, I'll put you in possession of all the details of our little scheme, after which I don't see why we shouldn't be able to congratulate ourselves in a short time that we've got a dangerous enemy out of your path and made an exceedingly worthy young man the happiest in all Great Britain. You're an actress, Miss Fane, I've watched you with pleasure many times myself; all you've got to do now is to see whether you can act as well off the stage as on. So now let us get to the final details. Come up to the far end of the ship there, where we shall be free from observation, for I don't want Miss Harlow or any of them to see us talking together."

"There's not much fear of that," answered Miss Fane, "Jenny Lovelace, our soubrette, who is as thick as thieves with Miss Harlow, is luckily a terribly bad sailor. Garden, Pendennis, Lindsay, and our other men, are playing nap in the smoking-room, but still, as you say, it is as well to be on the safe side. Come on, Julie, you may just as well be in this business as I, for I daresay, if all goes off well, as this gentleman seems to think it will, Mr. Caldecott will stand you in for something as well as me."

Accordingly the two girls with the stranger discreetly following in their wake, some yards behind them, and walking as though he had no connection with them, so as not to arouse suspicion, passed down the deck of the gently heaving vessel, wet with the autumn fog.

"This fog's a godsend," muttered the man. "I hope it holds till everything's over, it'll add immensely to our chances of success."

CHAPTER II.

Jenny Lovelace lay prostrate upon her berth. She and Hazel had managed to secure a cabin to themselves. Hazel, although this was the first time that she had ever ventured upon the sea, suffered from no qualms of sickness. Her splendid vitality, fostered by years of country life, had made her immune from all such petty ailments.

"Oh, how bad I feel," moaned Jenny, "I shall look a positive scarecrow when we get to Belfast, and then it'll be a pleasure to feel the solid stage beneath one instead of this horrid insidious rise and fall."

"Poor Jenny," answered Hazel, "I wish I could do something to alleviate your sufferings. Personally I never felt better. Somehow I don't like the idea of climbing on to that narrow shelf they call a bunk. I don't think I shall go to bed. I shall have a good long rest and a bath when we get to Belfast."

At that moment there came a knock at the door. Hazel opened it to find herself confronted by Miss Templeton Fane, on whose face there seemed to be traces of tears.

"Oh, Miss Harlow," said the girl in an almost piteous voice, "I wish you'd come out for a little. I do so want to have a talk with you."

Hazel's surprise may be imagined. Hitherto Miss Fane had always treated her with a certain amount of curtness, mingled with resentment. On the few occasions on which Hazel had tried to make advances to her fellow actress the girl had only repulsed her, and, only a few days ago, when Hazel had tried to dissuade her from accepting the invitation of a strange young gentleman to supper, Miss Fane had broken out into words of anger and defiance. And now had come this sudden change of front. Small wonder at Hazel's mystification.

"I am in trouble, Miss Harlow," went on the actress in a low voice, "I know that I have given you little cause to like me, but I want to ask your advice about a question that has been worrying me for a good many days."

Hazel's warm heart leapt up in pity at the girl's evident distress. Good actress though Hazel was on the stage, yet in private life she was the embodiment of a pure and natural simplicity, and thus she did not, when dealing with others of her own sex, look for duplicity and guile. In this way she laid herself open to the attacks of those whose only weapon was deceit.

"Of course I'll come with you, Miss Fane," she said warmly, "and if I can help you in any way, you know I shall be only too glad to do so. We will let byegones be byegones." Then she turned round to Jenny. "I'm going for a walk on deck with Miss Fane," she said, "try and get some sleep, dear."

Jenny was feeling too ill to make any comment, otherwise it must assuredly have struck the warm-hearted little soubrette as peculiar that Miss Fane should have sought out Hazel's company at so late an hour. And so Hazel, closing the door of the cabin softly behind her, followed the actress down the long passage that led to the stairs that had access to the main deck.

Having reached the deck, Miss Fane led the way past the saloon towards the forward part of the vessel, and finally came to a halt close to where one of the steamer's jolly-boats hung suspended from its davits.

"I think we shall be quiet here," she said, "and I have a good deal I want to say to you. In the first place I want to apologise to you for my rudeness the other day in connection with that going out to supper. It is about that that I want to ask your advice,"—the girl paused.

"You owe me no apology," said Hazel gently. "Everyone has a right to their own opinions. I only told you what I thought about going out to supper with strange men, because one can't help seeing in stage-life what terrible temptations lie in the path of all virtuous women."

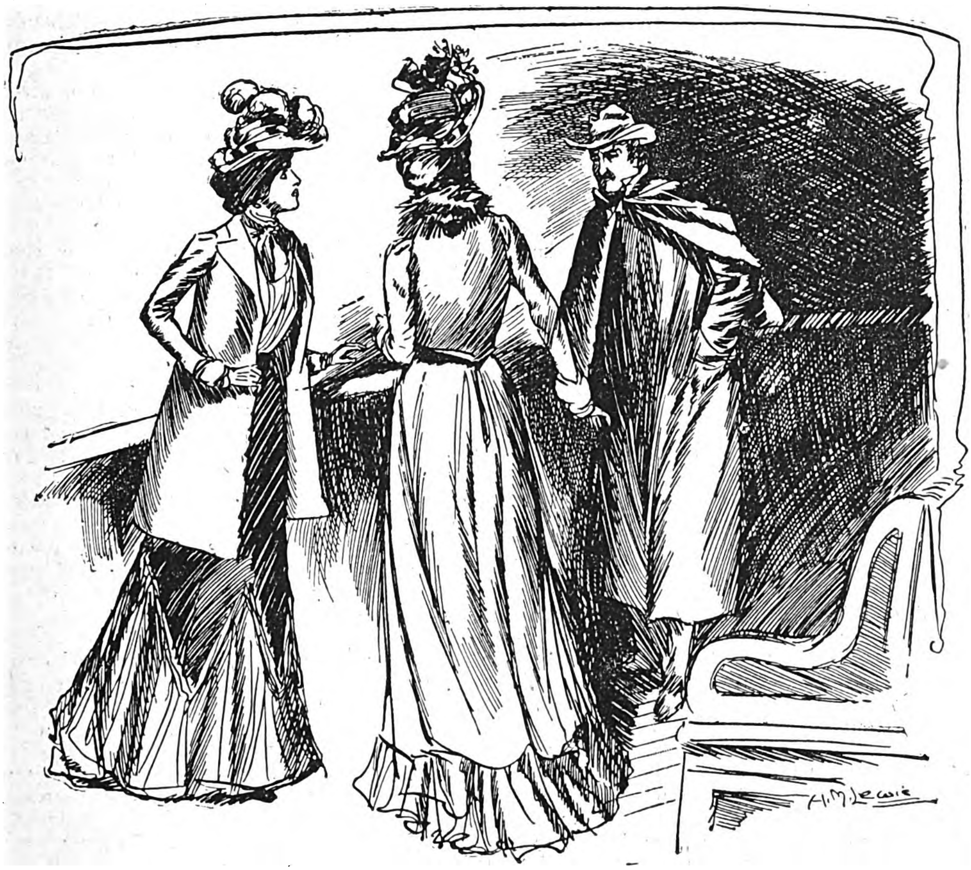
"You are quite right," replied the other in a low voice. "I wish I had never gone to supper with that man; there was no actual harm in it, I know, but he is coming over to Belfast. I have promised to see him there and I don't want to. I have fallen in love with him, and he, well, he only cares for me in the same way as a child might care for a new toy. You see how difficult the situation is for me."

The girl was acting as she had never done in all her life before; her voice was full of pathos, low-pitched subdued, tears seemed to be trembling upon her downcast lashes.

Hazel's warm heart leapt up anew; "I am so sorry for you," she said, "of course there's only one course open for you. You must have nothing more to do with him unless you think he intends to marry you."

"But I love him," murmured the girl. It was all that she could do to keep from bursting into a fit of hysterical laughter. Could Hazel have only seen into her soul for one brief instant, she would have realised the spirit of vindictiveness that had sent her enemy to lure her to disaster.

Yet it must be borne in mind that Miss Fane, eager as she was for revenge on Hazel, really believed that the story told to her a little while ago by the stranger was true. She really believed that Hazel was a hypocrite of the worst description. She had not been used to meet, amid all the thorny paths that run through the stage world, women of the whole-hearted simplicity which was Hazel's. It seemed to her that Hazel, as well as herself, was acting a part, the part of a thorough-paced "goody-goody." It was then only a case of "diamond cut diamond."



"I request you, sir, to mind your own business."

"Will you introduce me to the man you love when we get to Belfast?" said Hazel, in the same sweet, gentle voice, "I should so like to be a friend to you and to help you if I can."

The other made no answer, for just at that moment a faint cry sounded. "Help!" said a voice. Where had the voice come from? Not a soul was in sight. The fog by this time had settled down almost more thickly than before. Even the bridge upon which the captain stood was invisible. "Help!" said the voice again, this time somewhat more loudly.

The two girls pressed together almost convulsively.

"What can it be?" whispered Hazel in an awestruck voice.

"It seemed to come from above our head," answered the other in the same terrified accents.

A low moan followed her words. "It was in the boat," murmured Miss Fane, "whatever shall we do?"

Now Hazel was a girl to whom cowardice was a stranger. Someone was in trouble, in pain maybe; there was unmistakably a human being lying stricken in the boat that swung above her head.

She did not stop to think, did not pause to reflect that it was assuredly a somewhat curious event that the sound should come from one of the ship's jolly-boats. Her one idea was to succour whoever it was that lay in that extraordinary situation. She was agile and lithe as a panther. Templeton Fane seemed overcome with terror.

"I'll climb up into the boat," whispered Hazel, "and see what's amiss."

The next moment she placed her hand upon the gunwale of the swinging boat, another upon the rope that ran through the block connected with the fall of the davit. In quicker time than it takes to tell it she was over the side of the little vessel, to find that the tarpaulin which was usually spread over it to keep out the wet had been pulled aside and that a moaning figure was stretched out between the thwarts.

Hazel's heart began to beat more quickly. What on earth could be the meaning of so mysterious an occurrence?

"Who are you?" she whispered. "What's the matter? Shall I cry for help?"

"No, no," muttered the figure hoarsely. "Stoop down, I can't move. It's pain to me to talk as loudly as I am doing."

The warm womanly pity in Hazel's heart was stirred to its depths by the piteous appeal. She bent down as well as she could in the somewhat narrow space and tried to distinguish in the gloom the face of the speaker. In an instant the man's arms shot out and the unsuspecting girl was pulled down forcibly. She tried to scream, to struggle, but the man's arms held her like a vice.

"Keep still," he hissed, "and I won't hurt you." He uttered a low whistle. In an instant the sound of creaking cordage was followed by a perceptible lowering of the boat from the falls of the davits that secured it to the steamer. Again Hazel tried to scream. "Then there's no help for it," muttered the man. As he spoke the boat fell with a dull splash into the water of the sea, where it lay gently rocking on the oily swell, while the steamer slid past it with engines throbbing unceasingly, to be swallowed up in the gloom of the fog-laden night.

The man had followed up his last words by thrusting a gag with the hand of one practised to the use of such a fell instrument into the captive's mouth. Then with a piece of rope he managed, despite Hazel's struggles, to secure her so that she was powerless to move either hand or foot. This done he got to his seat and shipped a pair of sweeps between the throle pins, and turning the little craft's head, began rowing out into the black darkness.

The fog still lay thick upon the face of the waters. Suddenly the man ceased rowing. He could hear the faint sound as of a ship's engines pulsating through the gloom. In a moment he gave vent to a peculiar whistle uttered thrice. At once an answering signal came out of the darkness. Again he whistled; again the answer, drawing nearer and yet nearer. There was no mistaking the sound now, the steamer was approaching the spot where he and Hazel lay.

Before long a shadowy shape loomed up on his port bow. "Mermaid ahoy!" he cried.

"Aye, aye," answered a voice. "Lay to, and we'll draw up alongside."

Then came another voice. "Is all well?"

Hazel's blood seemed to turn to ice in her veins. It was the voice of Horace Caldecott. What hope could there be for her now?

In the meantime it may perhaps be as well to recapitulate and to explain Miss Templeton Fane's action in that night's black deed. It will be remembered that the unknown abductor of Hazel Harlow had explained to the girl the whole plot whereby she could aid in the discomfiture of her lovely fellow-actress.

Miss Fane had been directed to lead Hazel to where the boat hung suspended, the tackle that confined the craft to the steamer had been explained to the girl. All that she had had to do was to unfasten the rope at a given signal and let the boat fall into the water as has already narrated. Her task accomplished, Miss Fane, as though pursued by an unseen foe, fled away in a sudden access of terror from the scene of her base deed. She felt like a murderess. The girl was not wholly bad. Remorse seized hold of her; she sped away to her cabin and got into her bunk, yet there was to be no sleep for her that night.

CHAPTER III.

With some difficulty Hazel was lifted out of the Mystic's jolly-boat and conveyed up the side of the steam-yacht Mermaid. It was all like some horrid nightmare; the damp obscurity of the night; the sound of feet hurrying along the deck in the dark; the flaming of lights; the muffled sound of orders issued in hoarse voices.

She was carried down to a well-lighted, beautifully appointed cabin. Her bonds were taken off, the gag removed from her mouth. Beside her was an elderly woman, of somewhat weather-beaten appearance, with prominent cheekbones and hard, angular chin. Of Caldecott there was no sign.

Hazel turned to the woman in an access of terror.

"Save me! save me!" she cried piteously. "Is my life to be one long sequence of hideous villainies? What have I done that I should be persecuted so? What have I done that I should be made the victim of so dastardly a plot? By the woman's heart that must beat within your breast I implore you to save me from the monster who has lured me hither."

The woman's mouth seemed to grow a trifle harder. Her cold passionless eyes looked unmoved upon the pitiful picture of this lovely girl pleading for help.

"It's no good your making a fuss," she said. "Why, there's hundreds of girls would give their heads to be where you are at this moment. What's the good of talking nonsense about persecutions and all that? It can't be such a hardship to become the wife of a rich and handsome man like Mr. Horace. Why, I've known him all my life. I owe him everything I've got in the world, so it's no good your trying to blacken his character before me."

Hazel's heart sank within her. Her eyes filled with tears of hopeless agony. She looked wildly round the cabin as though seeking for some means of escape. The woman noted her action.

"Now do be reasonable," she said. "You can't jump out through the port-holes, and you're miles away from any chance of rescue. Mr. Horace has deputed me to tell you that if you will consent to become his wife when we reach Port St. Mary in the Isle of Man, which is not far away from where we are, he won't come near you till we reach land. What shall I tell him?"

"Oh, wait a few minutes—wait a few minutes," cried Hazel beseechingly. "Let me think. I can't realise that it's all true; that I have been trapped away like this; that I'm not really on board the Mystic with my friends all round me."

The woman sat down. "You can think for ten minutes," she said coldly; "Mr. Horace doesn't want to hurry you."

In the meantime all was bustle and confusion on the deck of the Mermaid. The fog had settled down now like a wall; it was hardly possible to see one's hand before one's face. Horace Caldecott was talking to his skipper.

"We must get rid of the Mystic's jolly-boat," he said, "It won't do to leave her floating derelict."

"I don't know," said a voice at his elbow, that of the man who had been responsible for Hazel's capture. "They're bound to get to know of the jolly-boat's disappearance. I should have thought that if you sent her adrift bottom upwards they would think when it was found that I and Miss Harlow were in Davy Jones's locker."

"You're right, Sam," said Caldecott quickly. "It shows that two heads are better than one. If I can once get people to think that, it'll be all the better for my future schemes."

"Confound this fog!" put in the skipper of the yacht. "We shall just have to lie to till it lifts. We can't get any bearings in this, and I for one don't want to be cut in half by a big ship."

Caldecott uttered an oath. "We can't stay here," he said savagely.

The sailor shrugged his shoulders. "Well, perhaps you'll kindly take the wheel," he said; "I've got the engines slowed down to quarter speed now. As far as I can judge we're heading the right way, but I'm not enough of a seaman to be able to take a vessel through a basin of pea-soup."

Caldecott realised that nothing that he could do or say would get him out of the dilemma. He could only curse the fate that prevented him from pushing on to the Isle of Man with all the pressure that the gauges of the Mermaid's boilers could stand.

"Well, perhaps the delay will give Hazel time to come to her senses," ran his unspoken thoughts.

The ten minutes specified by the woman who had been constituted Hazel's chaperon were drawing to a close. Hazel had sat mutely on the luxurious settee that ran all round the cabin trying to think out a solution of the terrible problem with which she had been so suddenly confronted. Her only chance now was a respite. If she agreed to marry Caldecott when they reached their destination, it would at least ensure her immunity from his hateful presence until land was reached, and perhaps she would find at Port St. Mary some means of frustrating her captor's resolve. Think as she would she could see no other course open. She sprang to her feet.

"Tell Mr. Caldecott," she said, "that I agree to his terms. He is not to attempt to see me until we reach land. Then"—her voice sank to almost a whisper, and every word seemed to be dragged from her mouth—"I will marry him."

"That's speaking sense," said the woman; "I'll go and tell Mr. Caldecott your decision at once."

She hurried out of the cabin, carefully locking the door behind her. In a moment Hazel sprang to her feet and began hurriedly looking round the room. Her first care was to examine the port-holes, four of which were set in the side of the state-room, but which, with the exception of one, were all screwed tightly down and much too small to allow the passage of a human body. One of them was, however, slightly unfastened, and of this Hazel made a mental note. She could find nothing else in the room, and was just about to resume her seat when her eye was caught by something bright that lay beneath a moveable oak buffet at one end of the cabin. A hurried examination proved this to be a tiny dagger of Oriental workmanship, more of a toy than a weapon —probably used as a paper-knife—yet with a point of surprising keenness. This Hazel thrust in her bosom, "For the worst," she muttered. "In case there is put before me the alternative of one of two crimes—either that of becoming Horace Caldecott's wife or of my own self-destruction, and I think that Heaven would account the latter of the two acts the least criminal."

She resumed her seat and took up exactly the same position as that in which she had been when her duenna had left the cabin. Hardly had she done so when the woman returned bearing in her hand a sheet of paper. This she laid down on the table in the centre of the cabin.

"Mr. Caldecott begs me to compliment you," she said grimly, "on your exceeding good sense. He also told me to remind you of the old proverb 'There's many a slip 'twixt the cup and lip.' He said that unfortunately that had been his experience on more than one occasion, and he didn't want to go through the same chapter of accidents again. He therefore asked me to beg you to be so kind as to put your signature to this document which I will witness." So saying she laid the paper, which was type-written, before Hazel's eyes.

The document ran as follows: "I, Hazel Harlow, late of The Good Samaritan Theatrical Touring Company, do hereby faithfully promise that I will go through the ceremony of holy matrimony with Horace Caldecott, of the Manor House, Honeycote, Oxfordshire, at any place or time to be settled by the said Horace Caldecott as he shall think fit, to which witness my hand and signature, ————, in the presence of ————, and the aforesaid," here followed Caldecott's signature in a bold flowing hand. Beneath this was a Somerset House agreement stamp.

The cabin seemed to go round before Hazel's eyes. The business-like appearance of the agreement, the formidable red stamp below, seemed to her unsophisticated eyes to constitute a covenant from which, if it were once signed, there could be no withdrawal. Visions of all the terrors of the law ranged against her seemed to rise up and add realistic terror to the situation.

The woman put a pen in her hand.

"What shall I do? What shall I do?" murmured Hazel, breaking out into a paroxysm of tears.

"Do?" came the cold answer; "just sign this paper."

CHAPTER IV.

Eric Monteith had gone to his cabin, and lying down upon his bunk, had tried to sleep. But try as he would he could find no repose. The cabin was unbearably stuffy; the dull throb of the slowly-moving engines droned unceasingly in his ears; the creaking of the vessel's sides, the faint wash of the sea outside, the thousand movements that go on aboard a steamer, combined to help in driving away all thoughts of sleep from his pillow.

At last he could bear it no longer; he determined to go up on deck and seek the fresh air above.

As he reached the hatchway that led up to the deck a woman brushed past him in wild haste and sped down the corridor that led to the ladies' berths. It was Miss Templeton Fane, her face was pale, her hair disordered. She took not the faintest notice of Monteith; her one idea seemed to be to get away to her cabin.

"I wonder what's up with her?" muttered Eric.

When he got up on deck it was to find that the fog had become very dense. The Mystic was moving along with painful slowness. Every now and then her syren emitted a dull reverberating hoot. The sound only seemed to add to the gloom of the night.

Eric made his way along the deck, keeping close against the taffrail, until he finally reached the place where not so very long before Hazel and her false fellow-actress had stood.

A noise as of something striking gently against the side of the vessel attracted his listless attention. The closest scrutiny revealed the fact that one of the ship's jolly-boats had disappeared, the noise he had heard was caused by the tackle which should have kept the boat in its place flapping against the ship's side.

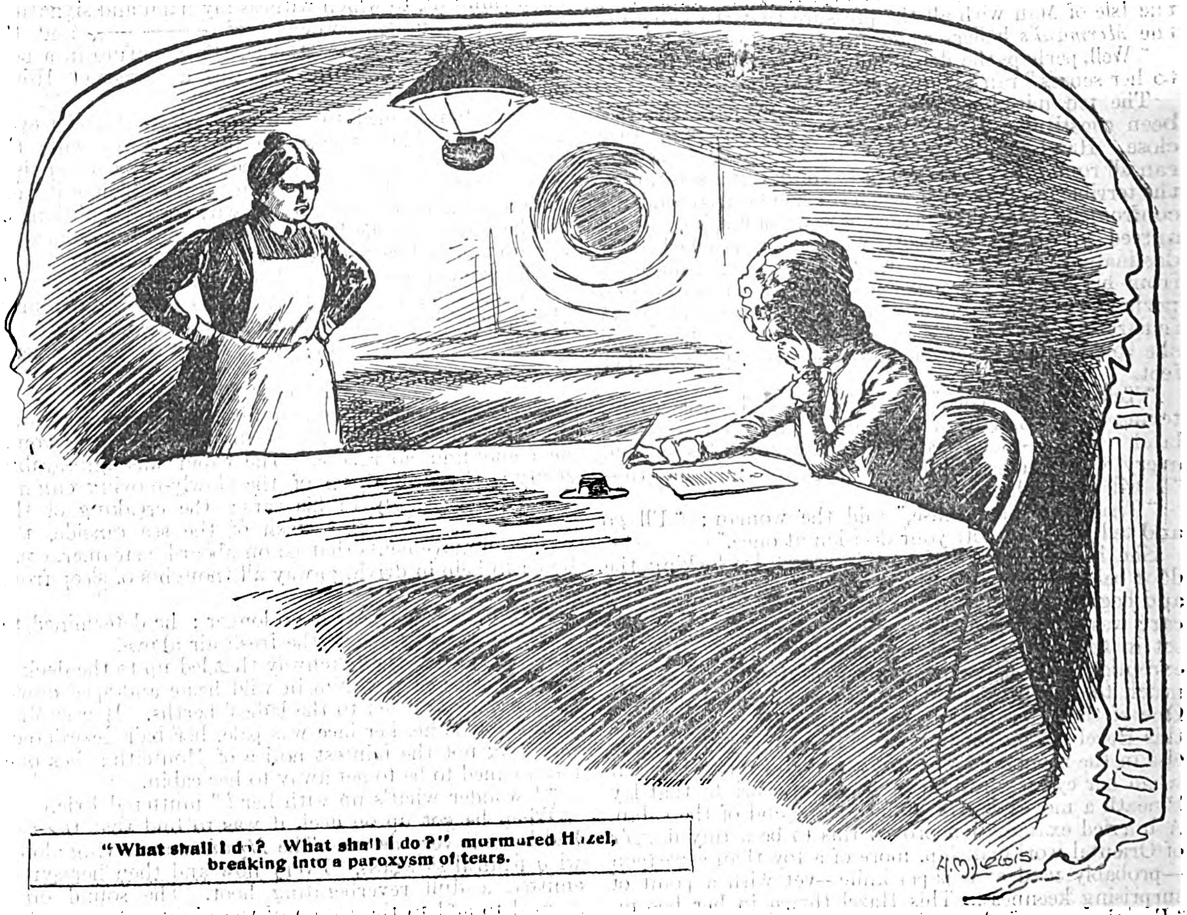
"There's something wrong here," he muttered. "Why has that boat gone? It must have been badly fastened to the davits and slipped away into the sea. The captain ought to be told of this. And yet surely," he went on, "the boat could not have come unfastened of its own accord. It strikes me that there's more in this than meets the eye."

He hurried back along the way he had come and suddenly ran full tilt into a cloaked figure female. Both recoiled from the shock.

"Is that Mr. Monteith?" asked rather a feeble voice.

"Yes," answered Eric. "And surely I am addressing Miss Lovelace?"

"Yes," replied the actress quickly. "Have you seen Hazel?"



"What shall I do? What shall I do?" murmured Hazel, breaking into a paroxysm of tears.

"No," replied Eric, a sudden fear gripping at his heart. "Isn't she with you?"

"No. Some time ago Miss Templeton Fane came down to our cabin. I was feeling awfully bad, but I heard Miss Fane ask Hazel if she would come on deck. She wanted to ask her advice about something. That was more than half an hour ago, and I thought Hazel ought to have returned by now."

"But I just passed Miss Fane on the stairway," cried Eric, "alone. She seemed very much excited about something."

"Alone!" echoed Jenny. "Then where can Hazel be?"

A cry fell from Eric's lips. "Good Heavens!" he said hoarsely. "Can there be any connection between Hazel's disappearance and the missing boat?" And in quick, hurried speech, he told Jenny about the discovery he had just made.

The obscurity that reigned on every hand hid the deadly pallor that crept over Jenny's face as she listened to her companion's words.

"Let us call the Captain at once," she cried, "and get him to institute a search all over the ship. How can it be possible that Hazel can have gone off in the missing boat? Why she would never have got into it of her own free will; and there surely could have been no cause for her to have left the ship. Anyhow, we must lose no time in finding her. If anything has happened I shall never cease blaming myself for not having gone with her and Miss Fane. I'll go at once to the latter's cabin and hear what she has to say about the affair." So saying, Jenny sped away forgetful now of her sickness, mindful only of the need for instant action.

Eric darted away to find the Captain, to apprise him of the loss of the ship's boat, and to hint that there had been perhaps foul play afoot that would necessitate instant and imperative action.

Monteith's news, as can be readily understood, caused a great sensation throughout the ship. The stewards and stewardesses were at once told off to visit every cabin and to thoroughly search the vessel to discover if any of the passengers were missing. It then transpired that Miss Hazel Harlow and a passenger who had booked at Liverpool under the name of Herbert Jones, were both missing. In the meantime Jenny had interviewed Miss Templeton Fane.

"Where is Miss Harlow?" she cried, bursting in upon the actress's berth without any ceremony.

A look of fear came into Miss Fane's face. "I don't know," she began, with a would-be air of bravado. "What do you mean by bursting in upon me like this? I am not Miss Harlow's keeper."

"You're lying!" answered Jenny, trying to keep calm. "I heard you myself come and ask Miss Harlow to go on deck with you. Since then no one has seen her, and you were observed coming down the staircase alone."

The actress thus driven into a corner determined on a bold course of action. "Miss Harlow swore me to secrecy," she said in a low voice; "but as you have driven me into a hole, I will tell you the truth. She has eloped in one of the ship's boats with a former lover."

The other uttered a cry. For a moment she stood motionless, her burning eyes fixed upon Miss Fane's face.

"I don't believe you," she cried out; "there has been foul play afoot. I know you hated Miss Harlow. You were jealous of her beauty and her goodness. What have you done with her? What have you done with her?"

Miss Fane was far too much involved now by her complicity in Hazel's abduction to betray her own part in the sinister affair.

"Prove that I am lying," she said defiantly. "What I am telling you is true. Miss Harlow is like other women; she plays her lovers off against one another. You will see that I spoke the truth some day perhaps."

For a moment a murderous desire to fall upon the girl's throat and drag the truth from her by main force almost beat down Jenny's forbearance. With an effort she restrained herself, and without another word left the cabin, her heart a prey to a hundred sickening doubts and fears.

The fog was so dense that the Captain was firmly convinced of the futility of altering the course of the steamer and instituting a search for the missing boat. Amongst the passengers generally, with the exception of course of the members of the Touring Company, the story that Miss Fane had circulated was accepted as the true one. One of the sailors, moreover, declared that he had heard the sound of engines of a steamer apparently lying to in the vicinity of the Mystic, and at about the time that Miss Fane had given for the enactment of what everyone was ready to believe a most romantic elopement.

"I have my duty to my employers," the captain of the Mystic said, in answer to Eric's impassioned appeal to try and make some effort to find the missing boat and its occupants. "We're late as it is. No, sir, I must push on for Belfast as speedily as possible."

Raymond Venables, in his capacity as manager of the theatrical company, was distraught. He had lost his leading lady and the biggest "draw" in his cast. He had never disguised the fact, moreover, that he was madly in love with the beautiful actress. Yet nothing could be done. As far as he and Eric could see Hazel was lost to them for ever, and could they have known her real plight their feelings would not have undergone any change.

Try as he would Eric could not gather up the threads of the mysterious disappearance of the woman he loved. Miss Fane was not to be shaken in her account of the occurrence, yet Eric could not bring himself to believe that the girl was speaking the truth. Hazel had no former lover save Horace Caldecott. On that point Monteith was positive. And he had been equally positive that Caldecott was not on board the Mystic when the steamer left Liverpool. Of the man Herbert Jones nothing was known, yet Monteith was forced to the opinion that somehow Caldecott and Jones were mixed up together in this black, inscrutable mystery.

Would he ever know the real truth? Would he ever see Hazel again? He pictured her at that moment lying cold and dead beneath the waves. Misery unspeakable filled his heart.

As for Jenny Lovelace, her feelings of agony were most poignant. "I shall never cease reproaching myself," she said to Eric, "for having allowed Hazel to go out alone with Miss Fane. Yet how could I think that any danger menaced Hazel out here upon the lonely sea?"

Monteith stifled a groan. "I am sure you have nothing to reproach yourself with, Miss Lovelace," he said in a low voice, "and besides, you were prostrate with sickness. It was no fault of yours. It was the fault of that cruel destiny that hems Hazel in—Hazel, the most beautiful, the most blameless of women, whose path should be strewn with roses instead of being beset by such cruel dangers."

CHAPTER V.

THE captain of His Britannic Majesty's cruiser Wasp was in a bad temper. He had been ordered to sail from Belfast to Liverpool at forced pressure to test the capabilities of a new type of boiler that a capricious Government had installed on his vessel, and now a dense fog enveloped sea and sky, and added to the darkness of a night that was, by the almanac, moonless.

By his side on the bridge stood his first lieutenant, as annoyed as was his chief at the climatic discomforts.

"Was ever man pursued by viler luck?" said Captain Bambridge. "The old women at the Admiralty aren't here to see the confounded state of affairs, and as likely as not they'll refuse to believe that there was anything more than a Scotch mist about to-night. I've a jolly good mind to signal 'Full steam a-head' and trust to luck. At the most we could only ram a tramp or run down a fishing smack; and what's that when the efficiency of the new boilers is at stake."

The first lieutenant laughed at his chief's saturine humour. "It's a case of being between the devil and the deep sea," he answered. "You can't serve the Admiralty and the owners of tramp steamers."

But although the captain had threatened to signal "Full steam a-head," he knew perfectly well that such a thing was impossible. There was nothing for it but to move slowly forward and to trust to the fog lifting.

Suddenly something happened that brought renewed alertness to Captain Bambridge and Lieutenant Styles. A faint cry rang over the face of the waters.

"Help! Help! Help!" they heard distinctly. The voice was a woman's.

"Great Scott! What's that?" said Styles. "Don't you hear the sounds of a ship's engines, sir?"

The captain's answer was to press a knob at his side, the next moment a great beam of light shot out from the bow of the cruiser, piercing the fog like a flaming ray of molten silver.

A bell rang down in the bows of the ship; men could be heard scurrying about on the deck; the cruiser swung round a point or two. As she did so a shadowy shape loomed up into the ray of the great search-light.

The captain seized a speaking-trumpet. "Ah-oy, there!" he cried, "what ship are you?"

"Steam-yacht, Mermaid, of Port St. Mary, Isle of Man," came the stentorian answer. "Who are you?"

"H.M.S. first-class cruiser Wasp. Were you singing out for help just now?"

"No," came the answer; "we're all right."

"I'll swear the cry came from the yacht, sir," whispered Styles hurriedly in his chief's ear.

"I think so, too," answered the captain. "There's something here wants investigating."

"Lie to," he roared in answer; "we're sending a boat alongside, and no bunkum mind. I've got the range of you."

A muttered curse was the answer to reach the ears of the two officers.

With that promptitude for which British tars are world-famous, a picked crew of bluejackets with the first lieutenant himself in command, manned one of the Wasp's long-boats, and in a marvellously short time was rowing with long measured sweep towards the suspicious steam-yacht.

Styles himself was the first to board the Mermaid. He was met by Caldecott, who broke out with: "What does this intrusion mean, sir? Have the officers of His Majesty's Navy taken to piracy?"

Styles took very little notice of his chagrin. "I heard a cry for 'help,'" he answered curtly, "in a woman's voice coming from this yacht. I must be under the necessity of searching your vessel."

He motioned to a couple of bluejackets. "Search the yacht thoroughly," he said, "and then report to me here."

A few minutes passed by, then the bluejackets appeared. With them was a girl at the sight of whom the naval lieutenant gave utterance to a sound of amazement. "Surely I know you?" he said blankly; "you're Miss Hazel Harlow, the actress about whom everyone is talking now."

"Yes, yes," answered Hazel breathlessly. Then she threw herself at the young sailor's feet. "Save me, sir, save me!" she cried. "Take me away anywhere so long as I escape from him"—indicating Caldecott with a gesture of horror.

The inflammable Styles, overcome by the sight of beauty in such distress, raised the girl to her feet.

"Certainly I'll save you," he said in a mystified voice. "What does it all mean? I have a boat here, and we can have you on board the Wasp in a jiffy, and perhaps we had better take the Mermaid in tow, so as to institute inquiry when we reach land."

"No, no," cried Hazel; "I want to get away from him; I never want to see his face again, and if he comes I shall have all the horror of publicity to face. Only take me to Belfast where my friends will be, and you will put me under a debt of gratitude that I shall never be able to repay."

Styles looked puzzled, as well he might. He had as yet only the most meagre details to help him in his elucidation of this mystery of the sea. He looked at Hazel's pale, beautiful face, and from her to Horace Caldecott, who, lowering and resentful, stood silently at his side.

"What have you got to say for yourself?" asked the lieutenant sharply.

Caldecott shrugged his shoulders. "Only that I picked up Miss Harlow drifting helplessly on the open sea in a steamer's jolly-boat. You will not deny that, I think," he said, turning to Hazel and trying to repress the smouldering passion that lay behind his eyes.

Hazel turned from him with a shudder. "Take me away," she said to the lieutenant faintly.

Styles, now more hopelessly mystified than ever, issued a few sharp orders; the result of these was that Hazel found herself snugly stowed away in the stern-sheets of the cruiser's long-boat and being rapidly rowed away from the hateful presence of Horace Caldecott.

She was taken on board the cruiser and conveyed to the captain's private cabin. To Bambridge, an elderly married man and eminently kind-hearted, she poured out the whole story of how she had been lured away from the Mystic and into Caldecott's clutches. Bambridge was furious.

"Why on earth did you let the fellow go, Miss Harlow?" he cried. "You could have had him locked up for this; a rascal like that has no business to be at large. From your account he must be a man of money and leisure. Say the word and I'll put about the cruiser's head," the Wasp was steaming back towards Belfast, "and have him in prison in a brace of shakes."

Had it been any other girl but Hazel, the answer to this proposition would probably have been in the affirmative, but Hazel was no ordinary girl. The modest retirement of her nature engendered by her long communion with nature when living at the farm at Honeycote, had never fostered in her heart the fierce extremes of love and hate that come so readily to some natures.

The danger put behind her for the present, she did not think of the future. She did not seem to realise that with Horace Caldecott she was dealing with a man whose nature was as far different from hers as the Poles are distant. He was a man of fierce passions, unscrupulous, almost a monomaniac where Hazel was concerned. She did not realise that in him she had found a lover who would never rest while life remained to him, from endeavouring to gain possession of the woman whom, as yet, all his most desperate schemes had failed to secure.

It was nine o'clock the next morning before the Wasp steamed into Belfast Harbour. The fog had lifted, and the habitues of the port were astounded to see the cruiser return. "A break-down," the more knowing ones uttered, "the Admiralty would have done better to have stuck to the old Scotch boilers."
